43029

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

43029

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXXX

JANUARY 1, 1930, TO JUNE 25, 1930

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

83

43029

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXX

JANUARY 1, 1930, TO JUNE 25, 1930

(Nos. 3365-3390)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
C	Correspondence
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
Dt	Driftway
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
I	International Relations, Documents
IP	International Relations, Foreign Press
IS	International Relations, Signed Article
M	Music
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

- Abbott, Edith D.
  - Washington (state) sugar beets and lumber; C 517
- Absolutes and progress
  - F. A. Manny; C 396
- Academic freedom
  - Pittsburgh university, illiberality; E 32
- Accidents. See Safety
- Ada beats the drum
  - J. W. Krutch; D 659
- Aeronautics
  - Accident in California costs many lives; EP 113
- Agricultural relief
  - Dollar wheat, lesson of; E 286
  - Farm board affairs in critical state. P. Y. Anderson; S 293
  - Legge, A., follows his own will. P. Y. Anderson; S 66
  - Meets enemy in commission man. R. S. Allen; S 8
  - Uncle Sam, plunger; E 351
- Alaska
  - Exploitation; E 116
- Aliens
  - Registration; EP 312, 409
  - Registration bill dies; EP 348
  - Registration indorsed by American federation of labor; EP 112
- Alimony. See Divorce
- All quiet on the western front. A. Bakshy; D 688
  - See also Remarque, E. M.
- Allen, Robert S.
  - Farm relief meets an enemy; S 8
- Aluminum
  - Duty lowered by senate; EP 231
- Aluminum company of America
  - Federal trade commission dismisses complaints against company; EP 437
- Amalgamated clothing workers
  - Union with brains; E 209
- American civil liberties union
  - Publishes annual report, "The story of civil liberty—1929-30"; E 721
  - Should have been on The Nation's honor roll for 1929. F. Goodman; C 125
  - Work for southern textile workers; aid needed; EP 30
- American federation of labor
  - At Marion, North Carolina; EP 166
- American society of newspaper editors
  - Rejects proposal to control members. P. Y. Anderson; S 539
- America's cup races; E 693
- Americans. See United States
- Anaesthesia known to ancients. C. Hooper; C 546
- Andersen, Hans Christian
  - Celebration in Copenhagen by children; EP 411
- Anderson, P. T.
  - Farmer subscribes for The Nation; C 218
- Anderson, Paul Y.
  - American society of newspaper editors rejects proposal to control members; S .. 538
  - Anti-injunction bill; delay sought; S 701
  - Boal, F. K., loses job as newspaper correspondent; S 9
    - Correction, EP 113
  - Boulder dam, struggle over; S 173
  - Campaign expenditures, Pennsylvania and Nebraska; S 538
  - Cannon, James, jr., challenge to United States senate; S 701
  - Communications merger dead; S 174
  - Communications, senate investigation; S 9
  - Farm board affairs in critical state; S .. 293
  - Hoover and newspapermen; S 419
  - Hoover, failure as politician; S 598
  - Hoover, feud with Republican senators; S 701
  - Hoover has bad luck with friends; S 9
  - Hoover hippodrome; S 293
  - Hoover "in bad" with country; S 538
  - Hughes, C. E., confirmation by the senate; S 238
  - Huston, C. H., activities disclosed; S .. 239
  - Huston, C. H., connection with Muscle shoals; S 293
  - Huston, C. H., lobbying and other characteristics; S 419
  - Illinois politics; S 485
  - Injunction bill, Shipstead; S 598
  - "Lame-duck" diplomats; S 66
  - "Lame-duck" sessions resolution held up by Speaker Longworth; S 485
  - Legge, A., and farm relief; S 66
  - Muscle shoals; S 485
  - Muscle shoals, conspiracy against public operation; S 538
  - Muscle shoals, scandal unearthed; S 293
  - Parker, J. J., appointment to supreme court; S 419
  - Parker, J. J., rejection; S 598
  - Pennsylvania politics; S 485
  - Pennsylvania primary results; S 651
  - Plots and counterplots in Washington; S 650
  - Post-office leases scandal; S 485
  - Power regulation bill; S 359
  - Prohibition and politics; S 119
  - Prohibition lobbying; S 650
  - Radio corporation of America, activities; S 120
  - Radio corporation of America, in the news; S 9
  - Radio corporation of America, monopoly hinders police work; S 174
  - Radio trust, prosecution; S 538
  - Roberts, O. J., nomination for supreme court; S .... 599; confirmation, 650
  - Scandal and impending scandal in Washington; S 358
  - Senate committee assignments; S 120
  - Tariff; S 650
  - Tariff; Grundy's work; S 419
  - Tariff; rayon duty increased; S 174
  - Tariff; to be as Hoover wanted; S 358
  - Unemployment bills, Senator Wagner's, held up; S 485
  - Washington correspondents; S 66
  - Washington topics of interest; S 599
  - West, J. L., becomes press agent of Republican national committee; S 239
  - Wilbur, R. L.; companionship with power men; S 419
- Anderson, Sherwood
  - Lift up thine eyes; automobile assembling plant; S 620
- Andrews, C. F.
  - What next in India? IS 25
- Angell, Norman
  - Naval politics at London; S 146
  - Parity or reduction? S 266
- Angels on earth. M. G.; D 24
- Anna Christie. A Bakshy; D 404
- Antarctica
  - Who shall govern? V. Karapetoff; C 125
- Anti-fascism
  - Mazzolo, C., killed in riot at anti-fascist meeting, New York; EP 479
- Apology for the present. H. Hazlitt; S 397
- Apple cart, the, by G. B. Shaw. J. W. Krutch; D 338
- Archbishop's automobile. S. Danziger; C, 151; see also 71
- Argentina
  - Gold exports stopped by presidential decree; EP 31
- Armament limitation and reduction. See naval reduction
- Art
  - American, industrial; EP 285
  - Etchings, genuine and false. C. Z. Offin; C 326
- Artists and models. H. Hazlitt; D 740
- Ashburn, Major general T. Q.
  - Government in business; Inland waterways corporation; EP .... 691; S 699
- Asphalt. A. Bakshy; D 632
- Associated press. See Newspapers
- At the bottom. J. W. Krutch; D 134
- Atlanta, Ga., communists. W. Wilson; S .. 730
- Auburn prison
  - Conditions; reforms recommended; EP .. 2
  - Disturbances; EP 312
- Audubon, John James; E 482
- Austria
  - Health insurance in. E. Kulka; IS 580
- Authors
  - Unfavorable conditions for; E 287
- Autographs
  - Presidents'; market value; EP 141
- Automobile tires. See Tires
- Automobiles
  - American, in Europe; EP 139
  - Assembling plant, work in. S. Anderson; S 620
  - British claims to lead in invention; EP 59
  - Sales; EP 87
  - Speed limits, use for; Dt 14
- Aux Cayes. See Haiti
- Aviation. See Aeronautics

B

- B., A. S.
  - Three little girls; D 525
- Babcock, Frederic
  - McCormick, R. H., success in Illinois primary; S 484
- Babson, Roger W.
  - Being right with Babson. R. W. Robey; S 359
- Baker, George L.
  - Way with communists in Portland, Oregon; C 423
- Bakshy, Alexander
  - All quiet on the western front; D 688
  - Anna Christie; D 406
  - Asphalt; D 632
  - Cain and Artem; D 739
  - China express, the; D 404
  - Color in films; D 337
  - Demon of the steppes, the; D 226
  - Devil may care; D 54
  - Fragment of an empire, a; D 226
  - Green goddess, the; D 280
  - Happy days; D 280
  - Journey's end; D 524
  - King of jazz; D 632
  - Last night, the; D 226
  - Laughing lady, the; D 106
  - Lost patrol, the; D 54
  - Love parade, the; D 158
  - Mammy; D 465
  - Man from Blankley's, the; D 465
  - Men without women; D 337
  - Mighty, the; D 106
  - News reel; D 54
  - Not so dumb; D 280
  - Old and new; D 577
  - Paramount on parade; D 577
  - Puttin' on the ritz; D 280
  - Rogue song, the; D 226
  - Sally; D 158
  - Sarah and son; D 404
  - Screen musical comedy; D 158
  - Silent enemy, the; D 632
  - Son of the gods; D 226
  - Song of the flame; D 632
  - Song of the west; D 337
  - Song o' my heart; D 465
  - Springtime; D 106
  - Turksib; D 688
  - Under a Texas moon; D 524
  - Vagabond king, the; D 337
  - Virginian, the; D 106
- Baldwin, Roger
  - Russia's conscientious objectors, appeal for; C 547
- Balfour, Earl of
  - Course in regard to inter-allied secret treaties and President Wilson; EP 383
  - Death; career. Lord Ponsonby; S .. 391; letter 653
- Baltimore street railway
  - Decision on return on present value, by supreme court; EP 85
- Bank failures. J. G. Curtis; S, 239; EP, 258; letter 625
- Bank for international settlements. See War debts and reparations
- Bank mergers
  - National city bank fiasco. C. W.; S, 11; letter 93
- Banks
  - Branch banking. J. G. Curtis; S 489
- Banks, savings
  - Life insurance. E. S. Smith; S 149
- Barkoski, John
  - Killing; W. J. Lyster and H. P. Watts convicted of involuntary manslaughter; E. Slapikis acquitted; EP 167
- Battle hymn of the republic as national anthem. A. C. Jourdan; C 297
- Bayard, Thomas Francis, on protection. C. O'C. Hennessy; C 625
- Bayous; Dt 570

- Beamish, Richard J.
  - Pennsylvania primary campaign; S..... 564
- Bekker, L. J. de
  - Haiti—a plan for self-government; IS.. 282
  - Massacre at Aux Cayes; IS........... 308
- Bergman, George J.
  - Magnes, J., views on Palestine; C...... 46
- Big-business brains; open letter to Senator Norris. J. G. Curtis; S............. 673
- Bilbo, Theodore G.
  - Wins pardoning championship; EP.... 410
- Birth control
  - Dennett, M. W., conviction reversed; EP 283
  - Roman Catholic attitude; M. Packard; C. 71
    - letter 151
- Black, Helen
  - Revolutionary tactics; C............... 570
- Black, Ruby A.
  - New deal for the red man; S.......... 388
- Blackwell, Alice Stone
  - India, British rule; C................ 675
- Blanshard, Paul
  - Racketeering; information sought; C.... 571
- Blease, Coleman Livingston
  - Defends lynching. C. B. Cheney; C.... 423
- Block, I.
  - On Magistrate Sabbatino; C........... 99
- Block, Paul
  - Not under obligations to National city bank 113
- Blossom, Frederick A.
  - Nominates E. Smith for The Nation's honor roll for 1929; C............. 218
- Blum, Leo
  - Alimony, payment of; C............... 395
- Boal, Frank K.
  - Loses job as newspaper correspondent for refusing to violate confidence. P. Y. Anderson; S.......9; correction, EP 113
- Bockmann, A. F.
  - News reel theater not worthy a place on The Nation's honor roll; C....... 99
- Bolitho, William (W. B. Ryall)
  - As seen by H. Broun. H. Broun; S... 288
  - Death; EP.......................... 691
- Bolivia. See Paraguayan-Bolivian dispute
- Books
  - Authors, unfavorable conditions for; E.. 287
  - Censorship. See Censorship, book
  - Children's. H. Broun; S.............. 695
  - Classics; who reads them now? H. Hazlitt; S............................ 449
  - Dollar books; E...................... 639
  - Dollar books, economics of. H. Hazlitt; S 676
  - Prices. M. D. Follin; C............. 363
  - Summer reading; E.................. 694
- Boston
  - Freedom of speech loses; EP.......... 410
  - Protest against shooting of rum-runners; EP 57
  - See also Censorship, book
- Boston symphony concert; four moderns. H. Hutchinson; M..................... 252
- Boulder dam
  - Another view. A. L. Smith; C......... 245
  - People's power; E.................... 385
  - Public and private interest at. W. C. Mullendore; R. Finney replies; C.... 179
  - Struggle over. P. Y. Anderson; S...... 173
  - Wilbur, Secretary, and Boulder dam. R. Finney; S......................... 214
- Bouton, S. Miles
  - Reparations referendum, German; C.... 327
- Boy, perfect; Dt......................... 178
- Boy scouts
  - And peace. J. E. West; C............ 364
  - Militarism. A. A. Conan; C........... 218
    - letter by J. M. West............... 364
- Boyden, Roland W.
  - Appointed as member of Permanent court of international arbitration; EP.... 504
- Brains, big-business; open letter to Senator Norris. J. G. Curtis; S............. 673
- Branch banking. See Banks
- Bread
  - American; Dt........................ 624
  - Good; Dt............................ 732
- Briand, Aristide
  - United States of Europe project; EP. 532; E 615
- Briggs, Clare
  - Death; E........................... 62
- Broun, Heywood
  - Bolitho, W., writings; S............... 288
  - Censorship, stage and press; S......... 36
  - Children's books; S 695
  - Communists; S....................... 63
  - Communists, division among; S.....353, 483; letter 570
  - Communists need better propaganda; S. 442; letter 733
  - Criticisms conditioned by mention of personal life of writer; S.............. 210
  - Dancing; S.......................... 171
  - Dog kibitzer; S...................... 263
  - Free speech, and police action against New York communists; S............ 145
  - Gold, M., "Jews without money"; S..... 353
  - Grammar; S......................... 509
  - Green pastures, the; S................ 415
  - Hack work; S........................ 387
  - Hoover, President; S.............563, 723
  - Kissing hands as reduction exercises; S 7
  - Liquor at private dinner parties; S.... 317
  - Newspaper sensationalism; S........... 117
  - Newspaper work; S................... 670
  - Novelty; S.......................... 617
  - Pope Pius XI's views on coeducation; S. 91
  - Printing trade controversy; S.......... 537
  - Supernatural, belief in; S............. 643
  - To be dramatic critic of The Nation in the absence of J. W. Krutch; EP.... 667
  - Unemployment; government employment agency needed; S.................. 442
  - White, W., largely responsible for rejection of Parker for supreme court; S 591
  - World, New York; S.................. 237
- Brown, G. M. L.
  - Business English; C.................. 16
- Brown, Mrs. William J.
  - Nation luncheon group in Baltimore; C.. 364
- Bruenn, Anna R.
  - Criticizes The Nation; C.............. 326
- Buell, Raymond L.
  - Special correspondent, the; C.......... 625
- Burrill, Mary
  - Green pastures, the; Negro view of; C.. 600
- Business
  - And the law; E...................... 614
- Business English. G. M. L. Brown; C.... 16
- Butler, Charles
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.. 35
- Butler, Smedley D.
  - Address on marines' work; EP........ 58
- Byington, Steven T.
  - "Our country,—"; C.................. 546
- Bynner, Witter
  - Ghosts; P........................... 240
  - To one under a mountain cloud; P...... 187
  - Wintry mind, the; P.................. 294
- Byrd, Richard Evelyn
  - And companions, on The Nation's honor roll for 1929 35
- Byrd antarctic expedition
  - Returning; inside story of life at Little America not told; EP.............. 259

C

- Cable bill. See Citizenship
- Cain and Artem. A. Bakshy; D............ 739
- Calkins, Raymond
  - Defends Watch and ward society; C... 178
- Cameron, Alice M.
  - Defends England; C.................. 571
- Canada
  - Tariff, speed-making records broken; EP 557
- Canick, Michael
  - Magnes, P., views on Palestine; C...... 45
- Cannon, James, Jr.
  - Challenge to United States senate; S.... 701
  - Stock-market activities; EP........... 719
  - Stock market and campaign activities; EP 690
- Carlisle, Floyd L.
  - Views on government ownership. Reporter; C.......................... 653
- Carnegie foundation
  - Carnegie corporation comes to its aid; EP 87
- Carnivorous plant; Dt.................... 674
- Carol, King. See Rumania
- Carpenter, Edward
  - Letters sought; C..................... 704
- Censorship, book
  - Boston bookseller sentenced for selling Lady Chatterley's Lover, by D. H. Lawrence; EP 2
  - Boston; Watch and ward society, my brother's peeper. G. Jackson; S.... 64
  - Boston; Watch and ward society defended by its president; C................ 178
  - Boston; Watch and ward society loses three distinguished members; EP..... 86
  - Massachusetts amends law; EP......... 438
  - Massachusetts supreme court upholds sentences; EP......................... 691
  - Modern history, by Hayes and Moon, barred in New York City; EP........ 559
  - Obscenity in court; E................. 642
  - Pornography and obscenity, pamphlet, by D. H. Lawrence; E............... 236
  - Smoot and Heflin on "obscene" books; E 384
- Censorship, plays
  - Players seek amendment of Wales act; EP 207
- Census, United States; Dt................. 517
  - Taking the census; EP................ 437
- Centenarian club of East Aurora, New York
  - Seeks members at $100 each; E........ 6
- Centers, creative. Z. and R. P. Hecht; C.. 270
- Century Magazine
  - Joined with Forum; EP............... 667
- Chain stores, war on. H. W. Schacter; S.. 544
- Chaplin, Charles Spencer
  - Abjures talkies; EP.................. 313
- Charles, Robert
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
- Chase, Don M.
  - Praise of G. W. Norris by California editor; C 245
- Chase, Stuart
  - Prosperity—Believe it or not. VII. Balancing the books; S.............. 39
- Chauvet, Ernest G.
  - Thanks for Mrs. Weed's article; C..... 517
- Chemical foundation
  - Investigation urged; E................ 169
- Cheney, Coleman B.
  - Senator Blease defends lynching; C.... 423
- Chernik, Jacob
  - Back-cover hyperbole; C............... 327
- Chicago
  - Financial plight; EP..........140; EP, 207
- Child labor
  - National committee celebrates twenty-fifth anniversary; EP............... 3
- Children of darkness. J. W. Krutch; D..... 134
- Children, saving; E...................... 481
- Children's books. H. Broun; S............ 695
- China
  - Civil war again; EP.................. 587
  - "Communist armies"; EP.............. 690
  - Madame Sun Yat-sen keeps faith. R. Gould; IS......................... 109
  - Missionaries' special privileges being surrendered; EP...................... 140
- China express, the. A. Bakshy; D......... 404
- Chinese Eastern railway. See Sino-Russian controversy
- Chinese theater, the; EP.................. 233
- Chinese-Russian controversy. See Sino-Russian controversy
- Chocolate soldier, the. M. G.; D........... 228
- Christian science
  - Censor. I. Machinery of suppression. H. R. Mussey; S.................. 147
  - II. "Obnoxious books." H. R. Mussey; S 175
  - III. Freedom of the press. H. R. Mussey; S............................ 241
  - IV. Siege of Fort Scribner. H. R. Mussey; S............................ 291
- Christian Science Monitor
  - Declines advertisement of The Nation's article on Christian science censorship; EP 207
- Christian social ethics, school of. V. D. Scudder; C...................... 571
- Christmas, night after; E................. 6
- Cinematograph. See Moving pictures
- Citizenship
  - Cable bill amended to make naturalization difficult; EP.................. 719
  - Denied because of refusal to bear arms; EP 558
  - Questions asked in Louisiana. S. T. Byington; C....................... 546
- City haul. O. G. V., D.................. 254
- Civilian
  - West Point expansion; C.............. 245
- Clark, John Bates
  - Veto the tariff; C.................... 675
- Classics, who reads them now? H. Hazlitt; S 449
- Cleland, John
  - Bought off by British government after publication of obscene work; E....... 414
- Clemenceau, Georges
  - Destroyer, the. R. Dell; S............ 92
- Cleveland Press
  - Editors purged of contempt; EP....... 348
- Clothing industry. See Garment industry
- Coal industry
  - Cutthroat competition; E.............. 261
- Coal miners, American
  - Battle goes on; EP.................. 411
  - Illinois dispute; EP.................. 232
  - Rebellion. L. Stanley; S.............. 356
- Coe, George A.
  - Militarism; C....................... 327
- Cohen, Alfred E.
  - Defends Judge Parker's Negro decision; C 547
- College athletics
  - Professionalism denounced by President Day of Union College; EP.......... 59
- Color; Dt 151
- Combinations. See Mergers
- Communications
  - Air monopoly again; E............... 90
  - Investigations, senate. P. Y. Anderson; S 9
  - Merger plan dead; P. Y. Anderson; S.. 174
- Communism
  - Atlanta's communists. W. Wilson; S.. 730
  - Broun, H., on communists; S.......... 63
  - Broun, H., on dissension among communists; S..........353, 483; letter, 570
  - Broun, H., on free speech and police action in New York; S............... 145
  - Broun, H., on need for better propaganda; S. 442; letters............363, 733
  - Brutality of New York police; EP...... 139
  - Convictions reversed in Ohio; cases in other states; EP.................... 690
  - Court rules labor contract may not be broken because laborer is a communist; EP 86
  - Demonstrations; EP 284
  - Demonstrations, March 6; EP..311; EP, 410
  - Denounced in court by Magistrate Sabbatino, sitting in judgment on youthful communist, D. Weiss; EP......58; C 71
  - Detroit; treatment of reds on March 6. C. Parker; C...................... 518
  - "Forceful" writers, dearth of. B. Rogers; C, 733; see also.................... 442
  - Membership in party not ground for deportation; EP 113

  - Portland, Oregon; Mayor Baker's way of handling communists. A. Jourdan; C 423
  - Treason-smellers active; EP 718
  - Treatment of communists, protest against. Student; C 395
  - Whalen documents printed in New York; EP 612
  - Whalenism; E 350
- Conan, Abraham A.
  - Boy scout militarism; C 218
    - letter by J. M. West 364
- Congress
  - Bills of merit; EP 718
  - "Lame duck" sessions resolution held up by Speaker Longworth; S 485
  - See also Senate, United States
- Conscription; E 439
- Constitution, United States
  - Fourteenth amendment; O. W. Holmes dissents on intent. C. Looker; C... 733
  - Undermining by executive usurpation; EP 30
- Cooke, R. F.
  - America and the League of Nations; C.. 244
- Coolidge, Calvin
  - Declares Americans can take care of their economic destiny; EP 87
- Cork; Dt 703
- Corn exchange bank trust company. See National city bank
- Cotton
  - Attempt by Farm board to support price results in loss; EP 719
- Courtesan. J. W. Krutch; D 606
- Creative centers. Z. and R. P. Hecht; C.. 270
- Crile, George W.
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
  - Placing on honor roll criticized. A. E. Wight; C 124
- Crime and criminals
  - Detroit crime clinic. J. A. Fellows; S.. 568
  - Misdemeanor or felony, at discretion of district attorney; EP 111
- Criticism
  - Critic, modern; point of view. C. H. Grattan; S 514
  - Conditioned by mention of personal life of writer. H. Broun; S 210
- Croly, Herbert
  - Death; EP 613
- Curran, Henry H.
  - On eighteenth amendment; EP 504
- Curry, W. B.
  - League of nations and treaty revision; C 151
- Curtis, J. G.
  - Bank failures; S 239
  - Big-business brains; open letter to Senator Norris; S 673
  - Branch banking; S 489
- Cutting, Bronson
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929... 35
- Czecho-Slovakia
  - German culture; EP........285; letter, 518
  - Minorities. S. Klíma; C 271
  - Minorities, treatment of. K. F. Geiser; C 364

D

- D., D. V.
  - Rebound; D 254
  - Recapture; D 228
- Dakin, Edwin Franden
  - Mrs. Eddy: The biography of a virginal mind; effort to suppress. H. R. Mussey; S 291
- Dance repertory theater. J. W. Krutch; D. 106
- Dancing. H. Broun; S 171
- Danziger, Samuel
  - Archbishop's automobile; C 151; see also 71
- Darlingtonia californica; Dt 674
- Daudet, Léon
  - Pardoned; returns to France; EP...... 59
- Daughters of the American revolution
  - Activities criticized; EP 232
  - Convention action; EP 504
- Davis, Horace B.
  - Substitute for lynching; S 12
- Day, Frank Parker
  - Denounces professionalism in college athletics; EP 59
- Deadwood Dick
  - Death; EP 613
- Deák, Frances
  - Hungarian decision; C (with editorial comment) 15
- Death takes a holiday. J. W. Krutch; D.... 79
- Debentures. See Tariff—United States
- Degrees, college, and wealth. E. Williams; C 151
- Dell, Robert
  - Clemenceau the destroyer; S 92
  - France wins at London; S 542
- Demon of the steppes, the. A. Bakshy; D.. 226
- Dennett, Mary Ware
  - Conviction reversed by circuit court of appeals; EP 283
- Deportation
  - Communist membership not ground for deportation; EP 113
- Detroit
  - Communists; treatment on March 6. C. Parker; C 518
  - Crime clinic. J. A. Fellows; S 568
- Deutsch, Babette
  - Sanctuary; P 187
- Devil may care. A. Bakshy; D 54
- Dictatorships; E 169
- Dill, Clarence C.
  - Tariff, action on; EP 637
- Diplomatic service
  - Business administration; EP 29
- Diplomatic service
  - "Lame duck" diplomats. P. Y. Anderson; S 66
- Disarmament
  - Einstein, A., views; E.....144; letter, 297
  - See also Naval reduction
- Dishonored lady. H. H.; D 254
- Distilled liquors known to ancients. C. Hooper; C 546
- Divorce
  - Alimony, payment of. L. Blum; C..... 395
  - And after. I. Children and property. M. Ernst; S.............172; letters, 395
  - II. Separation without divorce (a personal narrative) 211
  - III. Divorce and the child 268
  - IV. Insecurity of the child 323
  - V. Divorce with arbitration 393
  - VI. Child of divorce, a 393
- Doheny, Edward L.
  - Acquittal of charge of bribing A. B. Fall; EP 382
- Drama. See Theater, the
- Dresbach, Glenn Ward
  - Mountain background; P 365
- Drugs
  - Enforcement of laws by federal government; EP 284
- Dunbar, James
  - British budget problems; S 445

E

- Economics
  - Dominant in congress; E 168
  - King in Washington; E 142
- Edelstein, Harry M.
  - Separation of married couples; C...... 395
- Edison, Thomas Alva
  - Inventor enters heaven, the. J. Rorty; S, 295; letter 396
- Edman, Irwin
  - Dialogue; P 298
  - New naturalism; S 447
- Egypt
  - English subscriber speaks. E. Williamson; C 734
  - Nationalist party's success; EP 30
  - Treaty negotiations with Great Britain break down; EP 613
- Einstein, Albert
  - Views on peace; E..........144; letter, 297
- Encyclopaedia of the social sciences; volume I published; E 143
- England. See Great Britain
- English language
  - Business English. G. M. L. Brown; C.. 16
  - Correct English. H. Broun; S 509
- Ergot
  - Deterioration of; EP 587
  - Drug administration replies to criticism; EP 611
- Ernst, Morris
  - Divorce—and after. I. Children and property; S..............172; letters, 395
  - See also Divorce
- Etchings
  - Genuine and false. C. Z. Offin; C...... 326
- Europa (steamship)
  - Wins blue ribbon of Atlantic; E....... 413
- Europe
  - United States of Europe, Briand project; EP 532; 615
- European war
  - British entry made on vague commitment; Lloyd George admission; E 481; letter 571
  - Hatred survives and passes; EP........ 438
- Evans, F. E., soldier and newspaperman; C. 734

F

- Fall, Albert B.
  - Doheny, E. L., acquitted of bribery charge; EP 382
- Fame, bargain counter; E 6
- Farm board and relief. See Agricultural relief
- Fascism. See Anti-fascism
- Fascist league of America
  - Swan song; EP 41
- Fashions
  - Spring; EP 3
- Federal power commission
  - Bill for full-time body passed; EP...... 718
  - Couzens bill for reorganization; EP.... 611
  - Grants Flathead license to Rocky mountain power company; EP 638
- Federal reserve board
  - And stock market; EP 382
- Federal reserve system
  - Book on, by P. M. Warburg; E...... 535
- Fellows, J. A.
  - Detroit's crime clinic; S 568
- Ferril, Thomas Hornsby
  - Dialogue in Kansas—1850; P 677
- Filipinos
  - California prejudice; EP 165
- Finney, Ruth
  - Boulder dam, public and private interest at; reply to W. C. Mullendore; C 179
  - Wilbur, Secretary, and Boulder dam; S 214
- First Mrs. Fraser. J. W. Krutch; D...... 79
- Fischer, Louis
  - Latest bolshevik zigzag; S 513
  - Russia's new revolution; S 322
  - Vatican and the Kremlin, the; IS...... 82
- Fishman, Jacob
  - Jewish Morning Journal and W. Zukerman; C 703
- Flathead Indian reservation. See Water power
- Fletcher, Henry Prather
  - Work in Mexico defended; C 364
- Follin, Maynard D.
  - Book prices; C 363
- Food and drug administration
  - Chief replies to criticism; EP 611
- Fordham, Herbert
  - Navies, expensive; C 395
- Forum
  - Joined with Century Magazine; EP.... 667
- Fourteenth amendment. See Constitution, United States
- Fragment of an empire, a. A. Bakshy; D.. 226
- France
  - Colonies at peace; EP 559
  - Relations with Italy; EP 689
  - Wins at London. R. Dell; S 542
- Frank, Waldo
  - Mariátegui, J. C.; death; appeal for family; C 704
- Freedom
  - Defense of; E 507
  - War for; E 721
- Freedom of the press
  - Cleveland Press editors purged of contempt; EP 348
  - Korea. C. Hugh; C 652
- Freedom of speech
  - Broun, H., views; S 145
  - Loses in Boston; EP 410
- Freeman, Mary E. Wilkins
  - Death; EP 349
- French, Daniel Chester; eightieth birthday; EP 505
- Friends of music; "Dido and Aeneas." H. Hutchinson; M 497
- Friends, society of. See Quaker memorial
- Furness, Horace H., Jr.
  - Death; EP 533

G

- G., M.
  - Angels on earth; D 24
  - Chocolate soldier, the; D 228
  - Garrick gaieties; D 740
  - Jew Süss; D 24
- Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand. See India
- Garment industry
  - Stabilization needed; EP 3
- Garrick gaieties. M. G.; D 740
- Garvan, Francis P.
  - Investigation urged; E 169
- Gasoline. See Petroleum
- Gasparri, Cardinal
  - Resignation as papal secretary of state; EP 259
- Geiser, Karl F.
  - Czecho-slovak minorities; C 364
- Geneva tariff conference. See Tariff
- George, Henry, work of. G. White; C..... 363
- Germany
  - Bruening cabinet accomplishments; EP.. 533
  - Economic life and finances in sad state; EP 30
  - Women attend higher educational institutions in greatly increased numbers; EP 259
  - See also War debts and reparations
- Gilman, Grace
  - Non-violence in India; C 675
- Glassman, Don
  - Evans, F. E., soldier and newspaperman; C 734
- Glückliche hand, die. H. Hutchinson; M.... 605
- Goddard, Captain Calvin H.
  - Withdraws voluntarily suit against The Nation; EP 719
- Gold, Mike
  - "Jews Without Money." H. Broun; S.. 353
- Goodman, Fanny
  - Says American civil liberties union should have been included in The Nation's honor roll for 1929; C 125
- Gould, Randall
  - Madame Sun Yat-sen keeps faith; IS... 109
- Government ownership. See Public ownership
- Grammar, English. H. Broun; S 509
- Grattan, C. Hartley
  - Modern critic's point of view; S........ 514
- Great Britain
  - Budget problems. J. Dunbar; S....... 445
  - "Crisis" over unemployment-insurance bill averted; EP 206
  - Defended. A. M. Cameron; C 571

- Farmer, vanishing. J. A. Hobson; IS.. 714
- Government workings to be investigated. by H. J. Laski; EP.... 31
- Labor government difficulties; E.... 641
- Labor government weathers storms; EP 349
- Labor party in travail; E.... 535
- MacDonald and the Independent labor party; IP 407
- MacDonald leaves Independent labor party; EP 258
- Navy; naval politics at London. N. Angell; S.... 146
- Tariff; empire free trade defeated in debate; EP 167
- Taxes raised in new budget; EP.... 477
- Unemployment. J. A. Hobson; S.... 96
- Unemployment; ultimatum to MacDonald government; EP 411

Great Northern railroad
- Merger with Northern Pacific; EP.... 257

Green goddess, the. A. Bakshy; D.... 280
Green pastures, the. J. W. Krutch; D 376; H. Broun; S ....415; letter, 600
Greenburg, Sophie
- Nation Club of San Francisco dinner; C 152

Gregg, Richard B.
- India confronts Britain; S.... 696
- Will Gandhi win? IS 661

Ground hog
- Fails as harbinger of spring; EP.... 167

Gruening, Ernest
- On The Nation's honor roll for 1929... 35

H

H. H.
- Dishonored lady; D.... 254
- Infinite shoeblack, the; D.... 306
- It's a grand life; D.... 254
- Josef Süss; D.... 226
- Open door, the; D.... 226
- Out of a blue sky; D.... 254
- Simple Simon; D.... 306
- Strike up the band; D.... 226
- Women have their way, the; D.... 226

Hack work. H. Broun; S.... 387
Hadley, Arthur Twining
- Death; EP.... 313

Hague conference. See War debts and reparations
Haiti
- Crisis passes; EP.... 478
- Disturbances due to American administration; EP 30
- Evans, F. E., soldier and newspaperman. D. Glassman; C.... 734
- Hope for. H. H. Weed; IS.... 342
- Massacre at Aux Cayes. L. J. de Bekker; IS 308
- Plan for self-government, a. L. J. de Bekker; IS 282
- Roy, E., becomes president; EP.... 612
- Situation not reassuring; EP.... 438
- Situation promising; EP.... 348
- Thanks from Haiti for Mrs. Weed's articles. E. G. Chauvet, C. Moravia, S. Pradel; C.... 517
- Victory in. H. H. Weed; IS.... 378

Haitian commission
- Appointed; EP 2
- Bill passed by house of representatives; EP 111
- Does good work; EP.... 312
- Hope for Haiti, in report of commission; E.... 413
- Makes good beginning; EP.... 284
- Membership; EP, 205; letter on H. P. Fletcher 364
- Refused to President Hoover; investigation voted; EP 166
- Report; I.... 433

Half gods. J. W. Krutch; D.... 52
Halpern, D.
- Sabbatino, S., Magistrate; denunciation of young communist; C.... 71

Hamburg-American line
- Agreement with North German Lloyd; EP 383

Hamilton, Mary Agnes
- Visits America; EP 87

Happy days. A. Bakshy; D.... 280
Harding, Warren Gamaliel
- Letters, destruction of. M. Welpley; C. 244

Hardy, Arthur Sherburne
- Death; EP 349

Harris, Julian and Julia
- Retire from management of Columbus, Georgia, Enquirer-Sun; EP 141

Hart, Charles C.
- United States government appeals to soviets to aid him; EP.... 113

Harvard university, scrubwomen's case
- Discharge explained; EP.... 167
- Harvard defends course; EP.... 382
- Harvard "explains." G. Jackson; S... 212
- Scrubwomen, school for. G. Jackson; S. 118
- Women and wages. A. Lutz; C.... 297

Hawley, Edward W.
- Planet, new, name for; C 625

Hawley-Smoot bill. See Tariff—United States
Hayes, Carlton J. H.
- "Modern History" barred in New York City; EP.... 559

Hazlitt, Henry
- All too humanism; S.... 181
- Apology for the present, an; S.... 397
- Artists and models; D.... 740
- Dollar books, economics of; S.... 676
- Lysistrata; D 740
- Ripples; D 278
- Topaze; D.... 278
- Who reads classics now? S.... 449

Headless Washington. O. G. Villard; S... 264
Health insurance in Austria. E. Kulka; IS. 580
Hebrew university in Jerusalem
- Wolffsohn memorial library dedicated; EP 479

Hecht, Zoltàn, and R. P. Hecht
- Creative centers; C.... 270

Heflin, J. Thomas
- Book censorship; E 384

Hemingway, Ernest
- On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35

Hennessy, Charles O'Connor
- Bayard, T. F., on protection; C.... 625

Henry, James L.
- White woman's attitude toward Filipino; C 15

Henze, William E.
- On All quiet on the western front; C... 16

Hicks, Granville
- Twenties in American literature; S... 183

History, newer; E.... 262
Hobson, John A.
- Britain's vanishing farmer; IS.... 714
- Unemployment in England; S.... 96

Hoeflich, W. A.
- Investing $1,500; C.... 98

Holmes, Oliver Wendell
- Dissents on intent of Fourteenth amendment. C. Looker; C.... 733

Homicides. See Murders
Hooper, Charles
- Discoveries of the ancients; C.... 546

Hoover, Herbert
- Administration, bankrupt; E.... 560
- Administration, first year; E.... 234
- Administration; Hoover hippodrome. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 293
- Appointments diminish prestige; EP.... 503
- Appoints research council on social trends; EP 1
- As economist; EP 531
- Bad luck with friends. P. Y. Anderson; S 9
- Broun, H., on the president; S....563, 723
- Chastisement in coming election foreseen; E.... 480
- Failure as politician. P. Y. Anderson; S 598
- Failure to advise delegates to London naval arms conference; EP.... 585
- Feud with Republican senators. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 701
- Government by abstention; E.... 640
- Happiness boys; E.... 692
- Headless Washington. O. G. Villard; S 264
- Huston, C. H.; Hoover-Huston combination; EP 381
- "In bad" with country. P. Y. Anderson; S 538
- Newspapers, relations with. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 419
- Plots and counterplots. P. Y. Anderson; S 650
- Prohibition, attitude not known; EP... 257
- Prohibition called an experiment "noble in motive." A. Lattimore; C.... 363
- Tariff test for; EP 611
- Veto of Spanish war veterans' pension bill overridden; EP.... 665

Hoover, Theodore
- Defends war; EP.... 638

Hotel universe. J. W. Krutch; D.... 525 Housing
- New York City, plans; EP.... 691

Huebner, S. S.
- Says 98 in 100 are financially incompetent; EP 87

Hugh, C.
- Freedom of the press in Korea; C.... 652

Hughes, Charles Evans
- Appointment as chief justice of the United States; EP......165; E 208
- Confirmation by the senate. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 238
- Record; EP.... 165
- Remained on supreme court bench after running for president. W. Isaacs; C. 271

Hull house, fortieth anniversary; EP.... 587
Humanism
- All too humanism. H. Hazlitt; S.... 181
- Apology for the present. H. Hazlitt; S. 397
- More, P. E., denounces New York's intelligentsia; EP.... 719

Hungary
- Aristocracy's decline; IP.... 180
- Decision in recent case. F. Deák; C (with editorial comment).... 15

Hunt, Robert
- Marigold; P.... 397

Huston, Claudius H.
- Activities disclosed. P. Y. Anderson; S. 239
- Connection with Muscle shoals. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 293
- Hoover-Huston combination; EP.... 381
- Lobbying and other characteristics; P. Y. Anderson; S.... 419

Hutchinson, Howard
- Boston symphony concert; four moderns; M 252
- Friends of music; "Dido and Aeneas"; M 497
- Glückliche, hand, die; M.... 605
- Neighborhood playhouse program, with Cleveland symphony; M.... 374
- Opera in English; M.... 201
- Sacre du printemps, le; M.... 605
- Schola cantorum, concert; M.... 553

Hydroelectric power. See power industry

I

Illinois
- Politics. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 485

Illinois state prison
- Radio for prisoners; EP.... 667

Immigration
- Mexican, restriction, proposed; EP.... 667
- National-origins provision; EP.... 532

Independent labor party. See Great Britain
India
- All-India national congress for complete independence; EP 58
- British rule. A. S. Blackwell; C.... 675
- Civil disobedience movement EP, 383; EP 478
- Confronts Britain. R. B. Gregg; S.... 696
- English subscriber speaks. E. Williamson; C 734
- Events; EP, 585; EP.... 612
- Freedom, movement for; E 5
- Gandhi begins campaign. H. A. Miller; IS 501
- Gandhi begins civil-disobedience program; EP 313
- Gandhi begins making salt; EP 438
- Gandhi, the non-resistant. H. R. Mussey; IS 608
- Gandhi, the terrible meek; E.... 588
- Gandhi; will he win? R. B. Gregg; IS 661
- Gandhi willing to treat with Great Britain; EP 86
- Gandhi's purpose; EP 58
- Lord Irwin's blunder; IP 26
- MacDonald, R., and India; E.... 669
- Nationalist congress; EP.... 29
- Native doctors boycott British medicine; EP 689
- Non-violence not rejected. G. Gilman; C 675
- Passive resistance; E.... 722
- Peshawar killings; IP 741
- Revolt; E.... 561
- Revolt grows; EP 533
- Simon report, first volume published; EP 689
- Unrest grows; EP 637
- What next in India? C. F. Andrews; IS 25

Indians
- And the power trust; E.... 440
- Children, deficiency appropriation for; EP 438
- New deal for the red man. R. A. Black; S 388

Infinite shoeblack, the. H. H.; D.... 306
Injunctions
- Attempt to sidestep Shipstead bill fails; EP 718
- Delay on bill sought. P. Y. Anderson; S 701
- Shipstead anti-injunction bill. P. Y. Anderson; S 598

Inland waterways corporation. Major general T. Q. Ashburn; EP....691; S, 699
Insurance, health
- In Austria. E. Kulka; IS.... 580

Insurance, life
- "Cash and carry" insurance. E. S. Smith; S 149

Interstate commerce commission
- Railroad consolidation plan; E.... 4

International ladies' garment workers' union
- Union with brains; E 209

International review, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 306
Inventor enters heaven, the. J. Rorty; S 295; letter 396
Investor, small. W. H. Hoeflich; C.... 98
Irish Statesman passes; EP 438
Irwin, Lord, blunder; IP.... 26
Isaacs, William
- C. E. Hughes remained on bench after running for president; C.... 271
- Non-combatants and war; C.... 16

Isserman, Ferdinand M.
- Dr. Magnes and Zionism; IS.... 56

Italy
- Fascist finance. F. Nitti; IS 162
- Frees political prisoners on occasion of royal wedding; EP.... 59
- See also Mussolini. B.; Naval reduction

It's a grand life. H. H.; D.... 254

J

Jackson, Gardner
- Harvard "explains" in scrubwomen's wage case; S.... 212
- Harvard—school for scrubwomen; S.... 118
- My brother's peeper; S......64; letter, 178
- On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35

- Jaffe, Harry
  - Describes Russian prison; C 218
- Jamison, M. P. G.
  - Southern chivalry; C 326
- Janowsky, Oscar I.
  - Magnes, J., views on Palestine, and The Nation's; C 47
- Japan
  - And the naval pact. K. K. Kawakami; S 727
  - Elections, government victory; EP 259
- Jennings, Leslie Nelson
  - Admonition; P 17
  - Migrant; P 548
  - Tabula rasa; P 424
- Jew Süss. M. G.; D 24
- Johnson, Nelson T.
  - Open mind on China; EP 207
- Josef Süss. H. H.; D 226
- Joseph, George W.
  - Oregon gubernatorial campaign; EP 666
- Jourdan, Albert C.
  - Battle Hymn of the Republic as national anthem; C 297
  - Communism in Portland, Oregon; Mayor Baker's way with; C 423
- Journalists. See Newspapers
- Journey's end (moving picture). A. Bakshy; D 524
  - Journey's End (play); D 524
  - Produced at West Point; EP 141
- Jugoslavia
  - Matchek trial; E 693
- Julian petroleum company
  - Keyes, A., goes to prison; EP 348

K

- Kaplan, Saul
  - Palestine situation; C 45
- Karapetoff, Vladimir
  - Antarctica; who shall govern? C 125
- Karolyi, Count
  - Misunderstanding with friends; EP 57
- Kawakami, K. K.
  - Japan and the naval pact; S 727
- Kellock, Harold
  - Woodberry—a great teacher; S 120
- Kellogg pact
  - Honorable agreement, or bunk? EP 1
- Keyes, Asa
  - Goes to prison in Julian petroleum company scandal; EP 348
- King Lear. J. W. Krutch; D 498
- King of jazz. A. Bakshy; D 632
- Kingman, Harry L.
  - Restitution for Mooney and Billings; C. 125
- Klein, Nicholas
  - National gallery heroes; C 326
- Klima, S.
  - Czecho-slovakia, minorities in; C...271; letter 364
- Kohn, Robert D.
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 35
- Korea
  - Freedom of the press. O. G. Villard and C. Hugh; C 652
- Kral, J. J.
  - Masaryk, President, defended; C 518
- Kreymborg, Alfred
  - Dulcinea and Dorothea; P 702
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
  - Ada beats the drum; D 659
  - Apple cart, the, by G. B. Shaw; D 338
  - At the bottom; D 134
  - Children of darkness; D 134
  - Courtesan; D 606
  - Dance repertory theater; D 106
  - Death takes a holiday; D 79
  - First Mrs. Fraser; D 79
  - Goes to France for year on Guggenheim fellowship; EP 667
  - Green pastures, the; D......376; letter, 600
  - Half gods; D 52
  - Hotel universe; D 525
  - International review, the; D 306
  - King Lear; D 498
  - Lady Clara; D 554
  - Lawrence, D. H., death; S..320; letter, 570
  - Leiber, Fritz, D......466; 498
  - Lost sheep; D 606
  - Love, honor, and betray; D 403
  - Mei Lan-Fang; D 403
  - Meteor; D 78
  - Michael and Mary; D 52
  - Month in the country, a; D 430
  - New American drama, the; D 678
  - Penal law 2010; D 554
  - Plutocrat, the; D 306
  - Red rust; D 160
  - Retrospect of the drama; D 202
  - Review of the theatrical season; S 659
  - Rivals, the; D 403
  - Romeo and Juliet; D 578
  - Room 349; D 554
  - Tavern, the; D 659
  - This man's town; D 403
  - Uncle Vanya; D 554
  - Vikings, the; D 633
  - Wake up and dream; D 106
  - Waterloo bridge; D 106
- Kulka, Ernest
  - Health insurance in Austria; IS 580
- Kunitz, Stanley J.
  - Interior; P 452
  - Invocation to the phoenix; P 601
  - Parting; P 100
  - Skull of ecstasy; P 735

L

- Labor
  - Automobile assembling plant. S. Anderson; 620
  - How digging began. A. K. Tuell; S 361
  - Injunctions. See Injunctions
  - Unemployment. See Unemployment
- Labor party (British). See Great Britain
- Labor unions
  - Dress industry and steel industry contrasted; EP 233
  - Railroad, win in supreme court; EP 666
  - Unions with brains; E 209
- Lady Clara. J. W. Krutch; D 554
- La Follette, Philip
  - Out for governor of Wisconsin; EP 411
- La Follette, Robert Marion
  - Appointment to senate finance committee; EP 85
- Land and prosperity. G. White; C 99
- Laski, Harold J.
  - To investigate workings of British government; EP 31
- Last mile, the. O. G. V.; D 278
- Last night, the. A. Bakshy; D 226
- Latin America
  - And the United States; E 90
  - Law still permits president of United States to send military men; EP 586
  - See also Monroe Doctrine
- Lattimore, Alida
  - Hoover's description of prohibition; C 363
- Laughing lady, the. A. Bakshy; D 106
- Law
  - Respect for; Ct 321
  - Servant of life; E 534
- Law observance and enforcement. See National commission on law observance and enforcement
- Lawrence, D. H.
  - Death. J. W. Krutch; S....320; letter, 570
  - Pamphlet, Pornography and obscenity; E. 236
- Lawyers. See Legal profession
- League for independent political action
  - Williams, H. Y., western speaking tour; C 396
- League of nations
  - America and the league. R. F. Cooke; C 244
  - And treaty revision. W. B. Curry; C 151
  - Article XII, amendment proposed; EP 283
  - Development, work, and weakness; E 60
  - Permanent court of international justice; American membership; EP 504
  - Ten years of the league. F. Morley; S 67; E 60
- Lechlitner, Ruth
  - Cocoon; P 219
- Legal profession
  - Minnesota supreme court declares veteran preference law for admittance to profession invalid; EP 478
- Le Gallienne, Eva
  - As Juliet. J. W. Krutch; D 578
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 35
- Legge, Alexander. See Agricultural relief
- Leiber, Fritz. J. W. Krutch; D.......466, 498
- Levinson, Salmon O.
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 35
- Levinthal, Israel Herbert
  - Lord Ponsonby on Balfour; C 653
- Libel
  - Posthumous, actionable in New York. B. Tuska; C 734
- Liberia
  - Forced labor; I 256
- Library of congress
  - Vollbehr collection, and history of library. E 590
- "Lie-detector." V. Marshang; C 71
- Life insurance. See Insurance
- Lift up thine eyes. S. Anderson; S 620
- Lindsey, Ben B.
  - Barred by Colorado. H. McGuire; S 420
- Literature
  - American, twenties in. G. Hicks; S 183
  - Critic, modern; point of view. C. H. Grattan; S 514
- Littletown, prohibition in. W. W. Norton; S 510
- Livingstone, John A.
  - Radio trust's monopoly; C 71
- Lloyd George, David
  - Admits Great Britain entered war on vague commitment; E.....481; letter, 571
- Lloyd George, Megan
  - Maiden speech in Commons; EP 479
- Locusts, plague of; E 508
- Loeb, James
  - Mair, A. W., death; C 125
- London Daily Chronicle
  - Merged with London Daily News; EP 667
- London naval conference. See Naval reduction
- Looker, Charles
  - Holmes, O. W., dissents on intent of Fourteenth amendment; C 733
- Lost patrol, the. A. Bakshy; D 54
- Lost sheep. J. W. Krutch; D 606
- Louisiana
  - Murder case; white man convicted of murder of Negro girl; EP 479
- Love, honor, and betray. J. W. Krutch; D 403
- Love parade, the. A. Bakshy; D 158
- Lowe, Robert Liddell
  - De libris; P 572
- Lutz, Alma
  - Women and wages; C 297
- Lynching
  - Averted; EP 86
  - Blease, Senator, defends lynching. C. B. Cheney; C 423
  - Oklahoma; EP 666
  - Sherman, Texas; EP 586
  - Substitute for. H. B. Davis; S 12
- Lyne, J. G.
  - Railroad view of consolidation; S 94
- Lysistrata. H. Hazlitt; D 740

M

- McAdoo, William
  - Censured by New York City bar association; EP 478
- McCormick, Ruth Hanna
  - Victory in Illinois primary. F. Babcock; S 484
  - Wins in Illinois primary; E 480
- MacDonald, James Ramsay
  - And India; E 669
  - And the Independent labor party; IP 407
  - Leaves Independent labor party; EP 258
- MacDonald, Malcolm
  - Maiden speech in Commons; EP 479
- McGinty, L. J.
  - Race prejudice north and south; C 71
- McGuire, Harry
  - Colorado bars Judge Lindsey; S 420
- Macy, V. Everit
  - Death; public service; EP 383
- Magazines
  - New; E ....116; correction, EP, 141
- Magnes, Judah L.
  - And Zionism. F. M. Isserman; IS 54
  - Letters on his views on Arabs and Jews in Palestine; C 45
- Maiakovsky, Vladimir; suicide; EP 505
- Main, R. H.
  - Bank failures; C 625
- Maine
  - Hard times in. O. A. Robinson; C 326
- Mair, Alexander William
  - Death; tribute. J. Loeb; C 125
- Mammy. A. Bakshy; D 465
- Man, what is? E 143
- Man from Blankley's, the. A. Bakshy; D 465
- Manners, J. Hartley
  - Hatred of Germany kept alive; EP 439
- Manny, Frank A.
  - Absolutes and progress; C 396
- Mariátegui, José Carlos
  - Death; appeal for family. W. Frank; C 704
- Marine corps
  - Butler, S. D., speech on marine rule abroad to be kept quiet; EP 3
  - Butler, S. D., speaks on marines' work; EP 58
- Marsh, Corinna Reiman
  - Fulfilment; P 153
- Marshall, Carl
  - Pardoned by Mississippi governor after conviction of contempt; EP 410
- Marshang, Victoria
  - "Lie-detector"; C 71
- Martin, Helen R.
  - The Nation not on sale in Harrisburg, Pa.; C 270
- Masaryk, Thomas Garrigue
  - Eightieth birthday; EP......285; letter, 518
- Masefield, John
  - Appointed poet laureate of England; EP 587
- Matchek, Vladimir
  - Trial; E 693
- Mathes, Hodge
  - Tennessee yields to Malden; C 16
- May day
  - New York police action invites trouble; EP 505
  - Observance quiet; EP 558
- Mazzolo, Carlo
  - Killed in riot at anti-fascist meeting, New York; EP 479
- Mei Lan-fang; EP....233; J. W. Krutch, D, 403
- Men without women. A. Bakshy; D 337
- Merchant marine
  - Hamburg-American and North German Lloyd in agreement; EP 383
- Mergers
  - Business and the law; E 614
  - Control; EP 409
  - Government control or ownership. O. G. Villard; S 416
  - Letter to "My dear senator." O. G. Villard; S 416
  - Merger on merger; E 507
  - More in sight; EP 348

- Meteor. J. W. Krutch; D.... 78
- Mexico
  - President, new, P. Ortiz Rubio, installed. L. C. Wilson; S.... 216
  - President, Ortiz Rubio, shot; EP.... 206
- Michael and Mary. J. W. Krutch; D.... 52
- Michelson, Albert A.
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
- Mighty, the. A. Bakshy; D.... 106
- Militarism
  - Boy Scout. A. A. Conan; C....218; letter by J. M. West.... 364
  - Manifestations in United States. G. A. Coe; C.... 327
- Miller, Herbert Adolphus
  - Gandhi's campaign begins; IS.... 501
- Miners, coal. See Coal miners
- Minnesota
  - Veteran-preference law for admittance to legal profession declared invalid; EP.... 478
- Missionaries. See China
- Mitchell, William De Witt
  - Report that he will leave cabinet. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 701
- Monroe, Will S.
  - Carpenter, E.; letters sought; C.... 704
- Monroe doctrine
  - What it is and what it is not; EP.... 311
- Montana power company
  - Grab, threatened; EP.... 166
- Month in the country, a. J. W. Krutch; D 430
- Moon, Parker T.
  - "Modern History" barred in New York City; EP.... 559
- Mooney and Billings
  - California and Mooney. I. F. Morrow; C.... 653
  - Mystery; prize offered by Liberty for solution; E.... 351
  - Restitution in case of pardon. H. L. Kingman; C.... 125
  - Young, Governor, not yet convinced of accused men's innocence; EP.....113; EP.... 382
- Moore, Virginia
  - To spring; P.... 491
- Moravia, Charles
  - Thanks for Mrs. Weed's articles; C.... 517
- More, Paul Elmer
  - Denounces New York's intelligentsia; EP 719
- Morrison, Hyman
  - Jewish pioneers in Palestine; C.... 45
- Morrow, Dwight Whitney
  - Prohibition views; EP.... 611
- Morrow, Irving F.
  - Mooney and California; C.... 653
- Morton, David
  - Two swans I watched at twilight; P.... 357
- Mosbaek, L.
  - More men teachers favored; C.... 15
- Moscowitz, Grover M.
  - Censured by House of Representatives; EP.... 478
- Moses, Robert
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
- Mosher, W. E.
  - New York public utilities, legislation on; C.... 626
- Mosley, Sir Oswald
  - Resignation from British cabinet; E.... 641
- Moving pictures
  - Aesthetics; E.... 352
  - Antique or golden oak; E.... 562
  - Color in films. A. Bakshy; D.... 337
  - Commandments, according to Hays; E.. 441
  - News reel. See News reel theater
  - Screen musical comedy. A. Bakshy; D.. 158
  - Talkies, future of; E.... 61
  - Vulgarization; E.... 562
- Mullendore, W. C.
  - Boulder dam, public and private interest at; R. Finney replies; C.... 179
- Mundelein, Archbishop.
  - Automobile. S. Danziger; C, 151; see also C.... 71
- Murders
  - Substitute for lynchings; H. B. Davis; S 12
- Murray, Robert Hammond
  - Fletcher, Henry P., work in Mexico defended; C.... 364
- Muscle shoals
  - Conspiracy against public operation; P. Y. Anderson; S.... 538
  - Inquiry, further, needed. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 485
  - More delay; EP.... 503
  - Norris, G. W., praised by California editor; C.... 245
  - Scandal unearthed. P. Y. Anderson; S. 293
  - Senate passes bill for government corporation; EP.... 437
- Museum of modern art
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
- Mussey, Henry Raymond
  - Christian science censor. I. Machinery of suppression; S.... 147
  - II. "Obnoxious books"; S.... 175
  - III. Freedom of the press; S.... 241
  - IV. Siege of Fort Scribner; S.... 291
  - Gandhi, the non-resistant; IS.... 608
  - Tariff vote market; S.... 318
- Mussolini, Benito
  - Speeches, belligerent; EP.... 637
  - Speeches disturb Italo-French relations; EP.... 689

N

- Nansen, Fridtjof
  - Death; E.... 616
- Narcotics. See Drugs
- Nation, The
  - Albany club meeting. H. P. Winchester; C.... 271
  - Back-cover hyperbole. J. Chernik; C.... 327
  - Baltimore luncheon group. Mrs. W. J. Brown; C.... 364
  - Criticized. A. R. Bruen; C.... 326
  - Farmer subscribes. P. T. Anderson; C. 218
  - Goddard libel suit withdrawn voluntarily; EP.... 719
  - Honor roll for 1929.... 35
  - Honor roll for 1929; E. Smith nominated. F. A. Blossom; C.... 218
  - Honor roll protests; C.... 124
  - Krutch, J. W., goes to France for a year; H. Broun to be dramatic critic; EP... 667
  - Mr. Layman complains that it is esoteric. C. F. Roth; C.... 99
  - Not on sale in Harrisburg, Pa.; called not "strictly American." H. R. Martin; C.... 270
  - Philadelphia club proposed. L. Stern; C 675
  - Replies to charge that it is "destructive and never constructive"; E.... 168
  - San Francisco club dinner. S. Greenburg; C.... 152
  - Subscription discontinued. D. A. Richardson; C.... 218
  - Tariff poll....592, 618, 648
- National child labor committee
  - Celebrates twenty-fifth anniversary; EP.. 3
- National city bank
  - Fiasco in proposed merger with Corn exchange bank trust company. C. W.; S, 11; letter.... 98
- National commission on law observance and enforcement
  - Prohibition report criticized by H. L. McBain; EP.... 111
  - Report, preliminary; E.... 89
- National gallery heroes. N. Klein; C.... 326
- Naturalism, new. I. Edman; S.... 447
- Naturalization. See Citizenship
- Naval reduction (London conference and treaty)
  - Admirals' opposition to treaty; EP.... 638
  - American delegation returns; EP.... 531
  - Billions to "reduce"; E.... 589
  - Borah receives state department messages; EP.... 666
  - Chances for reduction excellent; EP.... 165
  - Conference a failure; EP.... 347
  - Conference makes progress; EP.... 205
  - Crisis; E.... 261
  - Crumbs only; E.... 506
  - Difficulties; E.... 33
  - Documents withheld by Stimson; EP.... 717
  - Dollars and ships at London.... 122
  - Failure; EP.... 381
  - Figures for American navy according to treaty; EP.... 477
  - France wins at London. R. Dell; S.... 542
  - Government by abstention; E.... 640
  - Grave news from London; E.... 233
  - Hoover's failure to advise delegates; EP 585
  - Hopes for conference; E.... 114
  - Hucksters' treaty; E.... 615
  - Issues at conference; E.... 88
  - Italians launch ships and approve plans for additional vessels; EP.... 558
  - Japan and the naval pact. K. K. Kawakami; S.... 727
  - Japanese claim to cruiser ratio; EP.... 1
  - Naval politics at London. N. Angell; S. 146
  - Parity the enemy at London; E, 314; letter.... 395
  - Parity or reduction? N. Angell; S.... 266
  - Protest against proposed abandonment of reduction program at London; EP.... 283
  - Roping America; E.... 412
  - Security and "sanctions"; IP.... 229
  - Slow progress at London; EP.... 139
  - Stimson denounces admirals for opposing treaty; EP.... 717
  - Treaty, joker in. D. W. Wainhouse; IS 634
- Navies
  - Expensive. H. Fordham; C.... 395
- Navy, British. See Great Britain; Naval reduction
- Nebraska
  - Campaign expenditures. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 538
- Neckties; Dt.... 490
- Negroes
  - Actors and singers; Dt.... 599
  - Assaults on white women, Baltimore; EP 86
  - Louisiana white man convicted of murder of Negro girl; EP.... 479
  - Lynching. See Lynching
  - Parker, J. J., attitude toward Negroes. O. G. Villard; S.... 512
  - Parker, J. J., rejection for United States supreme court. H. Broun; S.... 591
  - Race prejudice north and south. L. J. McGinty; C.... 71
  - "Racial integrity" still invoked in Richmond, Virginia; EP.... 112
  - South Africa's "white problem"; I.... 136
  - Square deal by Oklahoma mayor; EP.. 559
- Neighborhood playhouse
  - Program, with Cleveland symphony. H. Hutchinson; M.... 374
  - Returns; E.... 236
- New Freeman, the
  - First issue appears; EP.... 349
- New Orleans; Dt.... 422
- New Orleans cookery; Dt....546
- New York city
  - Housing plans; EP.... 691
  - Intelligentsia denounced by P. E. More; EP.... 719
- New York philharmonic symphony orchestra invades Europe; EP.... 533
- New York police
  - Display restraint at funeral of Communist worker; EP.... 206
- New York state
  - Water power; E.... 61
- New York World. See World
- New Yorker, the
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
- News reel theater
  - Criticism. A. Bakshy; D.... 54
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
- Newspapers
  - Correspondents, special. R. L. Buell; C. 625
  - Newspaper work. H. Broun; S.... 670
  - Press today. I. The Associated press. O. G. Villard; S....443; letters, 625, 734
  - II. The Associated press. O. G. Villard; S 486; letters, 600, 625, 734; see also 541
  - III. The United press. O. G. Villard; S 539
  - IV. Chain daily. O. G. Villard; S.... 595
  - V. Standardizing the daily. O. G. Villard; S.... 646
  - VI. Philadelphia cabbage patch. O. G. Villard; S.... 671
  - VII. What's wrong with the World? O. G. Villard; S.... 724
  - Sensationalism. H. Broun; S.... 117
  - Washington correspondents. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 66
  - See also American society of newspaper editors
- Nimmons, Carr, and Wright
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
- Nitti, Francesco
  - Fascist finance; IS.... 162
- Noise
  - Referendum; Dt.... 44
- Norris, George W.
  - Big-business brains; open letter to Senator Norris. J. G. Curtis; S.... 673
  - Praised by California editor. D. M. Chase; C.... 245
- North Carolina
  - Senator Simmons defeated in primaries; EP.... 691
- North German Lloyd
  - Agreement with Hamburg-American; EP 383
- Northern Pacific railroad
  - Merger with Great Northern; EP.... 257
- Norton, William W.
  - Prohibition in Littletown; S.... 510
- Not so dumb. A. Bakshy; D.... 280
- Novelty. H. Broun; S.... 617

O

- Oakland, California
  - Power control breaks down. J. C. West; C 423
- Obscenity
  - Cleland, J., bought off by British government; E.... 414
  - See also Censorship, book
- Ocean voyages by sail; Dt.... 217
- Offin, Charles Z.
  - Etchings, genuine and false; C.... 326
- Ohio state penitentiary
  - Fire; EP, 503; EP.... 532
  - Two convicts killed by machine-gun fire; EP.... 586
- Oil. See Petroleum
- Old age pensions
  - New York bills; EP.... 258
- Old and new. A. Bakshy; D.... 577
- Open door, the. H. H.; D.... 226
- Opera in English. H. Hutchinson; M.... 201
- Oregon
  - Joseph, G. W., gubernatorial campaign; EP.... 666
- Ortiz Rubio, Pascual
  - Shooting; EP.... 206
  - See also Mexico
- Othello, played by Negro; Dt.... 599
- Out of a blue sky. H. H.; D.... 254
- Ownership, public. See Public ownership

P

- Packard, Mandel
  - Birth control and Roman catholic church; C....71; letter of comment; C 151

- Palestine
  - And the Jews; letters on The Nation's views; C........ 45
  - Arab-Jewish riots; Arabs blamed by British commission; EP........ 411
  - Arab-Jewish riots; British investigation comes to end; E........ 31
  - Immigration suspended by British government; EP........ 639
  - Magnes, J. L., and Zionism; IS........ 54
  - Shaw commission report; E........ 441
  - Zionism finds itself. W. Zukerman; S 644; letter........ 703
- Paraguayan-Bolivian dispute
  - Breaks out again; EP........ 141
- Paramount on parade. A. Bakshy; D........ 577
- Parker, Caroline
  - Detroit reds, treatment on March 6; C.. 518
- Parker, John Johnston
  - Appointment one of worst in generation. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 419
  - Appointment to United States supreme court; EP........ 381
  - Attack and defense; EP........ 531
  - Attitude toward Negroes. O. G. Villard; S........ 512
  - Decision in Negro case defended. A. E. Cohen; C........ 547
  - Fight against, in senate; EP........ 557
  - Opposition; EP........ 477
  - Opposition grows; EP........ 409
  - Rejection by senate. P. Y. Anderson; S 598
  - Rejection due largely to W. White. H. Broun; S........ 591
- Parole boards
  - Recommended for New York state; EP.. 232
- Passive resistance, apostles of; E........ 722
- Peace
  - Article XII of covenant of League of nations, amendment proposed; EP.... 283
  - Einstein, A., views on disarmament; E.. 144
- Penal law 2010. J. W. Krutch; D........ 556
- Pennsylvania
  - Pinchot enters gubernatorial ring; EP.. 312
  - Politics. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 485
  - Primary campaign; EP........ 504
  - Primary campaign. R. J. Beamish; S.. 564
  - Primary campaign methods and expenditures. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 538
  - Primary campaign results; EP.....639; P. Y. Anderson; S........ 651
  - Republican politics; EP........ 410
- Pensions, old age. See Old age pensions
- Permanent court of international justice. See League of nations
- Peters, Harry T.
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
- Petroleum
  - Cutthroat competition; E........ 261
  - Doheny, E. L., acquitted of charge of bribing A. B. Fall; EP........ 382
  - Mergers; EP...... 257; EP........ 409
- Philadelphia
  - Newspapers. O. G. Villard; S........ 671
- Philippine islands
  - Independence; EP........ 165
  - White woman's attitude toward Filipino. J. L. Henry; C........ 15
  - See also Filipinos
- Pinchot, Gifford
  - Enters Pennsylvania gubernatorial ring; EP........ 312
- Pittsburgh, University of
  - Illiberality; E........ 32
- Pius XI
  - Views on coeducation. H. Broun; S.... 91
- Planet, new
  - Discovery; E........ 386
  - Name for. E. W. Hawley; C........ 625
- Plutocrat, the. J. W. Krutch; D........ 306
- Poems
  - Admonition. L. N. Jennings........ 17
  - Ambience of love, the. I. Schneider.... 706
  - Cocoon. R. Lechlitner........ 219
  - De libris. R. L. Lowe........ 572
  - Dialogue. I. Edman........ 298
  - Dialogue in Kansas—1850. T. H. Ferril 677
  - Dulcinea and Dorothea. A. Kreymborg. 702
  - Fulfilment. C. R. Marsh........ 153
  - Ghosts. W. Bynner........ 240
  - Interior. S. J. Kunitz........ 452
  - Invocation to the phoenix. S. J. Kunitz 601
  - Kneeling nun, the. E. L. Walton...... 627
  - Love songs after the Aztec. J. T. Shipley........ 126
  - Marigold. R. Hunt........ 397
  - Mid-voyage. I. Schneider........ 246
  - Migrant. L. N. Jennings........ 548
  - Mountain background. G. W. Dresbach. 365
  - Not yet a word. E. Seaver........ 328
  - Of changing seasons. E. L. Walton.... 519
  - Park in the gathering dusk. E. L. Walton 272
  - Parting. S. J. Kunitz........ 100
  - Portent. H. S. White........ 654
  - Sanctuary. B. Deutsch........ 187
  - Sexton's spade, the. G. P. Smith........ 48
  - Skull of ecstasy. S. J. Kunitz........ 735
  - Tabula rasa. L. N. Jennings........ 424
  - These humble people. E. L. Walton.... 72
  - To one under a mountain cloud. W. Bynner........ 187
  - To spring. V. Moore........ 491
  - Two swans I watched at twilight. D. Morton........ 357
  - Wintry mind, the. W. Bynner........ 294
- Poet laureate, English; E........ 536
  - Masefield, J., appointed; EP........ 587
- Poland
  - Conditions; appointment of J. N. Willys as American ambassador; EP........ 285
- Politeness; Dt........ 652
- Political leadership, genuine, needed in America. O. G. Villard; S.......354, 416
- Political prisoners
  - Freeing, as in Italy, suggested; EP..... 59
- Politics
  - Economics rules in Washington; E...... 142
- Ponsonby, Lord
  - Balfour, A. J.; S, 391; letter........ 653
- Poronography. See Censorship, book; Obscenity
- Porto Rico
  - Conditions; E........ 287
- Post office, United States
  - Leasing scandal. P. Y. Anderson; S... 485
- Power and power industry
  - Control breaks down. L. Todd; S...... 289
  - Control breaks down in Oakland, California. J. C. West; C........ 423
  - Control, public; E........ 168
  - Couzens introduces regulation bill. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 358
  - Flathead lease; EP........ 477
  - Flathead license granted to Rocky mountain power company; EP........ 638
  - Montana power company's threatened grab; EP........ 166
  - New York state; E........ 61
  - New York state development policy; EP. 112
  - Trust and the Indians; E........ 440
  - See also Boulder dam; Federal power commission
- Power commission. See Federal power commission
- Pradel, Seymour
  - Thanks for Mrs. Weed's articles; C..... 517
- Prayer, efficacy of; EP........ 667
- Prendergast, William A.
  - Resigns as chairman of New York public service commission; EP........ 206
- Present, apology for. H. Hazlitt; S........ 397
- Presidents, United States
  - Autographs, market value; EP........ 141
- Press. See Newspapers
- Printing trade controversy. H. Broun; S... 537
- Prisons and prisoners
  - American and British; EP........ 232
  - Last, worst month. L. J. Salter; C..... 733
  - Santanella, J., attempt to escape; EP.... 613
  - See also names of prisons
- Professors
  - Salaries; E........ 170
- Prohibition
  - And politics; P. Y. Anderson; S........ 119
  - Attacks on prohibition before house judiciary committee; EP........ 284
  - Boston protest against shooting of rum-runners; EP........ 57
  - Curran, H. H., views on eighteenth amendment; EP........ 504
  - Enforcement personnel, new, needed; EP 29
  - Flare up; E........ 668
  - Hoover, President, attitude not known; EP........ 257
  - Hoover's description of experiment. A. Lattimore; C........ 363
  - In Littletown. W. W. Norton; S...... 510
  - Liquor at private dinner parties; S..... 317
  - Lobbying. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 651
  - Morrow, D. W., views of; EP........ 611
  - Under fire; EP........ 231
- Proofreaders
  - Almost extinct; tribute to G. Schumm; Dt 124
  - Lynch, J. M., explains present conditions; Dt........ 325
- Propaganda. See Public utilities
- Prosperity
  - And the land. G. White; C........ 99
  - Believe it or not. VII—Balancing the books. S. Chase; S........ 39
  - Figures show decline; EP........ 558
  - Hard times in Maine. O. A. Robinson; C........ 326
- Protection. See Tariff—United States
- Public ownership
  - Carlisle, F. L. views. Reporter; C..... 653
- Public utilities
  - New York state regulation; EP, 532, 559; letter........ 626
  - Ownership, public and private. W. Raoul; C........ 327
  - Propaganda activities not admitted to record; EP........ 112
  - Regulation in critical state; EP........ 206
- Pulitzer awards; EP........ 613
- Putnam, George Haven
  - Death; EP........ 285
- Puttin' on the ritz. A. Bakshy; D........ 280

Q

- Quaker memorial. L. H. Wall; C........ 732
- Qualia, C. B., and W. A. Whatley
  - Spanish drama; C........ 15

R

- Race problem. See Negroes
- Racketeering
  - Information sought. P. Blanshard; C... 571
- Radio
  - For inmates of Illinois state penitentiary; EP........ 667
  - Merger on merger; E........ 507
  - See also Radio trust
- Radio corporation of America
  - Activities; S........ 120
  - Merger; E........ 507
  - Monopoly hinders police work in Detroit and Chicago. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 174
  - Story of establishment told to Senate committee. P. Y. Anderson; S...... 9
- Radio trust
  - Monopoly. J. A. Livingstone; C....... 71
  - Prosecution strikes snag. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 538
- Railroad rates
  - Discriminatory rates defeated by supreme court decision; EP........ 690
- Railroads
  - Consolidation; EP........ 257
  - Consolidation. J. G. Lyne; S........ 94
  - Consolidation plan of Interstate commerce commission; E........ 4
  - Consolidation; why consolidate? D. R. Richberg; S........ 37
  - Earnings, decline in; EP........ 666
  - Stations; Dt........ 98
- Raoul, William
  - Public utilities, ownership; C........ 327
- Rayon. See Tariff
- Reading. See Books
- Rebound. D. V. D.; D........ 254
- Recapture. D. V. D.; D........ 228
- Red rust. J. W. Krutch; D........ 160
- Religious men in politics; EP........ 586
- Remarque, Erich Maria
  - All quiet on the western front again. W. E. Henze; C........ 16
- Reparations. See War debts and reparations
- Reporter
  - Carlisle, F. L. on government ownership; C........ 653
- Republican party
  - Chastisement in coming election foreseen; E........ 480
  - West, J. L., becomes press agent of national committee; S........ 239
- Research council on social trends. See Social welfare
- Resnick, Louis
  - Safety; I. How safe is the subway? S.. 566
  - II. Saving and wasting lives; S....... 593
  - III. Why safety movement fails; S..... 622
- Revolutionary tactics. H. Black; C........ 570
- Rice, Elmer
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
- Richardson, D. A.
  - Discontinues subscription; C........ 218
- Richberg, Donald R.
  - Why consolidate railroads? S........ 67
- Richmond, S. L.
  - Jewish enterprise in Palestine; C....... 46
- Richmond, Virginia
  - Segregation of races; EP........ 112
- Rickatson-Hatt, Bernard
  - On O. G. Villard's article on Associated press; C........ 600
- Ripples. H. Hazlitt; D........ 278
- Rivals, the. J. W. Krutch; D........ 403
- Roberts, Owen J.
  - Nomination for United States supreme court; EP..585; P. Y. Anderson; S.. 599
  - Nomination is confirmed. P. Y. Anderson; S........ 651
- Robey, Ralph West
  - Being right with Babson; S........ 359
- Robinson, Otis A.
  - Hard times in Maine; C........ 326
- Rocky mountain power company. See Power and power industry
- Rogers, Bruce
  - Broun, H., views on dearth of "forceful" communist writers; C........ 733
- Rogue song, the. A. Bakshy; D........ 226
- Roman catholic church
  - And birth control. M. Packard; C, 71: letter of comment........ 151
- Romeo and Juliet. J. W. Krutch; D....... 578
- Room 349. J. W. Krutch; D........ 556
- Rorty, James
  - Inventor enters heaven, the; S......295; letter........ 396
- Roth, Carl F.
  - Mr. Layman complains; C........ 99
- Roumania. See Rumania
- Roy, Eugene. See Haiti
- Rubio, Ortiz. President of Mexico. See Ortiz Rubio, P.
- Rumania
  - Carol returns; EP........ 689
- Russia
  - Agrarian policy slows down; EP....... 347
  - Appeal to soviet government by United States to aid C. C. Hart; EP........ 113
  - Bars P. Scheffer; EP........ 3
  - Collectivization and nationalization of farms slowed down; EP........ 285

  - Collectivization of agriculture. L. Fischer; S ... 513
  - Conscientious objectors, appeal for. R. Baldwin; C ... 547
  - Five-year plan; E ... 561
  - Godlessness and humbuggery; E ... 260
  - Goes communist; EP ... 87
  - Prayer, day of, comes and goes; EP ... 347
  - Prison described. H. Jaffe; C ... 218
  - Religion in. L. Fischer; S ... 417
  - Religious policy; protests against protests; EP ... 313
  - Revolution, new. L. Fischer; S ... 322
  - Soviets, non-existent; E ... 34
  - Trip to. H. R. Seager; C ... 518
  - Turkestan-Siberia railroad completed; EP 533
  - Vatican and the Kremlin, the; L. Fischer; IS ... 82
- Russian-Chinese controversy. See Sino-Russian controversy
- Ryall, William Bolitho
  - Death; EP ... 691

S

- Sabbatino, Sylvester
  - Denounces communism in sitting in judgment on youthful communist, D. Weiss; EP ... 58; C 71
- Sacco-Vanzetti
  - Mystery, prize offered by Liberty for solution; E ... 351
- Sacre du printemps, le. H. Hutchinson; M .. 605
- Sailing voyages; Dt ... 217
- Safety
  - I. How safe is the subway? L. Resnick; S ... 566
  - II. Saving and wasting lives. L. Resnick; S ... 593
  - III. Why safety movement fails. L. Resnick; S ... 622
- Saint Augustine, Florida; Dt ... 244
- Saint Clair, Ruth
  - Sentenced to life imprisonment after fourth conviction for shoplifting; EP 206; EP ... 258
- Sally. A. Bakshy; D ... 158
- Salter, L. J.
  - Last month in prison; C ... 733
- Sanford, Edward Terry
  - Death; EP ... 311
- Santanella, John
  - Attempt to escape from prison; EP, 613; letter ... 733
- Sarah and son. A. Bakshy; D ... 404
- Savings bank life insurance. E. S. Smith; S 149
- Sayre, J. Nevin
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 ... 35
- Schacter, Harry W.
  - Chain store, war on; S ... 544
- Scheffer, Paul
  - Barred from Russia; EP ... 3
- Schneider, Isidor
  - Ambience of love, the; P ... 706
  - Mid-voyage; P ... 246
- Schola cantorum, concert. H. Hutchinson; M 553
- Schools
  - Bankruptcy, financial and educational; Dt 270
- Schumann-Heink, Ernestine
  - Still singing at sixty-nine; EP ... 719
- Schumm, George
  - Tribute to; Dt ... 124
  - See also Proofreaders
- Science and war; Dt ... 70
- Scott, Evelyn
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 ... 35
- Scott-Moncrieff, C. K.
  - Death; EP ... 349
- Scribner, Charles
  - Death; EP ... 505
- Scribner's, Charles, Sons
  - Siege of Fort Scribner, the; Christian science censorship. H. R. Mussey; S. 291
- Scripps-Howard newspapers
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 ... 35
- Scudder, Vida D.
  - Christian social ethics, school of; C ... 571
- Seager, Henry R.
  - Russia, trip to; C ... 518
- Seaver, Edwin
  - Not yet a word; P ... 328
- Security and "sanctions"; IP ... 229
- Senate, United States
  - Committee assignments; S ... 120
  - Expenditures of candidates; EP ... 586
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 ... 35
- Shapley, Harlow
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 ... 35
- Shearer, William B.
  - Clean bill of health for; EP ... 718
  - Lecture in New York a failure; EP ... 57
- Shefferman, M. S.
  - Police brutality; C ... 363
- Sherman, Texas, lynching; EP ... 586
- Shipley, Joseph T.
  - Love songs after the Aztec; P ... 126
- Shipping. See Merchant marine
- Shipstead bill. See Injunctions
- Silent enemy, the. A. Bakshy; D ... 632
- Simmons, Furnifold McLendel. See North Carolina
- Simple Simon; H. H.; D ... 306
- Simon report. See India
- Smith, A. L.
  - Boulder dam; C ... 245
- Smith, Edwin S.
  - "Cash and carry" life insurance; S ... 149
- Smith, Elmer
  - Nominated for The Nation's honor roll for 1929; C ... 218
- Smith, Granville Paul
  - Sexton's spade, the; P ... 48
- Smoot, Reed
  - Book censorship; E ... 383
- Smuts, Jan Christiaan
  - Visit to United States; EP ... 57
- Snake stories; Dt ... 362
- Snowden, Philip
  - Speech on national war expenditures; EP 231
- Social welfare
  - Hoover appoints research council on social trends; EP ... 1
- Society of Friends. See Quaker memorial
- Son of the gods. A. Bakshy; D ... 226
- Song of the flame. A. Bakshy; D ... 632
- Song of the west. A. Bakshy; D ... 337
- Song o' my heart. A. Bakshy; D ... 465
- South, the
  - Chivalry. M. P. G. Jamison; C ... 326
- South Africa
  - "White" problem; I ... 136
- Soviets. See Russia
- Spain
  - Cork, and description of country; Dt ... 703
  - Dictatorship; E ... 169
  - Drama. C. B. Qualia and W. A. Whatley; C ... 15
  - Ferment in; IP ... 529
- Spanish war veterans
  - Pension bill passed over president's veto; EP ... 665
- Speier, Herman
  - Case against Dr. Magnes; C ... 45
- Sports, American, and American life. J. R. Tunis; S ... 729
- Spring time. A. Bakshy; D ... 106
- Stanley, Louis
  - Miners' rebellion; S ... 356
- Star spangled banner
  - Battle hymn of the republic suggested as national anthem. A. C. Jourdan; C .. 297
  - National anthem; E ... 209
- Steamships
  - Europa wins blue ribbon of Atlantic; E .. 413
- Stein, Clarence S
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 ... 35
- Stendhal
  - Quotation from, on last worst month in prison. L. J. Salter; C ... 733
- Stern, Leon
  - Proposes Philadelphia Nation club; C ... 675
- Stocks
  - Being right with Babson. R. W. Robey: S ... 359
  - Federal reserve board and stock market: EP ... 382
- Stone, Shepard Arthur
  - Einstein, Albert; C ... 297
- Strike up the band. H. H.; D ... 226
- Strikes—Textile mills, southern
  - American civil liberties union aid to southern textile workers; EP ... 30
  - American federation of labor was at Marion, North Carolina; EP ... 166
  - Case of textile workers against North Carolina; EP ... 2
  - Marion, aid needed; EP ... 207
  - Wiggins, E. M., five to be tried for her death; EP ... 140
  - Wiggins, E. M.; men accused of killing her acquitted; EP ... 312
- Student
  - Protest against treatment of communists; C ... 395
- Sturges, Preston
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 ... 35
- Subway safety. L. Resnick; S ... 566
- Sugar
  - Machine for cutting and stripping cane tested; EP ... 349
  - See also Tariff
- Sun Yat-sen, Madam, keeps faith. R. Gould; IS ... 109
- Supernatural, belief in. H. Broun; S ... 643
- Supreme court, United States
  - Decisions, basis of; E ... 534
  - Letter to "My dear senator," on appointment of J. J. Parker. O. G. Villard; S ... 512
  - Vacancy; EP ... 311
  - See also Parker, J. J., Roberts, O. J.
- Symposium
  - Not taken over by Hound and Horn; EP 141

T

- Taft, William Howard
  - Death; E ... 316
- Talkies. See Moving pictures
- Tampa, Florida; Dt ... 394
- Tariff, Canadian
  - Speed records for tariff-making broken; EP ... 557
- Tariff, International action
  - Truce sought at Geneva; EP ... 258
- Tariff, Great Britain. See Great Britain
- Tariff, United States
  - Bayard, T. F., on protection. C. O'C. Hennessy; C ... 625
  - Bill hangs in balance; EP ... 665
  - Bill rushed through. P. Y. Anderson; S 651
  - Buncoing the farmer; E ... 115
  - Creator of ill will; EP ... 409
  - Debate goes on; EP ... 205
  - Debenture, eliminated by house of representatives; EP ... 557
  - Dill, Senator, action; EP ... 637
  - Economic folly of new tariff; EP ... 503
  - Economists ask for veto; EP ... 557
  - Foreign countries' resentment; E ... 589
  - Grundy's work. P. Y. Anderson; S ... 419
  - Hides, and boots and shoes; EP ... 139
  - Hoover signs bill; E ... 720
  - Hoover, test for; EP ... 611
  - Hoover to get tariff he wanted. P. Y. Anderson; S ... 358
  - Letters to "My dear senator." O. G. Villard; S ... 354; 619
    - Letter by E. D. Abbott ... 517
  - Log rolling passed bill; EP ... 717
  - "My dear senator"; on a certain betrayal in Washington. O. G. Villard; S ... 354; letter ... 517
  - Nation's poll ... 592, 618, 648
  - Pennsylvania in doubt; EP ... 690
  - Protests against bill; EP ... 665
  - Rayon duty increased. P. Y. Anderson; S ... 174
  - Senate completes its revision; EP ... 381
  - Sugar; on a certain betrayal in Washington. O. G. Villard; S ... 354; letter ... 517
  - Sugar; raising cane in Washington. A. Warner; S ... 41
  - Unpopularity; E ... 641
  - Veto the tariff! J. B. Clark; C ... 675
  - Vote market; S ... 318
- Tavern, the. J. W. Krutch; D ... 659
- Tea; in America; Dt ... 44
- Teachers
  - Men, favored. L. Mosbæk; C ... 15
- Television; EP ... 479
- Tennessee yields to Malden. H. Mathes; C .. 16
- Textbooks
  - "Modern history," by Hayes and Moon, barred in New York city; EP ... 559
- Textile mills. See Strikes
- Thacher, Thomas D.
  - Appointment as solicitor general of the United States; EP ... 257
- Theater, the
  - Chinese; EP ... 233
  - Holiday fare. J. W. Krutch; D ... 22
  - New American drama, the. J. W. Krutch; D ... 678
  - Retrospect. J. W. Krutch; D ... 202
  - Review of season. J. W. Krutch; S ... 659
  - Spanish drama. C. B. Qualia and W. A. Whatley; C ... 15
- This man's town. J. W. Krutch; D ... 403
- Thomas, Norman
  - On The Nation's honor roll for 1929 ... 35
- Three little girls. A. S. B.; D ... 525
- Tires, automobile
  - Cutthroat competition; E ... 261
- Tirpitz, Admiral von
  - Death; EP ... 313
- Todd, Laurence
  - Power control breaks down; S ... 289
- Tolstoy, Leo
  - Letter, The porcelain Sophia Andreyevna 649
- Topaze. H. Hazlitt; D ... 278
- Treaties
  - League of nations and treaty revision. W. B. Curry; C ... 151
- Trusts. See Mergers
- Tuell, Anne Kimball
  - How digging began; S ... 361
- Tunis, John R.
  - American sports and American life; S .. 729
- Turkestan-Siberia railroad completed; EP ... 533
- Turksib. A. Bakshy; D ... 688
- Tuska, Benjamin
  - Libel, posthumous; C ... 734
- Tyler, Marian
  - D. H. Lawrence; C ... 570

U

- Uncle Vanya. J. W. Krutch; D ... 554
- Under a Texas moon. A. Bakshy; D ... 524
- Unemployment
  - British. J. A. Hobson; S ... 96
  - British; ultimatum to MacDonald government; EP ... 411
  - Constructive program needed; E ... 235
  - Demonstrations, March 6; EP ... 410
  - Figures, discrepancy; EP ... 139
  - Government employment agency needed. H. Broun; S ... 442
  - Hoover happiness boys; E ... 692
  - Measures proposed; EP ... 437
  - Situation still acute; EP ... 504
  - Stones for bread; EP ... 315
  - Time to act; E ... 385
  - Wagner bills held up. P. Y. Anderson; S ... 485
- Unions, labor. See Labor unions

United mine workers
  Decline shown by Illinois dispute; EP.. 167
United press, the. O. G. Villard; S........ 539
United States
  American financial competency; varying views of C. Coolidge and S. S. Huebner; EP........................ 87
  American sports and American life. J. R. Tunis; S........................ 729
  Economics rules in Washington; E..... 142
  Government by abstention; E........... 640
  Government in business. Major general T. Q. Ashburn; EP, 691; S.......... 699
  Headless Washington. O. G. Villard; S 264
  Imperialism; E........................ 90
United States military academy
  Enlargement, proposed; EP...232; letter 245
United States of Europe. See Europe
United States power commission. See Federal power commission
United States supreme court. See Parker, J. J.; Roberts, O. J.; Supreme court, United States
  Vacancy; EP........................... 311
Urbana (Illinois) Daily Courier
  Views on Latin America and the United States; E........................... 90
Utilities, public. See Public utilities

V

V., O. G.
  City haul; D.......................... 254
  Last mile, the; D..................... 278
Vagabond king, the. A. Bakshy; D......... 337
Vatican and the Kremlin, the. L. Fischer; IS 82
Veterans
  Preference law declared invalid in Minnesota; EP........................ 478
Vikings, the. J. W. Krutch; D............ 633
Villard, Oswald Garrison
  Greets editor of Korean paper; consequences of greeting; C.............. 652
  Headless Washington; S................ 264
  Mergers; letter to "My dear senator"; S 416
  "My dear senator," letters to. I; S, 354, letter, 517; II; S, 416; III; S, 512; IV; S................................ 619
  Political leadership, genuine, needed in America; S......................354, 416
  Press today. I. The Associated press; S......443; letter..................... 734
    II. The Associated press; S....486; letters, 600, 625, 734 (see also 541)
    III. The United press; S............ 539
    IV. Chain daily; S.................. 595
    V. Standardizing the daily; S...... 646
    VI. Philadelphia cabbage patch; S.... 671
    VII. What's wrong with the World; S 724
  Supreme court; Parker appointment; letter to "My dear senator"; S......... 512
  Tariff; letter to "My dear senator"; S.. 619
Virginia
  Woman's university, not near Charlottesville. M. P. G. Jamison; C......... 326
Virginian, the. A. Bakshy; D............. 106
Virtue, definition of; Dt.................. 297
Vollbehr collection offered to Library of congress; E............................ 590

W

W., C
  National city bank fiasco; S....11; letter 98
Wagner, Cosima
  Death; EP............................ 439
Wagner, Robert Ferdinand
  Record commended; EP................ 612
Wainhouse, David W.
  London naval treaty, joker in; IS...... 634
Wake up and dream. J. W. Krutch; D.... 106
Wales act. See Censorship, plays
Wall, Louise Herrick
  Quaker memorial; C................... 732
Wall street. See Stocks
Walton, Eda Lou
  Kneeling nun, the; P................. 627
  Of changing seasons; P............... 519
  Park in the gathering dusk; P......... 272
  These humble people; P............... 72
War
  Non-combatants and war. W. Isaacs; C 16
  Science and war; Dt.................. 70
  Young men's view; EP................. 141
War debts and reparations
  Bank for international settlements as described by J. E. Reynolds; EP..... 284
  Bank for international settlements provided for; E........................... 143
  Details prove troublesome at The Hague; EP 86
  International loan floated under Young plan; E............................ 721
  Referendum, German. S. M. Bouton; C 327
  Young plan agreed upon at The Hague; EP 111
  Young plan goes into effect by German vote; EP........................... 349
War expenditures, national; EP........... 231
Warburg, Paul M.
  Book on federal reserve system; E...... 535
Warner, Arthur
  Raising cane in Washington; S......... 41
Washington, D. C.
  Correspondents. See Newspapers
  Scandal and impending scandal. P. Y. Anderson; S 358
Washington (state)
  Sugar beets and lumber. E. D. Abbott; C 517
Watch and ward society, Boston. See Censorship, book
Water power. See Power and power industry
Waterloo bridge. J. W. Krutch; D......... 106
Weed, Helena Hill
  Haiti, fresh hope for; IS.............. 342
  Haiti, victory in; IS.................. 378
  Thanks from Haiti for articles. E. G. Chauvet, C. Moravia, S. Pradel; C... 517
Weiss, David. See Communism
Wells, Herbert George
  Wellsiana sought. G. West; C......... 626
Welpley, Margaret
  Harding, W. G., letters, destroyed; C... 244
West, Geoffrey
  Wellsiana sought; C.................. 626
West, J. C.
  Power control breaks down in Oakland, California; C...................... 423
West, James L.
  Becomes press agent of Republican national committee. P. Y. Anderson; S. 239
West, James M.
  Boy scouts and peace; C.............. 364
West Point. See United States military academy
Whalen, Grover A.
  Needed by Wanamaker's, not by New York; EP......................... 382
  Resigns as New York police commissioner; EP......................... 638
  Whalenism; E........................ 350
Whatley, W. A., and C. B. Qualia
  Spanish drama; C.................... 15
Wheat
  Dollar wheat, lesson of; E............ 286
  Uncle Sam, plunger; E................ 351
White, George
  Henry George, work; C................ 363
  Prosperity and the land; C............ 99
White, Hal Saunders
  Portent; P.......................... 654
White, Walter
  Largely responsible for rejection of J. J. Parker for United States supreme court. H. Broun; S............... 591
Whitlock, Brand
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
Wight, Alexander E.
  Criticizes inclusion of Dr. Crile in The Nation's honor roll for 1929; C...... 124
Wiggins, Ella May. See Strikes—Textile mills, southern Wigmore, John H.
  Not fitted for place on bench of World court; EP.......................... 504
Wilbur, Ray Lyman
  And Boulder dam. R. Finney; S....... 214
  Companionship with power men. P. Y. Anderson; S....................... 419
Williams, Edgar
  Degrees and wealth; C................ 151
Williams, Howard A.
  Speaking tour, western, for League for independent political action; C....... 396
Williams, L. F. Rushbrook
  Interview with, and mission to British embassy; EP....612; letter by...... 705
Williamson, E.
  English subscriber speaks on India and Egypt; C.......................... 734 Willys, John N.
  Appointed ambassador to Poland; EP... 285
Wilmer, William H
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
Wilson, Lyle C.
  Mexico installs a president; S.......... 216
Wilson, Walter
  Atlanta's communists; S............... 730
Winchester, Harold P.
  Nation club of Albany meeting; C...... 271
Wisconsin
  Progressive movement; P. La Follette out for governor; EP.................. 411
Woltman, Frederick E.
  Expulsion from Pittsburgh university; E. 32
Women
  Workers; women and wages. A. Lutz; C 297
Women have their way, the. H. H.; D..... 226
Woodberry, George Edward Appreciation. H. Kellock; S........... 120
  Death; EP........................... 59
Woodbridge, Homer T.
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.. 35
World (New York)
  Management. H. Broun; S............ 237
  What's wrong with the World? O. G. Villard; S........................ 724
World court. See League of nations

Y

Yachting
  America's Cup races; E............... 693
  Yachts, gargantuan; E................ 316
Young, Owen D.
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
Young plan. See War debts and reparations
Yugoslavia. See Jugoslavia

Z

Zeitlin, Jacob
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1929.... 35
Zionism. See Palestine
Zukerman, William
  Zionism finds itself; S....644; letter.... 703

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Abraham Lincoln, his path to the presidency. A. Shaw; B......................... 604
Adams, Léonie
  High falcon and other poems; B....... 249
Adamson, Margot Robert
  Treasury of middle English verse, a; AN 739
Adventurous America: A study of contemporary life and thought. E. Mims; AN 336
Africa and some world problems. J. C. Smuts; B 522
Age for love, the; E. Pascal; AN.......... 605
Agin' the governments: Memories and adventures of Sir Francis Fletcher Vane; B 197
Alexander Pope. E. Sitwell; B............ 573
Alexander Pope as critic and humanist. A. Warren; AN 334
All our yesterdays. H. M. Tomlinson; B.. 186
Alsberg, Henry G.; R.................... 196
Ambrose Bierce: A biography. C. McWilliams; B.......................... 223
America and England? N. Roosevelt; B... 154
America conquers Britain. A record of economic war. L. Denny; B.............. 299
American Jezebel, an. H. Augur; AN...... 552
American stage, the. O. S. Coad and E. Mims, Jr.; AN 22
Amiel, Henri Frédéric
  Philine. V. W. Brooks, translator; B.. 782
"——& Co." J. R. Bloch. Translated by C. K. Scott-Moncrieff; B............... 368
Anderson, John
  Box-office; B........................ 49
Anderson, Margaret
  My thirty years' war; B............... 707
Andrews, C. F.; R ....398; letter, 675
Anonymous
  In spite of all rejoicing; B............ 738
Annals of American sport. J. A. Krout; AN 22
Anthology of invective and abuse, an. Compiled by H. Kingsmill; B............ 549
Anthony, Katherine
  Queen Elizabeth; B.................. 19
Apes, the. E. Phillpotts; AN............. 276
Apperson, G. L.
  English proverbs and proverbial phrases; AN 51
Apples be ripe. L. Powys; B............ 707
Armstrong, Martin
  Fiery dive, the, and other stories; AN.. 686
  Sleeping fury, the; AN............... 104
Art of reading, the. A. R. Orage; B...... 684
Asbury, Herbert; R...................... 127
Asch, Nathan
  Pay day; AN......................... 304
Assorted articles. D. H. Lawrence; B...... 519
Atherton, Gertrude
  Dido: Queen of hearts; AN........... 51
Audacious Audubon. E. A. Muschamp; AN. 304
Audubon, John James; Audacious Audubon. E. A. Muschamp; AN................ 304
Augur, Helen
  American Jezebel, an; AN............ 552
Auslander, Joseph
  Hell in harness; B.................. 49
  Letters to women; B................. 49
Austin, Mary; R......................... 370
Australia felix. H. H. Richardson; B....... 153

B

Bacon, Leonard
  Lost buffalo; B...................... 491
Bacon, Sir Francis: The first modern mind. B. Steel; B......................... 222
Balzac: The man and the lover. F. Gribble; B 493
Barrès, Maurice
  Sacred hill, the. M. Cowley, translator; B 50

Barrett, E. Boyd; R........................ 737
Baudelaire. L. P. Shanks; AN............. 712
Beethoven, L. van; Eroica: A novel based on his life. S. Chotzinoff; B............ 575
Belloc, Hilaire
  Missing masterpiece, the; AN.......... 334
Benstead, C. R.
  Retreat: A novel of 1918; B.......... 329
Bent, Silas
  Machine made man; AN.............. 576
Beresford, J. D.
  Love's illusion; AN................... 402
Best poems of 1929. Edited by T. Moult; AN 336
Between the lines. H. M. Tomlinson; B.... 601
Bibliography of John Dewey, a. M. H. Thomas and H. W. Schneider; B..... 100
Bierce, Ambrose: A biography. C. McWilliams; B........................... 223
Big American parade, the. E. Haldeman-Julius; AN 200
Black Christ, the, and other poems. C. Cullen; B 303
Black Venus, the. A. Salmon; AN......... 103
Blake and modern thought. D. Saurat; AN 105
Blaker, Richard
  Medal without bar; AN 738
Bloch, Jean-Richard
  "—— & Co."; B....................... 368
Block, Herman, and H. Lyon
  Edward Coke; AN.................... 402
Bolitho, William
  Twelve against the gods; AN.......... 225
Book of Arthur Gleason. My People. By A. Gleason. "A. G." an appreciation. By H. H. Gleason; B............... 73
Boswell, James, and Dr. Johnson. H. Salpeter; B 400
Bottom dogs. E. Dahlberg; B............ 496
Bottome, Phyllis
  Windlestraws; AN..................... 199
Bourru, soldier of France. J. des V. Rouges. Translated by E. H. Wright; AN.... 688
Bowen, Stirling
  Wishbone; AN 686
Bowers, Claude G.; R..................129, 248
Box-office. J. Anderson; B................ 49
Bradford, Gamaliel
  Daughters of Eve; B.................. 710
Brewster, Dorothy; R..................400, 710
Bridge, the. H. Crane; B................ 520
Bridges, Robert
  Testament of beauty, the; B......... 193
Brief account of diplomatic events in Manchuria, a. Sir H. Parlett; AN..... 21
Brief candles. A. Huxley; B.............. 654
Broad, C. D.
  Five types of ethical theory; B....... 424
Brody, Alter; R.......................... 429
Brown, Harriet Connor
  Grandmother Brown's hundred years, 1827-1927; B....................... 429
Brown, Ray C. B.; R..................... 575
Bruce, Philip Alexander
  Virginia Plutarch, the; AN............ 401
Buchanan, Scott
  Poetry and mathematics; B............. 629
Buck, Mitchell S.
  Rose of Corinth; AN.................. 277
Bunzel, Ruth L.
  Pueblo potter, the; B.................. 370
Burman, Ben Lucien
  Mississippi; AN 51
Burnett, W. R.
  Iron man; AN......................... 224
Byron. A. Maurois. Translated by H. Miles; B............................ 460
Bystander. M. Gorki. Translated by B. G. Guerney; B......................... 452

C

Cabell, James Branch
  Way of Ecben, the; B.................. 17
California, University of; recent publications; AN 51
Callaghan, Morley
  It's never over; B..................... 399
Calverton, V. F.; R...................... 681
Calverton, V. F.
  Three strange lovers; AN.............. 373
Canterbury tales. Prologue and four tales with the book of the duchess and six lyrics. G. Chaucer. Translated by F. E. Hill; AN........................ 711
Capek, Karel
  Money and other stories. F. Marchant and others, translators; AN.......... 686
Cardinal Newman. J. L. May; AN......... 373
Carlisle, Helen Grace
  Mothers cry; AN...................... 224
Carlyle, Thomas: Froude and Carlyle; A study of the Froude-Carlyle controversy. W. H. Dunn; B............. 366
Catlin, George E. G.; R..........522, 681, 738
Catlin, G. E. G.
  Study of the principles of politics, a; AN 711
Caulfield, Ruby Van Allen
  French literature of Louisiana, the; AN. 132
Chamberlin, William Henry
  Soviet Russia; B..................... 492
Chariot wheels. S. Thompson; AN........ 78
Charpentier, John
  Coleridge, the sublime somnambulist. M. V. Nugent, translator; B............ 426
Chaucer, Geoffrey
  Canterbury tales. The prologue and four tales and the book of the duchess and six lyrics. F. E. Hill, translator; AN 711
Chauviré, Roger
  Sword of the soul, the. E. Boyd, translator; AN 199
Cher, Marie
  Up at the villa; AN.................. 51
Childhood in exile. S. Levin. Translated by M. Samuel; B...................... 18
Chivers, Thomas Holley: Friend of Poe. S. F. Damon; B.................... 655
Choiseul, Madame de; in "Three women." H. E. Wortham; B................. 710
Chotzinoff, Samuel
  Eroica: A novel based on the life of L. van Beethoven; B................ 575
Christian science. Our new religion. H. A. L. Fisher; B...................... 330
Cimarron. E. Ferber; B.................. 494
Circumference. Varieties of metaphysical verse, 1456-1928; B................ 190
City of tomorrow, the. Le Corbusier; B... 130
Class of 1902. E. Glaeser. Translated by W. and E. Muir; B................ 131
Claude Monet: The water lilies. G. Clemenceau; AN 577
Clemenceau, Georges
  Claude Monet: The water lilies; AN.... 577
  Grandeur and misery of victory; B.... 494
Clemenceau. J. Martet; B................ 332
Closing hour. N. Hoult; AN.............. 334
Clough, Shepard B. and H. W. Schneider
  Making fascists; B.................. 334
Coad, Oral Sumner, and E. Mims, Jr.
  American stage, the; AN............ 22
Codman, Florence; R....................50, 464
Coleman, McAlister; R.................. 368
Coleridge, the sublime somnambulist. J. Charpentier. Translated by M. V. Nugent; B............................ 426
Collected poems. D. H. Lawrence; B...... 75
Collected poems (1914-1926). R. Graves; B.. 75
Columbus, Don Quixote of the sea. J. Wassermann; B......................... 298
Company, the. E. Seaver; B............. 573
Concise Oxford dictionary of current English. H. W. and F. M. Fowler; AN..... 51
Consequences. J. E. Ford; AN........... 277
Contemporary attitudes. K. B. Taft, J. F. McDermott and D. O. Jensen, editors; B 48
Cornered poets. L. Housman: AN.......... 713
Coronet. M. Komroff; B.................. 186
Cowper, William, life of. The stricken deer. D. Cecil; B........................ 708
Crane, Hart
  Bridge, the; B....................... 520
Cross, Wilbur L.
  Life and times of L. Sterne; AN...... 52
Cru, Jean Norton
  Témoins; B 462
Cullen, Countee
  Black Christ, the, and other poems; B... 303
Cruise of the Kronprinz Wilhelm, the. Count A. von Niezychowski; AN.......... 22
Cultural history of the modern age, a. Vol. I. E. Friedell. Translated by C. F. Atkinson; B 126
Cyrano. C. Rogers; AN.................. 158

D

Dahlberg, Edward
  Bottom dogs; B....................... 496
Dakin, Edwin Franden; R................ 330
Damon, S. Foster
  Thomas Holley Chivers: Friend of Poe; B 655
Dandelion days. H. Williamson; AN....... 658
Dane, Clemence
  Tradition and Hugh Walpole; B....... 19
Daughters of Eve. G. Bradford; B........ 710
Davis, Jefferson: His rise and fall. A. Tate; B 154
Davis, Jerome; R......................... 629
Davis, Royal J.; R...................... 222
Dear Judas and other poems. R. Jeffers; B. 20
Decline of the age of Louis XIV; or French literature, 1687-1715. A. Tilley; AN. 132
Delayen, Gaston
  Misadventures of Martin Guerre, the: A dramatic idyll. F. Symons, translator; AN 739
Delteil, Joseph
  On the river Amur. Translated by S. Putnam; AN 52
Denny, Ludwell
  America conquers Britain. A record of economic war; B 299
Desert of love, the. F. Mauriac. Translated by S. Putnam; AN............ 76
Deutsch, Babette
  Fire for the night; B................ 736
Dewey, Davis R.; R..................... 74
Dewey, John
  Quest for certainty, the: A study of the relation of knowledge and action; R.. 100
  Sources of a science of education, the; B 100
Dewey, John, a bibliography of. M. H. Thomas and H. W. Schneider; B.... 100
Dewey, John, essays in honor of; B........ 100
Dibble, R. F.; R 19
Dibelius, Wilhelm
  England. M. A. Hamilton, translator; B 397
Dickinson, Emily, friend and neighbor. M. Jenkins; AN 657
Dickinson, Emily, life and mind of, the. G. Taggard; B..................... 735
Dickinson, Emily, two books on; B.......... 329
Dido: Queen of hearts. G. Atherton; AN.. 51
Dillon, E. J.
  Russia today and yesterday; B........ 492
Dime novels; or, Following an old trail in popular literature. E. Pearson; B.... 127
Dissenting opinions of Mr. Justice Holmes, the; B.............................. 157
Dissolution of the Hapsburg monarchy, the. O. Jászi; B........................ 196
Dobie, J. Frank; R....................... 425
Dobie, J. Frank
  Vaquero of the brush country, a; B.... 371
Doctor Fogg. N. Matson; AN.............. 78
Doctor Johnson and Mr. Boswell. H. Salpeter; B 400
Donne, John, dean of St. Paul's. Complete poetry and selected prose. Edited by J. Hayward; AN..................... 105
Dos Passos, John
  42nd parallel, the; B................. 298
Down in flames. B. R. Redman; B........ 329
Dresbach, Glenn Ward
  Wind in the cedars, the; B........... 736
Droll parade. C. Talbott; B............... 491
Dunn, Waldo H.
  Froude and Carlyle: A study of the Froude-Carlyle controversy; B........ 366
Dunsany, Lord
  Fifty poems; B....................... 736
Duun, Olaf
  Trough of the wave, the. A. G. Chater, translator; AN..................... 524

E

Eckenrode, H. J.
  Rutherford B. Hayes; B.............. 654
Economics and ethics. J. A. Hobson; B..... 273
Eddington, A. S.
  Science and the unseen world; B....... 75
Eddy, Mrs.; in "Three women." H. E. Wortham; B 710
Edman, Irwin; R......................... 75
Edward Coke. H. Lyon and H. Block; AN.. 402
Elizabeth Gaskell. G. D. Sanders; AN.... 401
Ellery, Eloise; R......................... 20
Ellis, Anne
  Life of an ordinary woman, the; AN... 277
Embezzlers, the. V. Kataev. Translated by L. Zarine; B........................ 73
Emerson: The enraptured Yankee. R. Michaud. Translated by G. Boas; B.. 735
Emily Dickinson, friend and neighbor. M. Jenkins; AN....................... 657
Emily Dickinson: The human background of her poetry. J. Pollitt; B............ 329
England. W. Dibelius. Translated by M. A. Hamilton; B...................... 397
English government and politics. F. A. Ogg; B 549
English proverbs and proverbial phrases. G. L. Apperson; AN.................. 51
Epoch and a man, a; Martin Van Buren and his times. D. T. Lynch; B.......... 129
Eroica: A novel based on the life of L. van Beethoven. S. Chotzinoff; B........ 575
Erskine, John
  Uncle Sam: In the eyes of his family; AN 604
Escape. F. Nitti; B...................... 246
Essays in honor of John Dewey; B......... 100
Excursion to Tilsit, the. H. Sudermann. Translated by L. Galantière; AN..... 523

F

Fables. T. F. Powys; AN................. 686
Fadeyev, Alexander
  Nineteen, the; B..................... 425
Fadiman, Clifton P.; R........74, 186, 298, 629
Fairless, Michael
  Roadmender, the; AN................ 105
Faulkner, William
  Sound and the fury, the; B.......... 74
Fausset, Hugh I'Anson
  Proving of Psyche, the; B............ 49
Faust: Part I. J. W. von Goethe. W. P. Andrews, translator; G. M. Priest and K. E. Weston, editors; AN.......... 52
Fay, Sidney B.; R........................72, 463
Febvre, Lucien
  Martin Luther: a destiny. R. Tapley, translator; B 191
Federal reserve system: Its origin and growth. P. M. Warburg; B...602; E, 535

Ferber, Edna
  Cimarron; B 494
Ferrara, Orestes
  Private correspondence of Nicolo Machiavelli, the; B 20
Ferrero, Guglielmo
  Unity of the world, the; B 738
Fiery dive, the, and other stories. M. Armstrong; AN 686
Fifty poems. Lord Dunsany; B 736
Fire for the night. B. Deutsch; B 736
Firehead. L. Ridge; B 303
Fisher, H. A. L.
  Our new religion: An examination of Christian science; B 330
Fitts, Dudley; R 602
Five types of ethical theory. C. D. Broad; B 424
Fletcher, John Gould
  Two frontiers, the; B 462
Flexner, Abraham; R 397
Ford, Julia Ellsworth
  Consequences; AN 277
Forestry. A. B. Recknagel and S. N. Spring; B 631
42nd parallel, the. J. Dos Passos; B 298
Fowler, H. W. and F. M.
  Concise Oxford dictionary of current English; AN 51
Fowler, Harold and Mary
  Picture book of sculpture, the; AN 158
France, a study in nationality. A. Siegfried; B 709
Francis Rabelais: The man and his work. A. J. Nock and C. R. Wilson; B 250
Francke, Kuno
  Weltbürgertum in der deutschen dichtung von Herder bis Nietzsche; AN 21
Franco-Russian alliance, the, 1890-1894. W. L. Langer; B 428
Franco-Russian alliance, the, 1891-1917. G. Michon. Translated by N. Thomas; B 428
François Rabelais: Man of the renaissance. S. Putnam; B 250
Frank, Leonhard
  Robber band, the; AN 104
Frankfurter, F., and N. Greene
  Labor injunction, the; B 574
Free. B. Niles; AN 276
French literature of Louisiana, the. R. Van A. Caulfield; AN 134
Friedell, Egon
  Cultural history of the modern age, a. Vol. I. C. F. Atkinson, translator; B 126
Froude and Carlyle: A study of the Froude-Carlyle controversy. W. H. Dunn; B 366
Fuller, Harold de Wolf; R 372
Fuller, Henry B.
  Gardens of this world; AN 104
  Not on the screen; B 188
Fülöp-Miller, René
  Power and secrets of the Jesuits. F. S. Flint and D. F. Tait, translators; B 737

G

Gabriel, Ralph Henry
  Lure of the frontier, the; AN 22
Gallows' orchard. C. Spencer; B 454
Gandhi, Mahatma, ideas. C. F. Andrews; B ....628, letter, 675
Gannett, Lewis S.; R 76, 332, 494
Gardens of this world. H. B. Fuller; AN .. 104
Gaskell, Elizabeth. G. D. Sanders; AN 401
Geiser, Karl F.; R 102, 191
George Washington, 1771-1781. R. Hughes; B 248
German students' war letters. Translated by A. F. Wedd; B 252
Ghent, W. J.; R 274, 371
Gibbs, Philip
  Hidden city, the; AN 304
Gide, André
  Immoralist, the; B 491
  Montaigne; B 365
  School for wives, the; B 49
Ginzburg, Benjamin; R 18, 274
Glaeser, Ernst
  Class of 1902. W. and E. Muir, translators; B 131
Gleason, Arthur
  Book of Arthur Gleason. My people. By A. Gleason. "A. G.": an appreciation. By Helen Hayes Gleason; B... 73
Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von
  Faust: Part I. W. P. Andrews, translator; G. M. Priest and K. E. Weston, editors; AN 52
Gold, Michael
  Jews without money; B 428
Gold coast customs. E. Sitwell; B 399
Goldenweiser, Alexander; R 192
Good-bye to all that. R. Graves; B 186
Gorki, Maxim
  Bystander. B. G. Guerney, translator; B 452
Gothick north, the: A study in mediaeval art, life, and thought. S. Sitwell; AN 306
Gottschalk. Louis R.; R 21
Gramont, E. de, ex-Duchesse de Clermont-Tonnerre
  Pomp and circumstance. B. W. Downs, translator; AN 402
Grandeur and misery of victory. G. Clemenceau; B 494
Grandmother Brown's hundred years, 1827-1927. H. C. Brown; B 429
Grattan, C. Hartley; R 188, 493, 630, 684
Grattan, C. Hartley
  Why we fought; B 366
Graves, Robert
  Collected poems (1914-1926); B 75
  Good-bye to all that; B 186
  Poems: 1929; B 75
Gray, Cecil
  History of music, the; B 603
Gray dawn—red night. J. L. Hodson; B... 329
Great meadow, the. E. M. Roberts; B..... 300
Greene, Evarts B. and R. B. Morris
  Guide to the principal source for early American history (1600-1800) in the City of New York; AN 199
Greene, Nathan, and F. Frankfurter
  Labor injunction, the; B 574
Gregory, Horace; R 399, 737
Gribble, Francis
  Balzac: The man and the lover; B 493
Guerra. A. Neumann; B 684
Guide to the principal sources for early American history (1600-1800) in the City of New York. E. B. Greene and R. B. Morris; AN 199
Guignebert, Charles
  Short history of the French people, a. F. G. Richmond, translator; B 709
Gutman, Walter; R 130

H

Hacker, Louis M.; R 654
Haggin, B. H.; R 603
Haldane, J. S.
  Sciences and philosophy, the. Gifford lectures, 1927-28; B 127
Haldeman-Julius, E.
  Big American parade, the; AN 200
Hamilton, J. G. de R.; R 154
Harding, Alfred
  Revolt of the actors, the; B 49
Harding, Warren G., strange death of. M. D. Thacher (from the diaries of G. B. Means); B ....630; letter, 734
Hardy, Florence Emily
  Later years of Thomas Hardy, the: 1892-1928; B 680
Harlow, Ralph Volney; R 429
Harm's way. R. Tapley; B 737
Harris, Frank
  My reminiscences as a cowboy; B 425
Hawbucks! the; AN 50
Hayes, Carlton J. H.; R 710
Hayes, Rutherford B. H. J. Eckenrode; B.. 654
Hazlitt, Henry; R 100, 126, 153, 219, 223 246, 272, 298, 328, 365, 424, 491, 519 548, 572, 602, 627, 654, 706, 735
Heinrich, Carl
  Orphan of eternity, or the katabasis of the lord Lucifer Satan; AN 659
Heinz, Max
  Loretto: Sketches of a German war volunteer; B 329
Hell in harness. J. Auslander; B 49
Hergesheimer, Joseph
  Party dress, the; AN 604
Hess, Leonard
  Tomorrow's voyage; B 101
"Hey, yellowbacks!" E. L. Meyer; B 426
Hicks, Granville, R...101, 303, 329, 454, 520, 735
Hidden city, the. P. Gibbs; AN 304
High falcon and other poems. L. Adams; B. 249
Hindus, Maurice
  Humanity uprooted; B 156
Hingston, R. W. G.
  Instinct and intelligence; AN 158
His own people. L. W. Rogers; AN 334
History of Canada, a. C. Wittke; AN ... 21
History of financial speculation. R. H. Mottram; B 74
History of music, the. C. Gray; B 603
History of nationalism in the east, a. H. Kohn. Translated by M. M. Green; B 301
Hoax, the. I. Svevo. Translated by B. de Zoete; AN 524
Hobson, J. A.
  Economics and ethics; B 273
Hodson, James Lansdale
  Gray dawn—red night; B 329
Hollander, Lee M.; R 248
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, dissenting opinions of; B 157
Hopkins, Father Gerard Manley, S. J., life of. Father Lahey, S. J.; B 456
Hopkins, Gerard Manley
  Vision of the mermaids, a; B 456
Hoult, Norah
  Closing hour; AN 334
Hour of the American novel, an. G. Overton; AN 105
House of gold. L. O'Flaherty; AN 51
Housman, Laurence
  Cornered poets; AN 713
Houston, Sam, biography. M. James; B... 274
How we lived then—1914-1918. Mrs. C. S. Peel; AN 200
Hudson river bracketed. E. Wharton; AN.. 76
Hughes, Rupert
  George Washington, 1771-1781; B 248
Human history. G. E. Smith; B 656
Human mind, the. K. A. Menninger; B... 458
Humanism and America. Essays on the outlook of modern civilization; B 272
Humanity uprooted. M. Hindus; B 156
Huntsman in the sky. G. Toogood; AN.... 605
Hutchinson, A. S. M.
  Uncertain trumpet, the; AN 51
Hutchinson, Anne; two biographies; AN..... 552
Huxley, Aldous
  Brief candles; B 654

I

I thought of Daisy. E. Wilson; B 20
I was sent to Athens. H. Morgenthau; AN 336
Ibsen, the master builder. A. F. Zucker; B. 248
Imagist anthology, 1930; B 603
Immoralist, the. A. Gide; B 491
In spite of all rejoicing. Anonymous; B.... 738
India in bondage. J. T. Sunderland; B 398
Infidels and heretics. An agnostic's anthology. Edited by C. Darrow and W. Rice; AN 577
Instinct and intelligence. R. W. G. Hingston; AN 158
Intellectual things. S. J. Kunitz; B 709
International relations of Manchuria, the. B. C. W. Young; AN 21
Iron man. W. R. Burnett; AN 224
Iron man and the tin woman, the. S. Leacock; AN 158
Irwin, Will; R 73
It's a great war. M. Lee; AN 76
It's never over. M. Callaghan; B 399

J

James, Marquis
  Raven, the. A life story of Sam Houston; B 274
Jászi, Oscar
  Dissolution of the Hapsburg monarchy, the; B 196
Jeffers, Robinson
  Dear Judas and other poems; B 20
Jefferson Davis: His rise and fall. A. Tate; B 154
Jefferson, Thomas, letters; AN 711
Jelliffe, Smith Ely; R 458
Jenkins, MacGregor
  Emily Dickinson, friend and neighbor; AN 657
Jews without money. M. Gold; B 428
Joaquin Miller and his other self. H. Wagner; AN 225
John Donne, dean of St. Paul's. Complete poetry and selected prose. Edited by John Hayward; AN 105
John Merrill's pleasant life. A. B. Parsons; B 368
John, William M.
  Seven women; AN 51
Johnson, Samuel, and Boswell. H. Salpeter; B 400
Josephson, Matthew; R 462, 707
Josephson, Matthew
  Portrait of the artist as American; B.. 627
Joy is my name. S. Salt; AN 276
Jünger, Ernst
  Storm of steel. B. Creighton, translator; B 131

K

Kataev, Valentine
  Embezzlers, the. L. Zarine, translator; B 73
Kayser, Rudolph
  Stendhal: The life of an egoist; B 630
Keller, Helen Midstream; B 576
Kellock, Harold; R 656
Kien, Walter; R 252
Kindness in a corner. T. F. Powys; B 707
King, David
  Ten thousand shall fall; B 329
King Haber. A. Neumann; B 550
King mob. F. K. Notch; B 572
Kohn, Hans
  History of nationalism in the east, a. M. M. Green, translator; B 301
Komroff, Manuel
  Coronet; B 186
Kramer girls, the. R. Suckow; AN 523
Kreymborg, Alfred
  Our singing strength; B 132
Krout, John Allen
  Annals of American sport; AN 22
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..49, 127, 368, 460, 519, 573, 655

Kunitz, Joshua; R............73, 156, 425, 454
Kunitz, Stanley J.; R.................... 682
Kunitz, Stanley J.
  Intellectual things; B.................. 709
Kuprin, Alexandre
  Yama: The pit. B. G. Guerney, translator; AN 277

L

Labor injunction, the. F. Frankfurter and N. Greene; B 574
La Farge, Oliver
  Laughing boy; B........................ 102
Lafayette, letters; AN..................... 711
Lahey, Father, S. J.
  Life of Father Gerard Manley Hopkins, S. J., the; B.................... 456
Landlubber's log, a. A. Warner; B........ 400
Langer, William Leonard
  Franco-Russian alliance, the, 1890-1894; B 428
Lansdowne, Lord: A biography. Lord Newton; B............................ 72
Larsen, J. Anker
  Stranger in paradise, a. R. C. Jordan, translator; AN.................... 199
Later years of Thomas Hardy, the: 1892-1928. F. E. Hardy; B............ 680
Latimer, Margery
  This is my body; AN.................. 552
Laughing boy. O. La Farge; B............ 102
Laut, Agnes C.
  Overland trail, the; AN............... 304
Lawrence, D. H.
  Assorted articles; B.................. 519
  Collected poems; B................... 75
  Pansies. Poems; B.................... 75
Laws and liberties of Massachusetts; AN.. 52
Leacock, Stephen
  Iron man and the tin woman, the; AN.. 158
Leaders of the French revolution
  J. M. Thompson; B...................... 21
Le Corbusier
  City of tomorrow, the; B.............. 130
Lee, Mary
  It's a great war; AN.................. 76
Letters and friendships of Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, the. Edited by S. Gwynn; B.. 220
Letters of Lafayette and Jefferson; AN...... 711
Letters to women. J. Auslander; B....... 49
Levin, Shmarya
  Childhood in exile. M. Samuel, translator; B 18
  Youth in revolt; B.................... 463
Lewinsohn, Richard
  Mystery man of Europe, the: Sir Basil Zaharoff; B...................... 656
Liberty. E. D. Martin; B................. 706
Life and letters of Emily Dickinson. Edited by M. D. Bianchi; B.............. 329
Life and mind of Emily Dickinson, the. G. Taggard; B......................... 735
Life and times of L. Sterne. W. L. Cross; AN 52
Life of an ordinary woman, the. A. Ellis; AN 277
Life of Father Gerard Manley Hopkins, S. J., the. Father Lahey S. J.; B...... 456
Life of George Meredith, the. R. E. Sencourt; B.......................... 101
Life of Miranda. W. S. Robertson; AN... 712
Lincoln. E. Ludwig; B................... 185
Lincoln, Abraham: His path to the presidency. A. Shaw; B................ 604
Look homeward, angel. T. Wolfe; AN...... 225
Lord Lansdowne: A biography. Lord Newton; B 72
Lorenzo the magnificent. D. Loth; B....... 20
Loretto: Sketches of a German war volunteer. M. Heinz; B 329
Lost buffalo. L. Bacon; B................ 491
Lost child, the. R. Sanzara. Translated by W. Katzin; AN...................... 132
Loth, David
  Lorenzo the magnificent; B............. 20
Love's illusion. J. D. Beresford; AN....... 402
Loving, Pierre; R................49, 550, 684
Lowell, Amy
  Poetry and poets; B................... 656
Loyalists in the American revolution, the. C. H. Van Tyne; AN................ 659
Ludwig, Emil
  Lincoln; B............................ 185
Luehr, Emil
  New German republic, the; B.......... 102
Lure of the frontier, the. R. H. Gabriel; AN 22
Luther, Martin: a destiny. L. Febvre. Translated by R. Tapley; B.............. 191
Lynch, Denis Tilden
  Epoch and a man, an: Martin Van Buren and his times; B............. 129
Lyon, Hastings, and H. Block
  Edward Coke; AN 402

M

MacCallum, Elizabeth P.; R.............. 301
MacDonald, William; R..48, 154, 299, 428, 656
Machiavelli, Nicolo; the private correspondence of. O. Ferrara; B............. 20
Machine made man. S. Bent; AN......... 576
Mackenzie, Jean
  Trader's wife, the; AN................ 605
McWilliams, Carey
  Ambrose Bierce: A biography; B..... 223
Macy, John; R.......................... 366
Mahatma Gandhi's ideas. C. F. Andrews; B.......................628; letter 675
Making fascists. H. W. Schneider and S. B. Clough; B........................ 334
Malaeska: the Indian wife of the white hunter. Mrs. A. S. Stephens; AN.. 51
Man a woman marries, the. V. C. Pedersen; B 192
Man who lost himself, the. O. Sitwell; B.. 464
Manchuria: a brief account of diplomatic events; Sir H. Parlett; AN.......... 21
Manchuria; the international relations of. B. C. W. Young; AN................ 21
Mann, Heinrich
  Royal woman, the. A. J. Ashton, translator; AN......................... 686
Marsh, Fred T.; R...18, 222, 273, 426, 463, 496
Marshall, Robert; R...................... 631
Martet, Jean
  Clemenceau; B....................... 332
Martin, Everett Dean
  Liberty; B 706
Martin Luther: a destiny. L. Febvre. Translated by R. Tapley; B.............. 191
Masefield, John
  Hawbucks, the; AN................... 50
  South and east; AN.................. 52
Matson, Norman
  Doctor Fogg; AN.................... 78
Mauriac, François
  Desert of love, the. S. Putnam, translator; AN......................... 76
Maurois, André
  Byron; B 460
May, J. Lewis
  Cardinal Newman; AN................ 373
Meade, Norah; R.......................20, 101
Means, Gaston B.
  Strange death of President Harding, the, by M. D. Thacher (from the diaries of G. B. Means); B..630; letter, 734
Medal without bar. R. Blaker; AN......... 738
Meet the Germans. H. A. Phillips; B 102
Memories of my life. E. Westermarck; B... 153
Mengelberg and the symphonic epoch. E. R. Sollitt; AN...................... 713
Mencken, H. L.; R....................... 550
Mencken, H. L.
  Treatise on the gods; B............. 328
Menninger, Karl A.
  Human mind, the; B.................. 458
Meredith, George, life of, the. R. E. Sencourt; B 101
Meyer, Conrad Ferdinand
  Saint, the. E. F. Hauch, translator; AN 739
Meyer, Ernest L.
  "Hey, yellowbacks!" B................ 426
Michaud, Régis
  Emerson: The enraptured Yankee. G. Boas, translator; B.................. 735
Michon, Georges
  Franco-Russian alliance, the, 1891-1917. N. Thomas, translator; B............ 428
Midstream. H. Keller; B.................. 576
Miller, Joaquin, and his other self. H. Wagner; AN.............................. 225
Mims, Edwin
  Adventurous America: A study of contemporary life and thought; AN...... 336
Mims, Edwin, Jr., and O. S. Coad
  American stage, the; AN.............. 22
Miranda, Francisco de, life of. W. S. Robertson; AN 712
Misadventures of Martin Guerre, the: A dramatic idyll. G. Delayen. Translated by F. Symons; AN........... 739
Missing masterpiece, the. H. Belloc; AN.... 334
Mississippi. B. L. Burman; AN........... 51
Mississippi provincial archives, 1701-1729. Translated and edited by D. Rowland and A. G. Sanders; AN.............. 52
Mitchell, Broadus; R..................... 550
Monet, Claude: The water lilies. G. Clemenceau; AN 577
Money. D. H. Robertson; AN........... 659
Money and other stories. K. Capek. Translated by F. P. Marchant and others; AN 686
Montaigne. A. Gide; B 365
Montesquieu, Charles de Secondat
  Persian letters. M. Komroff, editor; AN 52
Morgenthau, Henry
  I was sent to Athens; AN............. 336
Morris, Harrison S.
  Walt Whitman. A brief biography with reminiscences; AN.................. 713
Morris, Richard B., and E. B. Greene
  Guide to the principal sources for early American history (1600-1800) in the city of New York; AN.............. 199
Mothers cry. H. G. Carlisle; AN......... 224
Motherwell, Hiram; R.................226, 334
Mottram, R. H.
  History of financial speculation; B.... 74
Mountain city. U. Sinclair; B............ 680
Mullin, Glen; R.......................... 400
Muschamp, Edward A.
  Audacious Audubon; AN.............. 304
Mussey, Henry Raymond; R..........273, 602
My life. L. Trotzky; B.................... 629
My reminiscences as a cowboy. F. Harris; B 425
My thirty years' war. M. Anderson; B.... 707
Mystery man of Europe, the: Sir Basil Zaharoff. R. Lewinsohn; B.......... 656

N

Neumann, Alfred
  Guerra; B 684
  King Haber; B 550
New German republic, the. E. Luehr; B... 102
Newman, Cardinal. J. L. May; AN....... 373
Newton, Lord
  Lord Lansdowne: A biography; B...... 72
Niezychowski, Count Alfred von Cruise of the Kronprinz Wilhelm, the; AN 22
Niles, Blair
  Free; AN 276
Nineteen, the. A. Fadeyev. Translated by R. D. Charques; B.................. 425
Nitti, Francesco
  Escape; B 246
Nock, Albert Jay, and C. R. Wilson
  Francis Rabelais: The man and his work; B 250
Not on the screen. H. B. Fuller; B...... 188
Notch, Frank K.
  King mob; B 572

O

O. Henry memorial award prize stories of 1929; AN 686
Obelisk, the. W. Rollins, Jr.; B.......... 739
O'Flaherty, Liam
  House of gold, the; AN............... 51
  Return of the brute; B 329
Ogg, Frederic Austin
  English government and politics; B.... 549
Olden, Balder
  On virgin soil; AN 402
Olden, Rudolf
  Stresemann. R. T. Clark, translator; AN 711
On the river Amur. J. Delteil. Translated by S. Putnam; AN................. 52
On virgin soil. B. Olden; AN............ 402
Orage, A. R.
  Art of reading, the; B................ 684
Orderly. M. R. Werner; AN............. 738
Origin of species. C. Darwin; AN......... 52
Orphan of eternity, or the katabasis of the lord Lucifer Satan. C. Heinrich; AN 659
Our changing human nature. S. D. Schmalhausen; B 274
Our new religion: An examination of Christian science. H. A. L. Fisher; B.. 330
Our singing strength. A. Kreymborg; B... 132
Overland trail, the. A. C. Laut; AN...... 306
Overton, Grant
  Hour of the American novel, an; AN.. 105

P

Pacifism in the modern world; B............ 274
Pansies. Poems. D. H. Lawrence; B...... 75
Parlett, Sir Harold
  Brief account of diplomatic events in Manchuria, a; AN 21
Parsons, Alice Beal; R.................... 708
Parsons, Alice Beal
  John Merrill's pleasant life; B........ 368
Party dress, the. J. Hergesheimer; AN.... 604
Pascal, Ernest
  Age for love, the; AN................ 605
Passing of normalcy, the. C. W. Wood; B.. 219
Paterfamilias. W. B. Trites; AN.......... 132
Patrick, M. M.
  Under five sultans; AN 22
Paxson, Frederic L.
  When the west is gone; AN........... 739
Pay day. N. Asch; AN................... 303
Pearson, Edmund
  Dime novels; or, Following an old trail in popular literature; B............ 127
Pedersen, Victor Cox
  Man a woman marries, the; B.......... 192
Peel, Mrs. C. S.
  How we lived then—1914-1918; AN.... 200
Persian letters. C. de S. Montesquieu. M. Komroff, editor; AN................ 52
Philine. H. F. Amiel. Translated by V. W. Brooks; B 682
Phillips, Henry Albert
  Meet the Germans; B................. 102
Phillpotts, Eden
  Apes, the; AN 276
Picture book of sculpture, the. H. and M. P. Fowler; AN 158
Poems. P. Quennell; B.................. 682
Poems: 1929. R. Graves; B.............. 75

Poetry and mathematics. S. Buchanan; B.. 629
Poetry and poets. A. Lowell; B.......... 656
Poets, farewell! E. Wilson; B............ 399
Polk: The diary of a president, 1845-1849. Edited by A. Nevins; B............ 101
Pollitt, Josephine
  Emily Dickinson: The human background of her poetry; B.................. 329
Pomp and circumstance. E. de Gramont, ex-Duchesse de Clermont-Tonnerre. Translated by B. W. Downs; AN........ 402
Pope, Alexander. E. Sitwell; B.......... 573
Pope, Alexander, as critic and humanist. A. Warren; AN 334
Portrait of the artist as American. M. Josephson; B 627
Potato face. C. Sandburg; AN............ 658
Power and secrets of the Jesuits, the. R. Fülöp-Miller. Translated by F. S. Flint and D. F. Tait; B 737
Powys, Llewelyn
  Apples be ripe; B 707
Powys, Theodore Francis
  Fables; AN.......................... 686
  Kindness in a corner; B............... 707
Private correspondence of Nicolo Machiavelli, the. O. Ferrara; B................. 20
Prize poems. 1913-1929; AN............ 658
Process and reality. A. N. Whitehead; B... 18
Proust, Marcel
  Sweet cheat gone, the. C. K. Scott-Moncrieff, translator; B............. 519
Proving of Psyche, the. H. I'A. Fausset; B 493
Pruette, Lorine; R.....................17, 153
Pueblo potter, the. R. L. Bunzel; B....... 370
Pure gold. O. E. Rolvaag. English text by S. Erdahl and the author; B...... 273
Putnam, Samuel
  François Rabelais: Man of the renaissance; B.......................... 250

Q

Queen Elizabeth. K. Anthony; B........... 19
Quennell, Peter
  Poems; B 682
Quest for certainty, the: A study of the relation of knowledge and action. J. Dewey; B 100

R

Rabelais, Francis, two biographies; B....... 250
Ratcliffe, S. K.; R........................ 628
Raven, the. A life story of Sam Houston. M. James; B 274
Read, Herbert
  Sense of glory, the; B................ 188
Recknagel, Arthur Bernard, and S. N. Spring
  Forestry; B 631
Redman, Ben Ray
  Down in flames; B 329
Regula S. Benedicti. Edited by E. A. Lowe; AN 52
Retreat: A novel of 1918. C. R. Benstead; B 329
Return of the brute. L. O'Flaherty; B..... 329
Revolt of the actors, the. A. Harding; B.... 49
Revolt of the fishermen, the. A. Seghers. Translated by M. Goldsmith; AN.... 373
Rhyne, Jennings J.
  Some southern cotton mill workers and their villages; B..................... 550
Rice, Elmer
  Voyage to Purilia, a; B................ 426
Richardson, Henry Handel
  Australia felix; B..................... 153
  Way home, the; B.................... 548
Ridge, Lola
  Firehead; B.......................... 303
Roadmender, the. M. Fairless; AN......... 105
Robber band, the. L. Frank. Translated by C. Brooks; AN..................... 104
Roberts, Donald A.; R.................... 222
Roberts, Elizabeth Madox
  Great meadow, the; B................ 300
Robertson, D. H.
  Money; AN.......................... 659
Robertson, William Spence; R............. 101
Robertson, William Spence
  Life of Miranda; AN.................. 712
Rogers, Cameron
  Cyrano; AN.......................... 158
Rogers, Leon W.
  His own people; AN.................. 334
Rogue Herries. H. Walpole; AN.......... 657
Rollins, William, Jr.
  Obelisk, the; AN..................... 739
Rolvaag, O. E.
  Pure gold. English text by S. Erdahl and the author; B....................... 273
Roman holiday, a. D. Ryan; B............ 222
Roosevelt, Nicholas
  America and England? B............. 154
Rose of Corinth. M. S. Buck; AN......... 277
Rouges, Jean des Vignes
  Bourru, soldier of France. E. H. Wright, translator; AN...................... 688
Royal woman, the. H. Mann. Translated by A. J. Ashton; AN.................. 686
Rugg, Winifred King
  Unafraid: A life of Anne Hutchinson; AN 552
Russia today and yesterday. E. J. Dillon; B 492
Rutherford B. Hayes. R. J. Eckenrode; B.. 654
Ryan, Don
  Roman holiday, a; B................. 222

S

Sacred hill. M. Barrès. Translated by M. Cowley; B........................ 50
Saint, the. C. F. Meyer. Translated by E. F. Hauch; AN.................. 739
Saint Teresa; in "Three women." H. E. Wortham; B....................... 710
Salmon, André
  Black Venus, the; AN................ 103
Salpeter, Harry
  Dr. Johnson and Mr. Boswell; B....... 400
Salt, Sarah
  Joy is my name; AN................ 276
Sandburg, Carl
  Potato face; AN..................... 658
Sanders, Gerald DeWitt
  Elizabeth Gaskell; AN................ 401
Sanzara, Rahel
  Lost child, the. W. Katzin, translator; AN 132
Saurat, Denis
  Blake and modern thought; AN......... 105
Schneider, Herbert W., and S. B. Clough
  Making fascists; B.................. 334
Schneider, Herbert Wallace, and M. H. Thomas
  Bibliography of John Dewey, a; B...... 100
Schneider, Isidor; R...................... 456
School for wives, the. A. Gide; B......... 49
Schlump. The story of a German soldier told by himself. Translated by M. Samuel; B......................... 131
Schuyler, Robert Livingston; R............ 549
Science and the unseen world. A. S. Eddington; B............................ 75
Sciences and philosophy, the. Gifford lectures, 1927-28. J. S. Haldane; B.... 127
Seagle, William; R...............157, 229, 574
Seaver, Edwin
  Company, the; B..................... 573
Seghers, Anna
  Revolt of the fishermen, the. M. Goldsmith, translator; AN............... 373
Sencourt, Robert Esmonde
  Life of George Meredith, the; B........ 101
Sense of glory, the. H. Read; B........... 188
Seven women. W. M. John; AN........... 51
Shadows of men. J. Tully; AN............ 224
Shanks, Lewis Piaget
  Baudelaire; AN...................... 712
Shaw, Albert
  Abraham Lincoln: His path to the presidency; B........................... 604
Shelley's lost letters to Harriet; B.......... 454
Shipley, Joseph T.; R...................19, 494
Short history of Chinese civilization, a. R. Wilhelm; AN...................... 158
Short history of the French people, a. C. Guignebert. Translated by F. G. Richmond; B....................... 709
Siegfried, André
  France, a study in nationality; B....... 709
Simpson, Clinton; R...................329, 573
Sinclair, Upton
  Mountain city; B..................... 680
Sir Francis Bacon: The first modern mind. B. Steel; B....................... 222
Sitwell, Edith
  Alexander Pope; B.................... 573
  Gold coast customs; B................ 399
Sitwell, Sacheverell
  Gothick north, the: A study in mediaeval art, life, and thought; AN........... 306
Skeffington, H. Sheehy; R................ 197
Skinner, Constance Lindsay
  Songs of the coast dwellers; AN........ 712
Sleeping fury, the. M. Armstrong; AN..... 104
Sly, John Fairfield
  Town government in Massachusetts, 1620-1930; AN.......................... 713
Smith, G. Elliot
  Human history; B.................... 656
Smith, J. Russell
  Tree crops; B....................... 76
Smuts, J. C.
  Africa and some world problems; B..... 522
Sollitt, Edna Richolson
  Mengelberg and the symphonic epoch; AN 713
Some forerunners of the newspaper in England, 1476-1622. M. A. Shaaber; B.. 372
Some southern cotton mill workers and their villages. J. J. Rhyne; B............ 550
Songs of the coast dwellers. C. L. Skinner; AN 712
Sound and the fury, the. W. Faulkner; B.. 74
Sources of a science of education, the. J. Dewey; B.......................... 100
South and east. J. Masefield; AN........... 52
Soviet Russia. W. H. Chamberlin; B...... 492
Spencer, Claire
  Gallows' orchard; B.................. 454
Spring. Samuel Newton, and A. B. Recknagel
  Forestry; B......................... 631
Spring-Rice, Sir Cecil, the letters and friendships of. Edited by S. Gwynn; B.... 220
Stendhal: The life of an egoist. R. Kayser; B 630
Stephens, Mrs. Ann S.
  Malaeska: the Indian wife of the white hunter; AN........................ 51
Sterne, Laurence; life and times. W. L. Cross; AN.......................... 62
Storm of steel. E. Jünger. Translated by B. Creighton; B....................... 131
Strange death of President Harding, the. M. D. Thacher; from the diaries of G. B. Means; B......630; letter.......... 734
Stranger in paradise, a. J. A. Larsen. Translated by R. C. Jordan; AN........... 199
Stresemann. R. Olden. Translated by R. T. Clark; AN........................ 711
Stricken deer, the. The life of Cowper. D. Cecil; B........................... 708
Study of the principles of politics, a. G. E. G. Catlin; AN..................... 711
Suckow, Ruth
  Kramer girls, the; AN................ 523
Sudermann, Hermann
  Excursion to Tilsit, the. L. Galantière, translator; AN..................... 523
Sunderland, Jabez T.
  India in bondagé; B.................. 398
Svevo, Italo
  Hoax, the. B. de Zoete, translator; AN. 524
Sweet cheat gone, the. M. Proust. Translated by C. K. Scott-Moncrieff; B.... 519
Sword of the soul, the. R. Chauviré. Translated by E. Boyd; AN............... 199

T

Talbott, Carlton
  Droll parade; B..................... 491
Taggard, Genevieve
  Life and mind of Emily Dickinson, the. B 735
Tapley, Roberts
  Harm's way; B...................... 737
Tate, Allen; R........................... 185
Tate, Allen
  Jefferson Davis: His rise and fall; B... 154
Témoins. J. N. Cru; B.................. 462
Ten thousand shall fall. D. King; B....... 329
Testament of beauty, the. R. Bridges; B.... 193
Testamento literario. A. P. Valdés; AN.... 553
Thacher, May Dixon
  Strange death of President Harding, the (from the diaries of G. B. Means); B. 630
That devil Wilkes. R. W. Postgate; B...... 299
This is my body. M. Latimer; AN......... 552
Thomas, Milton Halsey, and H. W. Schneider
  Bibliography of John Dewey, a; B...... 100
Thomas, Norman; R...................219, 274
Thomas Holley Chivers: Friend of Poe. S. F. Damon; B....................... 655
Thompson, J. M.
  Leaders of the French revolution; B..... 21
Thompson, Sylvia
  Chariot wheels; AN.................. 78
Three strange lovers. V. P. Calverton; AN. 373
Three women: Saint Teresa, Madame de Choiseul, Mrs. Eddy. H. E. Wortham; B. 710
Tilley, Arthur
  Decline of the age of Louis XIV; or French literature, 1687-1715; AN..... 132
Tomlinson, H. M.
  All our yesterdays; B................. 186
  Between the lines; B................. 601
Tomorrow's voyage. L. Hess; B........... 101
Toogood, Granville
  Huntsman in the sky; AN............ 605
Toward civilization. Edited by C. A. Beard; B 681
Town government in Massachusetts, 1620-1930. J. F. Sly; AN.............. 713
Trader's wife, the. J. Mackenzie; AN...... 605
Tradition and experiment in present-day literature; B......................... 219
Tradition and Hugh Walpole. C. Dane; B.. 19
Treasury of middle English verse, a. M. G. Adamson; AN...................... 739
Treatise on the gods. H. L. Mencken; B... 328
Tree crops. J. R. Smith; B............... 76
Trilling, Lionel; R........................ 684
Trites, W. B.
  Paterfamilias; AN.................... 132
Trotzky, Leon
  My life; B.......................... 629
Trough of the wave, the. O. Duun. Translated by A. G. Chater; AN........... 524
Tu Fu: The autobiography of a Chinese poet. Translated by F. Ayscough; AN...... 158
Tully, Jim
  Shadows of men; AN................. 224
Twelve against the gods. W. Bolitho; AN... 225
Two frontiers, the. J. G. Fletcher; B...... 462

U

Unafraid: A life of Anne Hutchinson. W. K. Rugg; AN........ 552
Uncertain trumpet, the. A. S. M. Hutchinson; AN........ 51
Uncle Sam: In the eyes of his family. J. Erskine; AN........ 604
Under five sultans. M. M. Patrick; AN.... 22
Unity of the world, the. G. Ferrero; B.... 738
Up at the villa. M. Cher; AN........ 51

V

Valdés, Armando Palacio
  Testamento literario; AN........ 553
Van Buren, Martin, biography. D. T. Lynch; B........ 129
Van Doren, Carl; R........ 188
Van Doren, Dorothy; R........300, 368, 494, 707
Van Doren, Mark; R........20, 75, 190, 454, 680
Vane, Sir Francis Fletcher
  Agin' the governments: Memories and adventures; B........ 197
Van Tyne, Claude H.
  Loyalists in the American revolution, the; AN........ 659
Vaquero of the brush country, a. J. F. Dobie; B........ 371
Vile bodies. E. Waugh; B........ 602
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R........426, 492, 576, 604, 630
Virginia Plutarch, the. P. A. Bruce; AN... 401
Vision of the mermaids, a. G. M. Hopkins; B 456
Vivas, Eliseo; R........ 250
Voyage to Purilia, a. E. Rice; B........ 426

W

Wagner, Harr
  Joaquin Miller and his other self; AN.. 225
Walpole, Hugh; Tradition and Hugh Walpole. C. Dane; B........ 19
Walpole, Hugh
  Rogue Herries; AN........ 657
Walt Whitman. A brief biography with reminiscences. H. S. Morris; AN........ 713
Walton, Eda Lou; R....49, 102, 132, 193, 249, 399, 491, 603, 656, 709, 736
Warburg, Paul M.
  Federal reserve system: Its origin and growth; B, 602; E........ 535
Warner, Arthur
  Landlubber's log, a; B........ 400
Warren, Austin
  Alexander Pope as critic and humanist; AN........ 334
Washington, George, 1771-1781. R. Hughes; B........ 248
Wassermann, Jacob
  Columbus, Don Quixote of the seas; B.. 298
Waugh, Evelyn
  Vile bodies; B........ 602
Way home, the. H. H. Richardson; B........ 548
Way of Ecben, the. J. B. Cabell; B........ 17
Weltbürgertum in der deutschen dichtung von Herder bis Nietzsche. K. Francke; AN........ 21
Werner, M. R.
  Orderly; AN........ 738
Westermarck, Edward
  Memories of my life; B........ 153
Wharton, Edith
  Hudson river bracketed; AN........ 76
Wharton, James B.; R........ 131
When the west is gone. F. L. Paxson; AN.. 739
Whitehead, Alfred North
  Process and reality; B........ 18
Whitman, Walt. A brief biography with reminiscences. H. S. Morris; AN........ 713
Why we fought. C. H. Grattan; B........ 366
Wilder, Thornton
  Woman of Andros, the; B........ 246
Wilhelm, Richard
  Short history of Chinese civilization, a; AN........ 158
Wilkes, John; That devil Wilkes. R. W. Postgate; B........ 299
Williamson, Henry
  Dandelion days; AN........ 658
Wilson, C. R., and A. J. Nock
  Francis Rabelais: The man and his work; B........ 250
Wilson, Edmund
  I thought of Daisy; B........ 20
  Poets, farewell! B........ 399
Wind in the cedars, the. G. W. Dresbach; B 736
Windlestraws. P. Bottome; AN........ 199
Wishbone. S. Bowen; AN........ 199
Wittke, Carl
  History of Canada, a; AN........ 21
Wolfe, Thomas
  Look homeward, angel; AN........ 225
Woman of Andros, the. T. Wilder; B........ 246
Wood, Charles W.
  Passing of normalcy; B........ 219
Wortham, H. E.
  Three women: Saint Teresa, Madame de Choiseul, Mrs. Eddy; B........ 710

Y

Yama: The pit. A. Kuprin. Translated by B. G. Guerney; AN........ 277
Young, B. C. Walter
  International relations of Manchuria, the; AN........ 21
Youth in revolt. S. Levin; B........ 463

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R........ 426
Zaharoff, Sir Basil; biography. R. Lewinsohn; B........ 656
Zucker, A. F.
  Ibsen, the master builder; B........ 248

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 1, 1930 No. 3365

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1
EDITORIALS:
  Consolidation—What For? 4
  India and Its Freedom 5
  Bargain-Counter Fame 6
  The Night After Christmas 6
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 7
FARM RELIEF MEETS AN ENEMY. By Robert S. Allen 8
THE RADIO CORPORATION IN THE NEWS. By Paul Y. Anderson 9
THE NATIONAL CITY FIASCO. By C. W 11
A SUBSTITUTE FOR LYNCHING. By Horace B. Davis 12
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 14
CORRESPONDENCE 15
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
  Admonition. By Leslie Nelson Jennings 17
  Cabell's Last Word? By Lorine Pruette 17
  Mr. Whitehead's Living Universe. By Benjamin Ginzburg 18
  A Russian-Jewish Childhood. by Fred T. Marsh 18
  Tradition and Clemence Dane. By Joseph T. Shipley 19
  Queen Bess Once More. By R. F. Dibble 19
  Greenwich Villagers. By Norah Meade 20
  Machiavelli and Lorenzo. By Eloise Ellery 20
  Judas, Savior of Jesus. By Mark Van Doren 20
  Eleven French Revolutionists. By Louis R. Gottschalk 21
  Books in Brief 21
  Drama: Holiday Fare. By Joseph Wood Krutch 22
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  What Next in India? By C. F. Andrews 25
  Lord Irwin's Blunder 26
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 27

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor Literary Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

SEVEN TO TEN for cruisers of 10,000 tons instead of six to ten as fixed by the Washington Conference, and the same increased ratio for auxiliary craft, is in substance the Japanese claim as brought out in the recent discussions with the Japanese delegation to the London Conference which stopped over for a few days at Washington to feel Secretary Stimson's pulse and take his temperature. As usual in such preliminary talks there are some alternatives. According to Mr. Wakatsuki, former Premier and head of the delegation, Japan would be glad to see a permanent holiday in the building of battleships, and will not insist that the 70 per cent ratio for auxiliary vessels shall be applied to each class of such vessels. As for the submarine, it will not abandon that type of craft, but it is willing to accept some limitation of submarine tonnage. In other words, Japan professes its readiness to agree to about any reduction or limitation of naval armament that will suit the other Powers, provided it is accorded a better position in relation to Great Britain and the United States than was given to it at the Washington Conference, and is allowed to retain the submarine. As the United States and Great Brittain appear to be opposed, tentatively at least, to all of these contentions except the battleship holiday, the official announcement that "agreement in the objectives of both countries was established" at Washington is apparently to be taken only in a Pickwickian sense.

NEUTRALITY FOR ARGENTINA in the next war, 800,000 tons of naval armament as a minimum for France, a protest by Earl Beatty in the House of Lords against any reduction in the strength of the British fleet: these and similar reports and outgivings of the past few days, taken in connection with the discussion of neutrality to which we referred last week, raise the question whether the Kellogg pact is coming to be looked upon by the signatory Powers as only an expression of a pious hope, or whether its doctrine possesses something that can be recognized as reality. In accepting the Kellogg pact, as we understand it, the nations have solemnly agreed not to go to war, with the implied reservation, however, that they may fight in self-defense. Why, then, all the to-do about neutrality and the need of keeping navies up to a high pitch? If war has been abolished there can be no neutrals, for neutrality has no existence save when there is war. On the other hand, if the armaments that are being talked about are really needed for defense, then every naval Power must be seriously expecting that the Kellogg pact is not really going to be observed. Is it not time that we had a little clear thinking and plain speaking about this peace business? Against whom does France need 800,000 tons of fighting craft, or Great Britain, according to Lord Beatty, require the laying down of ten cruisers within the next ten years? Is the Kellogg pact an honorable agreement, or is it bunk?

PRESIDENT HOOVER is responsible for a great increase in the amount of current information available with reference to social conditions in the United States. The report of his committee on recent economic changes published last spring was an extremely valuable study of contemporary economic movements, and he has now appointed a research council on social trends which shall direct corresponding studies in broader social fields, dealing with national health, changes in family life, housing, education, recreation, and like topics. The work will be carried on with funds provided by the Rockefeller Foundation, and the personnel of the council is a guaranty both of the scholarly character and impartiality of the work and of the skill with which the results will be presented. Mr. Hoover has been well advised in trusting this survey to five such men as Wesley C. Mitchell, Charles E. Merriam, William F. Ogburn, Howard W. Odum, and Shelby M. Harrison. It is worth noting, also, that the Social Science Research Council has given aid in defining the nature of the survey. All this promises much for the usefulness of the study that is to be made.

COMPLETE VICTORY FOR RUSSIA—that is the outcome of the negotiations at Khabarovsk in the matter of the dispute over the Chinese Eastern Railway. The troops of both sides are to be called away from the frontiers as soon as possible, all Russians and Chinese arrested by either nation will be released, all White Russians employed will be removed, all Soviet and Chinese executives who have been dismissed or have resigned will be restored, all economic organizations interrupted by the dispute will be reestablished, the respective consuls in East Siberia and Manchuria are to be put back into office, and the Chinese agree to dissolve the White Guard Corps and expel its leaders and organizers from Manchuria. From the Russian point of view nothing could be more complete and satisfactory. It is to be noticed, however, that the Soviets have not asked for any financial reparation for damages for the acts which the Chinese, by the acceptance of these terms without protest to the rest of the world, admit were wrong on their part. Yet Secretary Stimson has the effrontery to have given out in Washington that he sees in this result "a vindication of the so-called Hoover doctrine of action under the Kellogg peace pact." It is added, however, that neither the White House nor the State Department is expected to make any direct claim of credit for forcing a peaceful adjustment. We hope not. That would be an impudence beyond all characterization.

BOSTON has done it again. This time a perfectly respectable Cambridge bookseller has been sentenced to a month in jail and has been fined $500 in addition for selling a book alleged to be immoral, "Lady Chatterly's Lover," by D. H. Lawrence. The book was not exposed for sale nor was anybody solicited to purchase it. An agent of that disgusting organization known as the New England Watch and Ward Society procured the commission of the crime by going into the shop and begging the bookseller to get him a copy. This time the society has at least received from both the prosecution and the defense the dressing down that its despicable methods deserve. The district attorney says that he wishes the public to understand that he indorses neither the policy nor the tactics of the society and he adds that if its agents go into stores of good repute and induce people to commit crime he will proceed against them. He should begin right now by making an example of the contemptible agent who figured in this case. The counsel for the defense, Herbert Parker, who has held high office in the State and stands well at the bar, properly declared:

> These miserable, false pretenders who pose brazenly as protectors of public morals are nothing but falsifiers and deceivers. God forbid that the standards of this Commonwealth should be stained by the false and poisonous hands of such persons!

What is the matter with Boston that this society is not put out of business by the contempt of the citizenry?

"THEY ARE SIMPLY SMALL FILES in which human beings are stored away"—thus Colonel George F. Chandler, who has just investigated Auburn Prison at the request of Governor Roosevelt, describes the horrible cells in that prison. They are, he declares, "antiquated, damp, dark, and cold," and devoid of all sanitary conveniences except pails. They are seven feet high and seven deep; half are four feet wide and half only three and one-half feet—in these two men are often immured. The prisoners are "poorly and inadequately clothed"; there are "few gloves, overcoats, or boots" for those who work out-of-doors. The prison itself was built in 1816 and has not been added to since 1880. In addition to all this the men have for months been without adequate work or any work at all, without athletics or any proper exercise. Is it surprising that victims of this kind of "reform" have twice within six months risen in desperation? Colonel Chandler is able to praise only the women's wing which has 115 inmates—and three babies! He recommends immediate relief from overcrowding even by the use of the State Fair Grounds, an increase in the number of guards and civilian employees, better food, the abolition of special privileges, the segregation of incorrigible prisoners, and the abolition of the Mutual Welfare League. The Governor has accepted four of these recommendations: relief from overcrowding, better food and clothing, and a new prison-guard system. We are glad that he will not abolish the League. It is not less but more self-government that the prisoners need.

> At the end of seven months' struggle to organize, the strikers' toll is six men and one woman killed, twenty-four wounded, seven sentenced to prison for five to twenty years, seven kidnapped, and five flogged by mobs. Not a single one of those responsible for the violence against the strikers has been brought to justice.

THE CASE OF THE TEXTILE WORKERS against the State of North Carolina stands as above, according to the American Civil Liberties Union. The eight deputies lately on trial for second-degree murder for the death of six textile workers have just been acquitted by a mountaineer jury in Burnsville, North Carolina. The strikers were shot in the back; not one of them, according to eye witnesses, carried a gun; the deputies used their guns to disperse a crowd in front of one of the mills at Marion. Their plea was self-defense—against an old man, James Jonas, now dead, who, after the sheriff had thrown tear-gas bombs into the crowd, began to lay about him with his cane, against two or three hundred unarmed workers who had shown no disposition to violence and even when they were shot at had only a desire to get away. The verdict was not a surprise to spectators in the courtroom, nor will it be to anyone who has followed the mill trials so far. The State always wins; the strikers and organizers always lose. But the State may rest assured that, while labor conditions in the South remain what they now are, the bloody struggle will not end.

THE PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION to report upon conditions in Haiti has now been voted by both Houses of Congress. It is, therefore, an accomplished fact. We have never felt that it was really needed, for the real facts as to Haiti and our misgovernment of it could be ascertained easily by Mr. Hoover had he the will to peruse the existing literature on the subject. But he now has his commission; the question now is as to the personnel. Upon that everything will hinge. First of all the appointees should be men capable of entirely detached judgment about the conduct of our officials and the policies under which they have governed. Next there should be at least one representative colored American upon the commission. Our colored fellow-citizens are deeply concerned with the fate of Haiti; there are a number of them, notably Bishop Hurst of Baltimore, familiar with that country and competent to interpret the wishes of the Haitians themselves. If Mr.

Hoover does as well by the Haitians as he has in naming his new research council on social trends, we shall not fear.

A SPECIAL DISPATCH in the New York Times of December 18 stated that Secretary Adams apparently had received a reply from General Smedley D. Butler concerning his Pittsburgh speech on marine rule abroad, but did not intend to make it public. The Administration, the Times intimated, was not anxious to magnify the incident. Quite right! Let it die. The public memory is short, anyway. But we beg our readers not to forget that it now stands uncontradicted in the verified newspaper record, and that, if the Times account is correct, the Navy Department, with General Butler's report in hand, does not deny, that the marines have elected "our men" in Nicaragua by methods that would have disgraced Philadelphia ward politics in its palmiest days. If the Navy Department is satisfied to let the record stand at that, we are.

THE NOTEWORTHY FEATURE of the banquet held several weeks ago to celebrate the fifth anniversary of the resumption of arbitration in the New York men's clothing industry was the stress laid by all the speakers on the need for a more stabilized industry. Leading retailers of the country, clothing manufacturers, and the union all joined in making a public plea for greater cooperation among the responsible factors in the industry. It is a far cry from discussion of the generalities of industrial relations to the consideration of such problems as the credit risks of the customers of woolen mills, the evils of cancelation, and the public admission by large distributors of the value of labor organization. Lieutenant Governor Lehman said that stabilization of this type of industry was inconceivable without a strong and responsible trade union; and Sidney Hillman of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers went so far as to predict the creation of an industrial council, composed of all the elements of the industry, which should utilize its moral force for the control of those who refuse to contribute to the welfare of the industry. A survey of the operations of the impartial machinery, made by Jacob Billikopf, the Impartial Chairman, showed how much progress has been made toward the peaceful adjustment of disputes and toward higher standards of living in the industry as a result of the introduction and successful administration of unemployment insurance.

PAUL SCHEFFER, perhaps the foremost German foreign correspondent, who since 1921 has brilliantly represented the Berliner Tageblatt in Moscow, has been barred from Russia. The Soviet Government has assured him that there is nothing personal in this, but that it was necessary to establish further the principle that foreign journalists are not "resident" and therefore not covered by a treaty between Russia and Germany which guarantees to Germans permanently resident in Russia the right to return if they journey abroad. The Soviets have even hinted that Herr Scheffer may be allowed to return to Moscow at some later time. In a remarkable first-page editorial Theodor Wolff, editor of the Tageblatt, has told the whole story, declaring that the Russian Ambassador to Berlin had for a long time past urged upon him Herr Scheffer's recall. Theodor Wolff sees no possible interpretation for this act save that the Soviets desire to carry on the world revolution "with publicity completely barred." Undoubtedly Herr Scheffer wrote from an intensely German point of view. It is true, also, that from having been an admirer of the Soviet Government he became one of its bitterest critics. His analyses of Soviet economic affairs, while biased, have been among the most searching of any made in Moscow. Fortunately America profits by Moscow's stupid action: Herr Scheffer is hereafter to represent the Tageblatt in the United States. In this connection it is to be noted that the Soviets have denied circulation in Russia to our excellent contemporary the World Tomorrow.

THE NATIONAL CHILD LABOR Committee, which has just been celebrating its twenty-fifth anniversary, deserves the thanks of all good citizens for its notable work in protecting children against the many dangers of premature gainful employment. Its task, however, is only begun. Miss Grace Abbott, chief of the Children's Bureau, which is in some sense an outgrowth of the committee's work, pointed out at the anniversary dinner that when Great Britain in 1931 raises the school-leaving age to fifteen it will be ahead of the United States in preventing interference with education by child labor. In some of our States children of fourteen and fifteen may still work eleven hours a day, or even longer. Our legislative standards do not include all children, and even our most advanced legislation constitutes only a first step in that "program for a wholesome, healthy service to the life of young people" called for by Miss Frances Perkins, Industrial Commissioner of New York. With gratitude for the progress of the past twenty-five years we must gird ourselves for vastly greater effort during the next quarter-century or we shall find ourselves in respect to our children far in the rear of other countries (Russia, for example) which have come to appreciate more highly than we the value of their chief asset.

SPRING FASHIONS ARE OUT. Those persons who have been breathlessly awaiting their coming may take comfort, for they will be rejoiced to learn not only that skirts will be less extreme as to length but less adorned with bows, ruffles, pleats, and gadgets than they have been this fall. Thus the American woman can say triumphantly and loudly that she has won her fight against the Paris couturiers; no longer will she be bound in what she shall wear by the captious and arbitrary notions that emanate from Paris. She can say this and she doubtless will; but will it be true? M. Worth, head of one of the most famous Paris dressmaking establishments, came to New York the other day. He was horrified—not a bit less horrified than Miss Fannie Hurst, Miss Virginia Gildersleeve, and at least half of the editorial staff of The Nation—by the prevailing female fashions. "No, no," Mr. Worth cried out in dismay, "Paris never had any such ideas as these. Paris modes for this winter differed, it is true, from those of late years; but not like this; not so long, so intricate, so elaborate, so decorated. These are American adaptations of Paris models. Pfui!" We do not vouch for the above as M. Worth's exact words, but they were indeed his sentiments. And what is the answer to that? If the American woman all by herself invented the clothes she has this winter been seeing in the shops, then she deserves her punishment, which is—to wear them.

Consolidation—What For?

AFTER almost ten years of travail, the Interstate Commerce Commission has brought forth its plan of railroad consolidation. The Transportation Act of 1920, it will be remembered, required the commission "as soon as practicable" to prepare and adopt a plan for the consolidation of our nineteen-hundred-odd existing railroad companies into a limited number of systems. Competition was to be preserved "as fully as possible." For each system the cost of transportation as related to the value of property used was to be the same, so that under uniform rates they might all earn the same rate of return. The securities of consolidated roads might not exceed the valuation of the roads as fixed by the commission. That body was given no power to require consolidation, but once its plan was adopted, no consolidation might occur that did not conform to the plan.

The plan now published groups the railroads of the country into twenty-one systems, including the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific, making nineteen domestic groups. The commission would establish five trunk-line systems, based on the New York Central, the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Van Sweringen group, and the Wabash, instead of a four-system consolidation. In the Northwest, the Great Northern and Northern Pacific are to merge, but without the Burlington, which is to be the center of an independent system. An important feature of the plan is the proposal for terminals not tied to a particular line, but open to the use of all. The sharp criticism immediately voiced by Professor Ripley and the rumblings of dissatisfaction from railroad and political leaders indicate something of the ordeal the plan will have to face.

No more footless task than the one laid on the commission, we venture to say, was ever given by a legislature to an administrative body. The glaring theoretical inconsistencies that have run through all our railroad legislation, reaching their climax in the much-lauded Transportation Act of 1920, made the preparation of such a plan all but meaningless from the standpoint of the public interest. There are two possible reasons for consolidation: the gain to the public and the gain to the railroads and their financial backers. The first is the only sound reason for commission action; but under the voluntary plan the commission can get results only when the railroads stand to gain. The action of the commission shows clearly its appreciation of the fatuousness of its task. It originally employed Professor Ripley to prepare a tentative plan of consolidation, on which it held extensive hearings and collected fifty-four volumes of testimony. After four years of fruitless attempts to reconcile the conflicting interests of quarreling railroads, it let the matter lapse, and in its report for 1925 asked to be relieved of the task of preparing a comprehensive plan. This request it repeated in 1926, 1927, and 1928. Congress did nothing, and the commission in apparent despair has now proceeded to "prepare and adopt" the plan just given out. It remains to be seen whether the railroads will accept the commission's proposed arrangements in whole or in part, and whether Congress will pass the necessary legislation.

The primary purpose of present consolidation legislation is to make possible a uniform rate structure that will not give excessive profits to strong, well-located roads with good credit, at the same time that it starves weak ones. To accomplish this result, the strong roads must be combined with the weak ones, so that their earnings may go into a common pot. But railroad presidents are not fools; their job is to make money for their stockholders, and incidentally to serve the public in so far as such service will sooner or later increase profits. Therefore they are not going to take over weak roads that will prove a financial burden to them if they can help it, and in justice to their stockholders they ought not to. The only consolidation that is likely under present law, therefore, is consolidation that profits the strong roads. As regards the major issue of combining strong and weak roads, private profit and public gain stand directly opposed to each other. In general the strong roads will not consent to such mergers. Under present law and policies, they cannot be compelled to. Anyone who has followed the consolidation discussion of the past ten years knows that the ruling consideration in every case has been, not the public advantage involved, but the advantage of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the profits of the New York Central, the ambitions of the Van Sweringens, or this or that other private interest.

These are the determining conditions now, and they will continue to be so just as long as the railroads are privately owned. Put nineteen hundred railroads together into nineteen systems, and each system will still try, and will properly try, to make profits for its owners. We shall still have the same conflict of public and private interests that we have now. What we need is a unification of all the roads (not for purposes of operation, but for purposes of accounting) into a great transportation system in which the gains or losses of each particular part shall fall into a subordinate place.

Theoretically, that is what we are trying to get now, but the whole attempt is vitiated by the effort of the roads to get as much as possible for themselves. Witness the millions of dollars and the yet more valuable energy of thousands of able minds expended in the endless controversy over valuation, a controversy completely irrelevant to any public service—irrelevant to anything, indeed, except the gains of railroad owners. Witness the unceasing maneuvers of railroad executives and financiers in their efforts to achieve this or that combination, purely to make private millions, without regard to any public gain or loss involved. Witness the indecent haste with which we scrapped all the remarkable gains of unification achieved during war-time, and the mountain of current misinformation about that experience.

Consolidate the roads further under existing law and theories, and you only strengthen the forces of private interest lying squarely athwart the path of genuine consolidation. Let the strong roads strengthen themselves by consolidation, and you only increase the valuation on which they are going to demand a return. Discussion of the plan may help us to see the opposition of interest between a system of privately owned, profit-making railroads and a public needing a unified railroad system operated to produce adequate transportation at minimum cost.

India and Its Freedom

A MILESTONE in the history of the East—this the year 1930 may prove to be. Few in the Occident outside of England realize how portentous the next few months may become. They understand vaguely that there is unrest throughout India; that Afghanistan has just been somewhat pacified after a bloody civil war; that in Palestine the bitterness grows between English, Jews, and Arabs; that in Irak, Syria, and a dozen other countries the natives are outspoken against the mandate system or the overlordship of white men, and are more and more determined to free themselves of any foreign yoke or guidance, saying that they, too, prefer, if necessary, bad government of their own to good government by foreigners. As we write comes news of trouble from far-flung spheres of British influence. The British Under Secretary of State for the Colonies has just had to make the humiliating confession that in Southeast Nigeria in West Africa there has been a clash between natives and police in which eighteen natives were shot. The Labor Under Secretary "regretted to announce" that all the casualties were among women—an incredibly humiliating confession from an English official! From South Africa the news is very bad. In Natal, where in June last there was a riot at Durban in which over a hundred persons were killed or wounded, the police on November 14 examined 6,000 natives and made 600 arrests; a few days later 700 more arrests were made. Three natives have been wounded in the Transvaal and effigies of Premier Hertzog and General Smuts have been burned. As we write comes the startling news of a bomb meant for the Viceroy's train near Delhi on December 22 and the ominous break-up over the vexed question of dominion status of the preliminary conference between the Indian leaders and the Viceroy.

"The English people in Parliament," wrote Richard Cobden seventy years ago, "have undertaken to be responsible for governing 150,000,000 of people, despotically, in India. They have adopted the principle of a military despotism, and I have no faith in such an undertaking being anything but a calamity and a curse to the people of England." He added that it was "an abiding conviction in my mind that we have entered on an impossible and hopeless career in India." Today it is India that is the touchstone, and it is certainly the irony of fate that it is a Labor government which is to be put to the test by India as to its democracy and its willingness to do justice to a great mass of backward human beings. There are many in England who say today that the life of Ramsay MacDonald's so promising Government depends upon what happens in India. Moreover, the hour is at hand. At this juncture the Indian National Congress is meeting to decide whether the promise lately made to it of ultimate dominion status is to be accepted by the leaders of the Indian people, or whether there will be an immediate declaration of war. Not, of course, physical war, at least not at the beginning; the Indian people are completely disarmed and forbidden under heavy penalties to possess arms. If it comes to a break the struggle will begin with non-cooperation, that is, the refusal to obey laws and to pay taxes. But it is a grave question whether it will be possible to carry on a pacific revolution without eventual bloodshed. A single blunder by a British official; another bloody deed like the massacre at Amritsar; the killing in India of eighteen women in order "to allay unrest," and the fat will be in the fire.

Because we have felt deeply concerned over the situation in India we have, of late, given considerable space to Indian matters. We print two articles elsewhere in this issue presenting contrasted British points of view. No one is better qualified to speak for one side than C. F. Andrews, the foremost British supporter of Mahatma Gandhi, whose recent visits to this country—where he now is—have made him personally known to many Americans. The hope that men like Mr. Andrews held for averting a calamity in India was due to the recent renewal by the present Viceroy of the promise of ultimate dominion status. A year ago the hotheads in the National Congress could barely be held in check by Gandhi; it was only through his efforts that the congress did not demand dominion status at once. We earnestly hope that the patience of the Indian people can be stretched a little farther. Sorely tried as they have been, one more delay seems trifling in comparison with the horrors of a long and bloody struggle.

As to what is best for India each person will, we suppose, decide in accordance with his own particular political philosophy. Those who assume that only men of fair skin can govern properly in India will have their answer ready, and so will all those who have lost faith in democratic doctrines. There is also a great school, notably in England, believing in self-rule and desiring to help the Indian people, which can, however, only point to the possibility, nay, the probability, of religious conflicts and wars among the Indian states, and therefore finds itself unable to carry through to the logical conclusion the principles which it professes to hold. To our minds no compromise is possible. It is the Indian people who must have the final say and no one else. From the day of its foundation this journal has been firmly committed to the doctrine that no amount of good government inflicted upon a people by officials from another country can take the place of self-government, however bad. This may be, as some say, carrying theory to indefensible ends. We can, however, no more yield our position than could the American Abolitionists who were told that if they persisted in their mad demands for freedom for the Negroes the United States would become nothing but a shambles.

So we are for having the people of India achieve freedom by the peaceful means of Gandhi. Any other course will obscure the issue, rouse the bitterest and vilest human passions, and give to the imperialists of Great Britain the very excuse they seek to renew what Cobden himself characterized as the English "game of fraud, violence, and injustice in Asia." But however the issue may come out in the immediate future the fact is, in our judgment, that the day of white supremacy in backward and undeveloped countries is drawing to a close, if only because of the lessons of hypocrisy and deceit and wholesale murder which the superior races taught to their inferiors from 1914 to 1918.

Bargain-Counter Fame

TWO members of The Nation staff have received a letter which informs the recipient that he has been selected as one of The World's Most Useful Persons. Careful investigation reveals the fact that at least $100 must be forwarded to the Centenarian Club of East Aurora, New York, before the names can be publicly entered upon the roll of honor, but the distinction is so great and the cost, comparatively speaking, so little that we have decided to pass the details on to our readers. We are inclined to suspect that "most useful" means only "most useful to the gentlemen who receive the checks," but that explanation will probably not be printed, and we suggest that any members of our public who need honor more than they need a hundred dollars try sending draft, money order, or stamps to Mr. St. Clair Baxton, secretary of the association. We are not cynics but we do suspect that almost anybody with the needful cash will be discovered to have claims quite as authentic as the two editors of The Nation.

Judge Henry Neil, somewhat awkwardly described as "the father of mothers' pensions," is the president of the club and its purpose is to prolong the lives of the most useful persons by teaching them to subsist upon a rational diet. Anyone who pays, not $100 but $10,000, automatically becomes so exceedingly useful that the association will undertake to feed him at its own scientific table for the rest of his useful life, and it offers specimen menus—in which turnips, tomatoes, and spinach play a prominent part—to show what it will do for him. But even we humbler, hundred-dollar members are not neglected, for "every man, woman, or child who enrols as a member of the Centenarian Club becomes—a potential centenarian, and can look forward to an extended life of happy, healthy usefulness." He can also, it seems, contemplate the list of useful persons kindly supplied and take comfort in the undenied assumption that he is in the same class with Calvin Coolidge and Charles Chaplin, Herbert Hoover and Bernarr Macfadden, Anton Lang and Mussolini—all of whom appear on the list.

Only once does Judge Neil seem to us to have become a little confused in his logic. He is enlarging upon the joys of longevity and upon the importance of diet in attaining it when he inadvertently remarks that improper eating habits kept many at home with bad health when they should have been fighting for their country in the last great war. At this point we paused and, after a little reflection, tore up the check we were about to mail. We do want to live to be a hundred and we might even be willing to eat turnips to do it, but surely bullets are even more dangerous than proteins and it strikes us as undeniable that the sickly who stayed home had a far better chance of becoming centenarians than the turnip-eaters who went to battle. And so, instead of joining the centenarians at East Aurora, we think we shall form a club of our own and formulate a dietary program guaranteed to give our members some form of indigestion entirely incompatible with life in the army. Dyspepsia may not be pleasant, and it certainly is not patriotic to prefer ill health to the soldier's glorious death, but if it's long life that one is looking for one had better not be too robust when the next war comes around.

The Night After Christmas

THE joyful Christmas season has once more come and gone. We have had the usual plum-pudding stomach-aches and depleted-bank-account headaches. We have heard shouts of joy about Christmas from the young and moans of distress from the old. We have listened to the customary pleas from earnest persons to remember what Christmas really means—as if anyone in the world could state the meaning, after some two thousand years, of so complicated a festival, so deeply interwoven with the thought and behavior of millions of persons and dozens of nations. The Soviet Government, in its bold, refreshing way, has decided to abolish not only Christmas but Sunday. Four days of work, one of rest: that is, in so far as it is enforceable, to be the Soviet program henceforth.

But whatever our distaste for Christmas on the morning after, we can learn something from it about the state of America. Thus we read of a lady in San Francisco who bought for a Christmas present to a certain gentleman an emerald ring costing $240,000. We hear the story of another lady, also anxious to make a present to a gentleman, who after consulting with a famous jeweler in New York about just the right sort of distinguished gift that should properly represent her sentiments, decided on a knife, fork, and soup spoon (because "his favorite dish is soup") of platinum with a monogram in diamonds, all for $1,500. This would seem to indicate that the recent stock-market disaster had not been quite universal. But wait: the New York Times is having a hard time collecting its fund for the Hundred Neediest Cases; unless by the end of the collection period unprecedented strides are made in the fund, it will fall short of last year's total. Charity, the first of the luxuries, seems to be dropping behind. Thus also we are told that a lady in search of an ermine wrap for her daughter offered considerably less than the price demanded by one couturier, was refused, and made the same offer to another who accepted it gladly. And when she got home, after making her purchase, the first salesman was on the telephone, telling her that the firm had changed its mind and would sell her the cloak for the sum she had named!

Not too much can be deduced from so short a list of incidents. But probably they are not alone of their kind. In so far as they are significant at all, they indicate first that Christmas giving is over-lavish, ostentatious, and vulgar; second, that the decline in the value of investments has first of all reduced gifts for charity; and third, that while the middle-class and middle-price shops may have done as large a Christmas business as usual, the luxury trades were hard enough hit to wish to take any price they could get for what they had to sell. These deductions put one in a strangely sympathetic frame of mind toward the Soviet system. If Christmas is to be no more than an unintelligent redistribution of wealth where it is not needed, then would it not be simpler to abolish it altogether? Four days of work; one day of rest. On the day after Christmas how simple, sweet, and desirable that seems!

It Seems to Heywood Broun

HERE it is 1930, or thereabouts, and I must make a resolution to lose a deal of weight. Dieting is difficult and I don't play handball. The best sort of exercise is of the sort which can be introduced easily into the daily life of the victim. I think I'll endeavor to adopt the foreign custom of kissing ladies' hands. Let me admit at the beginning that I realize this is much more difficult than it seems. I don't expect to be an expert without long and protracted practice. Many years ago Rudyard Kipling wrote a short story in which he dealt not unkindly with an expatriate American who was endeavoring to become Anglicized. Just what happened to him is unimportant as far as we are concerned, but in the course of the tale Kipling ventured the remark that when an American had succeeded in learning a golf swing, correct and full, he was to all practical purposes a Briton. Of course, at that time Bobby Jones was not yet born and Hagen was a small boy. Within Mr. Kipling's lifetime dozens of Americans learned to master a coordinated movement which the novelist felt could never be conquered by any save those who were British by birth or spiritual alliance. And so, though I am inept in the beginning, it may be that within ten years observers will comment, "I wonder why these clumsy foreigners can't kiss a lady's hand the way that Broun does."

If a nation can learn a movement as difficult as the full St. Andrew's swing there is no reason why any one of us should despair of being able to kiss a lady's hand with both propriety and grace. Possibly propriety is not exactly the word I want. The average American, as things are now, goes about the business all wrong or nearly so. He raises the hand to his lips instead of bending over it. The spirit is that of a hurried diner at a buffet lunch rather than of reverence and adoration. It is no fun for the lady and no exercise for the man. Everybody knows that we do not bend nearly enough. There is in our land insufficient romance and too much waist line. We should seize eagerly upon a custom which promises to promote the one and reduce the other.

Not a few of our good citizens engage each morning in exercises designed to promote suppleness of figure. The daily dozen still has an honored place in the national regime. But this is mechanical. Setting-up exercises are hardly ever done with honest zest. It is my impression that muscles do best when they are moved about more or less unconsciously.

It would be better by far for a man to kiss somebody's hand twelve times a day than to put the same number of foot pounds of energy into the rather dull pastime of touching the floor of his bedroom with his fingertips. In the beginning of my plan it may be necessary to kiss the same hand twelve times. Twelve different hands would be better for the circulation, but nobody should attempt too much at the start. In looking about for fair and friendly persons having available hands a man could get lots of air, plenty of walking, and possibly even a little running.

It is not well to stress too much the purely utilitarian side of the practice. There is need in our life of some new form of greeting or farewell. It seems to me that the handshake is one of the least satisfactory contacts ever hit upon by man. Unless a terrific effort is thrown into the procedure there's no warmth in a handshake. I would be perfectly willing to shake hands with my worst enemy just before he turned to stab me in the back. To me this would not seem unduly treacherous, for a handshake should commit no one to anything. Only rarely is a circuit set up. "Excuse my glove," which is used in northern New York and, I am told, in some parts of Ohio, is silly. There's nothing particularly personal in a handshake even when the leather is absent. Why apologize?

The people who have tried to make the handshake significant have all failed grossly. And they deserved their failures. There is the man who endeavors to put sincerity into his clasp by crushing some of the smaller bones in the hand entrusted to him. Practically every state in the Union now has a law which provides that it is not homicide if you kill him immediately after the break.

And there is the lingerer. He does not put any crushing force into the grip but just hangs on. By mere duration he hopes to suggest some deeper note of feeling. But I have been told that many go away merely impressed with the belief that the poor fellow is fearfully absent-minded. "May I have my hand back now, if you please," has been enough to discourage whole regiments of lingerers. No, the thing is preposterous. Not Hercules himself or Percy Shelley could make a handshake passionate.

Still it isn't passion I had so much on my mind as warmth and friendliness. A kiss can be a very adequate expression of the more eager emotions. And this is the very fact which limits its utility. I am glad to hear that casual kissing is making great advances. When I was a young man, kissing was reserved exclusively for relatives and it was far too good for them. And if she was not your cousin then you had to marry her on the first convenient Monday in order to make an honest woman of her.

The old censure lying against all those who kiss and tell is another indication of how important the kiss must have been back in the days when Rostand called it a rose-red dot over the "i" in "loving." Suppose you do tell? What on earth have you got to make into an anecdote? People now kiss without commitments. In earlier days, judging by the current comedies, to kiss was to surrender. The hero and the heroine never kissed until just before the final curtain. If they had done so earlier it might have created a bad impression. And the old-style problem play had a kiss in it in the middle of the big third-act scene. This also meant something very important, but I can't remember what.

We need the kiss upon the hand or something which can stand between the handshake and the more orthodox native kiss. You never can tell just how that will turn out. Not infrequently one gets more than he bargains for—or very much less. It would not be a good thing, for instance, for a business man to start the day by kissing all his employees in turn. But he might very possibly kiss their hands. That would improve his figure and it couldn't very well do the young ladies in the office any harm.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Farm Relief Meets an Enemy

By ROBERT S. ALLEN

Washington, December 18

THE farm-relief act that the special session of Congress enacted this summer with such solemn assurance of great deeds to come has not had long to wait for its test. The long fight between the grain dealer and the grain grower, that has been productive of so much political and economic history in the Northwest, has forced the issue. On its outcome rests the question of the integrity of the government in this legislation. If the grain farmers win their fight, then the live-stock, the fruit, the cotton, and other growers may hope to win when their turn comes to organize effective marketing agencies. If the grain producers lose, then the others have no chance. Whatever the result, it is certain to have far-reaching political and economic effect.

The immediate fight centers around the program of the Farm Board to set up a farmer-owned and farmer-controlled grain marketing and stabilization structure. In its larger aspect the fight is the old, old struggle between the farmer endeavoring to organize the selling end of his business under his own ownership and management, and the commission man, who, possessing the great bulk of the terminal and storage facilities, to say nothing of credit, has for so long taken millions of dollars yearly in tolls from the producers, using every political and economic resource to break up the farmers' movement. Heretofore the machinery for the marketing of grain, from the elevators in which the grain is stored to the establishment of prices and the grading of grains, has been controlled, directly or indirectly, by commission firms holding seats on the grain exchanges or boards of trade in Minneapolis, Duluth, and Chicago. The Farm Board, having acquired membership on the Chicago Board of Trade through its purchase of a brokerage house, the Rural Grain Company, is apparently preparing the way for farmers' cooperatives to keep the marketing of their grain wholly in their own control. This has not served to lessen the alarm of the dealers.

In this fight, the farmer has certain advantages never before on his side. Two decades ago, when wheat producers of the Northwest organized the ill-fated Equity Cooperative Exchange, they had everyone and everything against them—the politicians, the banks, the merchants, their own inexperience, and above all the power and organization of the dealers. The breakdown of this organization was the object of an investigation in 1924 by the Federal Trade Commission. Senator Gerald P. Nye, in a speech before the Senate on December 9, said:

> This report [of the Federal Trade Commission] sets forth in no uncertain terms the charge that the Equity Cooperative Exchange was wrecked through a program of conspiracy and agreement among the people associated in the grain trade by boycott and by threats of boycott and by a general program of sabotage to hinder, embarrass, and destroy the business of the cooperative. It succeeded in its low work, just as it has succeeded in stamping out competition whenever it should show its head in the form of farmers' cooperative marketing agencies.

The situation has changed since then. The ten-year agricultural depression has hit farmer, merchant, and banker alike. The years of agricultural agitation brought new political forces into influence, the Non-Partisan League, the Farmer-Labor Party, the La Follette Progressive Party, giving the farmer in both State and national politics a militant and enlightened representation. And with Congressional elections looming in the approaching months the farmers are in a position to make their protest effective.

In Congress and in the farm belt the situation is being closely observed and talked about. Reports from the Northwest are to the effect that there is greater interest in the outcome of the fight between the grain men and the Farm Board than in the tariff bill. The politicians, caught between the grim determination of the farmers and the frantic outcries of the grain dealers, are anxiously observing developments. The issue is clear-cut; and the farmers know this. Both sides cannot win. If the Farm Board's plan goes through successfully, then the grain dealer loses. If he wins, then the farmer loses. The farm-relief legislation becomes a farce, the Farm Board an innocuous and futile agency, and agriculture faces again the task of renewing its struggle for effective collective bargaining.

Senator Nye put the matter squarely in a discussion of the issue on the Senate floor:

> The Farm Board has come to grips with a farm foe of great strength and influence. It is being bombarded without let-up by organized interests which are leaving no stone unturned, no string of influence unpulled in an effort to embarrass or halt the Farm Board in that body's program looking to what now seems to be genuine farm relief. . . .
>
> By its action the Farm Board has made it clear that the only way for agriculture to win is to supplant the grain-trade operators with farmer-controlled marketing machinery. . . .
>
> While the Farm Board has ignored the more personal interests of the grain trade, it has been apparent that the board has sought to play fair with the trade. The board has realized that the trade-owned terminal and elevator facilities which should under no circumstances be confiscated but which instead could well be utilized by the new cooperative machinery. . . . The grain trade did stand to lose . . . but to lose what? To lose, primarily, that opportunity to sit in the doorway and collect unearned tolls from the producers of grain. . . .
>
> With their backs to the wall the grain trade takes its last stand. Will they accomplish their purpose in the end, or will this administration, through the Farm Board, demonstrate to the farm people of the Northwest that at last they do have a helping hand from their government, after their years of struggle with the grain trade which has never contributed anything to the farmers?

Senator Nye introduced into the Congressional Record a letter that farmer friends had sent him, written by a grain commission firm in Minneapolis and sent out presumably to all grain-elevator men throughout the Northwest urging revolt against the program of the Farm Board. To offset credit pressure on the farmers the board has had to make funds available to cooperatives which have been called upon by commission houses either to pay outstanding loans without delay or to sign five-year grain contracts.

So far the farmer leaders declare that there has been no yielding on the part of the Farm Board. It is true that from certain Republican quarters assurances have come to them that the board's plans do not contemplate the elimination of the private grain trade. Alexander Legge, former president of the International Harvester Company, who is chairman of the board and the leader in its cooperative marketing program, has himself said this, although admitting that if its plans go through the farmer will dominate the grain-marketing system. The farm leaders are warm in their praise of Mr. Legge's work. They declare that he is carrying on courageously and ably. He has won their hearty approval not only by his work in directing the setting up of the grain-marketing organization, but by his stepping in at the time of the stock-market collapse in October and fixing a price of $1.25 a bushel for wheat. According to Senator Nye, the grain trade would have forced the price down to sixty or seventy cents a bushel.

Julius Barnes, who is a grain exporter on a large scale and now, as chairman of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, head of Mr. Hoover's business men's council, has interested himself in the commission men's case. He has gone with them to confer with Mr. Legge. Mr. Barnes, summoned before the Senate lobby investigating committee, declared that his sole purpose was to act as a conciliator. But to the farmer there is nothing to conciliate, and he does not trust Mr. Barnes, whose association with the grain men has done more perhaps than anything else to arouse the growers.

The Farm Board is trying, by means of a central Farmers' Grain Corporation, to set up a national cooperative grain-marketing structure. All the cooperatives, with regional units reaching down to the individual elevators and farmers, would belong to it. It would be backed by a $500,000,000 fund obtained direct from the federal treasury. The economic effect of such an organization, if successful, is a moot question. Some economists maintain that it would inevitably mean ever-increasing acreage and mounting overproduction; but the farmers assert that that is a problem which they will tackle when it arises. The issue now, they declare, is whether they will be permitted to organize their own marketing or whether the private dealers will once again triumph over them. That to them is the test; on that question they are waging their fight.

The Radio Corporation in the News

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, December 21

CHRISTMAS is here, and the spirit of good-will and forgiveness has descended on the Senate, erasing hatreds, banishing partisanship, and uprooting the most formidable conscientious scruples. Doubtless this explains the ease with which Old Joe Grundy was able to sidle into a Senate seat which had been so strenuously defended against the contaminating presence of poor Bill Vare. Doubtless, too, it explains the generous majorities by which Albert L. Watson and Clarence J. Hopkins were confirmed as federal judges, although there are cynics who contend that the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Kansas Anti-Saloon League are even more potent in such matters than the Yuletide spirit. As for me, I decline to surrender my illusions, and one of the most touching scenes I have yet witnessed was that in which Old Joe helped to make his own dream come true by voting to confirm Watson, who was originally picked at a conference in Old Joe's own room at the Mayflower Hotel. And yet, if there is a Santa Claus who remembers deserving politicians, why does not someone remind him of Claudius Huston, Chairman of the Republican National Committee and trusted friend of President Hoover, who has just suffered the bad fortune to be sued in the District of Columbia Supreme Court for $88,000? The plaintiff is Guy Standifer, wealthy shipbuilder and sportsman, and a vast deal of mystery surrounds the action. It is doubly unfortunate that the incident should have occurred just when the Senate Lobby Investigating Committee was unearthing the $75,000 fee which another friend of the President, E. P. Shattuck, received from the Cuban sugar lobby. Mr. Hoover seems to have bad luck with his friends!

SPEAKING of bad luck—it is not all reserved for Presidents, and may even overtake a deserving and industrious newspaper reporter if his industry happens to outrun his knowledge of his employer's financial connections. This painful discovery recently was made by Frank K. Boal, Washington correspondent of the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette and six other papers owned by the illustrious Paul Block. Mr. Boal obtained from a responsible government official certain information tending further to emphasize the Administration's deep and well-known displeasure with Charles E. Mitchell, president of the National City Bank of New York, and suggesting that Mitchell might soon retire from that position. He scheduled the story to the seven Block papers, and all seven accepted and published it. Very soon thereafter the editor of the Post-Gazette called Boal by telephone to say that Mr. Block was extremely angry over the publication, and was demanding the name of his informant. The reporter replied that he was pledged to confidence on the name, but would divulge it to his employer if the latter would let it go no further. That pledge not being forthcoming, the reporter stood his ground, and five days later was summarily discharged. In less than a week he received a call from a gentleman who identified himself as an emissary of the bank. He related that Block was under financial obligations to Mitchell, but insisted that the bank had not sought Boal's discharge. He failed to get the name of Boal's informant, and so far Boal hasn't got another job.

* * * * *

THIS salutary example may or may not be responsible for the curious manner in which the recent radio hearings before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce have been reported—or, rather, unreported—in the vast majority of the daily papers. Unless the reader happens to subscribe to a paper using the Universal News Service, or to a certain great Middle Western daily which modesty forbids me to name, he or she will be greatly surprised to learn the turn which those hearings have taken. Others know only that the majestic Owen D. Young appeared before the committee, demanding permission to merge the transoceanic cable and radio systems and the domestic telegraph lines in one gigantic communications monopoly, on the ground that they are unable, in their divided state, to compete successfully with "the British monopoly"; that he reiterated the familiar story that the Radio Corporation of America was organized from patriotic motives at the instance of President Wilson; and that majestically he departed with the plaudits of a grateful Senate ringing in his ears. With that much everyone is familiar. Now for the sadly neglected facts. Subsequent questioning of Mr. Young's less sanctified subordinates disclosed that the Radio Corporation's nationally advertised and constantly reiterated claim that it was "founded at the request of the United States Government" rests on nothing more substantial than the statement —itself disputed—that President Wilson in 1919 asked the General Electric Company not to sell certain radio patents to the British Marconi Company; and that subsequent to the organization of the Radio Corporation an admiral of the navy asked and received the President's permission to attend some of the board meetings as an observer. That is absolutely all! Under a cross-examination of the sort which his chief had magically been spared, Manton Davis, vice-president and general counsel of the company, admitted that President Wilson had "neither asked nor suggested its organization," but that he and his associates organized it "on their own motion and of their own volition." So much for that story.

* * * * *

NEXT, under similar cross-examination William Winterbottom, who occupies the comparatively humble but highly practical position of traffic manager of the R.C.A. communications system, admitted that competition between American communication lines and those of that ogre, "the British merger," actually exists nowhere in the world. He did speak of competition in the Pacific with a cable "whose ownership is largely British," but further questioning quickly revealed that the cable in question is a part of the International Telephone and Telegraph system, with which the Radio Corporation wishes to unite in competition against the British! And there in the stenographic record of the hearings lies the wreckage of Mr. Young's case—buried from the eyes of all the world excepting that portion of the public which I have named. With it are buried many other interesting facts. For example, there is the fact that competition between radio and the cables—which Mr. Young seeks to end—has universally resulted in reduction of rates, ranging from 20 to 35 per cent. There is the fact that the R.C.A. refuses to sell communicating apparatus, of which it has a manufacturing monopoly, to anyone who might set up a competing communications system. There is the fact that it refuses to sell transmitting tubes to owners of broadcasting stations who build the rest of their apparatus instead of buying it from R.C.A. There is the fact that in licensing the use of its patents to other manufacturers of receiving sets, it not only required them originally to pay royalties on the sets, but also on the hardwood cabinets in which they were encased, and even on the packing boxes in which they were shipped. This was delightfully described by Mr. Young as "requiring them to pay their share of the cost of research."

* * * * *

ALTHOUGH interesting, the foregoing are comparative trifles, involving only a few millions a year. What impressed me most was the financial "set-up" for the proposed merger of the R.C.A. communications system with the I. T. and T. It is admitted that the actual physical value of the radio facilities involved is not more than $25,000,000. In exchange for them, however, the R.C.A. would receive I. T. and T. stock having a present market value of approximately $100,000,000. Assuming that a monopoly in international communications was established, and that the government could regulate its rates (which is highly doubtful), the question arises as to what valuation would be allowed, as a rate basis, for that $25,000,000 worth of radio facilities. Mr. Young and General Harbord modestly suggested a valuation of $40,000,000 and a rate that would return 8 per cent on that figure. Such a valuation would include "intangible assets" such as "going value"—although it is obvious to a child that the going value of the system rests wholly on a gift from the public which would pay the rates, viz., the wave lengths and licenses to operate. Also, it would include the cost of unproductive research and of patents that are obsolete or useless. Senator Couzens aptly described this as "capitalizing your own mistakes." Personally, observing the market value of the I. T. and T. stock that would be exchanged for the property, I entertain grave doubts that the stockholders would even be content with a valuation of $40,000,000. Most refreshing of all the testimony was that of the extremely candid and forthright David Sarnoff, executive vice-president of the R.C.A. In effect, he said the company is able, through its manufacturing monopoly, to keep other people out of the radio-communications business; therefore the government should waste no wave lengths on "John Smith and Bill Jones," but give all of them to the R.C.A. He said that certain regulatory laws now on the federal statute books interfere with the plans of the R.C.A.; therefore they should be repealed at once. He said, finally, that these continual investigations of its methods by the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Justice, and the committees of Congress had been extremely irritating to the R.C.A., and that they should be discontinued once and for all. Poor Mr. Sarnoff! I liked him immensely for his frankness, but I shudder to think of the result when his testimony is read and dissected and elaborated on the floor of the Senate. Unless the temper of that body alters greatly under the mellowing influence of Senator Grundy, the communications monopoly is further away than ever. Indeed, the legislation, if any, which ensues from these hearings is likely to include either a prohibition on the sort of propaganda that has lately been broadcast over the National and Columbia chains by William Hard and Fred Wile, or a provision for some form of antidote. Hard's offensive attacks on the Senate and his incredible defense of Vare and Grundy—all thinly disguised as humor—have provoked tremendous resentment not only in the committee but in the entire Senate.

The National City Fiasco

By C. W.

ONE of the most interesting consequences of the recent collapse in the stock market was the last-moment failure of the National City Bank and the Corn Exchange Bank Trust Company to achieve the merger to which the whole financial world had been looking forward for several inflated weeks. The December issue of the National City's Letter gives the incident a formal explanation, which has been generally reprinted by the press. When the biggest bank in the country slips at the very point of becoming the biggest in the world, its explanation of the mishap is news.

The incident itself was dramatic. It involved the failure of the shareholders of the National City to ratify the action of their officials and directors, the willingness of the officials and directors to have their action left unratified, the chagrin of the Corn Exchange shareholders at the loss of a chance to sell their property for about $100,000,000 more than it was worth in the market, and the devastation of the prestige of Mr. Charles E. Mitchell, who was separated by but one step from making his financial organization the most powerful in the world as it was already the most aggressive. The explanation published by the National City tells nothing really new, but makes the best of a bad situation with characteristic boldness. It conscientiously points out—what its readers already know—that final authority in a corporation lies with the stockholders, and that certain acts, such as a merger with another corporation, require that authority specifically. It does not point out, however, that Mr. Mitchell's bargain turned out to be such a poor one that he had to acquiesce in its abandonment, or that being forced to let stockholders pull a corporation out of a hole the management got into is unusually painful, especially when the management is of the sort that ordinarily sees to it that whatever it starts gets finished. But candor is not a prominent virtue in business. Sometimes, as in this case, the truth reflects most indelicately on the judgment of responsible persons. Mr. Mitchell and the other officers of his organization are supposed to know a great deal about investment values and to practise in their management a stern, unpitiful technique. Yet in the merger agreement they had drawn up, they had provided not only for an exchange of the shares of the two banks, which is ordinarily all that the situation requires, but also as alternative they optimistically and generously provided for outright payment to the widows and orphans and others who own the Corn Exchange stock a price in cash which was almost six times its book value and almost sixty times its earnings. Almost anyone today will tell you sagaciously that sixty times earnings is too much to pay for anything. But the National City's offer was made many weeks ago when we were still in "a new economic era." Extravagant as it seems now, the option to take cash would have been accepted by few if any at the time it was arranged; but by the time the agreement came to be ratified it would have been accepted by everyone.

But the most impressive part of the whole affair is this: the National City Bank, with all its resources of statistical information, economic counsel, long experience, and unhampered executive ability, failed to see the deflation that was at hand. For that matter, no one else saw it, either, except those who had been seeing it inveterately for the past two years, but a concern as important as the National City is expected to see such things and see them accurately. Reasonably or unreasonably, its managers are supposed to be able to do what others cannot. And when they turn out to be as blind as the utterly sightless, people wonder what it is that all those salaries are supposed to pay for. Rumors have persisted that many of Mr. Mitchell's shareholders feel that his usefulness to the bank has been fatally impaired by this unfortunate miscarriage of judgment, but if he should relinquish the headship of his organization, he would undoubtedly be succeeded by an inferior in ability. Mr. Mitchell may be charged with making one big mistake, but scores of other financial executives have done nothing, and by doing nothing have allowed banking to be more and more cluttered with over-stuffed furniture and vice-presidents, and more and more sterilized with privilege. Mr. Mitchell has been imaginative and unconventional. Without intending probably to do more than make money he has done as much as any one except Mr. Giannini to socialize banking. From his position at the helm of the biggest bank in the country he has seen past the business of millionaires—which is the butt and sea-mark of most bankers' utmost sail—to that of clerks and laborers.

The National City—a bank whose resources are practically two billions of dollars, whose organization spreads over the whole earth, whose aggressive tactics make its otiose competitors squirm—began a year ago to lend to common people in small amounts at reasonable interest. It began selling securities to even the least investor. It established a fund for the cultural education as well as the practical training of its employees, and one of its three first beneficiaries is being put through college. Leaving aside the question of motive, the facts are significant in business evolution. If the National City as a consequence of the hurt to its amour propre decides to draw in its horns and sulk among the fossils who have found its policies too realistic and progressive, it will be extremely unfortunate, because in banking more than in any other kind of business there is need of organizations that have the courage and intelligence to make experiments. The tradition of responsibility is so strong among good bankers that they are afraid of any deviation from the established rule, and their sensitiveness is pretty well justified by the fact that they are after all dealing with other people's money and are under obligation to return it on demand. But deviations of a systematic sort must be made, for it is only thus that banking can be adapted to the changing requirements of a changing society. Consequently, the errors of those who are courageous enough to attempt new things are regrettable not merely for the immediate embarrassment suffered by the banks concerned, but for the set-back to the spirit of experimentation upon which improvement depends.

In this instance, all that has been checked, so far as we know, is the plan to make the National City the biggest bank in the world. And as for that, one may perfectly well ask what it has to do with improvement of banking. What is the use of being big? Why should banks merge, anyway? The explanations they themselves publish on such occasions tell nothing, they are so full of anxiety to soothe the public. Their faithful repetition of one another's verbiage would lead one to suppose that banks were run by parrots; which may be substantially correct, yet still leaves the problem of mergers obscure. Probably the real explanation is that even parrots do not either control or understand their destiny, and often do things they never meant to do. So with bankers. So with Mr. Mitchell and his unintended socialization of banking. So for that matter with business in general. When one contemplates the disorderly, ineffective, purposeless way in which man goes about satisfying his economic needs—calling the thing he does "business"—one is convinced without reference to geology or astronomy that society must be very, very young. But the efforts society makes are never the last word, any more than the fumblings of babies are unrelated to the dexterity of grown people. Even if it is impossible as yet to see much order in the development of civilization from the point of view of mankind as a whole, it is certainly true that particular eras have grown or are now growing with an orderly growth which transcends the individual.

All this applies to mergers. They may be effected in order to gratify vanity and personal ambition, but such personal reasons are not ultimate. The "growing point" of business evolution will always be appearing in some accidental event, in itself unforeseen and unpredictable. Consequently it is reasonable to believe that the circumstances which prevented the merger of the largest bank in New York with the most profusely branched bank in New York and which upset one or two less important combinations by no means closed a movement. The National City and the Corn Exchange will probably not merge with one another, after the falling out they have had, but they will inevitably merge somewhere, and so will their competitors.

The immediate reason for this is that the forces of competition always seek an equilibrium, and if equilibrium at the old level is destroyed it will be sought on a new one. The bank mergers that have occurred recently in New York and in the country at large destroyed old balances of power and dislocated old connections. If they had been merely separate and unrelated phenomena, they might have stopped at any moment like the ticking of a clock. But as a matter of fact they were all intimately interrelated parts of a general movement by no means peculiar to banking. The First and Second National have to combine because the Third and Fourth are combining, and the Third and Fourth combine because the Fourth has a kind of business and a type of management that the Third needs. When such a disturbance is started, and new strains and new inequalities are created, a long process of smoothing down is inevitable before new truces are attained. And back of this are still greater forces. The imperfections of our economic organization are so great, and the social requirements upon it are so taxing that the secular pressure upon business seems certain not to be suddenly relaxed. To the extent that mergers are the responses to such secular pressure and occur therefore as evolutionary changes, we may be confident that they are not at an end. And in banking they may begin again at any time, assuming indeed that they can even be said to have stopped.

A Substitute for Lynching

By HORACE B. DAVIS

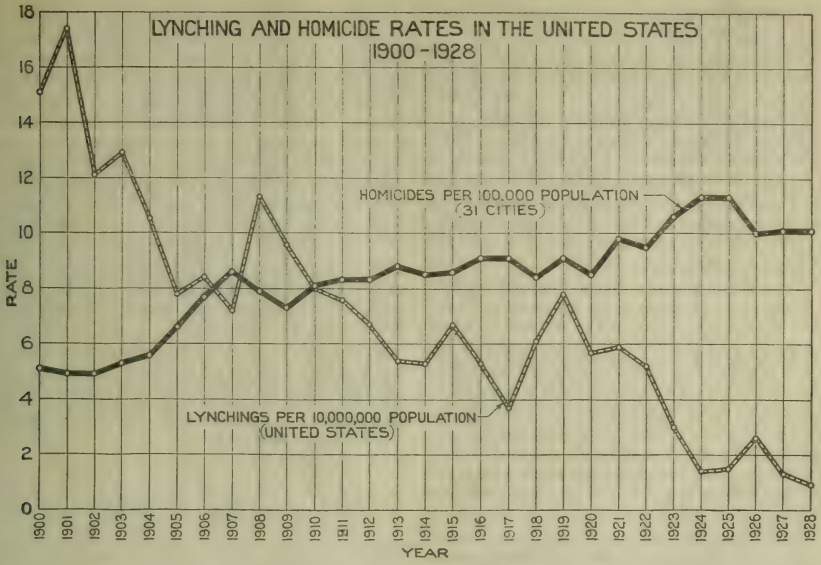
EDUCATED opinion the country over is all but unanimous in its public disapprobation of lynching. Southern newspapers are no less emphatic than those of the North on the subject; representative gatherings of Southern educators and Southern white women have gone on record condemning the crime in the strongest terms. Perhaps as a result of this agitation, lynchings have been decreasing for a generation. Whereas in 1892 no less than 235 persons were reported as having been lynched, the number fell to ninety-seven in 1902, eighty-nine in 1912, and sixty-one in 1922. From 1923 to 1927 the average number per year was under twenty-three, and in 1928 only eleven lynchings were reported. In the first six months of 1929 there were reports of only four lynchings, including that of N. G. Romey, white, a grocer, at Lake City, Florida. Not since records of lynchings were kept have there been so few. While the actual number is probably greater than reported, the record undoubtedly is more complete now than formerly.*

The deduction is often made that terrorization of the colored race in the South is decreasing also, and that Negroes enjoy greater security of life and limb than ever before. This, however, is not necessarily the case; our preoccupation with lynching as the most terrible form of murder has led us to overlook the fact that other forms are in the aggregate far more important. The same white public opinion that condemns lynchings will frequently be found sympathizing privately with murder when this has as its object the suppression of "sassy niggers." An incident which took place in Alabama during 1928 will serve to illustrate this point.

Matt Lucas was a highly skilled mechanic in the Westfield plant of the Tennessee Coal, Iron, and Railroad Company. This plant, which is one of the United States Steel Corporation's finest, is located just beyond the city limits of Birmingham. Even the whites brought their automobiles to Lucas to be fixed up over the week-end. But in the plant, in spite of his admitted ability, he could not rise above the rank of millwright's helper. He felt that he was entitled to promotion and was being discriminated against on account of his color, and he did not hesitate to say so. Lucas was married and lived in House 518 B, in Westfield, a town owned and controlled by the Tennessee Coal, Iron, and Railroad Company. He was thirty-four years old, a loud talker, completely unafraid of white folks and quite ready to answer them back, an unforgivable crime for a Negro in the South. On February 9, 1928, Matt Lucas was drunk. His wife tried to persuade him not to go to work, but he went nevertheless. When he got to the plant, he was ordered to go home.

---

* All figures are from Dr. Monroe N. Work, Tuskegee Institute, Alabama.



He did not obey at first, and some high words and threats seem to have passed on both sides. Eventually he went home. Soon after his wife had with some difficulty got him into bed, there was a knock at the door. The company guards had come for Matt. They took him outside and pumped him full of lead. Deputy Coroner J. J. Crowe turned in a verdict of "justifiable homicide."

His wife withdrew immediately to Montgomery, leaving her three children with her mother in Westfield. She brought suit against the company for her husband's death. The company, attempting to settle out of court, offered $300; Mr. Frank W. Smith of Birmingham, handling the case for Hill, Hill, Whiting, Thomas, and Rives of Montgomery, demanded $1,500; a compromise was reached, in May, on $750. All of this sum, according to Mrs. Lucas, went for the funeral and legal expenses. The guards who killed Lucas were not indicted at all. Out of five men who were involved in the disgraceful affair, two were still in the employ of the company in June, 1929, two had quit without notice, and one, who was not directly involved in the killing, had been discharged. The company paid the money to Lucas's widow, it explained, not because it admitted "legal responsibility" for the act, but "merely as a means of preventing the uncertainty of what a court action will result in."

Attorney Smith on his part was glad enough not to have the case get into court. His attitude was not due to any lack of zeal. Mr. Smith is proud of the fact that his grandfather was the first Confederate volunteer from Jefferson County; but he has acquired a high reputation among Negroes as counselor and defender of their race. "When the judge is white and the jury are all white (and they always are)," he explained to the investigator a year afterward, "there is very little chance for a Negro to get anything from a white man in court. The defense would claim that he (Lucas) pulled a gun or something, and the widow would get nothing." This statement, in view of the admitted facts of the case, must be considered astounding. Four guards seem to have been actually standing over Lucas while he dressed, and one of them testified at the coroner's inquest that Lucas had three times tried to get his hand into his pocket and had three times been prevented. Yet the guards testified further that Lucas still had a gun in his pocket when he got out of the house, and that he attempted to pull it on them, whereupon they shot him. This defense would apparently have been adequate before a white jury.

No news of the Lucas killing other than the routine obituary notice reached either of the two Negro papers in Birmingham; in fact, none of the Birmingham papers carried any account of the incident. But perhaps the most significant point in the whole affair was the attitude taken by the coroner, which was undoubtedly typical of a large section of the white community. "Why do you want to investigate this particular case?" he said to the investigator in 1929. "This kind of thing happens all the time." In fact another Negro was shot and killed by a Tennessee Coal, Iron, and Railroad Company guard before the investigator left Birmingham. The Negro was charged with stealing copper from the plant. The incident created as little stir as had Lucas's killing a year earlier. After all, why should it be otherwise? The Alabama subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation is not the only company in the district which employs guards who are ready to shoot on sight. The nervousness of such guards is understandable when it is remembered that sometimes it is the guard who is shot. A murder of some kind occurs in the Birmingham district every three or four days. Jefferson County, Alabama, in which Birmingham and Westfield are situated, reported 697 homicides from 1920 to 1926 inclusive, or at the rate of more than eight per month.

Lucas's killing might be described as a lynching. It is being so classed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, though not by the more cautious director of research at Tuskegee Institute. Whether it was or not, it reflects a basically unhealthy condition. Public opinion, which can be aroused by a lynching, needs to be aroused also over these borderline cases, and by ordinary homicides. For while the lynching evil is definitely on the wane, homicides (according to a leading authority) "actually as well as relatively . . . were never so frequent in this country as they are at the present time."

The accompanying graph, prepared from the homicide figures of Frederick L. Hoffman in the Spectator of March 14, 1929, and the lynching figures of Dr. Monroe N. Work, Director of Research of the Tuskegee Institute, shows that the decrease in lynchings has been coincident with an increase in homicides. The thirty-one cities for which homicide rates are available have an aggregate population of 23,632,000, and there is every reason to think that they correctly indicate the trend of the homicide rate throughout the country. It will be observed that the lynching rate fluctuates much more violently than the homicide rate. The sudden and permanent decrease in the number of lynchings after 1922, following a decade in which there had been no marked diminution, is striking. The Dyer Anti-Lynching bill was before Congress in 1922. If an aroused public opinion could so affect the lynching evil, why not then also the homicide scourge?

The American homicide rate is the highest in the world. It does not result alone from America's being a "new" country, since the rate in 1922 (8.4 per 100,000) for the area where homicides are registered was five times that for the Commonwealth of Australia and the Province of Ontario, each of which had a rate of 1.6. Massachusetts, a comparatively law-abiding community, had a homicide rate of 2.5 in 1922. The rate for New Zealand was 0.9 in 1923, that for Japan 0.8 in 1922, that for England and Wales 0.5 in 1922, and that for Scotland 0.2 in 1923. Memphis, with a rate of 60.5 homicides per 100,000 population, had probably the highest rate of any city in the "civilized" world, but Birmingham was a close second with 54.9. Other rates were: Jacksonville 52.6, Atlanta 45.1, and Little Rock 37.9. Gangster-ridden Chicago with a rate of 15.8 was surpassed by Detroit, which counted 16.5. New York City had a rate of 6.7. One hundred and twenty-two American cities averaged 10.4 homicides per 100,000 in 1927, though according to Hoffman the murder rate in 1925 was only 9.8 in Leningrad and about the same in Moscow. In Leningrad in 1922, when the waves of the revolution had not yet died down, the murder rate reached 26.7, but eight Southern cities exceeded that record last year. In all European countries for which figures are available, the homicide rate is far lower than in the United States.

The regional differences in the homicide rate are striking. The ten cities which in 1928 had the highest homicide rates were all Southern cities. Racial differences are even more important. The rate for whites in the South is high, but not higher than in parts of the West. For Negroes, the rate is usually many times the rate for whites. Unfortunately, figures on the color of the murderer are not available. Most murders of Negroes are probably by other Negroes. The high rate for the colored race is due in part, however, to the fact that in many sections of the South it is considered hardly a crime to kill a Negro. If the murderer does happen to be a white man, he usually goes scot-free. The pretext of the murder may be, in the words of Professor A. B. Hart, "simply trivial." A Negro kills a white man's dog which has attacked his sheep; the Negro is shot dead. A Negro causes his wife to be late to work for a white man; the white man takes a gun and kills the Negro. In 1929 a Florida white man was sentenced to the electric chair for killing a colored man. It was said to be the first case of the kind on record.

One thing at any rate is certain: there has been no marked increase in the Southern Negro's personal security. The anti-lynching campaign has shown what can be accomplished by an aroused public opinion. It needs to be intensified so that this national disgrace shall be definitely eradicated. Furthermore, the campaign must be broadened until public opinion is awake to the evils of all private, cold-blooded murder. The community which condemns mob murder while condoning such killings as that of Matt Lucas is suffering from moral astigmatism.

In the Driftway

THE State of Connecticut, in which the law establishes no speed limits for motor cars but holds every driver responsible for going at a rate consistent with public safety, is undertaking some experiments with a view to setting up certain maximums. Many persons will regard this as a step backward, the Connecticut law having been widely acclaimed as embodying the only sound principle in regard to speed. To establish an arbitrary maximum speed for certain highways and inflexibly enforce the rule is ridiculous, as it is all too apparent that a safe or dangerous rate depends upon the circumstances. Yet the Drifter has always believed that it is desirable to have certain legal maximums of speed—provided they are not generally enforced. And doubtless experience has brought the State Motor Vehicle Commission of Connecticut to the same point of view, as it is insisted that the new plan is in no sense to be an "enforcement trap." George Bernard Shaw has put the case for maximum speed limits well in arguing against the government's proposal to abolish them in England. As a driver of twenty-one years' experience Mr. Shaw admits breaking the law every time he takes a car on the road, yet he insists that some speed limit should be retained. He says:

> A speed limit cannot be observed in daily practice and is not meant to be so observed. It is a device for enabling the police to halt and mulct motorists in those cases of inconsiderate driving which fall short of driving to the public danger or are not grave enough to deserve the more serious penalties attached to that offense.

* * * * *

WITHOUT a speed limit it is practically impossible to prosecute any one for dangerous driving until after an accident has happened. For it can always be argued otherwise that a person can't have been guilty of dangerous speed because events didn't show it to be such. In other words, the police are never able to lock the stable door until after the horse has been stolen, if one may quote so equine a proverb in connection with the motor age. A maximum-speed law has the same advantages as laws against disorderly conduct. These laws are sometimes used for tyrannical or absurd purposes, but, on the other hand, they serve so many excellent ends that few up-to-date communities would be without them. To return to the automobile, Mr. Shaw remarks:

> The common assumption that a steam roller or motor bus if driven carefully over a baby at two miles an hour will not hurt it, while a sport car, which at sixty miles an hour or so becomes supercharged and attains the velocity of light or thereabouts, will mangle and slaughter the same baby is erroneous. An intelligent baby would prefer the sport car. Safe motor cars are imaginary, as are safe wheelbarrows, guns, skates, kitchen boilers, or razors. But they can be made safe enough to be tolerated when they are under the control of intelligent, considerate, and able-bodied persons.

* * * * *

MR. SHAW goes on to say: "No expert fears a well-driven car, however fast. All fear an ill-driven car, however slow." Here the Drifter pauses to ask what is meant by the word "expert." If Mr. Shaw means an expert pedestrian, the answer is that there isn't any other kind—alive. They get that way because they have to. Probably Mr. Shaw is thinking of drivers. Among them it is doubtless true that a well-driven car, even going immoderately fast, is sometimes less dangerous than a slow-moving automobile, badly handled. But a wise pedestrian would take his chances every time with a slow-moving car, regardless of the driver, for the reason that such a vehicle can stop more quickly and isn't likely to break so many bones even if it hits him. The theory, sometimes advanced, that we need drivers with more skill doesn't hold water; we need drivers with more morals. Taxicab drivers are admittedly skilful, but it is not well to get in their path—even when they are going their fastest.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

That Hungarian Decision

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation of October 30, there appeared an editorial paragraph stating that because of a certain decision rendered by an Hungarian court "it is a crime to praise the United States in Hungary." Such a decision seemed to me as extraordinary as apparently it did to you. I doubted that a court in Hungary, no matter how rotten the political system may be considered by some persons, would condemn anyone because he praised the United States. I have, therefore, procured a certified copy of a decision of the Royal District Court of Budapest rendered on August 23, 1929.

It is evident from the record that the person was indicted not because of having praised the United States but because he was found guilty of the crime of advocating the violent overthrow of the existing legal and social order and the forcible establishment in power of the so-called proletarian class. It is also evident that the advocacy of such ideas has been made a crime not by the arbitrary decision of the court but by a statute duly enacted by Parliament. The advocacy of the violent overthrow of the government and the social order is also a crime, if I am not mistaken, in the United States. You may agree with this Hungarian agitator that "in America . . . life is good, because they know no God," but it does not appear that the court in Budapest shared this view or that any consideration of the Utopian condition of American life influenced its decision.

I wish also to call your attention to the fact that the decision which you criticized was the decision of a court of first instance against which an appeal lies and that an appeal actually has been taken.

New York, November 25 FRANCES DEÁK

[The Nation's comment was based upon a report in a reliable Vienna newspaper. The document cited by Mr. Deák, which we have examined, proves that the report was incorrect. We are sorry to have been misled in this instance.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

More Men Teachers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to stand with Bertrand Russell in regard to woman teachers. I think there are all too many of them in our schools. I am in favor of more man teachers.

Askov, Minn., December 10

MRS. L. MOSBÆK

White Woman's Burden

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to express my appreciation of your review of John R. White's book in The Nation of August 28. I knew Colonel White well. He is an exceptionally fine man, and his statements about conditions in the Islands can be accepted without reserve.

It is the first time that I remember having seen authoritatively stated what I regard as the greatest bar to a fine understanding between Americans and Filipinos—the attitude of our American women to all Filipinos socially. Prior to the coming of American women en masse we men got along with the Filipinos very well, despite the natural irritations existing from war time. But the American woman at once put the Filipino "in his place" socially and sees to it that he is kept there. Hence the Filipino complaint of the Raza dominador and strengthening of a desire for complete separation. The government here has been an inspiration to men of ideals, and has been carried on without deviation for the benefit of the Filipino people; the social situation is an insult to every cultured Filipino.

Manila, P. I., October 29 JAMES L. HENRY

Spanish Drama

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The background of Mr. Joseph Wood Krutch would seem to have its blank spots, judging from his testy remarks in regard to the Quinteros' "A Hundred Years Old" in your issue of October 23. Does he know nothing of Spanish drama beyond the few plays which have been lately presented in New York? Has he never heard of Benavente? Of Zamacois? Or Linares Rivas? Is it possible that he doesn't know that the Spaniards invented realism—and did it so long ago that they have become rather bored by it? And that being bored they claim a legitimate right to seek relief from its pessimism and dreariness?

If Mr. Krutch seeks "pessimism, violence, and fire," let him read Benavente's "La malquerida" and "Señora ama"; if he desires social drama with food for thought we recommend to him the same author's "La virtud sospechosa" and "Gente conocida," or "La garra" by Linares Rivas; if the dramatic treatment of the aesthetic or psychological interests him, let him turn the pages of Pérez Galdos's "El Abuelo," "Mariucha," or "Electra." If realism means to him only the drably unpleasant, let him examine at random the productions of Zamacois.

There is no "school" of drama in Spain today; each writer seeks to be different from everyone else. The Quinteros are not like Martinez Sierra; the first try to show us that life is eminently worth living and that happiness exists, even in this "vale of tears," and the second stresses the fact that there is virtue in modern society—especially among women.

Two things are incumbent upon Mr. Krutch—first, that he acquire some knowledge of Spanish drama aside from the few translations which have recently been offered in New York; and second, that he remember that the reason for the prevalence of the cloudless silver lining to which he objects is due to the realization on the part of American producers that that sort of thing is the merchandise that goes over with a public nurtured on "Abie's Irish Rose," Hollywood, and Bernarr McFadden.

Lubbock, Texas, November 7 C. B. QUALIA
W. A. WHATLEY

Remarque Once More

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation of November 13 appears a letter of a former German officer, severely criticizing Remarque's "All Quiet . . ." and reflecting on the author personally. The officer is quite correct in saying that the book cannot be recommended to "men," at least not to men who possess and exercise reasoning power and therefore become unwilling to be butchered and robbed at the behest of stupid or vicious rulers.

If pacifism had prevailed in Europe in 1914 Germany would not now be a subject nation. Incidentally the Kaiser's loyal ex-officers should remember that he and his sons saved their skins and are enjoying a private fortune of more than fifty million dollars, which ought to relieve them at least for a while of having to wash dishes as Mr. Kienitz does.

Detroit, November 27 WILLIAM E. HENZE

Business English

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have a friend, a Parisian, who speaks fair colloquial English and has read widely in English literature, but who was utterly stumped by a New York financial letter. I essayed to rephrase it for him in simple English, as shown below. I should like to know, first, if your readers agree with my rendering (which is italicized); second, if I am forgetting my mother tongue; or third, if our financial writers are developing a new language intended to conceal facts.

> That general business has not retained all of its former impressive buoyancy is evidenced by current trends in several directions, but there is obviously a sharp distinction between moderate recession and fundamental unsoundness. If the rate of activity has not been wholly sustained, the change can be properly interpreted only through recognition of what has gone before, and the attainments of various maximum records if of too recent occurrence to be obscured by present tendencies.

Business has suffered a setback, but not a slump. One can get at the causes by carefully surveying past and recent events.

> Even with a contraction in some lines now, results this year will be unusually favorable in numerous instances and it is significant that the monetary tension has been relaxing steadily.

Even so, this year's record won't be so bad, and one will at least be able to borrow money again.

> Those are some surface indications of a reversal from long-continued expansion, yet the alteration is qualified by the earlier exceptional achievements. An especially prominent case is the letdown in steel production, which has come only after a period of unparalleled advance.

There are even signs of hard sledding ahead, in steel, for example; but one can always think of the riotous times just ended.

> There continues to be a large flow of business in many channels, and that autumn has not brought increased momentum in all quarters is mainly because of the great vigor shown in preceding months. The general trade tone is more conservative now but without sign of widespread instability.

In certain lines trade is still active, and business in general wouldn't have slowed up if it hadn't overspeeded earlier in the year. Those who can are sitting tight.

My version proved intelligible to my friend, who thanked me effusively. I hope I didn't mislead him.

Paris, November 11 G. M. L. BROWN

Tennessee Yields

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a loyal son of Tennessee I have to confess a feeling of jealousy at the way Malden has pushed Dayton clear off the map. In fact Dayton isn't any more famous today than York County, Pennsylvania, where the witches still work their wicked spells. Despite the best efforts of Bryan and Darrow and the press, we didn't succeed in luring more than ten or twelve thousand curiosity seekers to our Fundamentalist barbecue. Malden got out a million and a quarter in a little more than a week. We're licked!

Johnson City, Tenn., December 10
HODGE MATHES

Non-Combatants and War

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I seriously question the validity of the basic assumption that seems to underlie the reasoning of those who accept President Hoover's food-ship proposal, namely, that only those in actual combat should be permitted to suffer from starvation, pestilence, disease, while the non-combatant members of society should be exempt from such privations. War is a collective enterprise undertaken by the state. Why the lives of those behind the battle line are more worth preserving than those on the battle line is something which has never been made clear to me.

I, for one, welcome the possibility of starvation, poison gas, submarines, and anything else which will make war more ghastly and something to be feared by civilian as well as soldier. Let it become clear to every member of the community that war means misery not merely for those in combat but for everybody.

New York, November 29 WILLIAM ISAACS

Books and Drama

Admonition

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

Be not impatient, do not grasp too soon.
I know the heart is eager, having conned
Pages brushed white with silver of the moon—
Tales of a sea-born city and beyond.
Yet not alone to those who are the first
On soil usurped from older lords than ours
Does the innominable Presence burst,
Like an Aegean island, into flowers.

There is another Beauty which precedes
The arras lifted, the libation poured;
Secret and slow and mystical, it needs
No spending of the wine or honey stored,
But spins a thread impossible to break
Under the knees of gods who never wake.

Cabell's Last Word?

The Way of Ecben. A Comedietta Involving a Gentleman. By James Branch Cabell. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

"THE Way of Ecben" may be the last demonstration of the formula of existence which has been growing steadily more authoritative in Mr. Cabell's productions. It is now ten years since he declared that the novel must become more or less an allegory, since art must deal with contemporary life by means of symbols; that the reader must feel that he is not reading about some person unimportant enough to be listed in the local telephone book, but "about humanity—and about the strivings of that ape reft of his tail, and grown rusty at climbing, who yet, however dimly, feels himself to be a symbol, and the frail representative of Omnipotence in a place that is not home." He has also expressed himself about the value of dynamic illusions and has convincingly demonstrated that man is given to playing the ape to his dreams.

It is one thing for a man to write books and another for him to account for them. The reading public tends rightly enough to suspect any man's exposition of his own theory of composition. Mr. Cabell, as a particularly conscious artist, is in the curious position of having established his philosophy so early, of having so clearly seen the total pattern of the years, as to make this seem the premise rather than the result of his performance. The progressive abstraction of his later books does owe much to this early recognition of a trend, so that while the author has been playing with determined consistency the ape to one special dream there may be some of his readers who wish his mimicry had been less successful. For in his later writings there is the inescapable suggestion that the formula has choked fancy at least into a death faint.

If Mr. Cabell means what he appears to be saying—we cannot forget that he delights in the cream of a jest—this slender, exquisitely written account of the faring forth of one Alfgar is the last of those gallant tales of misadventures in a world that is brighter, perhaps, than our own, but no less rewarding of virtue. If such is the case, this "Comedietta Involving a Gentleman," while relatively unimportant in the list of Mr. Cabell's published works, assumes particular significance in that larger romance which is likewise a biography, somewhat more personal, developed by the author. Such a renunciation of much that Mr. Cabell holds most dear is at the least a gesture which we may at once admire and deplore.

In the commentary that makes up a considerable portion of this book, Mr. Cabell accepts the disadvantages incident to his advanced years and finds fifty the precise and suitable moment for terminating the biography (of Dom Manuel). He describes for us the unfortunate condition of the aging romancer who must needs repeat himself in a declining achievement, and sets himself to outwit time by renouncing the stage long before the curtain shows any disposition to come rumbling down. Elsewhere he has spoken approvingly of certain young men who were so fortunate or so wise as to die to life or literature at the age of twenty-nine, and it may be that he has concluded that the game is not worth the candle and that there remain other diversions to life than the peculiar one of making marks on paper. He declares explicitly that he will write no more stories after this one about Etarre, the witch woman who passes always to the sound of a troubling music, whose bright face he can no longer clearly see with the eyes that time has given him and for whose depiction he dare not depend upon mere memories, however dear. But it has been evidenced before this that renunciation sometimes has remarkable quickening effects upon man's several capacities; further, there have been recent studies of monkeys which show that appearances of senility are removed by a diversification of cage-mates. Thus "hail and farewell, Etarre," need not leave us wholly sad. There is also ground for encouragement in the fact that the recorder of Jurgen's glamorous trials has not committed himself beyond the termination of the saga of Dom Manuel's extraordinary line.

If this farewell to Poictesme means the breaking of a formula which has grown increasingly sterile, however magically it worked at first, some of Mr. Cabell's sincerest admirers will not repine. For while life itself may be an allegory ceaselessly repeated by the Original Author for his diversion, there are nevertheless permitted to us trifling variations in size and color and sense which give to each life the illusion of individuality. Mr. Cabell has been less tolerant than that other author of man's need of such a dynamic illusion. Having set himself as an artist with a relentless conscience to a single task, his great skill and word sorcery have been increasingly dedicated to the problem of creation in fewer and fewer strokes. And although this may be a part of the economy elsewhere praised, we cannot forget that the earlier expositions of man's questioning and his end derived richness and delight from the fact that the formula was less clear while the allegory was allowed still to partake of the spontaneity of approximate flesh and blood. "The Way of Ecben" is carved and cool, chastely unadorned; there seems little possibility that the story may ever be more austerely told, and thus perhaps little temptation for the artist to pursue it further. The tale is rightly praised by its author for its symmetry, but of all the seven auctorial virtues desired by John Charteris in literature as in life this is not necessarily the chiefest; distinction and clarity, beauty, tenderness, truth, and urbanity were likewise named. And there was some mention also of gusto. It is still possible to believe that Mr. Cabell is too young to be lacking in any of these, even the last, but it is difficult to believe that in the progressive dramatization of himself, which is for every good author his most cherished and most elaborated creation, we have had the last word from Richmond in Virginia, however distant Poictesme may now become.

LORINE PRUETTE

Mr. Whitehead's Living Universe

Process and Reality. By Alfred North Whitehead. The Macmillan Company. $4.50.

SCIENCE is today as much of a problem as it is a fact. The tremendous burst of activity in the last twenty-five years which has brought new life to the old and fundamental science of physics has succeeded in ruining the traditional cosmology of materialism, the guiding faith of scientists since the days of Galileo and Newton. With the theories of relativity and the new developments in sub-atomic physics, scientific method has achieved some of the most glorious victories that have ever fallen to the human spirit, but the scientist is completely at a loss when he stands aside from his specialized equations and tries to conceive the structure of the universe as a whole. Mr. Whitehead suggested a few years ago, in his "Science and the Modern World," that the way out of the difficulties posed by relativity and quantum mechanics lay in the acceptance of a "philosophy of organism"; and he also indicated that such a philosophy, unlike the traditional scientific point of view, would be able to heal the divided conscience of mankind and reconcile scientific thought with our religious and esthetic intuitions. In the present work he has attempted to apply this philosophy in detail and to see whether it stands up under the exacting test of a complete interpretation of human experience.

The effort is magnificent both in scope and in execution. Many scientists have recently been driven to philosophizing, but their amateur efforts in epistemology and metaphysics have been in striking contrast with their eminence as scientific investigators. To cite but one example, Mr. Eddington has thrown up his hands and told us that science no longer knows what its equations and pointer readings mean in reality; hence it no longer forbids us to believe in the "unseen world" accessible to the mystic's immediate experience, with its revelations of God, freedom, and immortality. In contrast to this attitude of scientific skepticism, Mr. Whitehead has undertaken the more difficult and constructive task of determining the place of science and scientific laws in the structure of reality. His work, whether it be regarded as completely successful or not, will certainly stand out as a masterful piece of philosophizing. Even if it does nothing else than revive the rationalist's faith in a wholehearted philosophy of the universe, it will have achieved its aim and earned the gratitude of the friends of thought.

Mr. Whitehead asks boldly, how are we to conceive the universe in the light of the new scientific ideas? And the solution seems to him to be indicated by the analogy of biological experience, which supplies just the aspects of relativity and individuality that appear to be demanded by the new physics. He bids us imagine, not a static universe of enduring matter motivated by external forces, but a living universe of interrelated corpuscular organizations. These corpuscles are a law unto themselves, having their own purposes and their own freedom, but they are held together by an internal solidarity, by common participation in Platonic forms, which Mr. Whitehead calls "eternal objects."

In fact we can best visualize Mr. Whitehead's universe by keeping in mind the Platonic cosmology in the "Timaeus," where the Demi-urge, with his mind on the Ideas, is represented creating the universe out of relative chaos. Instead of creation taking place from the outside, Mr. Whitehead represents creation as a fixation of the potentiality of the creatures through the spontaneous "ingression" of the eternal objects. It follows that the uniformities on which the scientist bases his laws come into being as part of the evolving activity of the creatures. Mr. Whitehead hazards the conjecture that, like the economic laws of human societies, the basis of the scientist's laws is an evolutionary social product—common ideals that come to be shared by groups of elementary organisms. He also believes that as social forms scientific laws are subject to genesis and decay, although the more fundamental social forms, as for example space and time, are carried over into repeated cosmic epochs and thus constitute the underlying basis for the more specialized societies and organic systems.

It is by a tour de force—which, however, is not altogether convincing—that the author tries to absorb the space-time continuum into the created universe and to represent both spatiality and temporality as expressions of the internal determinateness of the creatures. The general picture that he would like us to see is a universe of untrammeled creativity and spontaneity—a universe in which indeterminate potentiality gradually takes shape through the ingression of forms emanating from the timeless source of all order, God.

That Mr. Whitehead should identify the forms with God is not surprising. There is a twenty-five hundred year precedent in philosophy for this identification, but what is surprising is that he should refuse to pay to God the traditional "metaphysical compliment" of eminent reality over and above the finite creatures. Such a compliment appears to be necessary if God is to serve as the internal cement of the universe. But Mr. Whitehead evidently feels that thither lies the road to mysticism, and he therefore tries to compress his metaphysical principle of God (and incidentally his own religious intuition which seems to shine through between the lines) within the narrow framework of biological naturalism. As a result he succeeds in enlivening the universe of the physicist, but he is not quite successful in quickening the life of the spirit.

BENJAMIN GINZBURG

A Russian-Jewish Childhood

Childhood in Exile. By Shmarya Levin. Translated from the German by Maurice Samuel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

DR. LEVIN is one of the prominent figures in the history of modern Zionism. Combining the qualities of scholar and fighter, he has been a political leader in the Jewish world from the time he became a deputy to the first Russian Duma, and his activities carried him into many countries before they brought him home from "exile" to Palestine where he is now living. He has turned aside from his work as publicist long enough to write this delightful and moving story of his childhood in Swislowitz—a little Russian town, half Jewish and half Christian, proud of its location at the junction of two rivers which he fondly describes, and backed by a forest of equal nostaligic charm.

Dr. Levin has no sensational confessions to record except one which he could not very well avoid—that he was regarded on all sides as a boy prodigy. And for this reason some of his readers will be reminded of John Stuart Mill's "Autobiography," for, as in that classic, the most striking portions of the book deal with the extraordinary education of an extraordinary child. Like Mill, Dr. Levin tells of feats of learning, memorizing, translating, at incredibly early ages. While still a child he turned to writing essays in Hebrew and even began a serious novel. At the advanced age of nine, already deeply immersed in the profundities and technicalities of the Talmud, he began the study of Russian and, by way of diversion, found time to read widely in Yiddish literature. Now, on looking back, he says: "I cannot remember that I ever overstudied myself; my brain never became weary. It seemed to me that my brain was always at play and the things I learned just leaped into my mind."

Of course there was time to play, even for the child Shmarya. And although the sports which the Jewish children of Swislowitz indulged in seem few and pitiful compared to those of American boys of today, they were just as thrilling to the children of a poor Russian village of the seventies—poor, since even well-to-do people like the Levins were poor according to Western standards. Dr. Levin insists, too, that the Jewish children loved nature passionately and wondered why God had not given land and forests to his people as well as to the Gentiles; and the pictures that he draws of the village and the surrounding country, of the forest and the coming and going of the seasons, share with his descriptions of the activities of the home, the school, and the synagogue in giving to these memories their special charm. He is not so fortunate, perhaps, in making the many characters live again for us, or in weaving them into his narrative; though the picture of Mottye the Bean, his first teacher, brutal and stupid, is unforgettable as is that of his mother. But Dr. Levin is not a novelist, having abandoned that art (he regrets it now) after his first childish attempt. There can be no doubt, however, that he has a great gift for the short story. One has only to read the chapter in this book entitled Cherneh the Widow to realize that Zionism's gain was literature's loss.

FRED T. MARSH

Tradition and Clemence Dane

Tradition and Hugh Walpole. By Clemence Dane. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

THE important element of Clemence Dane's book is conveyed in the first word of her title; for with all her enthusiasm for Hugh Walpole, her swift, clear survey of his writings, her advancing of the novelist as the true bearer of the traditive torch, combining the qualities of the realist, moralist, and romantic while renewing the element of symbol, she pricks his faults too keenly for us to set him high. She emphasizes, for instance, his "criminal carelessness" of structure and his complete failure to seek any of the effects of sound—that other horn of symbolism on which, per contra, Gertrude Stein is impaled.

On her way to Walpole, however, Clemence Dane travels the long road of the English novel, sprinkling observations like scent in a game of hare and hounds. She maintains that the Gentle Reader dictates to the author, by his desire made manifest summoning the work of art. Thus to the popularity of such writers as Conan Doyle and Edgar Wallace she attributes the appearance of Conrad's "Secret Agent," Masefield's "Sard Harker," and Walpole's "Portrait of a Man with Red Hair." The Gentle Reader, indeed, is largely feminine; putting aside the static (Miltonic) character as masculine, Clemence Dane attributes to Jane Austen the recognition and to the Brontës the development of the feminine, the dynamic (Shakespearean) figure that changes with the events. Here she overlooks the earlier influence of Nicholas Rowe, who in the gay Lothario has given women their most beloved libertine and who in "The Fair Penitent" anticipated not only Jane Austen but Ibsen.

Pursuing literature through the changing tastes of the Gentle Reader, we find in the post-war world a quest of assurance, of revaluation. The hatred of war that has grown into many books Clemence Dane probes to a fear of discipline which, though it strengthens the strong, "sends the characterless back to the button-molder." Thus writers are led on the one hand to the assertion of full freedom, as in Joyce's post-Ulyssean uprooting of the language, and on the other hand toward the comforting trust in an imposed order, as T. S. Eliot seeks the eighteenth century. Looking into literature for interpretation and application of the new ideas the reader finds them presented only in equally new forms, so that confusion is indeed worse confounded. Pre-war writers, as being of an olden day, are benevolently regarded as ancestors though they may continue to produce; the new writers are even as disjointed as the times; the only author who uses the old technique to present the new ideas and the new spirit, and therefore the chief of the traditives, says Clemence Dane, is the novelist Hugh Walpole.

Thus we are carried swiftly along; but not free from jouncing. In a phrase each our guide assigns their place to a score of writers. Telling us that the "high-tide marks" of the novel—the bundle falling off Christian's back, Crusoe finding the footprint, Lucy eating dewberries while Richard Feverel watches, Angel Clare watching the flag run up at Tess's hanging, the gramophone breaking out in the voice of the murdered man in Oliver Onions's "Debit Account"—are all triumphs of the realist, she rapidly adds the moralist, then the romantic, as essential to traditive fiction. The romanticist she identifies at one moment with the poet, at another with the "shocker." The summoning of sound to supplement meaning she calls "speaking to the illiterate," yet deems it a measure of the writer's cunning. While Grant Overton presents Sherlock Holmes as "the modern deus ex machina," she declares the detective to be compact of fantasy as Puck. As we linger over these provocative statements we remember the old Sheep's dark shop that Alice found in the fourth square, its shelves full of all manner of curious things; but if Alice looked hard at any shelf, that particular shelf was bare. Whether or not Clemence Dane's stuff will stand under close examination, window-shoppers will find hers a crowded and colorful store.

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY

Queen Bess Once More

Queen Elizabeth. By Katharine Anthony. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

FOR some reason or other this book, so excellent in certain details—bits of characterization, epigrammatic succinctness, and keen observation—does not quite come to life. A number of suggestions might be advanced in explanation of this fact. Perhaps Miss Anthony erred fundamentally in treating the entire life of Queen Elizabeth with something of the terse incisiveness which Mr. Strachey, artistically stingy with his words as always, recently employed on but a few illuminating episodes of Elizabeth's reign. To relate her whole career, and in addition to depict much of the teeming gusto and swagger of the era, would quite certainly exceed the power of compressed suggestiveness of even the greatest of artists; as it is, Miss Anthony's volume, printed in large type on very generously margined sheets, numbers only a trifle more than 250 pages.

It might further be suggested that, while her book has unity of design, it lacks a corresponding unity of method. That is to say, at moments she writes with something of the lush fulness of objective treatment which, rightly or wrongly, is supposed to be a dominant element in "modern" biography; but at other times she returns to that almost completely Freudian treatment with which, in her book on Margaret Fuller, she began her writing career. Though her style is not now, as formerly, loaded with the technicalities of the Freudian school—she does occasionally use such expressions as "psychopathic," "delusions of grandeur," and "neurotic"—she nevertheless roundly insists that the lifelong "mannishness" of the Queen was due to the rough-and-ready disposition and language of her notorious father.

And yet this is distinctly not the type of book that one is likely to drop without completing it. One is always aware that a keenly observant brain is at work, even though one may by no means accept all its conclusions—yes, even though one may suspect that at intervals the brain isn't quite sure of itself. The fact that this book, an eminently serious performance with but few amusing interludes, has "made the best-seller list" so soon after its publication indicates that the public will occasionally read "dry" and "heavy" volumes if they are the children of intelligent parents. R. F. DIBBLE

Greenwich Villagers

I Thought of Daisy. By Edmund Wilson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

SOMEWHERE in Mr. Wilson lurks a Puritan who seems to be suffering from the hang-over of a Greenwich Village adolescence. This book may, then, be regarded as the purgative open confession that is supposedly so good for the soul. "I Thought of Daisy" is, in the main, as obviously autobiographical to a New Yorker as "Ulysses" is to a Dubliner. But Wilson is not Joyce, and there is lacking the perspective and creative quality that would enable him dispassionately to use and fuse the familiar for his own ends. We assist here at a series of parties, some entertaining, some dull, all very intimate, almost too intimate at times. We also meet various people. Of the parties Sue Borglum's is probably the best, and of the people the poetess fares worst. The author's treatment of Rita Coleman suggests a man striving to be fair in face of a grievance, with the result that she emerges from his hands with a kind of angular intellectuality. Of Daisy, on the other hand, he is fond in an indulgent fashion, with the result that she is delightful, if vacuous. Of neither lady, it must be stated, does he deserve much thanks; they suffer from the Puritan in search of a clean soul.

The men fare much better, particularly those who do not belong in the pre-war Village. Professor Grosbeck would probably be as well worth meeting in the flesh as he and his family are in print. Hugo is distinctive and interesting. Larry Mickler, though a Villager, is well drawn.

If Mr. Wilson has freed his soul of a complex by this publication, then those who admire him in his more familiar literary roles will have reason to be thankful that he "thought of Daisy." Not otherwise. NORAH MEADE

Machiavelli and Lorenzo

The Private Correspondence of Nicolo Machiavelli. By Orestes Ferrara. The Johns Hopkins Press. $2.25.

Lorenzo the Magnificent. By David Loth. Brentano's. $5.

THE "Correspondence" is not, as the title might seem to indicate, a complete edition of Machiavelli's private letters, but rather an essay on the character of Machiavelli as seen in his correspondence with excerpts from the letters. On the basis of studies in Italian archives of the period the author recently published a new biography of Machiavelli. The present volume is of much more limited scope, being merely the amplification of a lecture. The letters, Dr. Ferrara points out, are typical of the correspondence of the time in that they are not hastily written missives intended to convey information of external facts, but rather formal compositions of the nature of academic discussions and often designed to reach a considerable audience. Even so they throw much light, Dr. Ferrara contends, on the human side of Machiavelli, revealing him as a jovial friend and companion, a diligent functionary but by no means a hero in adversity, a great lover of his country, a libertine and at the same time "a good husband and a perfect father." The letters show above all, the author concludes, that the idea prevalent for so long that Machiavelli was the very incarnation of evil is a myth, and that his faults were only those of his time. The Renaissance was a period of intense realism and in the political field Machiavelli was its most conspicuous representative. This idea is not new, but the letters which Dr. Ferrara makes accessible in English add confirmation of it. The reader can only regret that the letters are not given in full and that they are not left a little more to tell their own story.

To the "Private Correspondence" one could scarcely find a greater contrast than "Lorenzo the Magnificent," both in subject matter and in the treatment by their respective authors. The former is a work of erudition, the second a popularization; Dr. Ferrara explains in detail his object, Mr. Loth leaves the reader to define it for himself; the one cites his sources, the other makes no claim to scholarship though there is abundant evidence that he has read largely in the period of the Renaissance. What Mr. Loth does do is to tell in sprightly and sometimes racy language the story of Lorenzo. He shows him in all his "splendor, lightheartedness, and rejuvenescence"—to quote the words of Ficino—at the same time that he brings before the reader the cruelty and lust and beauty and intrigue of papal and princely courts. The serious student may find nothing new, but the casual reader will be spurred to curiosity concerning a period presented with much skill and vividness.

ELOISE ELLERY

Judas, Savior of Jesus

Dear Judas and Other Poems. By Robinson Jeffers. Horace Liveright. $2.50.

THE Judas of Mr. Jeffers has learned the lesson of love so well that when he sees the teacher of that lesson, Jesus himself, hardening into a Messiah he decides to save him by betraying him to the authorities, who will chasten him a little and then release him so that he may return to the sweet walks of peace. The Jesus of Mr. Jeffers is motivated in part by an old doubt of his paternity, a doubt which his mother, by making up a story of how the shadow of God once visited her, has to a degree expelled, but which lingers in him sufficiently to turn a natural piety into an abnormal zeal. Even at the beginning of the poem Jesus is fixed in self-faith; but as the story unfolds itself he is seen to be an actively dangerous, a darkly threatening agent. He sees himself, indeed, in such a hue, yet cannot resist the vision.

> To be with my people,
> In their very hearts, a part of their being, inseparable > from those that love me, more closely touching them
> Than the cloth of the inner garment touches the flesh.
> That this is tyrannous
> I know, that it is love run to lust: but I will possess > them. . . .
> Their minds love terror, their souls cry to be sacrificed, > for pain's almost the God
> Of doubtful men, who tremble expecting to endure it. . . .
> I go a stranger passage to a greater dominion,
> More tyrannous, more terrible, more true, than Caesar or > any subduer of earth before him has dared to dream
> of.

This is not Judas's kind of love and it is not, presumably, Mr. Jeffers's. "To let the people alone is the mercy," cries Judas; "all stirring is death to them." Judas, by nature sensitive to pain, cannot endure the thought of the suffering and destruction which will follow upon Jesus's assumption of leadership; and so, partly to save his teacher and partly to save us, mankind, from any further teaching now that the line has been overstepped, he sends the son of Mary to—his death.

It is far from being one of Mr. Jeffers's best poems. To begin with it is an idea more than it is a poem, and the fact that it is ingenious, or that it seems to fit very neatly into Mr. Jeffers's whole system of "misanthropy," does not alter the case. The success of Dear Judas depends after all upon our perception of a theory, and even upon our agreement with this theory; which at once removes the discussion of it from the field of criticism as I see that field. The setting, as might have been expected, is somber and fine, and the utterances of the principal persons often reach a high level of rhetoric. But there is significance in the fact that Mr. Jeffers's long lines forget most of the time to be poetry.

Now there is another long poem in the volume to which these remarks do not apply. The Loving Shepherdess contains some of the best work that Mr. Jeffers has ever done; it is continuously pathetic, exciting, and beautiful; and its success does not depend upon the reader's acceptance of any theory about love. Mr. Jeffers, judging by the jacket of the book, has put such a theory into The Loving Shepherdess, but it does not seem to matter. Necessary as the procedure may have been for him in the acts of conception and composition, it is not at all necessary to the reader; which is to say that here we have a successful poem. It is more than that, this story of a driven girl who wanders north through California with a small flock of starving sheep, a witless girl who only knows that she loves the world and that she is willing to give that love to any portion of the world, human or not, which asks for it, a pretty girl for whom life long ago ceased to be pretty in return—this story is told with Mr. Jeffers's peculiar combination of harshness and kindness, and its long, sinuous rhythms are perfectly supported by a background of mountain, sky, and tree which Mr. Jeffers has lavished his best powers upon. It is his excursion into pastoral poetry, and though it keeps his austere brand upon each of its flanks it yet emerges a living and lovely creature of its ancient kind. Nothing could better prove the eminence of its author among contemporary American poets, and nothing could show more clearly what needed to be shown, namely, that Mr. Jeffers can write poetry which we do not have to be Carmelites to understand.

MARK VAN DOREN

Eleven French Revolutionists

Leaders of the French Revolution. By J. M. Thompson. D. Appleton and Company. $3.

IT was either very rash or very courageous of Mr. Thompson to undertake, within less than three hundred pages, to evaluate eleven of the most debated characters of the French Revolution. To say that he has done his task better than three other gentlemen who in the last year have been equally rash or courageous is not, however, unqualified praise. Mr. Thompson, as was to have been expected, has failed to master the latest materials on his numerous subjects, sometimes with rather unfortunate results—particularly, I should say, in the case of Robespierre, who is made an austere, unsociable dreamer; Marat, who is explained as a dual personality; and Saint Just, who is portrayed as a repentant sinner, atoning for a misspent youth. Nor has he grasped what seem to me to be more essential characteristics than some of those he attributes to his subjects. Sieyès, for example, whom he considers a philosopher manqué, was, I think, merely a bad politician. Mirabeau, whose failure he assigns to low aims, was more likely not a great man even to begin with. Lafayette, whom Mr. Thompson considers a republican, was probably only an aristocrat with many fewer liberal ideas than he himself quite sincerely gave himself credit for. Danton Mr. Thompson suspects of being, but hesitates to call, a scoundrel. The study of Dumouriez is admirable; those of Brissot, Louvet, and Fabre d'Eglantine are good. Quite naturally, too, there are a great number of errors, not alone in typography and opinion, but also of fact—some of them fairly serious. That the book was originally a series of lectures is rather obvious; each character gets about the same amount of space, and the author tends to sermonize and draw lessons. But as is frequently the case with popular lectures, they make pleasant and interesting reading.

LOUIS R. GOTTSCHALK

Books in Brief

A Brief Account of Diplomatic Events in Manchuria. By Sir Harold Parlett. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $1.25.

The International Relations of Manchuria. B. C. Walter Young. University of Chicago Press. $3.50.

The publication of these two books relating to the chief danger spot of the Orient is singularly appropriate in view of the controversy between China and Russia over the Chinese Eastern Railway. Both books were prepared for the conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations which met at Kyoto in October and November. Both cover much the same ground, but the work of Mr. Young is more valuable because it went to press after the Chinese seizure of the railway last July. It includes a brief account of that crisis and the most important documents relating to railway control.

Weltbürgertum in der deutschen Dichtung von Herder bis Nietzsche. Von Kuno Francke. Berlin: Weidmannsche Buchhandlung.

This treatise on cosmopolitanism in German literature forms the first chapter of the forthcoming volume of Professor Francke's "Kulturwerte der deutschen Literatur," but the well-rounded presentation of the theme as well as the timeliness of the discussion justifies its separate publication. If the formulation of the problem seems to exclude a balanced historical study, and the absence of a clear-cut differentiation between cosmopolitanism and internationalism, patriotism and Vaterlandsliebe, is at first somewhat perplexing, the author gains a peculiarly good opportunity for an almost dramatic development of the idea by varying its bearing and import according to the literary epoch and personality under discussion. Striking vindications, as that of Heine's Weltbürgertum, the connecting link between Kant's ethics and Nietzsche's ideals, prepare for a brilliant chapter on the era of Bismarck in which such men as Wagner and Lassalle, Spielhagen and Raabe, Vischer and Keller are judicially evaluated as unswerving adherents of traditional ideals in spite of the adversity of contemporaneous developments. As a whole, the book continues the confession of faith in German humanistic and democratic ideals which Professor Francke sees firmly rooted in German leaders of the past, and looks upon as holding a strong promise for the future.

A History of Canada. By Carl Wittke. Alfred A. Knopf. $7.50.

This carefully written book, one of the Borzoi Historical Series, is evidence of a growing interest in Canada now evident in the United States, long half-forgetful that it had a Northern neighbor. The author passes lightly over the period of French rule and more than half the book deals with the period since the federation of Canada in 1867. While there is no touch of the picturesque in the writing, the story is told in a clear style and every phase of importance is covered with striking detachment and insight. The text of the constitution of Canada is also included.

Under Five Sultans. By Mary Mills Patrick. The Century Company. $4.

The author of this volume has carried on a noble and useful work in the Near East. She is one of the original faculty of the Constantinople Woman's College and for many years was its director and, in times of difficulty, its mainstay. Together with Robert College, also situated on the shores of the Bosphorus, the Constantinople Woman's College was one of the strongest agencies in the modernization of Turkey. Naturally, during the course of her work, Miss Patrick acquired familiarity with the customs and institutions of the country and learned to know the Turkish people as no casual visitor could learn to know them. She also came in contact with many of the most important personalities of the Empire. As a consequence her book gives a kind of intimate and gossipy bird's-eye view of the history of Turkey during the last half century, and is crowded with interesting anecdotes and portraits. At the same time it attempts a serious account of historic developments. In any event it is a very readable book about a Turkey that has now passed into limbo.

The Cruise of the Kronprinz Wilhelm. By Count Alfred von Niezychowski. Foreword by Rear-Admiral Walter McLean, U.S.N. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Count Niezychowski, an officer of the North German Lloyd steamer which became a successful raider in the South Atlantic in 1914-1915, tells in this volume of the cruise of his ship which, after keeping the seas for 251 days and causing great concern to the British Admiralty, finally found refuge and internment at Norfolk. Although it is much too literally translated from the German and inadequately edited, the book none the less has its place in the growing literature of the brilliant naval exploits of the Germans. To the student of strategy and those who believe that trade routes may be safeguarded by building cruisers in groups of fifteen, this volume is respectfully commended. Considering the changes in sea conditions, the Kronprinz Wilhelm was a worthy successor to the Alabama which, however, had no radio or other modern devices to contend with. Certainly the Alabama never slipped through a blockade more easily than did the Kronprinz Wilhelm through the cordon of British vessels off Norfolk. Altogether this German raider accounted for fourteen Allied ships totaling 58,201 tons, and provisioned and coaled itself from them.

The Lure of the Frontier: A Story of Race Conflict. By Ralph Henry Gabriel. The American Stage. By Oral Sumner Coad and Edwin Mims, Jr. Annals of American Sport. By John Allen Krout. The Pageant of America. Vols. II, XIV, and XV. Yale University Press.

These three volumes complete the publication in fifteen volumes of a pictorial history of the United States which Professor Gabriel and his associates have long been preparing. The scheme, which calls for a text consisting almost wholly of pictures, is particularly well adapted to the present subject matter. Mr. Gabriel's volume on the widening frontier is naturally rich with old prints—and rather too rich with reproductions of softly idealized murals of pioneers such as adorn our courthouses and public libraries. Messrs. Coad and Mims have made a dull subject positively bright through a lively choice of old dramatic portraits and theater-interiors. And Mr. Krout, ranging as he does from cock-fighting to football, from bear-baiting to bicycling and mountain-hiking, has written a history that stands quite by itself in the degree of its interest and significance.

Drama

Holiday Fare

NOT all the plays reviewed and recommended in this column have survived the rigors of an Autumn meteorologically mild but theatrically very severe. Below I give a list of those which are still to be seen and which, upon second or even third thought, I still believe worth the attention of persons bent upon some holiday evenings in the theater. The list is classified and within each classification the order is that of merit—as I see it.

DRAMA

"Berkeley Square" (Lyceum Theater). A pleasantly entertaining and sentimental drama about a young American who wanders into the eighteenth century. The references to Einstein are not sufficiently profound to give anyone a headache and the acting of Leslie Howard is a delight.

"The Sea Gull" (Civic Repertory Theater). To be seen on certain nights only but quite the best thing at present on the program of Miss LeGallienne's company.

"The Criminal Code" (National Theater). Martin Flavin's drama of miscarried justice. A bit solemn but impressive.

"Subway Express" (Liberty Theater). All about a very strange murder committed in a crowded subway car. No more reasonable than most detective plays but novel and ingenious. The mechanical effects which transform the stage into a moving subway car are worth the price of admission.

COMEDY

"Strictly Dishonorable" (Avon Theater). The expert and up-to-the-minute comedy which is, by common consent, the most amusing thing to be seen on Broadway. Perhaps the second and third acts do not quite live up to the promise of the first, but at least one scene reaches something like a new high for American polite comedy.

"June Moon" (Broadhurst Theater). Ring Lardner's talent for parodying the language of Broadway plus George Kaufmann's knowledge of what the people want. Best if one takes the conventional happy ending and the touches of sentiment as part of the joke.

"Candle-Light" (Empire Theater). How a gallant butler had the time of his life when he mistook a lady's maid for a lady. With Gertrude Lawrence.

"Broken Dishes" (Ritz Theater). Conventional but thoroughly amusing domestic farce about a downtrodden husband who finally rebels—to the delight of the audience. Innocent enough to be approved by the Methodist Board of Public Morals and to get on anybody's White List, but still (believe it or not) both funny and reasonably intelligent.

"Your Uncle Dudley" (Cort Theater). Another farce of small-town life. Please ditto last sentence of comment on "Broken Dishes."

MUSICAL SHOWS

"Fifty Million Frenchmen" (Lyric Theater). Unusually amusing and novel revue based upon the adventures of the typical tourist in Paris. The jokes are not all very delicate.

"Sweet Adeline" (Hammerstein's Theater). Witty operetta with the scene laid during the gay nineties. Irene Franklin and Helen Morgan assist.

Holiday Interlude

MATINEES: GOOD SEATS, ALL PRICES, AT BOX OFFICE

WARNER BROS. Present

GEORGE ARLISS

in

"DISRAELI"

(A Vitaphone All-Talking Picture)

CENTRAL THEATRE
Broadway and 47th St.

Daily 2:45—8:45
Sunday 3—6—8:45

JUNIOR FILM GUILD presents
8 Holiday Children's Morning Shows
Sir James Barrie's
"PETER PAN"
Dec. 25th to Jan. 1st inclusive
Each morning 10 A. M. to 12 Noon
Tickets 50c. On sale now for every performance; by mail or in person.
FILM GUILD CINEMA, Dept. N, 52 West 8th Street.
Phones Spring 5090-5095-1716

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

A Wonderful Night—Majestic—W. 44th St.
Berkeley Square—Lyceum—E. 45th St.
Bitter Sweet—Ziegfeld—54th St. & 6th Ave.
Candlelight—Empire—B'dway & 40th St.
Criminal Code—National—W. 41st St.
Fifty Million Frenchmen—Lyric—W. 42nd St.
Half Gods—Plymouth—W. 44th St.—Op. Dec. 21st.
It's a Wise Child—Belasco—W. 44th St.
June Moon—Broadhurst—W. 44th St.
Marionette Theatre—Garrick, W. 35th St.—Sat. mornings
Meteor—Guild—W. 52nd St.
Red Rust—Beck—302 W. 45th St.
Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45th St.
Sweet Adeline—Hammerstein—Broadway & 53rd St.
The Little Show—Music Box—W. 45th St.
The Game of Love and Death—Biltmore—W. 47th St.
Yiddish Art Theatre—Jew Süss—Broadway & 28th St.

FILMS

Disraeli—Central Theatre—Broadway and 47th St.
General Crack—Warner Bros.—Broadway & 52nd St.
Hunting Tigers in India—George Cohan—Broadway and 43rd St.
Peter Pan—Junior Film Guild—52 W. 8th St., Dec. 25th to Jan. 1st, each morning.

CONCERTS AND RECITALS

Arthur Hackett—Guild—Sun. Eve., Jan. 12th.
Carola Goya—Hampden—B'dway—62nd St.—Sun. Eve., Dec. 29th.
Dorothy Gordon's "Young People's Concert Hours"—Town Hall, 113 West 43rd St.—Sat. Aft., Dec. 28th.
Fourth Concert Judson Celebrity Series—Carnegie—Jan. 6th.
Grand Opera for Children—Hansel & Gretel—Town Hall—Tues. Morn., Dec. 31st.
Josef Hofmann—Carnegie Hall—Sun. Aft., Jan. 12th.
Manhattan Symphony—Mecca Temple—Sun. Eve., Jan. 5th.
Menuhin—Carnegie—Fri. Eve., Jan. 3rd.
Musicians' Gambol—Carnegie—Mon. Eve., Dec. 30th.
Philharmonic Students' Concert—Carnegie—Sat. Eve., Dec. 28th.
Philharmonic Symphony—Carnegie—Thurs. Eve., Jan. 2nd; Fri. Aft., Jan. 3rd; Sun. Aft., Dec. 29th—Metropolitan Opera House—Jan. 12th.
Philharmonic Symphony, Junior Orchestral Concert—Sat. Morn., Dec. 28th, Jan. 11th, Carnegie Hall.
Ruth Draper—Comedy—41st E. of Broadway.
Society of Ancient Instruments—Town Hall—Sun. Aft., Jan. 12th.

WILLIAM HARRIS JR. PRESENTS
"THE FIRST PLAY OF THE SEASON WITH TEETH IN IT."
ROBERT LITTELL, WORLD.

CRIMINAL CODE

By MARTIN FLAVIN with ARTHUR BYRON
NATIONAL THEATRE 41st St., West of 7th Ave. Evenings 8:50
Matinees Xmas week: Thurs & Sat.
Mats. New Year's week: Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

The Theatre Guild Presents

METEOR

By S. N. BEHRMAN
Guild THEA., 52nd St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40
SPECIAL MATINEE CHRISTMAS

The Theatre Guild Presents

RED RUST

By KIRCHON & OUSPENSKY
Martin Beck THEA., 45th St. W. of 8th Ave.
Evgs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs & Sat. 2:40
SPECIAL MATINEE CHRISTMAS

A Theatre Guild Production

Game of Love and Death

By ROMAIN ROLLAND
Biltmore THEA., 47th St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

MAURICE SCHWARTZ PRODUCTION

YIDDISH ART THEATRE
B'way at 28th St.
Bogardus 0676
Every Eve. (Incl. Sun.) 8:30 Mats. Sat., Sun., 2:30.
Programs carry English Synopsis.

LION FEUCHTWANGER'S
Famous Play

JEW SUSS

From which his novel "POWER" was developed

—OPENING THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 26—
The Actor-Managers Inc. has the honor to present The Distinguished Artist

RUTH DRAPER in her ORIGINAL CHARACTER SKETCHES (Including 5 new ones)

Every evening including Sunday except Monday and Thursday nights
COMEDY Theatre 41st. East of Broadway. Matinees Thurs. & Saturday. VERY GOOD SEATS at $1.00

ALBERT CARROLL in MIMICRY
FRED KEATING in MAGIC

49th St. Theatre W. of B'way., Every Eve. Inc. Sunday
Pop. price Mats. Xmas, New Year's & Saturdays.

TOWN HALL Tues. Morn., Dec. 31—11 o'clock
GRAND OPERA FOR CHILDREN
HAENSEL AND GRETEL
CHARLOTTE LUND OPERA COMPANY
Aleta Bore Ballet—Allan Robbins Orchestra
Cast—Cowden, Bernhardt, Trolsaas, Wellington-Smith
Tickets—25c, 50c, 75c, $1.00, $1.50 Loges, seating six, $10.00

Other "Holiday Interlude" announcements on page following

HARDY PERENNIALS

"Street Scene" (Playhouse). Elmer Rice's cross section of tenement life, cut so as to include an exciting murder.

"Journey's End" (Henry Miller's Theater). How Englishmen fought the war without forgetting what's cricket and what isn't.

"Bird in Hand" (Barrymore Theater). John Drinkwater's mild comedy redeemed from fatuity by amusing characters and excellent acting.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The current offerings at the Yiddish Art Theater are Feuchtwanger's "Jew Süss," presented during the week end, and Gottesfeld's "Angels on Earth" on the other days. "Jew Süss" in play form is not so convincing as the novel, for the dramatization emphasizes its more obvious melodramatic structure at the expense of its characterization and historical description. Despite this, the production as staged by Maurice Schwartz is colorful and often moving. "Angels on Earth" is a satirical comedy describing the latest improvements in hell, which have made it a Jewish Babbitts' paradise, and the adventures of two of its guardian angels who are dispatched to New York to prevent hell from becoming over-populated. Needless to say the angels prefer New York to the quiet joys of the new hell. Boris Aronson's settings contribute a great deal to the fantasy of the play.

M. G.

Holiday Interlude

SPONSORS
Prof. John Dewey
Morris Hillquit
Norman Thomas
Roger Baldwin
Charles E. Beer
John Birro
Heywood Broun
Abraham Cahan
Morris Ernst
Charles W. Ervin
Adolph Held
Dr. Joseph Hollos
Dr. John H. Holmes
Dr. Sigmund Klein
Algernon Lee
Walter Lippmann
Dr. Alex. Meiklejohn
Chas. E. Russell
Upton Sinclair
Helen Phelps Stokes
Oswald G. Villard
Prof. Harry F. Ward

First Public Appearance
Lecture Extraordinary Count
Michael Karolyi
First Premier of Hungarian Republic
Heretofore Banned from the Lecture Platform in America
Subject:
DICTATORSHIP IN EUROPE
Carnegie Hall
TUESDAY EVENING,
JANUARY 7, 1930
Tickets 75c, $1.00, $1.50, $2.00
For information, write or call
Count Karolyi Reception Committee,
7 East 15th Street
Algonquin 3094

This will be the occasion for a public reception to Count Karolyi by the liberal and radical movement of New York.

Under the management of the Rand School of Social Science.

Other announcements appear on page preceding.

Holiday Interlude

DEBATE
Soviet Russia
vs.
Labor England
SCOTT NEARING For Communism
vs.
FENNER BROCKWAY
Brilliant Labor Member of British Parliament
CHAIRMAN: SAMUEL UNTERMEYER
RESOLVED: That the British Labor Party offers more to th workers of the world than the Communist Party in Soviet Russia
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1930—8:30 P. M.
MECCA TEMPLE—133 W. 55TH STREET
Reserved Seats $1.00, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00 & $2.75
Reservations advisable now for best seat locations.
Obtainable by mail or in person at Civic Club, 18 E
10th Street; Columbia University Bookstore; Worker
Bookshop, 26 Union Sq.; Rand School Bookstore, 7 E
15th Street, and New School Bookshop, 465 W. 23rd St
Also by mail or in person at offices of
LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
11 W. 42nd St., Room 1950 - CHickering 5789
TO OUT-OF-TOWNERS—This debate will be published in book form.
Reserve your copy now by sending $1.00.

NEW YEAR'S EVE
ARTISTS' COSTUME BALL
PLAYBOY'S FETE FUTURISTE
CUBIST COSTUME CARNIVAL
IN GREENWICH VILLAGE
At Webster Hall — Tuesday Evening
119 East 11th St. — December 31
Tickets in advance, $3.50 : : At door, $5.00
By mail from PLAYBOY, 32 Union Square
Telephone Stuyvesant 9687
DANCING AT 10—TILL DAWN
Costume or Evening Dress obligatory
Tickets on sale at all village shops — Send for particulars

Step Out With THE TEACHERS' UNION
Informal Dance—January 17th
HOTEL PENNSYLVANIA—ROOF GARDEN
Order tickets, $1.50 in advance. Address
SECRETARY, TEACHERS UNION, 70 Fifth Avenue

SATURDAY FORUM ON CURRENT EVENTS
2 P.M. — 25 Cents Admission
A. J. MUSTE — December 28
Dean, Brookwood Labor College
"NEXT STEPS IN AMERICAN LABOR"
H. PARKER WILLIS — January 4
Professor of Banking, Columbia University
"THE PANIC OF 1929 AND ITS RESULTS"
RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 East 15th Street — Algonquin 3094
QUESTIONS AND DISCUSSION

International Relations Section

What Next in India?

By C. F. ANDREWS

We printed in the International Relations Section of our issue of December 18 the recent statement of Lord Irwin, Viceroy of India under the Labor Government, with regard to the future status of India. We printed also the "Delhi Manifesto," issued by a conference of Indian political leaders in reply to Lord Irwin's declaration. This week we present two widely separated points of view with regard to Lord Irwin's statement and to the Delhi Manifesto. C. F. Andrews, close friend of Gandhi and protagonist of his program, himself a resident of India for many years, may be said to represent the enlightened Indian Nationalist point of view. The New Statesman, from which we reprint the editorial, Lord Irwin's Blunder, represents the English liberal, but frankly imperial, point of view which is undoubtedly widely held in Great Britain, in both Liberal and Labor circles.—EDITOR THE NATION.

THE past six months have witnessed many swings backward and forward in Indian political life. A pause has now been reached in this oscillation with the Viceroy's announcement that dominion status was the declared goal of British statesmanship and that a conference was to be summoned in London.

Everyone in India today who reads the newspapers and thinks for himself realizes Great Britain's critically difficult position owing to the unemployment problem. She is not in a position to challenge India, her best customer, to an economic warfare. The new tone adopted in England towards China has also not passed unnoticed. Young India, especially, has begun to feel a new strength of her own. She is no longer in a pliant mood. These inner facts will probably account for the checkered reception which has been given to the Viceroy's declaration. The younger members of the Nationalist Party, who are at heart in favor of complete separation from England, are critical of everything that comes from England today. Pundit Jawaharlal Nehru, who is their acknowledged leader, has stated to the press:

> A conference to discuss peace terms, when war is being waged against us by the British government, is not to be thought of. Such a conference must be preceded by a cessation of the present warlike repressive activities. There must be a clear indication that the British government is out for peace, on the basis of the Indian Nationalist demand, and is not merely playing for time.

Mahatma Gandhi's first reaction to the announcement was no less characteristic. "Any such conference," he said, "must be like Caesar's wife, above suspicion." At the same time he was prepared on certain conditions to welcome the Viceroy's proposal for a round-table conference in London. Later on, a meeting was summoned of leaders belonging to all parties and creeds. I have seen the list of those present and would regard it as truly representative. It included the name of Pundit Jawaharlal Nehru on the left and that of the Rt. Hon. V. Srinivasa Sastri on the right wing of Indian politics. This meeting issued a statement to the press which was unanimously agreed upon. It recognized the sincerity of the Viceroy's utterance. Three things were demanded: (1) a quiet atmosphere for the conference; (2) a political amnesty; (3) a majority from the Indian National Congress among those members of the conference who should represent the Indian people.

On these points there should not be any serious difficulty. Then follows, in their statement, a request to the Viceroy to corroborate their own interpretation of his message, so that there may be no misunderstanding. They assume that the conference itself is to place before the British Parliament what form the dominion constitution of India shall take. Thus the Viceroy's twofold declaration, that dominion status was the goal and a conference was to be held, has been taken by all the Indian leaders to mean that the conference is to decide the new dominion constitution of India.

Up to the present, I have not been able to find (after searching through the somewhat scanty news from India) any sign of a deadlock, or disavowal, or disagreement. But it is evident that many newspapers in England have not given the same interpretation to the Viceroy's speech which the Indian leaders have given; nor are they at all convinced that negotiations have advanced to the point of framing a dominion constitution. We are left, therefore, in a state of uncertainty which may possibly be ended one way or another before what I am now writing is published. If I am asked how far it is desirable and possible to go in carrying out the British government's pledge of ultimate dominion status for India, I would say without any hesitation that the earlier constitution under the Reform Councils of 1921—making some subjects "reserved" and others "transferred"—proved unworkable. It had in it all those elements of distrust and timidity which ruin honest statesmanship. One of the chief secretaries in the Government of India at Simla said to me: "This Reform Constitution is so bad that it has only one thing to recommend it: no one can ever wish to go on with it, and therefore it drives us forward to something better."

But if that be granted (and hardly anyone who knows the facts would question it) then it carries with it the obvious corollary that the new constitution, unlike the half-hearted measure that went before, must proceed on lines of trust and boldness. There is really no half-way house. Responsible government can only mean full responsibility; to offer with one hand and then to draw back with the other is futile and unstatesmanlike as well.

For the past ten years an incessant torrent of propaganda has been poured forth all over the world, deluging us all with the news that because India is composed of many races, religions, castes, languages, therefore the idea of self-government is impossible. Every riot has been magnified; Miss Mayo's slanderously unfair book has been trumpeted forth; caste barriers have been exaggerated. On the other hand, nothing has been said concerning the underlying unity of Indian life; its geographical completeness; its moral power of patient endurance; its essential reasonableness and moderation; its universal demand for freedom to govern itself in its own way. I shall not easily forget, when I was traveling, in Indian dress, in a third-class railway carriage, how the villagers after discovering my identity crowded round me asking with eager lips and faces: "When shall we get Swaraj (self-government)?" That was more than twelve years ago in a remote country district almost at the foot of the Himalayas, far from any town center. If the demand for Swaraj was so nearly universal then, what must it be today?

It was profoundly interesting to me to read in Mahatma Gandhi's paper, only a week ago, that he had been visiting that very district. He relates simply that the crowd had been more than twice as great as those multitudes who had gathered at the very height of the non-cooperation movement. We often hear today that his influence is on the wane, that he retains but a shadow of his former greatness. To those who know the facts that is just as absurd as it is untrue to say that India is not eager for Swaraj.

If then the question be asked: "Would you be ready to intrust India during this coming year with full responsible government, both provincial and central?" I would answer, "Yes." If I were further asked concerning any safeguards to the minorities and to the depressed classes that might be needed, the reply would be that there would necessarily go along with the new constitution a declaration of rights, these rights to be so framed as to comprise a statutory law which no Parliament could overrule or annul.

Lastly, if the problem of military and naval defenses were raised, I would point out that India is already an original member of the League of Nations and a signatory of the Paris pact and also of the World Court. Her record is one of peace with her neighbors, not of war. Also it should be pointed out that not a single dominion within the British Commonwealth of Nations has a full self-supporting armament as yet, either by land or sea. If officers from England were still needed to carry over the Indian Army intact into the new constitution, they would surely be willing to continue their service for that purpose as long as they were needed. Important details of gradual transference of responsibility could be agreed on, with the necessary accommodations, when once the main issue of full self-government was decided.

Lord Irwin's Blunder*

The debate on India in the House of Lords made it abundantly clear that it is upon the Viceroy that the main if not the whole responsibility rests for the unfortunate form of the solemn declaration which he made on reaching India. Speaking for the government, Lord Parmoor declared that "we should if possible realize what the difficulties are in India and attempt upon a matter of this kind to do our best to support the views and opinions of the present Viceroy." He went on to refer to Lord Irwin as "the greatest Viceroy of modern times." . . . It is quite evident that Lord Irwin while he was in London dominated the India Office and that the India Office is now seeking shelter from the cold blasts of criticism under the wings of the "great" Viceroy.

About the blunder there can be no doubt. The only important question now is how its dangerous consequences ma be averted, if they can be averted at all. Lord Irwin used th vague phrase "dominion status," about the precise meaning o which lawyers might argue forever, but such lawyers' arguments are not pertinent in this case. All that mattered wa how the phrase would be understood by the politicians and people of India. All authorities on the present political mentalit of India—excepting "the greatest of modern Viceroys"—appea to have been agreed that such a phrase ought not to have bee employed by the Viceroy at the present moment, because would inevitably be misunderstood. But against all such advic the India Office decided to trust "the man-on-the-spot." . .

The position of Lord Irwin is clear enough. He wishe to be able to make a declaration which would avert the dange of that campaign of "civil disobedience" which was threatene for New Year's Day. Probably he has averted it, but at wha cost? At the cost apparently of destroying the last scrap o confidence which remains in India in the integrity and good fait of the British raj. Lord Irwin seems to be a believer in th doctrine of "Peace in our time, O Lord—and after me th deluge." In all the circumstances of the case his official declaration in favor of "dominion status" could only be taken in Indi to mean that that status was to be granted in the immediat future. That it did not mean that has been made perfectl clear by Lord Parmoor, but Lord Irwin must have know that it would be taken in that way in India and must hav intended that it should be.

How Lord Irwin's speech was actually taken in India wa made clear enough within three days of its delivery. A committee of the leaders of all parties in India, including the liberal moderates, issued a plain statement of what they understood Lord Irwin to mean. They declared, "We understand that the conference is to meet, not to discuss when dominion status shall be established, but to frame a scheme of dominion constitution for India. We hope we are not mistaken in thu interpreting the import and the implications of this weighty pronouncement of the Viceroy." The men who signed this manifesto—moderates and extremists alike—knew, of course, tha nothing of the sort was intended by Lord Irwin or the British government. But they saw their chance and took it, and who shall blame them? If Lord Irwin sought to bamboozle them why should not they in turn bamboozle the people of India?

For bamboozling it was. That is the whole trouble "dominion status" is a phrase which has almost no meaning in relation to India. That enormous continental conglomeration of Hindus and Mohammedans and semi-independent native states can never, as far as it is possible to look forward into the dim future, have a constitution that would be in any way comparable to the constitutions of Canada or Australia or New Zealand. "Dominion status" for India as a whole is just about as remote a prospect as is the ultimate "Federation of the World." The thing is simply not possible, either now or probably a hundred years hence. India has a thousand Ulsters. Will the warlike Mohammedan minority ever consent to be ruled by the very unwarlike Hindus? Will the aristocratic Indian states consent to be ruled by the spurious (or else illiterate) democracies of Calcutta and Lahore and Bombay? These questions answer themselves almost before they are asked. "Dominion status" is therefore an intrinsically nonsensical term as applied to India. It can only be so applied with a conscious or semi-conscious intention to deceive.

The fat, however, is already in the fire—thanks to Lord Irwin. There can be no going back upon his declaration. Carefully read, it means, of course, nothing at all. But on the face of it it seems to mean something, to imply some very big change of policy. Yet, according to Lord Parmoor, there is to be no change of policy at all. The intention of the government is to pursue the policy which has been pursued by all British governments during the past twelve years. . . .

---

* We reprint this editorial from the New Statesman, English liberal weekly, of November 9.—EDITOR THE NATION.

But, then, why this flamboyant declaration of policy by Lord Irwin? It means nothing, apparently, save a reaffirmation of the policy of 1917. Yet in India it has been taken to mean very much more, and it was the obvious intention of Lord Irwin that it should be taken to mean much more.

What is the meaning of it all? If we cannot understand it ourselves, how can the Indians be expected to understand it? "There is no change," says Lord Parmoor. Then why in heaven's name should there be all this fuss? If Lord Irwin's speech meant something, then what is that something? If it meant nothing, as Lord Parmoor suggests, then why has it produced this wonderfully "satisfactory" result in India? The answer to these questions is obvious. The "greatest Viceroy of modern times" has elected to take a short view of the Indian political situation, and in announcing his policy has used phrases which must surely have been intended to hold a double meaning—one for India and another for England. It is not, we believe, by such methods that the great problem of Indian government can be solved. Lord Irwin is a disastrously bad adviser. On what he has done during the past few weeks he should probably be described, not as the greatest, but as the worst Viceroy of modern times.

But the urgent question is how the damages can best be repaired. The Indian leaders have affirmed—honestly or dishonestly—their belief that the proposed conference is to meet at Delhi to frame a constitution embodying the principle of immediate dominion status. So far, no official statement has been issued, either by the Viceroy or by the home government, repudiating that absurd, yet inevitable, interpretation of Lord Irwin's words. But some such repudiation must be made at once if the British government is not justly to be charged with the worst sort of disingenuity and trickery. We are not going to offer India dominion status either this year or next year, or in the lifetime of any living man. We might perhaps leave her alone to work out her own salvation without the aid of British bayonets. That is conceivable. But it is not conceivable that India (as a whole), in any future conditions that can now be even hypothetically envisaged, will be able to control her own army, navy, and civil service in the manner in which these services are controlled in other British dominions. This must somehow be made clear, if only to rectify, in such measure as is possible, Lord Irwin's almost grotesque blunder. . . . He must find means of clearing up the mess that he has made, or if that is impossible he ought to resign. What is immediately urgent, as Lord Reading pointed out, is that the obvious misunderstandings to which Lord Irwin's speech has given rise should be instantly rectified. The Indians have already too little confidence in our good faith. We cannot afford to let the "greatest Viceroy of modern times" destroy that confidence altogether.

In view of the many letters received from readers on recent riots and the present situation in Palestine, The Nation will publish in its issue of January 8 a short article and a considerable number of letters on this subject.

LAST 5 DAYS! of REMOVAL SALE
All Etchings, Color Reproductions, and Books must be sold AT ANY PRICE!
International Book & Art Shop 3 Christopher St. 8th St. & 6th Ave.

Contributors to This Issue

Robert S. Allen is a Washington newspaper correspondent.

Paul Y. Anderson is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

C. W. is a writer on current business developments.

Horace B. Davis is on the staff of Southwestern College in Memphis.

Leslie Nelson Jennings is a New York poet.

Lorine Pruette is the author of "Woman and Leisure: A Study in Social Waste."

Benjamin Ginzburg is preparing a volume to be entitled "The Adventure of Science."

Fred T. Marsh writes occasional book reviews for The Nation.

Joseph T. Shipley is at work on a book of literary criticism.

R. F. Dibble, whose recent death is lamented by The Nation as well as by his many other friends, was in the department of English at Hunter College.

Norah Meade reviews novels regularly for The Nation.

Eloise Ellery is professor of history at Vassar College.

Mark Van Doren is editor of "An Autobiography of America."

Louis R. Gottschalk is in the department of history at the University of Chicago.

Joseph Wood Krutch is dramatic editor of The Nation.

C. F. Andrews, who has lived more than fifteen years among the villages of Bengal, is connected with the Tagore School in India.

Coming to America

A. FENNER BROCKWAY, M.P.
FAMOUS BRITISH LABOR LEADER AND PEACE ADVOCATE
Mr. Brockway arrives in America on January 7th under the auspices of THE WORLD TOMORROW. He will speak on—Non-Cooperation in War Time—The Future of India—The Labor Party and Palestine—A New Way With Criminals—The British Labor Party, Is It Fulfilling its promises?
For terms and dates address:
A. ALBERT MacLEOD
52 Vanderbilt Avenue New York

☐ SHOPPERS' CORNER ☐

GIFTS

That are unique and lovely at moderate prices. Only genuine handcrafts of Mexican and American Indians. Variety of Rugs—Pottery—Weavings — Jewelry — Baskets, etc.

LA FIESTA, 38 West 8th St.
Nation readers invited. OPEN TILL 10 P. M.

MARITZA—172 W. 4th Street

Offers to her friends a very distinctive and unusual selection of lovely gifts just received for the holiday season at very moderate prices. ¶ Russian shirts for men. ¶ Charming selection of Jersey dresses. ¶ Russian Cossack coats and hats.

¶ Original Costumes to Hire.

NEW EDITION OF FINE
ETCHINGS
By American and European artists. Fine subjects to beautify the home or office. Splendid for Christmas gifts. Write for free set of small reproductions. Dept. B

ETCHERS GUILD
366 Broadway, New York City

OPEN SHELF

THE BOOKS YOU CAN'T GET ELSEWHERE

may be rented for a nominal fee. Members throughout the United States have access to a large collection of rare, scarce, out-of-print, strange and curious books; limited, privately-printed editions, unabridged translations and extraordinary new books. Please state occupation or profession when writing for information and lists.

Esoterika Biblion Society
45 West 45th Street, Dep't N-6 New York City

RESORTS

RUSTIC Beauty for your relaxation and recreation, convenient for week ends. 1½ hours from Grand Central. Skating, Skiing and tobogganing.
HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 858

THE LAKE VIEW
SILVER & CAMEN
Surpassing Accommodations
Atmosphere of Refinement
Excellent Cuisine
Moderate Rates
59 Madison Ave. Phone Lakewood 287
Lakewood - New Jersey

SONAQUA CLUB
Lake Mohegan, N. Y.

The Haven for Sport Lovers. Ideal for recreation and relaxation. Convenient for week-ends. Only 45 miles from N. Y.

Sports
Skating, Hiking, Skiing, Tobogganing.

Special feature program for Christmas and New Year Weekends.

For reservations call Peekskill 1276

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS:

Mail your classified ads so they reach us Friday, to insure their appearance in the issue of THE NATION on the stands the following Thursday.

THE NATION 20 VESEY ST., N. Y.

☐ FOR RENT ☐

FURNISHED ROOMS

Manhattan Beach Hotel
Manhattan Beach, N. Y. C.

LIVE in a modern fireproof hotel by the seashore for less than in the crowded city—$9.00 per week and up for one; $12.00 per week and up for two. All hotel services included. Tennis and handball courts. 37 minutes from Times Square (B.M.T. Brighton Beach Station). Phone Sheepshead 3000.

TO LET—In apartment of private professional family, large sunny corner bedroom, single or double, three windows, two large closets, private lavatory and toilet; near B'way subway, 103rd St., and express station 96th St. Tel. before 9:30 A.M. or between 6 and 8 P.M. Clarkson 0523.

APARTMENTS

GREENWICH VILLAGE

CHARMING one- and two-room apartments; all improvements; fireplaces; moderate rentals. Apply Superintendent, 58 Barrow St.

IN THE COUNTRY

FOR RENT—4-room apartment, new, simply and colorfully furnished, incinerators, electric refrigeration; accessible Hessian Hills School and one hour from Grand Central. $100 per month Feb. 1-Sept. 1. W. Lon Martin, Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y.

APARTMENTS TO SHARE

YOUNG man located in Buffalo, N. Y., will share his comfortable bachelor quarters with another young man. Write Box 2255, % The Nation.

WANTED—A young man interested in recreational work to share with two other men a four-room furnished apartment with service in a model tenement. Terms—two evenings per week of work and $12 a month. Telephone Drydock 9099.

WANTED—Two young women to share my apartment, Washington Square section; Liberals, Christians preferred; references. Box 2256, % The Nation.

FURNITURE FOR SALE

FURNITURE and complete household necessities; three rooms artistically and newly furnished; sacrifice. Call all day Sunday, 640 E. 175th St., Bronx, or phone Stuyvesant 7770 afternoons, evenings. Pullman.

POSITIONS WANTED

ART DIRECTOR: (man) Ten years as professional and teacher: Painting, Modelling, Pottery, Design: References: Part-time with progressive institution New York or vicinity. Box 2250, % The Nation.

YOUNG MAN, 33, married, seeks editorial position; liberal, well-informed, 10 years' newspaper experience; excellent references. Box 2254 % The Nation.

HELP WANTED

ROENTGENOLOGIST needs assistant. He must be cultured, well poised, unattached, and be able to handle tactfully various types of people. The work necessitates residence in or near the office, but working conditions are pleasant. Technical experience is unnecessary. The position is permanent and there is possibility of increase in salary. Box 2258, % The Nation.

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

Program Dec. 27-Jan. 4
AT COOPER UNION
8th Street and Astor Place at 8 o'clock. Admission Free.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF PROGRESS
Friday, Dec. 27—No Meeting.

ETHICS AND SOCIAL SCIENCE
Sunday, Dec. 29—No Meeting.

NATURAL SCIENCE
Tuesday, Dec. 31—No Meeting.

MUHLENBERG BRANCH LIBRARY

209 West 23rd St., at 8:30 o'clock.

Monday, Dec. 30—Dr. Mark Van Doren—The Autobiography of America—"Beyond the Mississippi."

Wednesday, Jan. 1—No Meeting.

Thursday, Jan. 2—Dr. E. G. Spaulding—The Development of Fundamental Ideas and Fundamental Problems in Philosophy and Science. "The Nature of Space and Time."

Saturday, Jan. 4—Dr. Houston Peterson—Types of Character. Emil Lucka's "Frontiers of the Soul" and Spranger's "Types of Men."

EDUCATIONAL

THE MODERN SCHOOL

THE MODERN SCHOOL
Stelton, N. J.
(Boys and Girls from 4 to 14 years of age.)
Creative activities.
Academic Instruction.
Write JAS. H. DICK, Prin.

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN, ENGLISH

Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 9 to 9 daily. 18th year.

FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

UNIVERSAL INSTITUTE OF
LANGUAGES ITALIAN—GERMAN FRENCH—SPANISH
Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Simplified conversational method. 18 years' experience. Also neglected English education. 1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

RUSSIAN by professional teacher, Imperial university graduate. Berlitz method. M. Jerlitzyn, 25 W. 123rd St. Harlem 0487

PERSONAL

A CLUB is organizing to give members, through mutual cooperation, an intelligent social atmosphere combined with exclusive out-door activities e. g. private beach facilities, camp, etc. Please write Box 2257, % The Nation.

If you're tired
of Hunting a Home
Let The Nation
Real Estate Column
Find it for you.

30 words—$3.08

THE NATION 20 Vesey St.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1930 No. 3366

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 29
EDITORIALS:
- Peace Be to Zion 31
- Pittsburgh's Shame 32
- Disarmament Difficulties 33
- The Non-Existent Soviets 34

THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL FOR 1929 35
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 36
WHY CONSOLIDATE RAILROADS? By Donald R. Richberg 37
PROSPERITY—BELIEVE IT OR NOT: VII. BALANCING THE BOOKS. By Stuart Chase 39
RAISING CANE IN WASHINGTON. By Arthur Warner 41
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 44
CORRESPONDENCE:
- Palestine and the Jews 45

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 47
BOOKS, FILMS, DRAMA:
- The Sexton's Spade. By Granville Paul Smith 48
- Mobilizing the Jeremiahs. By William MacDonald 48
- Meet the Wife. By Pierre Loving 49
- A Poet on Hell and Women. By Eda Lou Walton 49
- The Economics of the Contemporary Theater. By Joseph Wood Krutch 49
- Prose in the Grand Manner. By Florence Codman 50
- Fiction Briefs 50
- The Book Shelf 51
- Drama: A Peevish Play. By Joseph Wood Krutch 52
- Films: The News Reel. By Alexander Bakshy 54

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Dr. Magnes and Zionism. By Ferdinand M. Isserman 56

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
DRAMATIC EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE TEMPER OF INDIA is clearly indicated by the scenes that took place at the opening of the Indian Nationalist Congress on December 29, 1929. Shouts, riots, men and women fainting in the crush, leaders whose speeches counseling moderation and sobriety could not be heard above the melee—these were the order of the opening day. And to add to the color and confusion of the proceedings came 9,000 Sikhs, yellow clad, dust-covered, with naked swords beating time on their scabbards as they marched. So far the moderates have won a further reprieve; Gandhi defeated by a vote of 131 to 89 the proposal of Subash Bose providing for complete cessation of participation in the present government; and the plan of non-cooperation is set for some future day. But to say, as the London Times with foolish confidence says, that the Congress need not be taken seriously and that its resolution for complete independence instead of dominion status does not represent the people of India, "nine-tenths of . . . which are illiterates not caring a fig for politics," is to ignore completely the dangerous possibilities of the situation. The demands of the executive committee of the Congress are for boycott of the existing government, refusal to participate in the proposed round-table conference in London between representatives of the Indian Nationalists and of the British Government, and for giving the Nationalist Congress authority to institute non-cooperation whenever it deems it advisable. This, of course, is further temporizing. But the Indian situation right now is dynamite of the most explosive kind. Not Gandhi, not the British Raj, not all the counsels of moderation in the world can stop that powder train if once it starts to explode. It is the duty both of the Indian Nationalists and of the British Labor Government to prevent an explosion if it is humanly possible. This is no time for ultimatums on either side.

SENATOR BORAH IS QUITE RIGHT. The President's Law Enforcement Commission cannot inform us what the prohibition law is, for we know that, and nothing will really be done to enforce the law until there is a complete change in the enforcement personnel. We should add that there will be no real enforcement until there is absolute determination on the part of our highest officials to procure it. It all rests with President Hoover himself. He has now been ten months in office and there has been no change. He has tried to duck the issue by appointing the Law Enforcement Commission and by announcing that he is going to make the District of Columbia a model of what the country should and can do on the liquor question. No report from his commission will relieve him from his sworn duty to enforce the prohibition law until it is repealed. We have heard a lot about this wonderful executive and his organizing ability. Here is his chance to show what he can do. He will accomplish nothing until, as Senator Borah suggests, he fires every man in the service who will not do his duty and appoints men who will. If we were of the school which put this law into our Constitution we should make Mr. Hoover's life miserable in every legitimate way until he set himself to the task he is now shirking precisely as did his immediate predecessors in the White House.

MR. HOOVER APPARENTLY INTENDS to make this a business administration in diplomacy. With Charles G. Dawes at London, Walter E. Edge at Paris, and now Frederick M. Sackett at Berlin, the business man has come into somewhat more than his own in occupying the diplomatic seats of the mighty. There is, of course, something thoroughly appropriate in these appointments at the hands of an administration whose chief emphasis is on business efficiency, and probably that administration is reasonably representative of the present-day United States. Yet we cannot forbear casting a wistful glance backward at the days when a Bancroft or a Motley was considered an appropriate representative of this country of ours. Nor can we really believe that corresponding appointments today would be either inappropriate or undesirable.

"AN ABSOLUTE SURRENDER of a basic principle of Anglo-Saxon liberty" is Representative James M. Beck's characterization of the proposal to confer upon

Mr. Hoover the right to make tariff duties "flexible" by lowering or raising them as he sees fit. "I believe that our constitutional institutions are in process of dissolution," Mr. Beck told the Bond Club of New York a few days ago. Doubtless we shall continue to have a President, a Congress, and a Supreme Court for a long time, but the character of the Presidential office is changing at the expense of Congress because the spirit of the people "is one that believes in the concentration of power in one man." The Sixteenth Amendment, Mr. Beck declared, violated the original intent of the Constitution by making the imposition of income taxes independent of the proportionate representation of the States in the House, while the Eighteenth Amendment was adopted "simply through the impact of minorities upon cowardly legislators and public men." We have more than once found ourselves in sharp opposition to Mr. Beck in political matters, but when he attacks the rapid undermining of the Constitution by the growth of executive usurpation the former Solicitor General is on solid ground and we are glad to commend his courage.

THE FIVE CHILDREN of Mrs. Ella May Wiggins, murdered in the course of the Marion textile strike disturbances last fall, are now in a State home for orphans. The man who shot Mrs. Wiggins is at large, although a group of persons have been tried for and acquitted of her murder by due process of law in North Carolina. The deputies of Marion who shot and killed six strikers in a riot in front of one of the mills are also at large, the State having absolved them, too, of any stigma of murder. But the American Civil Liberties Union refuses to be disheartened by this turn of affairs. It has instituted civil suits for damages on behalf of Mrs. Wiggins's estate against the mills, the Gastonia Gazette, and twenty-four persons. It has filed suits against the sheriff of Mecklenburg County and other officers for unlawfully arresting and imprisoning four union organizers. It will shortly begin damage suits on behalf of three textile organizers, Lell, Saylors, and Wells, kidnapped by a group of over-patriotic citizens and taken to a lonely spot in the country where one of them was flogged. It will appeal the cases of the seven men convicted of conspiracy to kill Chief of Police Aderholt in Gastonia and sentenced to from five to twenty years in prison. For these and other activities that will give courage to the underpaid and overworked textile workers of the South, the union deserves the thanks of everybody who prefers justice and decency to the most barefaced exploitation. But it needs more than thanks: it needs funds to carry on this work. Those who wish to help may do so by sending contributions to the American Civil Liberties Union, 100 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

A SHARP WARNING from Dr. Schacht, president of the Reichsbank, early in December, that the financial reforms necessary to enable Germany to meet its obligations under the Young plan had not yet been made, followed by the authorization of a foreign loan of $100,000,000 which Dr. Schacht refused to approve and for which temporary advances from the Reichsbank were immediately substituted, calls attention to the unhappy state of German finances and German economic life. Fortunately the Müller Government, after venting its wrath upon Dr. Schacht, announced an elaborate program of reform and thereby probably saved itself from being turned out of office; but the Finance Minister, Dr. Hilferding, resigned and Professor Paul Mollenhauer has taken his portfolio. The Reichsbank loan will relieve the pressure upon the treasury and take care of an estimated deficit of 1,700,000,000 marks at the end of the fiscal year. On December 7 the number of unemployed who were receiving doles reached 1,250,000, an increase of more than 100,000 in a single week and a half million greater than the number a year ago. The index of wholesale prices had declined on December 4 to 134.6 against 140.3 the previous year, and the output of iron in November was the smallest of any month since February. German industry, in short, is showing the strain which foreign borrowings have for some time concealed.

FROM VICTOR CAUVIN, secretary-general of the Union Patriotique d'Haïti, we have what purports to be the inside story of just how the recent disturbances in Haiti started. Not disaffection with President Borno, the American-made executive of Haiti, but plain dislike of American methods of administration was evidently the source of the trouble. Demands that students of the Central Agricultural School found petty and humiliating were made on them by George F. Freeman, its American head; the students rebelled and were told by Mr. Freeman to remove themselves elsewhere if they did not care for his system of education. Some two hundred students decided to strike and marched in orderly lines into the town; twice they were dispersed by police and reassembled. This strike spread to other schools, all the demonstrations being quiet and orderly. On December 3 the Government issued a communiqué disclaiming all responsibility for any measures that might be taken against the strikers. Troops appeared on the following day at the town of Jacmel. At Port au Prince an American struck a Haitian employee of the custom house, and in protest the whole custom-house personnel joined in the strike. Martial law was thereupon instituted without sufficient warning to the citizens, many of whom were arrested for violating it in consequence. Since the strikes continued to spread through the town, martial law was not revoked until December 17. M. Cauvin says: "Until the seventeenth of this month [December] we could not walk the streets from 9 p.m. till 5:30 a.m. We were treated as enemies in our own homes, in our own country." This seems to be the gist of the matter. We tend to forget that Haiti belongs to the Haitians. We cannot, of course, vouch for the word by word accuracy of M. Cauvin's report. But its import is clear enough. It shows that the American administration in Haiti has been short-sighted, domineering, and brutal. It is a bad record for us; we can only begin to amend it by getting out.

NATIONALIST PARTY SUCCESS in Egypt appears to be complete, all but seven of the 235 seats in the Chamber of Deputies having been won by the Wafd, or by a small group of Independents who will act with the Wafd, in the election just held. Reballoting in eighteen constituencies will not change the general result, since at most it can only reduce slightly the overwhelming Wafd majority. The election was interesting because of the creation of twenty-one new seats in the Chamber on account of the increase of population since the previous election, and because the election was held on the basis of direct suffrage instead of the secondary or "two-degree" basis which the constitution appears to contemplate. Rather curiously, the proposed treaty between Egypt and Great Britain, the negotiation of which has been hanging fire, did not enter as a direct issue into the electoral contest; not, it is reported, because of popular opposition to the treaty, but because support of the treaty would help the former premier, Mahmoud Pasha, whom the Nationalist or Wafd Party had denounced as a dictator and sought to defeat. It is expected that the treaty question will be taken up as soon as the new government is formed and the outlook for the treaty seems to be good.

> As a remembrance of a limpid and heroic page made sacred by the sacrifice of our martyrs, the banners and histories of the chapters will be offered to the Historical Museum of Fascism where they should remain as a symbol of devotion to our ideals.

THIS LYRIC FLIGHT, uttered by Count Ignazio Thaon di Revel, was the swan song of the Fascist League of America, officially disbanded on December 31, 1929. Count Revel carefully explained that the league, with its membership (reputed) of 12,000, was to be dissolved because its aims—"to acquaint America with the ideals of fascism and the marvelous work of national reconstruction accomplished by the Fascisti government in Italy"—had been achieved. This is, of course, as it may be. But although Count Revel denied it with amused tolerance, one suspects that it was not entirely the accomplishment of all its ends that put the league out of business, but certain strictures on its methods. The league has been a little too high-handed in its dealings; it has not even been above violence in its campaign of acquainting America with the ideals of fascism, reprisal for which culminated in the murder of two overactive league members. Marcus Duffield, in an article in Harper's Magazine last November, charged the league with setting up, among Italian Americans, a dictatorship whose ultimate control was vested in the Duce himself. This article was brought up for comment in the United States Senate a fortnight or so ago. In spite of denial by Secretary Stimson that any fault was to be found with the League, one guesses that Mussolini's assistants in this country thought the water was getting a little too hot.

STOPPING THE GOLD FLOW from Argentina was President Irigoyen's aim in closing by decree, on December 17, the Caja de Conversion or exchange bank at Buenos Aires. The reason for this sudden action, which came as a surprise to the financial world, was alleged to be the "damaging influence" of exchange fluctuations upon the Argentine market and the consequent shipments of gold coin out of the country "without justifiable causes." The immediate effect of the decree, of course, is to remove Argentina from the list of countries which maintain the gold standard, but the whole transaction appears somewhat hard to explain. New York banking opinion inclines to the view that President Irigoyen's decree, besides being precipitate, was unnecessary and the action in any case is disturbing. It is true that general business conditions in Argentina during the past year have been getting worse rather than better, with an unfavorable balance of trade, high rediscount rates, and a consequent outflow of gold. On the other hand the Banco de la Nacion, the central bank of Argentina, which as a result of the decree takes control of the exchange situation save as local banks may still, apparently, export such gold as they have, is reported to have an 82 per cent gold reserve against outstanding currency—one of the highest reserve ratios, perhaps actually the highest, in the world. It is not clear that Argentina has anything to gain by dropping the gold standard. Currency depreciation, certainly, will not minister to its prosperity.

TO HAROLD J. LASKI has come a signal honor. He has been chosen by Ramsay MacDonald to lead in an investigation of the administrative machinery of the English government, which may result in several changes in the British constitution—at least so the dispatches announce. Whether they exaggerate or not, it may be laid down as certain that whatever subject Mr. Laski applies himself to he will illuminate—witness his searching article in the January Harper's entitled Can Business Be Civilized? Indeed, the strength of the British Labor Party remains in the men of most unusual intellectual caliber whom it can call upon for party service; it is open to question whether any other national political organization can equal it in this respect. That the Labor Party is planning far-reaching constructive changes is altogether significant. If through Professor Laski and those with whom he will serve the party will in due time announce definite recommendations as to administrative reforms and constitutional changes, there will be conclusive answers to the recent Conservative charges that the MacDonald Administration is leading only in foreign affairs.

Peace Be to Zion

AS the British investigation of the riots in Palestine comes to an end, and as the passions aroused in connection with those outbreaks gradually cool, we are struck with the substantial agreement among intelligent and well-disposed observers, Jewish and non-Jewish alike, on certain essentials of the Palestinian question, however sharply they may have differed concerning the events of the months just past. It is agreed, first, that the association in any way of Zionism with British imperial interests and ambitions is unfortunate for a movement which is in essence cultural and spiritual. As it is phrased, "Zion cannot be built on bayonets." Second, it is agreed that under existing conditions the Jews cannot expect, and ought not to ask, the political domination of Palestine. Third, it is agreed that they ought to be adequately protected against such murderous attacks as those of the past summer. Fourth, and most important, it is agreed that whatever arrangements are worked out for the political control and the necessary policing of the country, the permanent structure of Zion must be built on a foundation of mutual understanding between Jews and Arabs.

We have not tried to assess the exact immediate blame for the attacks of last August, though it seems clear from the testimony thus far that they were instigated at least in part by certain fanatical Arab leaders. Nor have we attempted, in advance of the findings of the investigation, to determine definitely the responsibility of the British Government, whether by reason of the conflict between the Balfour Declaration and the alleged war-time promises to the Arabs or because of laxity in the local administration at a time when trouble was evidently impending. Because we have tried to understand and explain, as far as we could, what lay in the background of the killings, many of our readers have apparently felt that we were inclined to condone the attacks on the Jews. Nothing could be further from the truth; we have nothing but reprobation for violence and murder, and sympathy for the victims. But we have no word to retract that we have spoken in defense of Arab rights; nor have the Arabs forfeited those rights by the misconduct of some of their number.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Our primary interest, however, is not in the wrongs and mistakes of the past, or even in the immediate responsibility for them. Our concern is with the future. Zionism, we believe, has a genuine cultural and spiritual contribution to make to modern life. The economic and political tasks of working out that contribution are of the utmost difficulty and complexity, in view of the physical, racial, and religious conditions in Palestine. Because we are wholly friendly to this great undertaking, and because we are confident that no enduring structure can be built in Palestine except on the basis of Arab friendliness and good-will, we have supported the irenic position of Dr. Magnes. In his steadfast adherence to the highest ethical standards in the face of the most bitter provocation, that great leader seems to us at once to uphold the finest tradition of Judaism and to point the only possible way to the true success of Zionism. At cost, if need be, of further misunderstanding, but in full confidence that our belief is right, we once more assert that the only way for those who have been wronged in Palestine is the way, not of vengeance, but of forgiveness and reconciliation.

Pittsburgh's Shame

WE have already commented briefly upon the case of Frederic E. Woltman, graduate assistant in the department of philosophy at the University of Pittsburgh, who was summarily dismissed from his assistantship on May 2 last and also expelled from the university because of his alleged connection with a meeting of the Liberal Club, a student organization, at which Professor Harry Elmer Barnes of Smith College was scheduled to speak. It will be recalled that the meeting of the club, called specifically "to demand the unconditional release of Thomas Mooney and Warren K. Billings," was first denied the use of a room in one of the university buildings, was then debarred from all university property, and was finally held in a lot near the university where Professor Barnes spoke from the running-board of an automobile. This was on April 12. On April 24 the club was officially dissolved by the university authorities, but continued its activities off the campus with the result that, on May 2, two students who had been leaders in the club activities were expelled and Mr. Woltman, who was not a member of the club, was both expelled and dismissed.

A committee of the American Association of University Professors has lately investigated this extraordinary situation and its report has just been published. Never, in all the long list of infractions of academic freedom which the association has investigated, has a university administration emerged more thoroughly damned. The condemnation is the more severe because of the scrupulous care which the committee appears to have taken to give full weight to the factors, few though they are, by which the university administration might profit. They recognize, for example, that no question of tenure was involved in Mr. Woltman's dismissal, since he held a one-year appointment, had no reasonable ground to expect that he would be reappointed, and was paid his salary for the full year notwithstanding that he was dropped in May. They cite the feeling on the part of the faculty that the situation of the university administration "really is difficult." "It has adopted a highly ambitious project of expansion, calling for greatly increased endowment; it is dependent for funds partly on the local community and partly on a State government, in both of which the influence and peculiar point of view of certain big-business and industrial interests seem to be paramount." Yet it is the judgment of the committee that Mr. Woltman, who had spoken and written on labor and other subjects, "was dismissed without a statement of charges and without a hearing, without any allegation of incompetence for his academic duties, and without recommendation by the department in which these duties were performed."

The "administration" of the University of Pittsburgh is President John Gabbert Bowman, sometime secretary of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, whose handling of professorial pensions The Nation has several times dissected. Dr. Bowman's 680-feet-high, ten-million-dollar "Cathedral of Learning" is apparently intended to be an "efficient" institution such as "certain big-business and industrial interests," along with the cultured and the man in the street, will approve. The association's committee finds that Dr. Bowman is a dictator, and it suggests that he is a coward. In spite of his denial that the university objected to professors taking part in the discussion of public questions, provided they did not engage in "propaganda that seemed to associate the name of the university with the end sought," he frankly admitted that a member of the faculty who did not yield to "friendly remonstrance" would be dismissed, and added that "at the present time there were four or five members of the faculty to whom this was likely to happen." The conclusion of the committee is, in substance, that the president is afraid of his financial supporters, that he offers only the choice of a one-hundred-per-cent loyalty to his own notions of things or dismissal, that the faculty has "little or no part in the government of the university," and that the professors are terrorized. The fact that all members of the faculty are employed under yearly contracts, with no presumption of permanence, naturally makes their dismissal easy.

The association has done an admirable piece of work in eviscerating this latest academic scandal. It will not have completed the great task of liberating the professoriate, however, until it has devised some method of bringing such a boss-ridden institution as the University of Pittsburgh to book. As long as professors are willing, as they are, to take the places of colleagues who have been unwarrantably dismissed, and having done so can still retain good standing in the profession, academic freedom will remain only a form of words.

Disarmament Difficulties

THE French naval memorandum, made public on the day after Christmas, served at once to emphasize the difficulties facing the London Naval Conference and to indicate its possible usefulness. The note serves notice that the French navy is going to be based on the needs of the French empire as understood in France—an uncompromising suggestion of the difficulties of the conference—and declares that "the conference will fail to achieve its object to the full unless it makes it lead to a general agreement in Geneva as to the methods for the limitation of naval armaments."

The accomplishment at London of anything worth while depends on a rare combination of idealism and hard-headed realism. Probably no man in public life combines those qualities in higher degree than Ramsay MacDonald, and it is good that the conference is to have the advantage of his leadership. Yet no one should be betrayed into false hopes on that account. At the time of Mr. MacDonald's visit to our shores last summer, his earnestness and eloquence led many enthusiastic observers to feel that the day of peace on earth was very near. At that very moment, however, more hard-headed critics pointed out that aside from psychological results the immediate practical outcome of the MacDonald-Hoover conferences, as far as the public was informed, had been precisely nothing. Since that time a somewhat bewildered American public has learned that despite President Hoover's statement plans of the Navy Department for cruiser building have not been held up by a single day. Mr. MacDonald did make a gesture toward delaying naval construction; yet if we are not mistaken all inquiries addressed to the present British Government concerning actual naval work have been answered to the satisfaction of alarmed patriots who feared an undue weakening of the navy. In both countries there has been a gap between talk and action that is painful to contemplate. Yet we are not inclined to charge either of the chief leaders concerned with hypocrisy. The hard realities of the situation have proved too much for the idealism that found expression in public utterance. Appeals to popular sentiment have run afoul of contracts and political commitments. Ramsay MacDonald's pacifism is genuine enough, but when it comes to actual naval cuts the Admiralty holds the trumps, and the blessed state of parity is to be achieved, it appears, by our building up to Britain instead of Britain's building down to us. If results are to be achieved at London then, it must be by a clear understanding that words, however eloquent, are no substitute for deeds.

From this point of view the elimination of the Paris peace pact from the London discussion may be by no means an unmitigated loss. President Hoover and Prime Minister MacDonald based their disarmament pronouncements on the idea of the peace pact. The French Government says of the pact: "It is undoubtedly a real step toward the preservation of peace, but it cannot be looked upon as sufficient in its present state to guarantee the security of nations." The note goes on somewhat cruelly: "It was this consideration, no doubt, that prevented the British Government from contemplating a substantial reduction in their naval armament and the American Government from giving up the prompt execution of their latest naval program."

It is time to stop talking nonsense about basing naval limitation on the peace pact. If the pact means anything, it means that the nations accepting it are not going to fight. But navies are made to fight. As long as you maintain navies then you are proceeding on the assumption that the pact, for practical purposes, is meaningless; and the idea of basing naval limitations as opposed to abolition on the pact is logically nonsense. Neither Mr. Hoover nor Mr. MacDonald last summer had the slightest idea of scrapping his country's navy, nor will a single delegate come to London with such an idea even remotely in mind. How then could a resulting treaty possibly be based on the pact? To attempt any such logical feat is simply to darken counsel by words without knowledge. And the frank elimination of the Paris document, while it may dash unjustifiably high hopes, may also serve to keep men's eyes on the practical realities and possibilities of the situation. The conference in fact is going to make little practical difference in the actual business of naval construction unless the governments concerned experience a change of heart of which there is no evidence. The French note is clear and frank on this point. It says flatly that the French navy is going to be based not on sentiment embodied in the peace pact but on "national needs," taking into account France's geographical position and colonial empire. Such an attitude deals openly with existing political realities in terms of force and supposed national interests. Such an attitude makes striking naval reduction well nigh impossible. Yet such an attitude seems in fact to be taken, as far as we can see, by all the Powers concerned, though none of the others has stated it quite so plainly. We should approach the conference, accordingly, with no illusions.

Because of these difficulties, shall we simply wash our hands of the conference? By no means. The world is as it is; if we expect little, we may be grateful for not much. If definite plans of limitation, carefully worked out, can be put forward, some slight measure of relief from competitive expenditure may be achieved, as happened at Washington. Further, a fillip may be given to the lagging work of the League's Disarmament Commission, through which France insists, perhaps rightly, any approach to a general move toward armament reduction must come. Finally, the conference, happily, is going to contain some men, at least, who really believe that reason can take the place of force as the ultimate international arbiter. Let their hands be strengthened by the support of the world's peace forces, and this conference may take on the character of a cooperative attempt at solving common problems. If it does, it will be worth while, no matter how small its concrete achievements. For the attainment of peace is a matter both of public sentiment and of the right organization of international relations. The peoples, eager for peace, will back their government representatives, we are confident, in every move they may make in the direction of armament reduction.

The Non-Existent Soviets

IN compiling The Nation's Honor Roll for 1929 we had great trouble in deciding whether to give first place, on the score of humor, to the New Yorker or to the Department of State. We finally gave it to the New Yorker on the ground that our cheerful contemporary is always good-natured, which the State Department sometimes is not. But we confess that we find the State Department a great deal funnier than the New Yorker. In the field of metaphysics, moreover, or in the solving of conundrums, the department so happily presided over by Mr. Stimson is certainly without peer. In its performance of that old favorite piece, "When Is a State Not a State," the department surely stands near the top in the field of drama also.

The latest scene in the play, up to the time of writing, has been put on with the cooperation of Senator Borah, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and the Department of the Interior. Senator Borah sent a personal appeal to M. Litvinov, Acting Soviet Commissar of Foreign Affairs, while the department sent messages through the Soviet Union Information Bureau to the officially non-existent Soviet Government, and through Governor Parks of Alaska to those substantial material realities the Soviet icebreakers Lipke and Stavropol, in each case asking aid in finding our lost fliers Eielson and Borland. According to the earlier newspaper dispatches, Secretary Wilbur in an apparent fit of absentmindedness sent off the message to Moscow without stopping to consult Mr. Stimson. Later dispatches report that he had State Department consent. In any case, we hope that he will not be proceeded against under the Logan Act; and as he was corresponding with a government that does not exist anyway, he will probably come off free. Concerning the messages to the ships, the State Department graciously informed Mr. Wilbur that it had no objection to the appeal for help—very likely because these ghostly icebreakers, though they are the property of a metaphysical no-state, yet have the solid material quality of cutting a good deal of ice when it comes to saving lost polar fliers.

The response to Secretary Wilbur's appeal was striking, coming as it did from no government at all. This Soviet unreality promptly dispatched a plane under the guidance of Semyon Shestakov, the celebrated flier who piloted the Land of the Soviets from Moscow to New York, in search of Eielson and Borland, and ordered two other planes to aid in the expedition. If Shestakov, Russian national hero, at the risk of his own life should rescue our fliers, we presume that the State Department again would have no objection. If human lives were not at stake, one could enjoy without qualification this merry game of hide and seek that our State Department plays, able to see the Soviet Government when it wants to get something out of that organization, but under any other circumstances acting deaf, dumb, and blind.

This little play of the State Department's is much like the classical marionette show; it goes on for years in a series of changing scenes, and when one set of actors is killed off, their successors play much the same part. The department could not recognize the Soviet Government because it repudiated the Czarist debts, because it confiscated the private property of American citizens, because it carried on propaganda for a world revolution, and now, forsooth, because M. Litvinov has given Secretary Stimson a sharp slap on the wrist over his invocation of the Paris pact in connection with the settlement of the Chinese Eastern Railway question.

Of course, the play has its inconveniences. As we recognize no Russian government with which we can make a deportation convention, we cannot deport Russian undesirables to the land of the Soviets, and the first thing we know we may find traffic in our streets blocked by Russian Communists and other such kittle-cattle who with the devilish ingenuity for which they are famed have managed in one way or another to evade the vigilance of the immigration service. More serious are the business consequences. The great American corporations, like the General Electric, the Westinghouse, the American Locomotive, and the International Harvester Company, are eager to do business in Russia. Despite all discouragements trade today is three times as great in value as before the war and many of these corporations are giving Russian trade organizations credit extending up to three years, thus showing their faith in the future of the business. Their competitors in the other great countries which have recognized Russia enjoy the services of consuls and trade representatives and all the other aid their governments can give them. If only the State Department would put on a new act, our business men think that they might enjoy some of these same advantages themselves. But after all, the play's the thing, and what is trade by comparison with considerations of a loftier and more spiritual nature?

Our readers will not have forgotten the five million dollars of wicked Russian gold sent by the Soviet Government to two great New York banks last year to help meet the Russian trade balance. They will not have forgotten the righteous indignation of our State Department which finally led to the return of this unrighteous wealth. Perhaps they do not know that the German banks then put their stamp on it, thus taking off the curse, and that in due time it came back all right. Again, the Russian state bank carries balances in American banks, and it asked those banks to honor coupons on Soviet railway bonds held here. The State Department virtuously insisted that this should not be done. So it goes. We hesitate to mention these sordid details of trade and commerce, which serve only to illustrate a few of the difficulties placed in the way of business development by our official policy. The State Department evidently has its mind on higher things, and while it continues to give as entertaining a performance as the one it is now putting on, we feel that the show is worth all it costs, particularly as most of the cost does not fall on us.

How long will the play run? We do not know, but we begin to think that it may be the "Abie's Irish Rose" of the diplomatic repertory. In fact, we are inclined to believe that long after Henry L. Stimson has ceased to be more than a name, and after the present editors of The Nation are moldering in the dust, the same old favorite may still be seen on the boards of the State Department playhouse. By that time its title may be "No Recognition Without Repentance."

The Nation's Honor Roll for 1929

WE offer below the names of certain Americans who, in public service, the arts, sciences, or other fields, have distinguished themselves during the past year. This is not, of course, an inclusive list, but as it stands it forms a group of men and women who have done honor to the United States as a whole or to their particular part of it.

Public Service

The UNITED STATES SENATE, for keeping hot the fires of controversy and for insisting that the American people be continuously aware of the intricacies of government. The tariff, farm relief, the power problem, the lobbying activities of William B. Shearer and others have all been brought into the clear light of publicity because the Senate remains the one active, debating legislative body in the country.

OWEN D. YOUNG, for his work in directing the formulation of a reparations agreement—the Young plan—which aims to take the reparations issue out of politics.

SALMON O. LEVINSON, father of the idea of the outlawry of war, now embodied in the Paris peace pact and formally accepted by the great Powers of the world.

J. NEVIN SAYRE, of the Committee on Militarism in Education, for his gallant leadership in the struggle to keep militarism out of the schools.

Senator BRONSON CUTTING, for successfully attacking the censorship clauses of the tariff bill, with the resulting deletion of the provision for the censorship of obscene books and the limitation of the definition of "seditious" matter.

NORMAN THOMAS, for his intelligent, forthright, and vigorous campaign as Socialist candidate for Mayor of New York City.

ERNEST GRUENING, who, with his paper, the Portland Evening News, almost single-handed persuaded the voters of Maine to refuse to permit the export of hydro-electric power.

ROBERT MOSES, for his part in securing for the people of New York State one of the finest systems of public parks in the United States.

GARDNER JACKSON, courageous Boston journalist, for devoted and persistent service without pay to unpopular causes.

Journalism

The SCRIPPS-HOWARD newspapers, for general liveliness and liberalism, and particularly the New York Telegram, for putting itself on record as favoring a Socialist Mayor—Norman Thomas—for New York City.

The New Yorker, for being consistently amusing, good-tempered, intelligent, resourceful, and good-to-look-at.

Architecture

The firm of NIMMONS, CARR, AND WRIGHT of Chicago, whose work in industrial building and, more particularly, on structures in various cities built for Sears, Roebuck and Company, is a long step toward a distinctly American treatment of the problem of design.

ROBERT D. KOHN, CHARLES BUTLER, and CLARENCE S. STEIN of New York City, associated architects, for the new Temple Emanu-El on Fifth Avenue, fresh proof of American ability to build noble houses of worship.

Books

BRAND WHITLOCK, for "La Fayette," the most outstanding biography of the year.

JACOB ZEITLIN and HOMER T. WOODBRIDGE, for "The Life and Letters of Stuart P. Sherman," in which they make secure the enduring fame of an interesting and powerful American letter writer.

EVELYN SCOTT, for "The Wave," a great novel about the Civil War.

ERNEST HEMINGWAY, for telling, in "A Farewell to Arms," a tender love story in the vernacular.

HARRY T. PETERS, for recalling, in "Currier and Ives: Printmakers to the American People," a vanished but touching and impressive American age.

Drama

EVA LE GALLIENNE, for her increasingly successful direction of the Civic Repertory Theater in New York City.

ELMER RICE, for "Street Scene," a prize-winning play in which realism, satire, and melodrama are all made to contribute to great theatrical effectiveness.

PRESTON STURGES, for enlivening an otherwise dull season with "Strictly Dishonorable," a delightful trifle which approaches the ideal of pure comedy without ceasing to preserve the flavor of contemporary American life.

The NEWS REEL THEATER, for the establishment of a unique institution where one may enjoy the talkie-newspaper without waiting for the end of somebody's super-feature.

Art

The group of collectors and amateurs who have made possible the MUSEUM OF MODERN ART in New York City, which will devote itself to the display of contemporary painting and objects of art, both American and foreign.

Science

ALBERT A. MICHELSON, who, in announcing, on his seventy-seventh birthday, his retirement from his post as head of the physics department of the University of Chicago, declares that he wishes merely to have more time to continue his fifty-four years of scientific research.

HARLOW SHAPLEY, of the Harvard Observatory, for a series of lectures on astronomy in New York City which were heard with delight by large and eager audiences but which did not yield any portion of their scholarly profundity to popular taste.

WILLIAM H. WILMER, whose years of skilful, devoted, and successful service in the field of ophthalmological surgery have been recognized by the establishment of the Wilmer Ophthalmological Institute at Johns Hopkins University.

Adventure and Heroism

Rear Admiral RICHARD EVELYN BYRD and his companions for their bold flight over the South Pole.

Dr. GEORGE W. CRILE, ROBERT CHARLES, a Negro passerby, and many other unnamed persons who not only kept their heads in a panic but performed feats of the most admirable bravery and self-sacrifice during the trying hours that followed the Cleveland Clinic explosion and fire.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

I'VE been against every move made for censoring the theater. And I'm not for curtailment now. And yet New York is in a silly situation when the frankness of the stage so far exceeds the modes and manners of the newspapers. Concerning several plays of recent vintage the reviewers have written with wariness and embarrassment. Sometimes the mere recital of the plot has been enough to cause stammering and indirection.

This, I repeat, is a silly situation. Either the stage is too licentious or the public press too squeamish. Decidedly I lean to the latter interpretation. Moreover, the radio, which begins to usurp the functions of the newspaper, is the most prudish of all. Even a simple "damn" is generally denied to those who broadcast. Now plays are done audibly before a congregation while both the radio speech and the newspaper story may be taken by the individual in discreet seclusion. Why should these mediums not be empowered to go the limit in frank talk and the stage in its co-educational capacity be limited to mild and mannered "Drat it's"? The commotion about theatrical censorship pro and con is out of all proportion. On principle I am against abridgments such as the ban recently placed by Boston against O'Neill's "Strange Interlude." But I must admit that things done for or against the theater are relatively unimportant in our national life. The drama has ceased to be a force as far as the millions are concerned.

If cutting is to be done let liberties be taken from the playwright and given to the radio man and the reporter. Save in the case of murder trials and some particularly good divorces the press in general is far too namby-pamby. I know that there is much shouting about the sensational and yellow press and the manner in which it has encouraged crime. And I am willing to admit that much is printed in the tabloids which seems to me singularly offensive to good taste. But sensationalism and yellowness do not arise from overemphasis so much as a paucity of examination. A young man murders his wife and burns the body. This is enough to send the tabloids shrieking into headlines. One of them may print (on many occasions one of them has printed) the true-signed story of the murderer. Yet the tabloids are correct in thinking that a murder story may justifiably command the interest of us all. To say, "I am not interested in such sordid things" is to say, "I am not interested in life about me." Murders are abnormal but after all abnormality is the normal magnified and brilliantly illumined. A complete study of the Snyder case would have taught us all a great deal about the problem of the American home and the factors which war against successful marriage in this country.

No paper gave anything like a comprehensive story of this fascinating case. Whenever the story approached the sex line the newspapers sheered off. Much that the reporters omitted was decidedly unpleasant and yet I am of the opinion that this kind of censorship is harmful in the long run. To be sure, morbidity may be increased by harping on certain incidents and at the same time none of us will grow wiser and kinder without a greater store of information. In my opinion the Snyder case was enormously significant. It had more educational potentialities than almost any single sociological course in college. Again, newspapers were attacked for printing so much of the testimony about the action brought by Mr. Rhinelander against his wife. You have not forgotten, I trust, that the young man sought an annulment on the ground that his wife was of Negro extraction and that she had concealed this fact from him. To say that such a story was sordid and should have been left out of news columns or mentioned only briefly is to say that the entire problem of white and Negro relations is of no moment. Here was a concrete dramatization of the question upon which scores of textbooks have been written. And I maintain that these specific illustrations of human behavior should carry more weight with the observer than mere generalizations. Had I been a managing editor I would have endeavored to print at least twice as much as my nearest competitor.

The average newspaper owner is fond of referring to his journal as a "family newspaper." Rigorously he guards readers against all sorts of things which he feels would lead them to cancel their subscriptions in protesting horror. But this same family which supposedly cannot endure even the slightest approach to frankness in print will presently put down the paper and be off to some movie house there to enjoy the pleasant ribaldry of "This Cock-Eyed World." And later they may go to a night club to watch slightly clad young women singing popular songs the lyrics of which are filled with sinful innuendo. One can be lyrical about sins which must never be mentioned by prose writers. Somebody is making suckers of us humble reporters. Possibly the papers might avoid the risk of shocking readers by putting all forthright stuff into rhyme and pretending that it was merely a quotation from a popular song.

When a man says, as I have said on many occasions, that he believes in no censorship at all he probably is not telling the truth. What he really means is that he would allow much material which is suppressed to see the light of day and balance up by curtailing other things which the community, in its ignorance, considers harmless. If Boston made me its dictator I would not think of stopping "Strange Interlude" or "A Farewell to Arms" or "An American Tragedy," but I might be gravely tempted to say, "While I am in office no newspaper will be allowed to carry Mutt and Jeff." Of course I am falling into the same heresy which afflicts other censors. I happen to think that Mutt and Jeff is bad for people.

Still it is not unreasonable to maintain that censorship pinches in the wrong places. A year or so ago I had a long argument with a newspaper owner who had refused to print anything about some rather gay divorce scandal because it seemed to him immoral. And in the paper from which the frolicsome episode was barred there ran, two columns long, a story of some singularly depraved and brutal murders by an unbalanced German. Practically none of the details was missing. In the mistaken eyes of the newspaper executive one story had to do with sex and the other didn't, which made all the difference. Somebody ought to tell editors the facts of life.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Why Consolidate Railroads?

By DONALD R. RICHBERG

THE great mystery, concerning who wants to consolidate the railroads, may never be solved. But it is certainly not the men who run them. The practical operators of the larger, more successful railroads will generally agree that economical, efficient operation becomes more difficult as a railroad system expands beyond the effective control of a single head. According to an accepted dictum "railroading is 95 per cent human." Steam transportation service is furnished by about 1,750,000 human beings, and one manager can direct only a small percentage of these employees with maximum efficiency.

It has been my special work for many years to represent large organizations of railroad employees. Frequently I have seen the far-sighted, progressive policy of a railroad president hampered, delayed, and modified by the inherent difficulty of inducing its application by subordinate officials, too numerous and remote for control by a single mind. On the other hand, operating officials frequently have been able to modify the effects of an illiberal policy handed down from above. Like difficulties in acquiring and handling traffic are experienced by far-spread systems. The particular needs of one section of the country cannot be satisfied because of the conflicting demands of another territory served by the same railroad. Communities that seek and are entitled to the fostering care of a railroad find their interests sacrificed to meet the needs of others.

Thus, in weighing the advantages and disadvantages of consolidations of railroads, we face at the outset an ancient problem of government. How far can centralization of power be carried so as to eliminate the wastes, frictions, and inefficiencies of small competing units without producing the greater wastes, frictions, and inefficiencies of bureaucratic, remote control?

The Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate submitted a report on "Unification of Railroads," which was printed in the Congressional Record of February 25, 1929. There we read: "Everyone familiar with present-day railroad problems . . . believes that the carriers and their properties should be consolidated into a limited number of strong, efficient, and well-balanced systems capable of giving the public the service it demands at rates reasonable to the carrier, the shipper, and the public."

If this high-sounding platitude means that a few systems of large size should be organized to handle the bulk of the steam-transportation business there is no general agreement that such a result is desirable, either among railroad operators, members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or well-informed students of railroad problems. And furthermore, there has been no program yet produced whereby such a result can be accomplished. Certainly the pending legislation approved by Senate and House committees, to encourage voluntary consolidations, will not produce the ideal announced.

The most pressing need for reorganization of rail systems is presented by the existence of a large number of weak railroads (most of them comparatively small roads) which furnish an essential service but which cannot be operated profitably at rates providing an ample, if not an excessive, profit to the larger, stronger roads. It is quite clear that a prosperous railroad will not "voluntarily" share its gains with its impoverished relations, except upon some compulsion or because there is a reasonable prospect of ultimately increasing the profits of its stockholders.

From the public standpoint the primary question to be solved in any consolidation program is this: How can provision be made to decrease the excessive profits of strong, well-located railroads which have good credit, and to increase the inadequate profits of weak, poorly located railroads which have poor credit? Of course, if all the railroads pooled their revenues so that expenses and profits could be paid from one treasury, we should have a transportation system which could be operated like the postal system, whereby losses on rural delivery may be met from the profits of urban delivery. But no such solution is possible under private ownership; and the present need is to find a way whereby private ownership and operation may be able to function effectively without making excessive charges for public service. The writer has no arguments for or against public ownership to advance in this article. The desirability of maintaining private ownership is simply assumed. The Senate report previously quoted makes the following significant statement:

> Unification offers the only means other than government ownership by which railroad units of a substantially uniform character may be created. Public regulation under present conditions is extraordinarily difficult, and its complexities are constantly increasing. If we are unable to make it more effective, efficient, and fair, public regulation may fail. And if it fails, the continuation of private ownership will become impossible.

Of course, the elimination of "weak" roads and the creation of an adequate transportation system composed only of "strong" roads is the ostensible goal of all the legislative programs now being discussed. But how is this to be accomplished merely by encouraging "voluntary" consolidations? It is plain that there must be some elements of compulsion in this "voluntary" program, or else it is a misleading proposal designed for some other purpose than to benefit the public. The bills now recommended to the attention of Congress may be summarized as providing the means whereby railroads may be consolidated when they so desire. They provide no means whereby railroads may be compelled to consolidate. There is no positive provision for exerting public pressure to produce consolidations in the public interest. The public protection authorized is wholly negative—the prevention of consolidations which the Interstate Commerce Commission holds to be contrary to the public interest. Just what force is to induce railroads to consolidate so as to reduce the existing profits of the prosperous roads has not been explained. Certainly a zeal for public service cannot be regarded as an inducement to stockholders to reduce their profits and to diminish the market values of their stocks. Under proposed laws the commission will not even be required to find that a consolidation will produce any certain or defined public benefits. Apparently the commission is expected to assume that consolidations are desirable and will "promote the public interest," unless a public detriment greater than any possible public benefit is evident. The political intent to give railroad owners what they want—rather than to compel them to give the public what it wants—is quite visible. And since the Senate and House bills are largely the product of railroad lawyers, it is not strange that private interests are carefully protected and public interests receive little attention in their provisions. The ancient slogan, "Give us more cake and you'll get more crumbs," seems to have controlled the drafting of these bills.

It would be impossible in less than a volume to analyze the effect and purpose of the numerous complicated provisions of the "official" consolidation bills (sponsored by Senator Fess and Representative Parker). It is far simpler to point out what they do not provide for protection of the public interest (which is very important), rather than what they do provide (which is relatively unimportant).

1. The bills do not provide that consolidations shall be permitted only when in conformity with a comprehensive plan prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Thus they do not assure ultimate absorption of all weak roads into strong systems. But unless railroad consolidations are required to fit into such a plan, a continuation of present expansions, primarily for profit and secondarily for service, is inevitable.

Nine years ago the commission was directed by Congress to prepare a comprehensive plan; but many obstacles have delayed its production, including (1) inherent difficulties, (2) disinclination and disagreement inside the commission, and (3) railroad opposition. Now it is proposed that any plan approved by the commission shall be only advisory to the railroads and to the commission, so that consolidations inconsistent with the plan may be approved until the plan itself is eventually discarded. It would be optimistic indeed to assume that railroad consolidations for private profit would bear any close resemblance to consolidations for public service.

2. The bills do not provide any assurance of more effective rate regulation, or any prospect of lower rates. In the first place, there is little sincere belief found anywhere that any economies sufficient to warrant reduced rates will result from consolidations. The main argument of the consolidators is that better, not cheaper, service will be provided. In the second place, no effort is made to establish a stable rate basis for roads, whereby the present demand for speculative profits based on fluctuating "values" might be eliminated. Therefore, under prevailing doctrines, it is probable that the consolidated properties will claim greater values as the basis for rates than the sum of the present separate property values. Higher rates are more likely to result from consolidations than lower rates. The reasons for this conclusion are many, but they arise from a long and intimate study of the methods whereby many great railroad systems are permitted today to gather profits of 10 to 20 per cent in the public-service field where a generation ago a 6 per cent profit was regarded as a bounteous harvest.

3. The bills do not provide for any more effective control over service and profits than the Interstate Commerce Commission can exercise today. Yet if still greater power is to be given to private persons to serve and to exploit public needs, there should be a corresponding increase in the power of public officials to protect public interests. One of the greatest forces of public protection today is found in the divergent counsels of competing railroads. Consolidation legislation has been delayed up to date, not so much because of opposition from an apathetic public as because of conflicts of opinion between railroad managements.

In concluding this brief survey of the present situation, attention should be drawn to the questions which should be answered before legislation is approved.

First, if the Interstate Commerce Commission presents a comprehensive plan for future railroad consolidations, will its ultimate adoption mean the absorption of all weak railroads which furnish a necessary service into strong systems capable of giving an improved service at rates which will not produce excessive profits upon actual private investments?

Second, will this publicly devised program be made the basis of preventing consolidations which do not conform to this program and the basis of compelling the consolidations recommended, by either direct or indirect pressure of public authority?

Third, will consolidated railroads be required to submit to a practical exercise of rate-regulating powers whereby, in return for increased security of investment and assurance of a fair return thereon, private owners will surrender their present claims to those speculative profits which are inconsistent with the obligations of public service? Under present laws such profits are being made. New legislation should not be enacted which will provide the basis for any further exploitation of public necessity for excessive private profit.

There is a large fraction of the public, consisting of 1,750,000 railroad employees and their dependents, who have a special interest in consolidation legislation, to which I have made no reference. These employees have found that their working conditions are changed, their homes are moved, their privileges and savings acquired by years of labor are wiped out in the rearrangement of work, the moving of terminals and division points, and the changes of management which follow upon railroad consolidations and reorganization. They have not opposed progress and improvement, but they have urged that the benefits should not flow entirely to security owners, that the public also should gain, and that the losses of the employees should be reduced as far as possible.

Finally, without criticizing railroad representatives for drafting consolidation legislation, so as to permit the maximum freedom of private judgment and the minimum restraint of public authority, it seems clear to me that the protection of public interests calls for an entirely different treatment of this problem. No consolidation measure now before Congress, which has any prospect of passage in the near future, merits the approval of an impartial public servant. Such a one may believe that little harm and some good may come out of giving the roads a free hand. But, if well informed, he must also know that the present laws for regulating railroads are a composite of proved wisdom and demonstrated folly which should be drastically revised before we proceed to complicate existing problems and to increase the difficulty of their eventual necessary solution by authorizing new combinations of anti-public forces.

Prosperity—Believe It or Not

VII—Balancing the Books*

By STUART CHASE

WE have, let us say, an onion. The onion represents the total economic life of the United States. The heart of the onion is prosperity. How large does it bulk?

First, we must strip off all the States not included in the Middle Atlantic, East North Central, and Pacific States. The National Bureau of Economic Research finds that by and large they have not prospered. Second, in the prosperous belt, we strip off most of the farmers; they have not prospered. Third, we strip off a large section of the middle class. The small business man, the independent storekeeper, the wholesaler, many professional men and women, have failed to keep income on a par with the new standard of living. Fourth, we strip off the unemployed. Machinery seems to be displacing factory, railroad, and mining workers—and of late mergers are displacing executives, salesmen, and clerks—faster than they can find employment in other fields. The net increase in "technological unemployment" since 1922 is at least 650,000 men and women. Fifth, we strip off the coal industry, which has been in the doldrums throughout the period. Sixth, we strip off the textile industry, which has been seriously depressed. Seventh, the boot-and-shoe industry; ditto. Eighth, the leather industry. Ninth, the shipbuilding industry. Tenth, the railroad-equipment industry. Eleventh, we strip off the excessive number of businesses which have gone bankrupt during the era. Twelfth, we strip off those millions of unskilled workers who were teetering on the edge of a bare subsistence in 1922, and by no stretch of the imagination can be called prosperous today. The best that can be said is that their position is a little less precarious than it was. In short, only a part of the country has been prosperous during the past eight years and even in that part there are at least twelve soft spots.

What then remains? A good deal. This categorical stripping process is justified, but we must be careful not to let it destroy our perspective. All through the preceding articles we have noted item after item which reflected, according to the definition of prosperity employed, some genuine advance. Should we list them one after another, an impressive exhibit on the other side of the fence would confront us. And here I should like to be permitted a philosophical aside. The human mind is a clumsy and impetuous instrument. Nor is it fond of hard work. Most people find two, or at the outside, three supporting cases sufficient for a generalization. Thus, if we note two Rolls Royces parked on Main Street, we say, "This place is full of millionaires." When I show, one after the other, no fewer than twelve dissents from the view that America is prosperous, the conclusion is almost irresistible that "Prosperity is a myth."

The onion has shrunk, but it has not disappeared. Among the most significant of the surviving layers are:

(1) A 20 per cent increase in the national income per capita from 1922 to 1928; (2) a 30 per cent increase in physical production; (3) a 100 per cent increase in the profits of the larger corporations; (4) a housing program expanding faster than population; (5) an increase in average health and longevity; (6) an increase in educational facilities greatly surpassing the growth of population; (7) a per capita increase in savings and insurance; (8) a five-hour decline in the average working week; (9) a slowly rising wage scale against a fairly stationary price level; (10) an increasingly fecund, alert, and courageous science of management, resulting primarily in an ever-growing productivity per worker.

The trouble with nearly every item on this second list is that while it indicates that we are more prosperous than we were, nothing whatever is said about the degree of prosperity from which we started. The base line is missing. If we were barely comfortable in 1922, we ought to be reasonably comfortable now. But of course the fact is that some 80 per cent of all American families lived below the budget of health and decency in 1922, and the 20 per cent increase in per capita income since that date, while it has helped, to be sure, still leaves probably two-thirds of all families below the line.* Unfortunately, too, the 20 per cent cannot all go into intrinsically better food, housing, and clothing, but must be applied to appease the clamoring salesmen of the new standard of living with their motor cars, radios, tootsie-rolls, silk stockings, talking pictures, and beauty shoppes. In this connection another important qualification should not be overlooked. We have seen in the foregoing articles how Middletown, and with it the whole nation, has been shifting year by year to a pecuniary economy. Money has become the sine qua non of existence. In pioneering days a hard-working family could provide for itself literally without money from one year's end to the next. Increasingly now we get our income in dollars rather than in the provisioning of our own homes by means of truck gardens, house building and repairing, "handy" work of all kinds. I am sure that a fraction of the 20 per cent is accounted for by the steady shift to a dollar economy.

We have added a little real income and considerable fluff to the totally inadequate distribution of goods and services obtaining in 1922. Is this prosperity in the deeper sense? No. The most that can be said is that the past eight years have registered a rate of advance in the direction of a prosperity which may some day be achieved. If you ask me to guess, I would say that if the next seven years are as good as the last, and the next seven again, and the next—by 1950 the United States of America will have doubled its per capita income as compared with 1922. With the usual important exceptions for persons and classes, the bulk of the population will be receiving not less than $4,000 a year per family, and will so be, if not extravagantly upholstered, at least reasonably prosperous. This would mean twenty-eight years of upward curves. The longest period of business prosperity so far in the history of the republic is fourteen years, from 1879 to 1893. Can the going economic system, with its lack of coordinated control, hold the pace for a full generation and then peg it at the top? I profoundly doubt it.

---

* This is the seventh and last of a series of articles on American prosperity by Stuart Chase.—EDITOR THE NATION.

* The National Bureau of Economic Research estimated, for 1918, that 85.9 per cent of all gainfully employed in the country received less than $2,000 a year; 72 per cent got less than $1,500. There was little gain between 1918 and 1922.

You will remember that in the first article we gave four definitions of prosperity: (1) as evidenced by the usual business barometers; (2) as evidenced by a greater flow of goods and services; (3) as evidenced by economic security and peace of mind; (4) as evidenced by the "life more abundant"—comprehending material welfare, security, and the upbuilding of a genuinely noble civilization. Measuring our findings against these definitions, we may conclude:

Definition one: Business prosperity is—up to October, 1929, at least—a provable fact. The national totals for corporate profits, new capital seeking investment, bank clearings, life-insurance totals, foreign trade, leave no doubt on this score. It has been spotty, however, with lags and set-backs here and there throughout the structure. A crude generalization might be made to the effect that industries catering to the new standard of living have prospered at the expense of industries providing the old-line staples.

Definition two: Prosperity from the commercial standpoint has never meant much to the rank and file. In the course of the four earlier periods, labor had benefited for the moment in steadier employment and sometimes in an enhanced wage scale, but with the concluding panic, everything returned to the status quo—the same old tenements, the same old shacks, the same wet babies in the kitchen, the same old bread line. As retail prices usually went up, even the flow of goods was not markedly augmented. The fifth period has a somewhat different story. Since 1922 wages have increased, prices have remained stationary (by and large), and the flow of goods and services has been augmented. While population has gained 12 per cent, the tonnage of physical production has increased 30 per cent. Unfortunately for the argument, this is not all consumers' goods. A very large fraction represents an increase in producers' or capital goods. Factories, office buildings, Diesel engines, turret lathes, power houses—these are all admirable things, but they fill no hungry stomachs, for the moment. I doubt if the wayfaring man has received as much in tangible consumable goods as the bulk productivity figures indicate. But he has certainly received some increase. Above all he has received new sorts and varieties of goods, sacrificing, at the same time, housing space, bulky foodstuffs, textile yardage. He has received the motor car for which his spirit yearned, for which he was willing to cut down on food and clothing if need be, and which incidentally did more than any other one factor to keep business prosperity swinging upward. With all due allowances, I should conclude that the second definition of prosperity has been met, obliquely if not squarely.

Definition three: Now as to prosperity measured in terms of economic security and peace of mind. Unemployment has been rampant and, according to the careful calculations of Dr. Wesley C. Mitchell, increasing throughout the period. We are probably entering, for the first time in industrial history, an era of "technological unemployment," in which, owing to the encroachments of the machine, the total firing rate is to exceed the total hiring rate. A more destructive agent for security and peace of mind it is difficult to imagine. With their land values in ruins the farmers have not passed their nights in dreamless slumber. They have been seeing werewolves for a decade. The middle class, as we have repeatedly noted, is trying to make a slightly expanded dollar meet a greatly expanded budget of wants—and with no very signal success. Industrial strains and stress in the factory, as we have seen, are probably not increasing, but the pace of living is accelerating. As it whirls faster and faster, it brings no discernible peace of mind. No. The third definition we cannot grant. Prosperity in terms of tranquillity and genuine leisure has not arrived for most of us.

Definition four: "Where wealth accumulates and men decay." A very imposing battery of critics and philosophers have taken this line as their text in viewing contemporary American civilization. Sinclair Lewis, H. L. Mencken, Eugene O'Neill, Ring Lardner, James Truslow Adams, not to mention the learned Oswald Spengler, are among those who seem to incline to the belief that as the spiral of commercial prosperity whirls upward, the spiral of the good life whirls downward. Prosperity in terms of a whole civilization—the fourth and last definition—can hardly be said to have spread its wings over the America of 1929. But I see no evidence of a net decay either in men or in their arts and accomplishments. Babies live longer, sickness declines, the whole race is improving biologically. Ah, but the mind, the creative instinct, the precious spiritual values! Having no degree in metaphysics, I know nothing about the inwardness of such ghostly matters. But we all have eyes and ears and, with a little training, can tell whether buildings are finer, pictures richer, plays more stimulating, poems grander, novels more compelling; whether criticism is more acute, statesmanship more intelligent, manners better than a decade ago—in brief, whether our commercial prosperity follows signboards marked: To Periclean Athens, To Augustan Rome, To the Florence of the Medicis; or per contra, To Bedlam or Bust.

Personally I favor the marker: No Speed Limit on This Highway, supplemented with: Dangerous Curves. American civilization was relatively crazy in 1920, and shows no signs of being less crazy today. It does show enormous and, I suspect, increasing vitality. Architecture in the skyscraper is searching for a new art form, in its way as thrilling as the temples of Ankor. It is impossible to take two steps on the streets of New York without colliding with either (a) a novelist, (b) a painter, (c) a playwright, or (d) a designer of fabrics, metal light fixtures, cock-eyed office furniture. A whole new age of decoration is breaking out in interior furnishings, office equipment, lavender bath-tubs, and even rose-colored oil heaters. The scene is at once ludicrous, arresting, inspiring, and always genuinely stimulating. There is just a chance that America might whirl itself into the most breath-taking civilization which history has yet to record. But to date the chief exhibit is activity. By all odds the noblest aspect of our civilization is found in our engineering works.

Prosperity as a rate of advance. Here if anywhere lies the real achievement of these eight years. In industrial management, the central fire of that advance, we find the most dramatic and significant aspect of the whole complicated story. It is management, furthermore, which has built these turbines, dams, and power lines, released these birds of steel to wing across the sky. Even the skyscraper is more the product of the engineer than of the architect. Steadily the output per worker rises in the well-managed factories, railroads, mines. Steadily the cost of production falls. Ever more exciting grow the machines and instruments which raise output, lower costs, increase control. Here is a press like a rearing brontosaurus thirty feet in height, just installed by the Olds Motor Company. It exerts a pressure of one million pounds. A piece of raw steel is fed to it. Crunch! Out comes a finished fender. Similarly, ever more intelligent grow the psychological contacts with the worker—a factor utterly overlooked in the Taylor systems of twenty years ago. His curve of fatigue is plotted, his adaptability to a given job is measured, his accident rate is brought down, his hours of labor are reduced, his wages are increased according to the doctrine of the economy of high wages, his leisure is respected and not corrupted by the company uplift schemes so dear to the heart of the Big Boss. I assure you that this bright picture is not general throughout American industry, but it does represent the performance toward which such plants as that of Henry Dennison in Massachusetts are striving. The spearhead of the whole movement is probably found in those establishments—such as Hart Schaffner & Marx, or the equipment shops of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad—where a strong and intelligent labor union cooperates, thus becoming an integral part of management.

A beautiful technique—the crowning achievement of prosperity. Given a free hand it might remake American industry, humanly as well as technically. It might abolish poverty, immeasurably diminish the stresses and strains which have dogged every step of the industrial revolution since the days of Watt, flood the nation with essential and even beautiful goods at a fraction of their present cost, raise the curse of Adam, and lay the basis for, if not positively usher in, one of the noblest civilizations which the world has ever seen. But the hands of management are not free. The technician is constantly undone by the sales department, which, floundering in a pecuniary economy, sees no other way—and indeed there is no other way—to maintain capacity than by style changes, annual models, advertising misrepresentation, and high-pressure merchandising. He is undone by the vested interests of the owners who demand their pound of flesh in rent, interest, and dividends now, with no thought for the rounded perfection of engineering principles and the time that they—and nature which sanctions them—demand. Above all the technician needs a national system of super-management, whereby production might be articulated to consumptive needs, and the fabulous wastes of excess plants, excess machines, excess overhead costs, uneconomically located industries, cross hauling, jam, tangle, and bottlenecks, be brought under rational control. That such super-management is not beyond human capacity to operate, the experience of the Supreme Economic Council during the war, and of the Russian Gosplan today, amply demonstrates. Prosperity in any deeper sense awaits the liberation of the engineer. If the owners will not get off his back (and why should they? They pay him little enough and he fills their safe deposit boxes) I, for one, would not be sorry to see him combine with the wayfaring man to lift them off. A complicated technical structure should be run by engineers, not by hucksters.

Raising Cane in Washington

By ARTHUR WARNER

Washington, December 23

THE American sugar interests in Cuba have been raising more cane in Washington this winter than in the Caribbean. For several weeks the newspapers have been filled with the doings of the lobby which has been trying to prevent a high import duty on sugar in the new tariff bill in order to keep the market open for the Cuban product. It has come out that in this effort the lobby employed a personal friend of President Hoover and succeeded in winning the President's sympathy if not his definite assistance in behalf of Cuban-grown sugar. Meanwhile Cuban growers of sugar, as distinguished from American growers of Cuban sugar, engaged the persuasive powers of General Enoch H. Crowder, retired, formerly our ambassador at Havana and, during the World War, in charge of the military draft in the United States. The Senate Judiciary Committee's sub-committee, which was appointed to investigate Congressional lobbying in consequence of the late lamented and already practically forgotten Shearer scandal, has lost all track of ships in its pursuit of the long, sweet trail of sugar.

Thus within less than ten months of his inauguration Mr. Hoover stands accused of improprieties of a sort which led the Democratic floor leader of the House, Representative Garner of Texas, to say on December 20 that the President ought to give the country "a direct, definite, and positive declaration" in regard to his relations with the Cuban sugar lobby. "Mr. Shattuck's denial that he had discussed sugar legislation with the President by no means disposes of the matter," continued Representative Garner. "There are definite statements in the letters of the sugar lobbyists that imply the absolute contrary." As for General Crowder, he is said to have betrayed military secrets—and to benighted foreigners at that—in giving it away that in case of war the general staff had decided not to try to keep a traffic lane open between the United States and the Philippines.

The sweet story of how growers of cane sugar in Cuba tried to safeguard their product against the machinations of American beet-sugar raisers in the drawing of the new tariff bill first began to reach the public when, on December 10, the Senate sub-committee called before it as a witness H. C. Lakin of New York City, president of the Cuba Company. Mr. Lakin said that the president of the American Chamber of Commerce in Havana had informed him that the Cuban government had suggested that somebody be found to represent it in connection with the sugar schedule in the new tariff bill. Mr. Lakin consented to act in that capacity, he said, and considered himself a representative of the Cuban government. Mr.

Lakin organized a campaign in behalf of Americans with sugar interests in Cuba. He told the Senate sub-committee that General Crowder had begun work, he thought in December, 1928, at the direct request of President Machado of Cuba. General Crowder was paid by a group of Cuban sugar-mill owners, whereas Mr. Lakin's campaign was financed in the United States. On January 29, 1929, Mr. Lakin wrote to General Crowder:

> I am already making some progress toward further efforts in Washington. By great good fortune I find that Shattuck, who wrote the brief with me [prepared earlier for the Ways and Means Committee] is perhaps Hoover's closest legal friend.
>
> He is the personal attorney for Hoover and all his family. I think I have persuaded him to undertake a confidential mission, first to convince Hoover, and secondly to work on the committees and members of Congress on behalf of Cuba, and I believe that I can induce several of the larger producers here to undertake to bear the expense. When I have made a little more progress in this connection I will communicate with you again. I am sure that I shall need your advice and cooperation.

The full name of the gentleman who was to undertake the "confidential mission" alluded to was Edwin P. Shattuck, a lawyer of New York City, who for some years had represented American sugar interests in Cuba. Mr. Shattuck had a home in Miami and he was there during the visit of Mr. Hoover to that resort previous to his inauguration. In a statement to the press Mr. Shattuck has made the following remarks concerning his "confidential mission":

> Before the new Administration came in I informed Mr. Hoover of my connections, not to obtain his approval of an important legal engagement, but to inform him what my connection was so that there would be no misunderstanding. The President did not feel that he had any right to ask me to abandon my clients and that matter ended.

While Mr. Shattuck was in Miami, Mr. Lakin said in a letter that the lawyer had seen Mr. Hoover "in the last ten days." As good luck would have it, Mr. Shattuck was a personal friend of Senator Smoot, too. "It seemed well to employ a man who knew him," wrote Mr. Lakin, and during the Utah Senator's visit to Miami Mr. Shattuck talked with Mr. Smoot—may one guess of sugar?

Mr. Hoover has said that the competitive system of industry is the most beneficent ever devised by man. But, of course, he does not actually believe it—at least not for his own crowd. Competition is splendid among workingmen; it keeps wages down. But in the realm of big business—sakes alive, no. The less competition there the better, as every up-to-date, big-business man—including Mr. Hoover—knows. Naturally, therefore, Mr. Hoover asked Senator Smoot, according to the Lakin version, if he and Mr. Shattuck couldn't devise a plan whereby domestic sugar could be protected without hurting the Cuban product. "President Hoover has taken a direct hand," Mr. Lakin wrote on March 15, 1929, to W. A. Chadbourne. "He has already suggested a possible solution to Senator Smoot and to Mr. Shattuck." The cane and the beet-sugar interests did not want to cut one another's throats any more than Mr. Hoover wanted to have them, as is evident from Mr. Lakin's further comment: "Smoot has already conferred with the beet people, among whom we have some representatives through whom we keep posted as to what is going on. I do not dare to write more."

The most enlightening details in regard to the procedure of the sugar lobby are contained in the correspondence of Mr. Lakin as dug up by the Senate sub-committee. For instance, there is a letter in regard to stirring up opinion in Latin American countries, of which Mr. Lakin admitted on the stand he was ashamed. It was written on March 5, 1929, to Rafael Sanchez Aballi, Secretary of Communications of Cuba. It ran in part:

> According to my views, one of our most important arguments is that other Latin American countries will claim that if Cuba's close relations to the United States result in damage to Cuba, they had better fight shy of having a similar thing happen to them. Therefore, it seems to me that it would be a good thing to call the situation to the attention of the appropriate persons in other Latin American countries. . . .
>
> My suggestion would be for you to have our brief and supplemental brief translated into Spanish and printed; and that copies be sent by the association to all congressmen, governors, and mayors of Cuba, and to the leading economic associations and the newspapers. Suggestions could be made to the newspaper editors to circulate the brief among their newspaper correspondents in other Latin American countries. . . .
>
> Thus far only one company which I have approached has failed to contribute. Mr. Shattuck tells me that he was anxious to have some Cuban contributions, but I think that for the present it is better to leave the responsibility to the American companies, especially as the members of Congress are very sensitive about any foreign interference with what they regard as a purely national matter.

There was also a letter to Señor Aballi suggesting that "it might really be a good thing if a committee of Cuban Masons should go quietly and without any publicity whatever to members of Congress who are Masons." Mr. Lakin thought still better of a letter sent by Cuban Rotarians to all Rotary clubs in the United States. "This letter is likely to have more influence than the undertaking of the Masons," concluded Mr. Lakin, "because the Rotary clubs are formed on the basis of economics instead of fraternal relations." In a letter to J. M. Tarafa of Cuba Mr. Lakin said:

> I have raised a fund of over $85,000 to conduct the fight. Some of the money will be used for publicity and some for employing people who have a certain amount of influence in Washington. Our chief reliance will be on Mr. Shattuck, who is a very intimate friend of Hoover, and has already talked with Hoover about this subject.

Referring to Senator Smoot, Mr. Lakin said that he > was very emphatic in stating that the Philippines are the most dangerous competitors of the United States producers. He had many facts and figures which he supplied to me and urged me to advertise as widely as possible the desirability of limiting the Philippines to 500,000 tons. He stated very, very specifically that he proposed to make a big fight on that point. Of course, at that time it was not thought that Stimson was to be Secretary of State.

A most revealing letter was written by Mr. Lakin on March 4, 1929, to the secretary of President Machado of Cuba. The secretary, expressing, of course, the ideas of his chief, had suggested a commission to go before Congress. Mr. Lakin agreed and named George A. Zabriskie, president of the United States Sugar Association, Mr. Shattuck, and himself. Of this stalwart trio he wrote that they were "as near to President Hoover as you are to President Machado." Mr. Lakin described a plan in regard to sugar to be presented to the Senate and then went on to say:

> With members of the House of Representatives we are not suggesting any formal plan whatsoever. We are attempting to create an atmosphere of doubt in the minds of Congressmen in order that their recommendation shall be either a reduction in the duty or leaving the duty at its present rate or making any increase as small as possible. There are political reasons for this plan which I cannot appropriately put into a letter.

The letter said further:

> The plan is an attempt to put in particular form some general principles with which we know President Hoover is in sympathy. Our knowledge of the desire of President Hoover is accurate but naturally the sources of our knowledge should not be stated in writing. This particular matter of a plan for helping both the beets and Cuba is strictly one we must leave to Mr. Shattuck's discretion. . . .
>
> It is the custom of the beet interests to maintain a lobby in Washington. I think that eventually the Cuban interests should have a permanent office in Washington, but the fact that Cuba is a foreign country makes the old-fashioned lobbying dangerous for it to undertake.
>
> I do not approve of unguided entertainment of members of Congress. That form of lobbying is no longer fashionable in Washington.

That Mr. Lakin was in cordial cooperation with President Machado is evident from a long letter from the latter in which Mr. Lakin is praised for his efforts and the Cuban executive says in effect: "On with the dance."

Mr. Lakin's most specific reference to the way in which President Hoover helped the sugar lobby is contained in a letter written on April 16, 1929, to Mason B. Starring. Mr. Lakin said that he was informed that a majority of the Ways and Means Committee was opposed to an increase in the sugar tariff and he thought that three of them who were in favor of higher duties—Representatives Bacharach of New Jersey and Watson and Estep of Pennsylvania—"might be induced to change their votes."

> Several members of the committee have appealed to President Hoover and he has instructed his secretary, Mr. Newton, to establish a contact between the committee and ourselves [the letter continued]. I understand that some suggestion of this came from the individual members of the committee.

When Mr. Shattuck himself was called before the Senate sub-committee he denied the accuracy of some of Mr. Lakin's statements, but his answers to questions were not always direct and he failed to shake the general impression left by previous testimony except to emphasize the natural probability that Mr. Lakin had exaggerated certain aspects and had misunderstood others.

"Is there any testimony in the record about your relationship with Mr. Hoover that is untrue?" Senator Blaine asked.

"No, but I think a great many statements have been permitted from which improper inferences have been drawn," replied Mr. Shattuck. "I have never discussed the sugar tariff with Mr. Hoover," Mr. Shattuck continued. "I have discussed the sliding scale with Mr. Newton, Mr. Smoot, and others." And then Mr. Shattuck added: "Some people might think what Mr. Newton said was the same as what the President said." Indeed they might—not unreasonably.

The lobbying activities of General Crowder in behalf of Cuban sugar growers had not been revealed directly up to the Christmas recess of Congress, but the correspondence of Mr. Lakin throws enough light on them to put the former army officer in an unhappy position. Mr. Lakin was a business man, having at least the excuse of his company's interests to justify his lobbying. But that a retired army officer of high rank should have resorted to so shabby a method of turning an extra penny as did General Crowder can be a source of little pride to any American. In a letter to the secretary of President Machado of Cuba, dated March 15, 1929, Mr. Lakin spoke of General Crowder's doings as follows:

> General Crowder, at my request, has agreed to remain in Washington for two or three months. Of course, you know that his position in Washington is one of the highest.
>
> He is received everywhere. He has prepared a strong argument on the Philippines matter. He had a translation made, which the Ambassador has sent to President Machado. I hope you will see that memorandum and discuss it with President Machado, and as a special favor to me, I wish you would ask President Machado to write a personal letter to Crowder congratulating him on the memorandum and thanking him for agreeing to devote himself to the Cuban cause in Washington and explaining to Crowder the President's belief that Crowder will be of great advantage to Cuba in this matter.

To which Mr. Lakin added this delicious—if not malicious—morsel: "Of course, you know Crowder, and a little praise of this sort will do a lot of good and make him enthusiastic."

That General Crowder's lobbying was not lacking in finesse is evident from a note which he wrote to Mr. Lakin saying: "I discussed with Mr. Shattuck the opportune time to see Smoot and contribute what he could toward perfecting sliding tariff, but always with the idea of making Smoot father the proposition in the name of beet sugar, as a means of giving it added strength."

The principal ground upon which General Crowder has been criticized appears in a letter from Mr. Lakin to Mr. C. Rionda, in which mention is made of a suggestion of Mr. Rionda that the Secretaries of War and the Navy be approached in regard to the limitation of sugar importations from the Philippines. Mr. Lakin wrote: "General Crowder has written a fine memorandum on this subject. He has also learned that the plans of the general staff provide that in case of war any attempt to keep a traffic lane open between the Philippines and the United States would be promptly abandoned." When Mr. Lakin was examined by the Senate sub-committee in regard to this statement about General Crowder, Senator Caraway asked: "Was he getting the plans of the army and giving them to you in the tariff fight?" "Yes," was the reply. "That ought to be very interesting," Senator Caraway observed.

Political scandals are no treat to Washington and not much of a tidbit for any other section of the country. The chief novelty of the revelations in regard to the sugar lobby lies, of course, in President Hoover's relations to what has been going on. It is the first time since he took office as President that he has met criticism of this kind. There is some doubt as to how deeply and in what way he is involved, but granting all that has been said at its full value there will be many who will honestly defend the President as acting within the proprieties. An unbiased discussion of the issue would be worth while, but that the country will not get, as the question has been taken up as a partisan one. Representative Garner's call for a statement of facts from the President—a legitimate demand—was followed at once by a broadside from Representative Wood of Indiana, chairman of the Republican Congressional Committee. Even admitting all that had been charged, said Mr. Wood, for the President "to give audience to men who are also representatives of industry or commerce does not constitute a plot, nor is a conversation between the two a connivance."

But aside from Mr. Hoover's relation to it, the Cuban sugar lobby is instructive as an illustration of the way in which industry and politics work together in our system of government to accomplish the common end that business may go on as usual and that politicians may continue in office. Throughout the entire discussion, including the part that Mr. Hoover is said to have taken, there was no hint of the public welfare in the connection with the sugar schedule of the tariff. It was entirely a question of reconciling two business groups so that each could go on making as much money as possible. In justice to Mr. Lakin, though, it should be said that he seems more than a little crestfallen—in retrospect—at the path he has followed.

"Do you think it proper to hire people, because they have the confidence of the President, to influence legislation?" Senator Caraway asked Mr. Lakin in the course of the latter's testimony. "I don't think it should be done at all by anybody," was the reply. Then he added that in the circumstances there were special reasons to justify such action. There always are.

In the Driftway

A DESIRE for less noise seems to be creeping over the country at such an encouraging rate that the Drifter dares to hope that, if he lives out the century, racket may be generally recognized for what it is—a pest as deadly as bad sewage or impure drinking water. New York City has appointed a commission to study noises scientifically and find out which are most objectionable. Meanwhile, the city of Washington has been getting at the same end more expeditiously, and probably just as accurately, by means of a popular referendum conducted by one of the newspapers. The Washington Post has been printing ballots and inviting its readers to fill them out so as to indicate the most hated noises. According to a recent tabulation, the most hated noise was loudspeakers in homes, against which 171 votes were recorded. Next in order were automobile horns, 140 votes; barking dogs, 110 votes; motor trucks, 90 votes; ambulance sirens, 84 votes; and noisy brakes on automobiles, 80 votes. It is worth remarking that, of the six noises most objected to, four—loudspeakers in homes, automobile horns, barking dogs, and noisy brakes on automobiles—might be abolished entirely, or at least drastically restricted, without any real inconvenience or hardship to the community at large. Loudspeakers could certainly be much reduced in intensity without destroying their value. Although automobile horns have some point on country roads, it would be well to forbid the blowing of them in city streets. Such action would compel drivers to be more careful of one another and remind them that it is their legal duty to look out for the pedestrian instead of the other way about. Noisy parties were listed seventh in the Post's vote and jazz bands ninth. Curiously enough, pneumatic drills and riveting, which in New York would certainly stand high in the list of abhorred noises, rank eleventh and twelfth, respectively, in Washington. Six ballots were cast against cats as the worst noise, five against roosters, four against whistlers, and one each against pigeons, alarm clocks, snoring neighbors, and scissors-grinders. Four persons said the worst noise in Washington was Congress.

* * * * *

THE note in this column the other day in regard to a visitor, presumably an Englishman, who complained that he couldn't get a satisfactory cup of tea in New York City has brought a communication beginning "To the Drifter, Sir (or Madam)." The correspondent explains this salutation by saying that she and another "Lady-addict of The Nation" have speculated about the sex of the Drifter, because they have "detected traces of feminine tricks of observation and turns of phrase—or thought we did." "And please don't satisfy our curiosity!" the correspondent adds. "Think of the fun your readers would miss if they knew all! It sounds so superior to say: 'One could swear this was written by a woman,' when one doesn't have to furnish proof but just make conversation." After this introduction the correspondent goes at the subject of tea, remarking:

> And while I'm at it, I'd like to mention another atrocity committed on lemon from the point of view of my Russian origin. In the few places where lemon is served properly it is sometimes stripped of the skin. Now that is sacrilege—and ignorance. The average Russian likes the lemon for the aroma of the skin, released by the hot water, usually, rather than for its acid juice. Remove the skin, and the lemon just doesn't belong.
>
> And you know probably that Russians have a glass of tea, not your English cup, or Irish dish. A glass of tea—thin glass—with a delicate slice of lemon floating on top, not mauled, squeezed, and helpless at the bottom, looks quite attractive, and tastes grand. There is no danger of breaking the glass if the hot water is poured against the spoon rather than the glass itself. Needless to say the spoon is removable.
>
> Your Englishman might try not only Chinese restaurants, but also some of the Russian restaurants on lower Second Avenue, if he doesn't mind the glasses.

* * * * *

IN regard to the failure to serve enough—or any—hot water with tea in American restaurants, the Drifter's correspondent remarks that once in a so-called tea room on Broadway, after obtaining with great difficulty a pot of hot water, she was charged five cents extra for it! The letter concludes with the soothing comment: "And your column is swell, even if you have no occasion to quote this particular anonymous contrib." After reading that, any bounder who failed to use the letter would prove that he (or she) was not a lady—and certainly no gentleman.

THE DRIFTER

Palestine and the Jews

The Case Against Dr. Magnes

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I regret to say that your recent reference to the statement of the American Jewish Congress on the subject of Dr. Magnes's utterances and overtures to the Arabs in Palestine is very much out of accord with the feelings of the membership of Jewish organizations and Jews generally.

In connection with the recent lamentable events in Palestine a few simple considerations should be obvious.

1. The Arabs were the offenders and therefore should have been the first to make proposals of peace.
2. The official investigation to fix the blame for the outrages was going on and in accordance with all rules of such procedures, negotiations and the expression of radical opinions should have been withheld until the hearing was concluded.
3. There are responsible Jewish organizations associated with the aspirations of our people in Palestine. Dr. Magnes, if he was not in too great a hurry to create a sensation, could have waited or submitted all and every one of his plans to Dr. Weizmann of the Zionist organization, or to Lord Melchett and Mr. Warburg of the Jewish Agency.
4. Dr. Magnes is the Chancellor of the Hebrew University, which at least should preserve its neutrality in a time of crisis; and it is not fitting that any officer of that institution should at any time usurp the authority of ranking organizations.
5. A tremendous responsibility is incurred by any individual who suggests in one form or another that a basic official document, like the Balfour Declaration, which to the millions of scattered Israel marked a new era in Jewish life, should be reinterpreted or modified, or made a subject of hasty and ill-considered discussion.
6. A pronouncement, made with an air of novelty, about the equal rights of the three great religions in Palestine inevitably left the unfortunate inference that the Jews had not on many previous occasions recognized and solemnly declared themselves in favor of these rights.

These were the chief points, as logical as they are clear, of the statement which you condemn. The issues involved being far more important than any individual, the conclusion can only be that on this occasion, at least, Dr. Magnes did not act in the best interests of Zionism and the cause of peace in Palestine.

New York, December 16 HERMAN SPEIER

Was It Fair?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is a matter of freedom of opinion whether one will agree or disagree with Dr. Judah L. Magnes's utterance at the opening session of the Hebrew University, as commented on in your issue of December 4. Is it, however, in line with the fine tradition of The Nation for deep human understanding and sympathy to refer to those who could not agree with it as "little bitter-minded Jews"?

You have often expressed admiration for these heroic Jewish pioneers in Palestine. They are not petty adventurers. All they seek is a return to a free, simple life that may become the cultural and spiritual symbol for Jewish life elsewhere. Theirs is a labor of love—they work with dignity and with consideration for their neighbors. And when, through misguided propaganda, what they are building with such toil is wantonly destroyed, when their old and defenseless ones are massacred, is it to be expected that they will retain their equanimity, that they will turn their left cheek when they have been smitten on the right? On deeper consideration, do you really think it was fair to call these men "little bitter-minded Jews"?

Boston, December 21 HYMAN MORRISON

[Nothing could have been further from our thought than to characterize all critics of Dr. Magnes by the phrase to which Mr. Morrison and other correspondents properly object. We regret that any such expression crept into our columns.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Rushing into Print

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was painfully disappointed with your rash and ill-considered condemnation of the Jewish critics of Dr. Magnes's statement concerning Palestine as a group of "little bitter-minded Jews." I am afraid that what you say about the leaders of the American Jewish Congress rushing into print can be applied with equal force to your own editorial paragraph. Through your devotion to the ideal of pacifism, you have become blinded to the actual facts of the Palestine situation. The country is still very far from being in a state of security. The economic boycott and the attempted murder of Norman Bentwich furnish ample reason for the existence of a state of highly nervous excitement. Any capitulation at the present time to the Arab leaders would be nothing more than a cowardly admission that the Arab rioters were justified. I should hardly expect The Nation, least of all American magazines, to condone rioting and violence, yet that is exactly what you have done.

Pittsburgh, December 10 SAUL KAPLAN

"Worse Than Treacherous"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial regarding Judah Magnes, despite the evident sincerity of your tone, is false as to facts and misleading in its implication. The protestants against Judah Magnes, far from being "little bitter-minded Jews," as you bitingly refer to them, are rather the rank and file of the Zionists, i.e., those who have given of either their money or their blood or both toward the rehabilitation of Palestine.

No Zionist, however radical, ever wanted to antagonize the Arabs, and even the brutalities inflicted on aged rabbis, women, and defenseless rabbinical students have not shaken their belief in the fundamental goodness of the great mass of Arabs who were merely the dupes of a few Arab instigators and some petty English officials. Moreover, the most radical Zionist has never dreamed further than that Palestine, like Switzerland, should be a home for the three religions and for the two races, the Arabs and Jews, as well as other races.

We do not criticize Dr. Magnes for his exhortations to us not to lose our heads and not bear any bitter feeling toward the Arabs. Neither is the protest directed against his abandonment of political aspirations in the Holy Land, inasmuch as he is entitled to his own personal opinion. We do feel that it is most inopportune at this time, when the blood of the martyred victims is yet warm and solitary outrages are yet committed by Arab hoodlums, to exhort the friends and relatives of those very victims to cooperation with the Arabs, thereby insinuating that we had not cooperated before and that our failure to cooperate was responsible for the massacre.

As a private citizen, Dr. Magnes is entitled to his personal opinion, but he was wrong to speak authoritatively when he had no right of authority; he was indiscreet in not waiting for the Arabian atrocities to subside, and for the English committee to complete its investigation. Coming from the Chancellor of the Hebrew University, his meaningless and misleading words are worse than treacherous.

Brooklyn, December 6 MICHAEL CANICK

Whose Bayonets?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: What does Dr. Magnes demand that has not already been put into practice by the official representatives of the Jewish people? What acts have they omitted to perform that they should merit denunciation in the name of culture and humanity? What other people has within a decade established school systems, published an exceptionally large number of books, magazines, and newspapers, and founded a university for the inculcation of scientific knowledge, as well as a familiarity with more academic subjects such as the humanities? Never in the history of the world has there been a movement which proceeded along more peaceful lines and with a greater sense of consideration for the ultimate advancement of the ideals for which humanity has been striving. Was it not the Jews who opened hospitals to the long-neglected Arabs—a service which, in itself, stands on a par with the efforts of Dr. Grenfell in Labrador? Who took the unskilled and unorganized Arab laborers and welded them into unions and labor societies so that their standard of living has been raised? How do you account for the fact that the official records show that hundreds of Arabs protected their Jewish neighbors, at the risk of their own lives?

To say that the Jews are building a home on bayonets is to say that up to last August the Jews were brandishing knives at their Arab neighbors, which any child knows to be absurd and untruthful. As for last August, who but the Grand Mufti—a young fellow of thirty-six—told the Bedouins from the desert to be present in Jerusalem with weapons? Who started the damnable lie that the Jews had bombed the mosque? Who went into the rabbinical college and snuffed out the flower of Palestine's American-Jewish young manhood? Is it the Jews or the Arab instigators that have caused bayonets to play a part Palestine?

Boston, December 18 GEORGE J. BERGMAN

Jewish Enterprise in Palestine

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: What Ramsay MacDonald said at Geneva with regard to the Arab outbreak in Palestine—that it was an uprising of lawlessness and disorder, and that there is no racial conflict between Moslem and Jew—is absolutely the truth. Let me tell your readers what has happened to the Arabs since the Jews came to Palestine. Oranges which are now exported for about $7,000,000 yearly were hardly worth picking before the Jews arrived. This orange trade was brought about through Jewish energy and enterprise but the Arabs have profited by it. A Jewish electric company is supplying power and light to Jews and Arabs alike. The same company is working on a project

THE NEW SCHOOL
for Social Research
Second Term: Jan. 13—April 4

Among other courses:

Problems in Abnormal Psychology — Joseph Jastrow
Twelve lectures—Tuesdays, 8:20 P.M.

Behavior Problems in Children — David M. Levy
Twelve lectures—Wednesdays, 5:20 P.M.

Psychoanalysis and Culture — Fritz Wittels
Twelve lectures—Thursdays, 8:20 P.M. beginning January 23

Individual Psychology: Its Sociological Aspects — Alan Porter
Twelve lectures—Mondays, 8:20 P.M.

The Marriage Relationship — Beatrice Bishop
Twelve lectures—Tuesdays, 8:20 P.M.

Creative Attitude Toward Life — Ralph M. Pearson, Thomas Munro, Lewis Mumford, H. A. Overstreet and others
Twelve lectures—Wednesdays, 8:20 P.M.

Fee for twelve lectures, $15
465 West 23rd Street New York City

VISIT RUSSIA
Short, low rate Winter trips from $280 Up
Including round trip passage and a five day complete service and sightseeing in Leningrad and Moscow.

AMALGAMATED BANK
Travel Dept.
11-15 Union Square, N. Y. C. or
Amalgamated Trust & Savings Bank
111 West Jackson Blvd.
Chicago, Ill.

For information on Spring and Summer trips, write for booklet "N."

DISCUSSION
THE GROUP
A Clearing House Of Opinion
Meets at Auditorium—150 West 85th St.
Tuesday, January 7th, at 8:30 P. M.
CLEMENT WOOD
(Distinguished Author)
will speak on:
"RATIONAL LOVE LIFE"

Sunday afternoon at 4 P. M. (Jan. 12th)
Informal Discussion Group
SEYMOUR A. SELIGSON
will speak on:
"MARRIAGE AND MORALS"
(Bertrand Russell and Modernism)
Admission 50c Organized 1918

to harness the Jordan and Jarmuk rivers in order to provide cheap current for all Palestine. Before the Jews came to Palestine everything wearable had to be imported from Europe. Now there are more than ninety factories producing all sorts of wearing apparel, furniture, bedding, matches, soap, foodstuffs, and, last but not least, cement and bricks. These things not only are being sold in Palestine, but are exported to the neighboring countries. The commerce of Palestine has expanded through Jewish enterprise to such an extent that often one sees four steamers at a time in the port of Jaffa where formerly only one steamer called in two weeks. From all these undertakings, which require money and courage, the Arabs reap the same benefit as the Jews.

When the Jews settled in Petach Tikvah it was a sand dune; they dug down 150 feet, brought up water, and turned the dune into a paradise. And what progress have the neighboring Arabs made? None at all. Go to any of the Jewish settlements and see how everything is progressing while the neighboring Arabs live in the primitive way in which they have always lived. The Jews work the land with modern machinery, while the Arabs use the same tools they employed when King Solomon built his temple. It is safe to say that the Jews have done more for Palestine in less than ten years than the Arabs accomplished in more than 900 years.

There will always be room enough for those Jews that care to stay in Palestine to live in peace with the Arabs if only the agitators will mind their own business.

Tel-Aviv, Palestine, November 4 S. L. RICHMOND

Wisecrack

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation's pious attitude regarding Palestine has of late been buttressed with some profound and learned references to the Old Testament. May I suggest, however, that your apparent approval of Dr. Magnes's position would prove far more convincing if you exhorted moderate Arabs to cooperate with him. "If space permits" should this time not have been a deterrent as you could very well have dispensed with that sophomoric wisecrack about walls tumbling down.

New York, December 2 OSCAR I. JANOWSKY

Contributors to This Issue

DONALD R. RICHBERG is general counsel for the leading railway unions.

STUART CHASE concludes in this issue a series of seven articles on American prosperity. This series, with additions, is now available as a Boni Paper Book.

ARTHUR WARNER is associate editor of The Nation.

GRANVILLE PAUL SMITH is a Southern poet who has contributed verse to various magazines.

WILLIAM MACDONALD is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

PIERRE LOVING, long resident in France, is now living in New York.

EDA LOU WALTON is assistant professor of English at New York University.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is dramatic editor of The Nation.

FLORENCE CODMAN is a regular contributor of reviews to The Nation.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY, author of several books on the theater, writes on motion pictures for The Nation.

FERDINAND M. ISSERMAN is the rabbi of Temple Israel in St. Louis.

Why a Training School for JEWISH SOCIAL WORK?

BECAUSE experience has shown that the social worker can only be successful if he knows and reckons with the social, religious and cultural background of the people among whom he works.

BECAUSE the Jewish group in America represents a racial, religious and cultural entity possessing a highly distinctive character.

BECAUSE the social worker who identifies his work with the Jewish group in America should by special training and knowledge be able to contribute to the problems of its adjustment to American life with a view to its own greater happiness and to the greater enrichment of the culture of America.

College graduates are invited to examine carefully the advantages of Jewish social work as a profession.

Scholarships and Fellowships of $150 to $1,000 for each school year are available for especially qualified students.

For further information address
M. J. KARPF, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

A graduate school

71 W. 47th St., New York City

AN ERA OF NEW VALUES

The twentieth century is slowly groping towards new spiritual values revolutionary in their effect on mankind.

Among other ideals, a condition of world peace is coming to be accepted not as the vision of impractical theorists but as a basic principle in the government of all self-respecting free peoples.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

will interpret fully for you the momentous efforts that are being made at the present time to facilitate the removal of war as an arbiter of international disputes.

It will also interpret the entrancing experiment of democratic government in England, where Labor guides the destines of an empire.

At the beginning of the present Fall is a fitting time to start reading THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY with its progressive outlook on vital affairs of the day.

MAIL THIS COUPON

The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City

Gentlemen:—

Enclosed please find $3.00 for which send THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY to the below address.

Name ______

Address ______

Books, Films, Drama

The Sexton's Spade

By GRANVILLE PAUL SMITH

It always stood where he could lay his hand
Upon it without search or loss of time;
He spoke a language it could understand,
Down driven muscles in a ragged rhyme.

For twenty years it bit the living sod
And gnawed into the gravel and the clay;
A partnership for heaping clod on clod,
They put a thousand weary folk away.

One day he had a turn and went to bed,
To hear them whisper that the end was near;
And then a mad thought galloped through his head
So all his flesh closed on his blood in fear.

He stole at midnight to the lake and threw
Something that whirled from out his hands and made
A splash; and though their prophecy came true,
His grave was hollowed with a bright new spade.

Mobilizing the Jeremiahs

Contemporary Attitudes. Essays in Many Fields of Thought. Selected and Edited by Kendall B. Taft, John Francis McDermott, and Dana O. Jensen. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

THE editors of this volume have been moved by the laudable desire to "present definitely conflicting points of view on a number of important aspects of contemporary life and contemporary thought," excluding "dulness and prosiness" because those things "have been looked upon as the outward and visible signs of intellectual sterility." What they have done is to compile from the writings of upwards of forty authors, most of them Americans, something akin to an annotated catalogue of the seven-times-seven deadly sins of the modern age in general and of America in particular. Here and there, in the melancholy exhibit, appear a ray of light and an accent of hope, enough to bear out the promise of "conflict," but the leaven is not sufficient to leaven the lump and the net effect of the whole is one of gloom. I would not venture to affirm, even in the face of this recital, that there may not be still other sins with which our time should be charged, for the world is a large place and the possibilities of evil probably bear some rough relation to square miles and population; but if anything of great importance has been left out it would appear to have been through editorial inadvertence.

A few examples of what is offered will be enough to show what the book is like. Robert L. Duffus, who leads off with a survey of American prejudices, tells us that we need humility and tolerance; and André Siegfried assures us, as gravely as if it had never been said before, that "in its pursuit of wealth and power America has abandoned the ideal of liberty to follow that of prosperity." Agnes Repplier, when she wrote, saw conventions as "the life and soul of the country"; while Dr. Canby, who scans our sentimentality, concludes that we have been infected by "a disease of our own particular virtue," namely, "idealism, suppressed and perverted." Dr. Joseph Collins discovers in the history of the Ku Klux Klan "the enduring monument to our preposterous hypocrisy"; Katharine F. Gerould scores our passion for law-making and our nonchalant law-breaking; Walter Lippmann reminds us that America is a world power of a portentous kind and "no longer a virginal republic in a wicked world"; and Harold J. Laski emits the crushing dictum that "if we assume that democratic government is desirable, there is hardly a canon of institutional adequacy against which the American system does not offend."

The case is almost as bad when we pass to business and education. Professor Durant Drake, who elsewhere agrees with Kirby Page that a Department of Peace at Washington would help to abolish war, deplores the fact that business is conducted so much for private profit and would like to see in it more of a cooperative spirit; and Professor Ross exhumes from "the mutualism of our time" some new varieties of sin not all of which, he declares, are "superficially repulsive." Stephen Leacock, who tolerates coeducation as a kind of necessary evil not wholly unmixed with good, would rather like to see "every girl lucky enough to get a higher education" spend at least six months of her four years "in the training and discipline of a hospital as a nurse," because, of course, she is going to marry. "There is more education and character making in that," he writes, "than in a whole bucketful of algebra." John R. Tunis finds that "the sporting heroes of the nation are its gods," and Robert Littell sees a vision of "football law, football hygiene, the drama of football, football ballistics, football histology, the aesthetics of football."

When it comes to religion, science, and morals, the temper of America and that of the modern age are examined more or less together. The late Dr. Edwin E. Slosson discerns and laments a considerable list of dangers lurking in "the changing mind of man," while Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick is sure that "never in man's history has faith in God been more necessary to sane, wholesome, vigorous, and hopeful living than today amid the dissipating strain and paralyzing skepticism of modern life"—a conclusion which Professor Conklin, looking at religion from the standpoint of science, appears to regard as not wholly quixotic. There are sharp raps at the questionable state of contemporary morals, the cult of violence, the harmfulness of so-called good men, the spread of recklessness under the glamor of success, and the depressing effects of democracy in various manifestations. Professor Wertenbaker makes a brave attempt to show that a youthful America has done at least as well as was to be expected; Dean Gauss of Princeton declines to despair about the undergraduate; Bernard De Voto blesses the coeds, and Zona Gale and others have some mildly hopeful things to say about the outlook for literature, art, the drama, and music on this side of the Atlantic. On the whole, however, these 526 pages contain far more blame than praise.

What, it may in fairness be asked, is such an exhibit worth? Some useful historical purpose may doubtless be served by assembling facts and arranging them in order so that those who care for that kind of thing may see how unlovely the mess is; but if the contemporary attitudes here set out represent accurately the prevailing temper of our intellectuals, one can only conclude that the outlook for the intellectual life in this country is dark. The darkness will not be turned into light, however, by displaying classified descriptions of virtues and vices. The American intellectual has done yeoman service for his country by exposing its shortcomings and exploding its pretensions, and a certain amount of vigorous arraignment is likely always to be good for the soul; but too few of those who now assay destructive criticism have anything new or virile to say, and the messengers of hope are rarely concerned with anything save elaborating another device for keeping up appearances. What seemed to be, not so very long ago, a sturdy wave of intellectual radicalism is spending itself in ripples and scum on the shore of a dead liberalism. It would be worth while, I think, for the intellectuals to make the experiment of letting the evils that so much distress them churn on for a bit without giving so much attention to the turmoil, and to devote themselves to developing the good art, the sound writing, the decent politics, and the sensible morals they profess so earnest a desire to see.

William MacDonald

Meet the Wife

The School for Wives. By André Gide. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

IN this brief and remarkably condensed novel M. Gide shows himself to be not only profound but over-subtle, for so fastidiously has he handled the character drawing and the central theme that the real point is likely to be missed. In "The Counterfeiters" the author used the diary framework to give his people neighborly reality and to enable him to comment freely upon them and their affairs, although the comment is limited strictly by the terms of Edouard, the novelist, whose notebook we are supposed to be reading.

This book depicts the gradual disillusionment of a young wife, Eveline, who keeps a diary, in regard to her husband, Robert. Eveline discovers that Robert is a liar, a cozener, and a prig; but Eveline herself is also, in another sense, an out-and-out prig with quite impossible "chimerical ideals." What, then, in reality, is she and what is he? Neither knows, and Eveline does not even realize, until twenty years have passed, that her husband really loves her. When she realizes it, she has ceased altogether to love him. The subject of the book is concisely phrased by Robert in a last talk with his wife before she enlists as a nurse in a fatal sector at the war front. "You say I am not the man you thought. But then you are not the woman I thought, either. How is it possible ever to know whether one is the person one thinks one is? . . . The question is, you see, whether emotion exhausts itself in the expression of emotion, or whether, on the contrary, it is called into being by expression. . . . And indeed one begins to doubt whether anything exists in reality apart from appearance." This is the bitter moral or philosophical pill that M. Gide asks wives, schooled or unschooled, to swallow.

Pierre Loving

A Poet on Hell and Women

Hell in Harness. By Joseph Auslander. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $1.75.

Letters to Women. By Joseph Auslander. Harper and Brothers. $2.

JOSEPH AUSLANDER is far too facile a poet. He has grace, excellence of music, and language, a quick poetic insight into character or scene; yet despite all this he is of less importance as a poet than a number of more awkward and more groping writers. He has somewhat the same annoying fluency as the English poet Humbert Wolfe. Like Wolfe he is in the literary tradition without being strikingly individual. He inherits something from the younger Keats and something from the weaker Browning. His words flow effortlessly, melodiously, without anything of that impact which words must have if they are to be, in Frost's definition, "deeds." The reader follows with a mild delight, usually quite unstirred by either pleasure or dislike.

We have two books in a year from Auslander's pen, and two very different books. "Hell in Harness" is a tale in verse concerning a New York East Side youngster who ends in the electric chair, convicted of a murder he did not commit. The verse moves rapidly. The story is fairly dramatic. One reads it as one would a cheap novel. It is not a poem unless we are to consider any verse-narrative a poem. The characters, like movie characters, play their rather unconvincing parts convincingly. The poem has not the energy of rhythm or action that makes The Set-up an interesting poem on a prize-fight. It has not the intense feeling of Auslander's shorter narrative Steel. It is an example of how much too easily Auslander writes anything he may choose to write.

"Letters to Women" (to Elinor Wylie, Amy Lowell, Eleonora Duse, Emily Dickinson, Virginia Clemm, Fanny Brawne, Sappho, Lot's Wife) is a more serious poetic endeavor. Mr. Auslander knows these women; he has read their lives; he interprets them imaginatively. If he does not tell us anything very new concerning them, we are not amazed; that is not his purpose. These women have moved him as a poet, and he addresses them as one poet would another. Whatever their artistic function, they have been women of vision or women close to an artist's heart. Mr. Auslander is interested in them as personalities and he presents them to his reader as personalities. In addressing Elinor Wylie, for example, he makes use of the images and emotions most frequently to be found in her own poetry. The same statement holds for his study of Amy Lowell, one of the best in the book. The study of Emily Dickinson, which won the Palm's prize of $1,000, is less interesting than some of the others; Emily Dickinson's personality is too subtle to be easily presented. The poorest poems are those in which Mr. Auslander allows himself the freest emotional outpourings: Virginia Clemm, Duse, Lot's Wife suffer from too close an identification with his personal feelings.

The "Letters" make a pleasing collection as letters. As poems they suffer from Mr. Auslander's fluency in rhythm, rhyme, and phrase. Good poetry has to be pulled from deeper roots and more rocky soil. The only ease allowable to a poet is that ease which comes after the full circle of struggle for exact and emotional statement has been made. One never feels this struggle back of Mr. Auslander.

Eda Lou Walton

The Economics of the Contemporary Theater

Box-Office. By John Anderson. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

The Revolt of the Actors. By Alfred Harding. William Morrow and Company. $3.50.

MR. ANDERSON'S little treatise on the commercial aspects of the American theater is valuable and refreshing for the simple reason that it is written from the standpoint of one in close contact with realities. He has undertaken to trace in outline the effects of the theatrical business upon theatrical art, and he recognizes the fact that under no possible conditions could the two be entirely divorced. The production of a plan is a costly undertaking which someone must pay for, and the box-office is the place where the payment is made. Evil results only when the costs are so great that the manager can take no risks, can produce nothing which does not appeal to a very large audience, and is compelled to charge an exorbitant price for admission. Hence the trouble with the New York theater is not that it is "commercial" but simply that the running of it has become so expensive as to make mass appeal inevitable. If it cost twenty-five thousand dollars to publish a book American literature would be in at least as bad a way as the American theater now is.

It is probable that the monopoly established by Erlanger and later fought by the Shuberts was largely responsible for the destruction of the provincial theater, but Mr. Anderson makes it clear that no one person or group of persons can be held accountable for the rapidly mounting cost of production which has now reached a point where the suitable presentation of any play inevitably involves a financial operation of very considerable magnitude. On the one hand increasing real-estate values have made the rent of a theater so high that it cannot possibly be paid out of the profits of any performance which does not immediately attract large audiences. On the other hand the organization of actors and stage hands into groups powerful enough to enforce demands of one kind or another has added greatly to the cost of the production itself. Every kind of labor, talent, and material is two or three times as expensive as it once was, and the advance in the price of admission is not proportionate. Under the circumstances any play, to succeed, must draw larger audiences than ever before and that means that the producer can afford to take fewer chances. Everything except the theatrical "best seller" tends to be forced out.

Mr. Anderson has no panacea to offer. To those enthusiasts who proclaim that the provincial Little Theater constitutes our one hope he replies with convincing skepticism that most of the Little Theaters now produce chiefly Broadway successes and that such a local folk drama as Paul Green's "In Abraham's Bosom" was not in demand until it had created something of a furor in New York. Theatrical centralization has probably come to stay and the best theaters have usually been in some sense "commercial." What we need is not so much the non-commercial manager as some opportunity for the manager who could play for smaller stakes and engage in enterprises which could be profitable without necessarily appealing to the largest possible audience.

Mr. Anderson touches only in passing upon the struggle which resulted in the establishment of the Actors Equity Association. Mr. Harding's volume recounts in great detail the story of the "revolt" and reprints the chief documentary evidence. His book will probably take its place as the standard account of events extremely important both in the history of the American theater and in that of the labor unions.

Joseph Wood Krutch

Prose in the Grand Manner

The Sacred Hill. By Maurice Barrès. Translated from the French by Malcolm Cowley. The Macaulay Company. $2.50.

Any publication in English of Maurice Barrès's classic novel about a hill in Lorraine would be a noteworthy event; in Malcolm Cowley's translation there is the rare opportunity of approaching, as closely as is possible through an interpreter, the style and thought of one of the most important French writers of the past half-century. Mr. Cowley not only translates idiomatically and accurately but he achieves the most difficult goal of all—the reproduction of the rhythm of the original, the quiet power of Barrès's clear but ladened prose.

The only adverse criticism of Mr. Cowley has nothing to do with his translation. It concerns the statement in his introduction in which he says, speaking of Barrès's style: "It is not a 'French' style in the usual meaning of the term; that is, it has nothing in common with the limpid, bright, and rather shallow manner of Anatole France and his imitators." Even the quotation marks do not excuse the assertion nor lessen the suggestion that Barrès was a literary exception. To say such a thing is to include only the brilliant sparkle which runs from Rabelais through Voltaire and Renan to Anatole France, and to exclude everything else in French prose, particularly the tradition branching from Chateaubriand and de Guérin. To confirm such a statement to Frenchmen would prove embarrassing, especially to the group which acknowledges Barrès as its master; to preface Barrès's masterpiece with it only cheapens Mr. Cowley's otherwise authentic and informative foreword.

The story of "The Sacred Hill" is a true one. About one hundred years ago on the heights of Zion-Vaudémont in Lorraine the three Baillard brothers raised their great religious citadel. In the shadow of the hill they had been born and on it and round about it they experienced ordination, triumph, suspicion, excommunication, ridicule, and death. To Maurice Barrès the tragedy of their fanaticism was an inseparable part of the history, influence, and significance of the hill itself; without the hill the special quality of their heresy would have been unimportant. The hill was old—old enough to have supported pagan temples, to have seen Celtic chaos fall before Roman order, to have sustained at the same time both a church and a castle when spiritual and temporal power ruled together and by one another's will. That the hill should have fostered in the Baillards one more creed, one more revelation was only another manifestation of its spiritual power as natural to its destiny as that it should hold on its summit, at Leopold's death, another convent of the church which stamped upon and smothered the very exaltation the hill had inspired.

The highest expression of such an idea was certain to be lyrical, and although Barrès wrote in prose he attained through his style a rhythmic measure in perfect accord with his thought. His sentences are long, complex, and beautifully balanced. His contrasts between characters, between the foolish prophet Vintras and the zealot Leopold; between the sentiment of Thérèse and that of Father Aubry; between objects in the landscape; between the hill and the meadow; between themes, civilization, and revolt are as varied and as unified as the language. The strident details of realism are absent; behind Thérèse's flight and Vintras's insinuations they exist but are not emphasized. They were beside Barrès's purpose. He was intentionally detached, and this objective attitude serves to magnify his conceptions, to lend them strength, and at the same time to intensify his material, to lend it verisimilitude. "The Sacred Hill" gains thereby a grandeur that revives the finest of the romantic tradition.

Florence Codman

Fiction Briefs

The Hawbucks. By John Masefield. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Fox hunting squires, their gallant sons and fair daughters, together with their faithful old retainers, are the people with whom Mr. Masefield's new novel is concerned. George Childrey, on the death of his elder brother, arrives in England after seven years of knocking about in the colonies to take over the Bartons. Carrie Harridew, a playmate of his childhood, is now the belle of the countryside and George promptly falls in love with her. Unfortunately, some dozen or so other young men have anticipated him. These form a group of stock characters that seem to come straight from the pages of the more naive old melodramas. There are the scoundrel Vaughan, the slick lawyer, the silly poet, the burning young minister, and other recognizable types. The story progresses by a process of eliminating suitors one after another. Sandwiched in between the love scenes are delightful bits of description, and those who know their Masefield as poet will not be surprised to learn that there is a splendid chapter on a fox hunt, but these are not sufficient to save the book from its artificial characters and hackneyed plot.

Malaeska: The Indian Wife of the White Hunter. By Mrs. Ann S. Stephens. Edited by Frank P. O'Brien. The John Day Company. $2.50.

This was the first of Beadle's famous dime novels, and as such deserves reprinting from the edition of 1860. The story of an Indian woman who suffered from the failure of her white offspring to acknowledge her is still readable as well as curious. Mr. O'Brien's brief but informative introduction describes the series which the book began and supplies some bibliographical data concerning Mrs. Stephens, who wrote the novel from which "The Old Homestead" was taken.

Up at the Villa. By Marie Cher. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

"Up at the Villa" unfolds as the putative diary of a solitary woman living above the modern city of Rome. "To fill her lengthening leisure" she surrounds herself with a group of disillusioned young people: Adela, her conventional niece, Tatia, the little Russian sculptress, and three men—an Italian painter, Silvio, who is irresistible to women; Henry Fleming, a consumptive poet whose ardor and jealousy for Tatia hasten his death; George Rose, an English painter who loves Adela; and Theobald Woodman, stepfather of Henry. With ironic detachment the nameless diarist records the progress of the loves and jealousies of the protagonists. But the story is slight; it is the atmosphere of Rome which the author so successfully evokes, the subtle delineation of character, and the exquisite prose in which she has enveloped her story that will linger in the reader's memory.

The Uncertain Trumpet. By A. S. M. Hutchinson. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

Arrived at Ashton Parva the young vicar, David Quest, found that he had to combat not only the sins of the flesh as exemplified by the hunt-loving Flogg-Wallopers and sundry others, but also the more venal sins of the spirit displayed by the austere Pelham Heritage and by a malicious old maid whose accumulated venom came near wrecking David's work. Matters were further complicated by the sudden death of the vicar's patron. Through the long years of struggle to ultimate success Quest was buoyed up by the friendship of Banjo Heritage, Pelham's half-brother. Those who dislike overdoses of sentimentality, prolixity, and characters who respond like puppets rather than human beings will not be enthusiastic over this book, but others will discover in the vicar a character worthy of a place beside the immortal Mark Sabre.

The House of Gold. By Liam O'Flaherty. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Passion, Disintegration, Nemesis, the division headings of this novel, supply the best key to it. It is the record of the destruction, moral, mental, and physical, wrought by one woman's beauty on husband, lover, friend, and priest. The course of the calamity is so swift that neither time nor space is spared for anything but a record of its track. Once or twice there is a fleeting glimpse of a lovely bit of Irish sea coast; the rest is lust and squalor. Adjectives such as powerful, brutal, startling fit the book no better than desperate, melodramatic, and insignificant.

Mississippi. By Ben Lucien Burman. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $2.

When States Lilly discovers that he is not the son of Captain Lilly on whose steamboat he has spent most of his life, but was born a Shantytowner, lowest of the low whites who fester along the muddy banks of the Mississippi, he feels that there is nothing for him to do but to go back to his kinsfolk; and go back he does, fighting down his homesickness until time and tide (this time a flood tide) bring about a reunion. "Mississippi" is a somewhat pretentious title for this extended short story. And the story itself occasionally lapses into exaggeration, sentimentality, and banality. But Mr. Burman evidently knows the Shantytown folk, those nomadic, unlettered outcasts who live in houseboats along the banks of the river, and he writes of them wisely and entertainingly. One would like to hear more about this little-known people, and in their own right, not as local color for a magazine story plot.

Seven Women. By William M. John. J. H. Sears and Company. $2.50.

The flat, open country of the Middle West, if authors are to be trusted, abounds in women with warped souls. These creatures have been analyzed and satirized by a whole school of writers; in "Seven Women" seven of them, as alike as peas in a pod, are portrayed as the witless exponents of their own prudery—embittered, vindictive women who exalt their malice as the shield of their fear of reality. This is Mr. John's first novel. The variety he gives to a single theme, the scope he causes that variety to embrace, the balance he strikes between his story and his design, remake an old idea into a novel of fresh interest, originality, and promise.

Dido: Queen of Hearts. By Gertrude Atherton. Horace Liveright. $2.50.

This is the third novel of Gertrude Atherton's which concerns itself with the ancient world. This time she tells the story of Elissa, deposed queen of Tyre who, with her faithful followers and bearing the vast treasure of her murdered husband, steals away with the Tyrean fleet and founds the new city of Carthage, there to reign as the Queen Dido whom Virgil is to celebrate in immortal verse. Mrs. Atherton sticks close to the traditional facts and tells the story of the ill-fated queen without the sentimental-romantic embroidery which is so familiar in popular historical novels, and which is so unsuited to the ancient spirit. But the book has no high spots; it is merely the competent work of an author who has done much better things. It should, however, prove entertaining and instructive to high-school students struggling through their Virgil, especially since Mrs. Atherton shares with most of them the opinion that the pious Aeneas was something of a prig, and was unconscionably long-winded in his narrations.

The Book Shelf

The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Current English, by H. W. Fowler and F. M. Fowler, based on the great Oxford Dictionary and first published in 1911, has been brought out in a new edition revised and much enlarged (Oxford University Press, American Branch; $4.50).

English Proverbs and Proverbial Phrases, by G. L. Apperson (E. P. Dutton and Company; $8), offers the novel feature of "dated quotations, in chronological order, drawn from the whole range of English literature," accompanying the various sayings.

Recent publications of the University of California Press in history and international relations include The Anglo-Japanese Alliance, by Alfred L. P. Dennis ($1.50); The International Government of the Saar, by Frank M. Russell ($1.75); Some Aspects of the Recent Foreign Policy of Sweden, by Eric C. Bellquist ($1.75), and The Encomienda in New Spain: Forced Native Labor in the Spanish Colonies, 1492-1550, by Lesley B. Simpson ($3.50).

Mississippi Provincial Archives, 1701-1729 (Jackson: State Department of Archives and History), is the second volume of a series devoted to the colonization, development, and government of the French province of Louisiana. The papers have been translated and edited by Dunbar Rowland and Albert G. Sanders.

The fourteen-hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Benedictine monastery at Monte Cassino has been commemorated by the reproduction in facsimile of Regula S. Benedicti (The Rule of St. Benedict) from the earliest manuscript copy, now at the Bodleian Library (Oxford University Press; $2.50). The work is edited by E. A. Lowe.

The Laws and Liberties of Massachusetts, familiarly known as the Massachusetts Body of Liberties, has been reprinted in facsimile from a copy of the 1648 edition in the Henry E. Huntington Library at San Marino, California, with an introduction by Max Farrand (Harvard University Press; $5).

Goethe's Faust: Part I, translated by William Page Andrews, edited and revised by George M. Priest and Karl E. Weston (Princeton University Press; $4), is the first installment of a metrical version by the author of "Goethe's Key to Faust" and other studies.

The latest addition to the Library of Living Classics, edited by Manuel Komroff, is The Persian Letters of Montesquieu, reproduced "with a few minor corrections" from the translation of John Davidson (The Dial Press; $4).

An English translation by Samuel Putnam of Joseph Delteil's On the River Amur, with illustrations by Alexeieff, has been brought out by Covici-Friede ($12.50).

South and East, by John Masefield, already published in a recent collection of his verse, has been separately issued in a large-type quarto form with six color plates by Jacynth Parsons (The Macmillan Company; $2).

A third edition, in one volume, of Wilbur L. Cross's Life and Times of Laurence Sterne (Yale University Press; $5) contains some emendations of the previous text and additions to the bibliography.

The Origin of Species, by Charles Darwin, has been added to the Thinker's Library (London: Watts and Company; 1s.). The text is that of the sixth and last edition.

Drama

A Peevish Play

IT is, I take it, no part of a dramatic critic's business to inquire too closely into whatever private reasons a playwright may have for changing his opinions. If, for example, Mr. Sydney Howard once thought very well of both women and Freud, he has a perfect right now to denounce the two of them in good round terms without thereby giving me any license to speculate publicly upon the causes of the change. But the artist should earn his immunity by assuming a reciprocal obligation. It is his business to cover up with the impersonality of art the private feelings which inspire him, and accordingly when Mr. Howard, excellent playwright that he is, exhibits before the world a drama like "Half Gods" (Plymouth Theater) it becomes my duty to say that the play gives every indication of having been written in some kind of a private pet; and it becomes, furthermore, my privilege to remark that such plays are much better torn up as soon as they have performed their only possible function, which is, of course, to relieve the minds of those who write them. Passion is the sine qua non of drama and even anger may occasionally serve the playwright very well, but a masterpiece cannot be founded on mere irritation even though, as seems here to be the case, that irritation nourishes a delusion of grandeur and believes itself to be moral indignation.

Throughout nine scenes Mr. Howard reiterates, with the tiresome insistence of a minor monomaniac, his conviction that the modern wife is a terrible creature. The particular one whom he has chosen to exhibit keeps her hard-working husband up late at night, neglects her children, and frequents a psychoanalyst. Moreover, lest her actions should not speak clearly enough for themselves and lest it might possibly be suspected that she is somewhat worse than the average, he employs three separate and distinct raisonneurs who see to it that the audience is continuously provided with a running homily inspired by the action. The first, a disillusioned divorcée, explains why she and all women like her make a mistake when they leave adulterous husbands; the second, a child specialist, delivers a lecture on the whole duty of woman—which is, of course, to breed; and the third, a kindly old judge with a copy of Emerson at his elbow, quotes something undoubtedly profound but of dubious application.

As a result of it all the male members of the audience are supposed to go home, spank their wives, and live ever after, not exactly happily but in that embattled state which, according to Mr. Howard, is characteristic of all truly sacred marriages. Yet so grotesquely does he overstate his case, so obviously is he speaking like a dyspeptic who has been kept waiting for his morning coffee, that even the husbands are embarrassed by the tactlessness of their champion. Irritation seems, moreover, to have robbed Mr. Howard of his skill as well as of his sense of proportion, for he not only states his platitudes with intemperate vehemence but states them clumsily as well. Certain brief, clear-cut incidents and occasional flashes of pointed dialogue are the only things which testify, even momentarily, to the talent he has allowed to be obscured. The piece as a whole, vacillating between shrill almost hysterical earnestness and slapstick farce, flounders like the work of an amateur.

Now I, for one, am perfectly willing to forgive Mr. Howard his unfortunate divagation if it will serve to purge his soul. Such accumulated irritation must be got rid of somehow and most of us, in similar circumstances, either send a letter to the Times or break up a few pieces of furniture. The pity is only that a playwright of Mr. Howard's talents feels compelled to write a play when either of the two more ordinary methods would probably have done just as well.

"Michael and Mary," A. A. Milne's sensational comedy-drama, seems to have settled down for a good long run at the Charles Hopkins Theater. Even its warmest admirers will hardly deny, however, that all of its drama is confined to one short scene in the second act, and the only question which remains is the question of whether or not the padding which surrounds this one scene is whimsically delightful or merely infantile. Many seem to incline toward the former opinion, but I must confess that I personally cannot understand their sense of humor. Amorous baby-talk is doubtless sweet in the ears of the one for whom it is intended, but public kittenishness leaves me cold, and it embarrasses me much to imagine Mr. Milne in his own study being so deliberately and persistently arch. As Macaulay remarked of one of Southey's feeble witticisms, "a sensible man might make such a joke in the privacy of his family circle. A sensible man might even write it down. But that any one should copy it off, send it to the printer, and correct two sets of proof makes one despair of human nature." Joseph Wood Krutch

THEATRES

WILLIAM HARRIS JR. PRESENTS
"THE FIRST PLAY OF THE SEASON WITH TEETH IN IT."
ROBERT LITTELL, WORLD.

CRIMINAL CODE

By MARTIN FLAVIN with ARTHUR BYRON
NATIONAL THEATRE 41st St., West of 7th Ave. Evenings 8:50
Matinees New Years week: Thurs & Sat.

The Theatre Guild Presents

METEOR

By S. N. BEHRMAN
Guild THEA., 52nd St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

The Theatre Guild Presents

RED RUST

By KIRCHON & OUSPENSKY
Martin Beck THEA., 45th St. W. of 8th Ave.
Evgs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs & Sat. 2:40

A Theatre Guild Production

Game of Love and Death

By ROMAIN ROLLAND
Biltmore THEA., 47th St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

The Actor-Managers Inc. has the honor to present

RUTH DRAPER in her ORIGINAL CHARACTER SKETCHES (Including 5 new ones)

Every evening including Sunday except Monday and Thursday nights
COMEDY Theatre 41st. East of Broadway. Mats. New Years & Sat. VERY GOOD SEATS at $1.00

ALBERT CARROLL in MIMICRY
FRED KEATING in MAGIC
49th St. Theatre W. of B'way., Every Eve. Inc. Sunday 8:50
Popular price matinee Saturdays.

BEGINNING SUNDAY EVG., JAN. 5
Through Sunday Evg., Jan. 12
The Actor-Managers, Inc., introduce

DANCE REPERTORY THEATRE

Martha Graham, Doris Humphrey, Charles Weidman, Tamiris
Week of Joint and Individual Dance Programs
Every Evg. Incl. Sun., Jan. 12. Mat. Sat. only.
MAXINE ELLIOTT'S Thea., W. 39th St.

FILMS

Now Playing

EXTRAORDINARY DOUBLE-FEATURE PROGRAM!!!

The titanic awe-inspiring drama of demonology
" . . . greater than 'The Dybbuk' . . ."

"The Golem" enacted by a notable cast a medieval romance of the Ghettoes of Europe intensely unique

—and on the same program—

POLA NEGRI
in
"A Woman of the World"

a sophisticated tragicomedy based on CARL Van VECHTEN'S "The Tattooed Countess" a stirring combination of emotional thrill, spirited drama and rollicking humor.

FILM GUILD CINEMA

New York's Unique Theatre—Direction: Symon Gould
52 West 8th Street, bet. 5th and 6th Avenues
Popular Prices Spring 5095-5090
Continuous Daily Noon to Midnight

MATINEES: GOOD SEATS, ALL PRICES, AT BOX OFFICE

WARNER BROS. Present

GEORGE ARLISS
in
"DISRAELI"

(A Vitaphone All-Talking Picture)

CENTRAL THEATRE Daily 2:45—8:45
Broadway and 47th St. Sunday 3—6—8:45

55TH STREET PLAYHOUSE
Just east of 7th Ave.—Popular prices
Continuous from 1 until Midnight
Commencing January 4th
THE GREATEST HINDU SPECTACLE

"THROW OF THE DICE"

successor to "SHIRAZ" and "THE LIGHT OF ASIA," produced by the same director with the same cast of Hindu stars.

Other announcements appear on pages 54 and 55

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Films

The News Reel

THE motion picture was a screen newspaper before it was a screen play: it recorded events before it began to invent them. But there is clearly a marked element of entertainment that distinguishes the motion-picture record from its analogue in the ordinary newspapers. It is a peculiar kind of entertainment, and its presence or absence, as the case may be, does not become apparent until one sees a fairly large number of screen news items presented at one time. Such an experience has now been made possible by the News Reel Theater which has recently opened in New York. The venture is no doubt timely and welcome. There has been a need for it for some time. But a visit or two to this theater is sufficient to make one realize that screen journalism has hardly advanced beyond the rudiments of its art. The material of the new theater is the familiar news reel of all the cinema houses, except that it is reinforced by the addition of sound. Since it has been elevated, however, to the position of an independent show, it immediately forces the question whether the news reel in its present form offers both sufficient entertainment and sufficient information.

I feel fairly certain that it does not. The criticism that might be leveled against it and that comes easiest to one's mind is, of course, its obviously tabloid character. There is no doubt that in its subject matter the American news reel fashions itself after the model of the tabloid press. Like this latter it is anxious to let us see and hear Mrs. Peaches Browning discourse learnedly on the feminine fashions, or introduce us to the plans and hopes of the boy who has inherited a million-dollar fortune. It panders to our morbid curiosity, and such "celebrities" are its stock in trade. But being tabloid means something more than mere sensationalism. It stands for compressed and vivid presentation. And it is the principal characteristic of the motion picture and one of its chief virtues that it deals not with abstract ideas but with vivid, concrete images, even where as in the talking picture they are accompanied by words. For this reason the chief fault to be found with the news reel is not so much that it is a tabloid, but rather that it is not enough of a tabloid. Instead of giving us a mere reproduction of an event or a person, it should present a selective picture that would bring out the most characteristic features of its subject; and to do this it must use a more imaginative and more flexible technique.

The connection between this problem of form and the entertainment value of the news reel will be readily appreciated. It is one thing to see and hear Mrs. Browning as she is, and quite another thing to have her presented to us as she would be seen by an observant journalist who is also an artist at his job. A composite portrait of a person could be made vastly entertaining where a faithful reproduction would be merely dull. Seeing that so many of the "events" reported in the screen news are specially staged for the benefit of the camera and the microphone—a practice which places the modern news reel somewhere between the pure record and the invented play—there should be really no difficulty in enlivening the cinema reporting by allowing it more freedom in the way of deliberate arrangement and of the personal touch of an imaginative journalist.

"Devil May Care" (Astor's), starring Ramon Novarro, is one of those musical costume plays which leave the impression of complete futility. With its few tunes indifferently sung, mediocre acting, and pointless plot, it has very little to justify it.

"The Lost Patrol" (Cameo) is a meritorious British effort marked by able acting and intelligent direction, and telling a dramatic story that is impressive if a trifle too well ordered.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

□ FILMS □ LECTURES □

RKO CAMEO 42nd Street and Broadway

WEEK beginning SATURDAY JAN. 4

Another Cinemasterpiece from the Soviet Studios

"THE MAN FROM THE RESTAURANT"

STARRING

VERA MALINOVSKAYA and TCHEKOV

FAMOUS RUSSIAN PLAYERS

in addition to

CLARK AND McCULLOUGH

Talking Comedy

MEXICO!

Shall Europe understand our nearest neighbor better than we do?

The eyes of the world are on Mexico today. The Open Forum Speakers Bureau, Little Building, Boston, is offering lectures by Jose Kelly, Commissioner of Commerce, Industry and Labor of the Republic of Mexico. Mr. Kelly is considered an expert on the social and economic development of Mexico. For available dates and terms, address the Bureau.

First Appearance in America

COUNT MICHAEL

KAROLYI

FASCISMO: Its danger to world peace

TUESDAY EVE., JAN. 7, 1930 AT 8.30

CARNEGIE HALL 57th St. & 7th Avenue

Tickets $1.00 to $2.50 now at Box Office

MGT. WILLIAM B. FEAKINS, Inc.

□ LECTURES □ DINNER □ DEBATE □

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE

7 E. 15 St. Alg. 3094

NEW LECTURE COURSES

Winter term begins January 6

PHILOSOPHY OF EVERYDAY LIFE
R. N. Boardman Mon., 8.30 p. m.

RECENT ECONOMIC CHANGES
Marius Hansome Tues., 8.30 p. m.

CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN LITERATURE
Aben Kandel Tues., 7.00 p. m.

SOCIALIST POLITICS AND POLICIES
Morris Hillquit Harry W. Laidler
Norman Thomas Algernon Lee
Tues., 8.30 p. m.

BASIS OF HUMAN BEHAVIOR
Joseph M. Osman Tues., 8.30 p. m.

BRITISH LABOR'S RISE TO POWER
Mark Starr Wed., 8.30 p. m.

PROGRESS IN THE ARTS
Herman Epstein Anita C. Block
Lewis Mumford Douglas Haskell
Gilbert Seldes Wed., 8.30 p. m.

HISTORY OF INDIAN CIVILIZATION
J. Vijaya-Tunga Wed., 7.00 p. m.

SCIENCE AND CIVILIZATION
Dominic d'Eustachio Thurs., 8.30 p. m.

Registration now open.

Nominal fees—Single admission 50c.

Six Illustrated Lectures

GEOLOGY of SOCIAL SCIENCE

by A. J. TAYLOR (Auspices Socialist Labor Party)

IRVING PLAZA, 15th St. & Irving Place
NEW YORK, N. Y.

WEDNESDAYS, JAN. 15, 22, 29
FEB. 5, 12, 19, at 8 P. M.

1st Lecture—The Dawn Man
2nd Lecture—The Cave Man
3rd Lecture—The Tool Man
4th Lecture—The Land Man-1
5th Lecture—The Land Man-2
6th Lecture—The Machine Man

Admission $1.50 the entire series. Tickets from—

ROSE EPSTEIN, Treasurer

73 Elwood Street NO RESERVE SEATS New York, N. Y.

The Friends and Students of

WILL DURANT are tendering to him and Mrs. Durant a

FAREWELL DINNER

at the Aldine Club, 200 Fifth Avenue, New York,

6.30 p. m., Friday, January 10th, 1930, on the eve of their departure for a round-the-world tour.

Tickets at $3.00 may be obtained through

WM. J. PERLMAN, 39 Broadway, New York City; 'phone Digby 6110; or
DR. HANNAH STONE, 41 Fifth Avenue, New York, or SIMON AND SCHUSTER, 37 West 57th Street, New York.

SPEAKERS:
JOHN DEWEY, HEYWOOD BROUN, NATHAN KRASS, HENRY GODDARD LEACH, Chairman.

A Momentous 3-Cornered DEBATE!!!

COMMUNISM, or SOCIALISM, or CAPITALISM?

Scott
NEARING for Communism
Noted Sociologist and Lecturer

Fenner
BROCKWAY for Socialism
Brilliant Labor Member of British Parliament

Prof. Edwin R. A.
SELIGMAN for Capitalism
Foremost Economist, Columbia University

Chairman, SAMUEL UNTERMYER

—SUBJECT—

Resolved: That Capitalism offers more to the workers of the world than Socialism or Communism.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1930—8:30 P. M.
MECCA TEMPLE—133 W. 55TH STREET

Reserved Seats $1.00, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00 & $2.75
Reservations advisable now for best seat locations

Obtainable by mail or in person at Civic Club, 18 E. 10th Street; Columbia University Bookstore; Rand School Bookstore, 7 E. 15th Street, and New School Bookshop, 465 W. 23rd St.

Also by mail or in person at offices of

LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
11 W. 42nd St., Room 1950—SPRing 1716

TO OUT-OF-TOWNERS—This debate will be published in book form. Reserve your copy now by sending $1.00.

CARNEGIE HALL—SUNDAY EVENING—
JANUARY 5TH—8:15 P. M.

William B.

SHEARER

will tell

"The Inside Story of Ten Years of International Intrigue Against U. S. Sea Power" with comments on the approaching

LONDON CONFERENCE

What might have come out at the Senate investigation, had it been completed

Tickets on sale at Carnegie Hall Box Office and by mail

Balc. $1.00; Dress Circ. $1.50; Orch. $1.50-$2.50; Box Seats $3.00

Direction—Celebrities Management, Inc., 11 W. 42nd St., N. Y. C.

Dr. Magnes and Zionism

By FERDINAND M. ISSERMAN

JUDAH L. MAGNES, Chancellor of the Hebrew University, stirred up a veritable hornets' nest by declaring, in the midst of the Palestinian crisis, that Zionists must abandon the hope of establishing a Jewish Palestine, that a representative parliament ought to be instituted there, and that Jews and Arabs should make peace among themselves. His position was condemned by Zionist officials, by students at the Hebrew University who hissed his address, by the American Jewish Congress, by the Jewish press generally, by rabbis, by Jewish legionnaires, and by many others. His critics are of two classes. Some are unalterably opposed to his plan; others regard this as an inopportune time to suggest it. I agree entirely with Dr. Magnes. I regard his views of Palestine as the only ones which an enlightened liberal Jew (using the word "liberal" in a philosophic and not a religious sense) can hold. In addition to that I believe they are practicable.

What are the facts about Palestine? At the present time, there are about 125,000 Jews there, 600,000 Arabs, and perhaps 50,000 Christians. The land is being administered by a British high commissioner, who is an absolute autocrat, responsible for his actions to no Palestinian group but only to the British administration in London. The only appeal that Palestinians have against his decisions is to the Cabinet or Parliament of England. The government of present-day Palestine is undemocratic and despotic. Practically, the administration has curtailed no personal liberties, and has granted autonomy to communities, but theoretically there is no political freedom in Palestine. The taxes are levied by the high commissioner. Not only is there taxation without representation, but the whole administration of the country is dictated by London and its officials and not by the people who reside in Palestine.

One of the great slogans of the World War, phrased by Woodrow Wilson, was the self-determination of peoples. The Arabs contend that in 1915 General M'Mahon, a British general, promised independence to the Arabs of Palestine if they would rise against the Turks and favor the British, and declare that they now want this promise redeemed. There is some doubt as to whether this promise was made, or whether if made it was authorized in London. Even assuming that no such promise was made, the problem still remains, what of self-determination for the Palestinians? Certainly Jews, who for centuries have struggled for political rights, will not justify denial of this right to any group. How can liberals, who sympathize with the desire of the Philippines for independence, with Chinese Nationalist aspirations, with India's desire for dominion status, deny to any group the right of democratic government? Are the Jews ready to become parties to tyranny? The fact that the condition of the Arab was worse under Turkish rule is no argument at all. The very hope of political Zionism is based on a desire for national independence. The fact that there are Arabs elsewhere who have political autonomy is also irrelevant. The ideal of the self-determination of peoples is one to which most Jews, certainly Zionists, subscribe.

If the Palestinians were to be granted full political freedom, the Arabs would easily dominate any established political Parliament, and they could easily put an end to Jewish immigration, and thus close the book of Zionism. In order to prevent this from happening, and in order to enable Great Britain to carry out her pledge to the Jews as made in the Balfour Declaration, St. John Philby suggests that though political autonomy be granted in Palestine, the minority rights of Jews be recognized, and the high commissioner retain the power of veto over any legislation. The recognition of minority rights implies the right to a minority language and to minority schools. If the high commissioner has the right to veto legislation, any attempt, not based on economic motives, to restrict immigration can be frustrated. St. John Philby's proposal, indorsed by Dr. Magnes, is fair to both Arab and Jew.

Now, as to the timeliness of Dr. Magnes's utterances. There are many who feel that even if he is right he should not have spoken out at this time of crisis. The time to speak out on fundamental principles is not when no issue is at hand, but when issues are open and principles are needed with which to solve these issues. If as a result of the investigation that is now going on to sift the causes of the riots in Palestine, any changes are to be made in the status of Palestine, these changes should be determined by principle and not by opportunism. There is no doubt that from the standpoint of immediate practical expediency the Jews have to lose by insisting on principles as Dr. Magnes does. Because the Arabs were the aggressors and because their hands are stained with the blood of innocent victims, their demands are bound at present to lose force. But shall the Jew at this late date sacrifice principle to expediency? If I understand Jewish history at all I see it as an expression of loyalty to an ideal. Material things, wealth, power, influence, all were sacrificed by our fathers for the ideal. Shall we in Palestine, the cradle of our ideals, where Amos pleaded for justice, Hosea for love, and Isaiah for peace, erect a new altar and sacrifice upon it the ideals of our tradition? Is it for this that we want Zion? In times of crisis, the prophets demanded the application of principle to vital issues. Amos denounced ritual not on a week-day but on a holy day before the crowds fulfilling ritual duties. A Zion built on expediency would be a renunciation of Judaism. Not with bayonets but with good-will must Zion be redeemed. Palestine will remain, until the Arab leaves of his own volition, a bi-national country, the Switzerland of Asia, the home of three great faiths—Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism. Here is an opportunity to demonstrate to the world that religious bigotry is not essential, that Jew, Christian, and Mohammedan can live together in peace and harmony. Thus the Holy Land can again teach the world. I therefore regard Dr. Magnes's utterance as timely and in keeping with Israel's finest tradition. He spoke not as a scheming politician but as a courageous prophet.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1930 No. 3367

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 57

EDITORIALS:

The League of Nations 60
New York's Power 61
The Talkies' Future 61
"Hey, Skin-nay!" 62
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 63
MY BROTHER'S PEEPER. By Gardner Jackson 64
LAME-DUCK DIPLOMATS. By Paul Y. Anderson 66
TEN YEARS OF THE LEAGUE. By Felix Morley 67
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 70
CORRESPONDENCE 71

BOOKS AND DRAMA:

These Humble People. By Eda Lou Walton 72
Insight and Charm. By Sidney B. Fay 72
Russian Irony. By Joshua Kunitz 73
An American Knight. By Will Irwin 74
Speculation. By Davis R. Dewey 74
Hardly Worth While. By Clifton P. Fadiman 75
Two English Poets. By Mark Van Doren 75
The Quaker and the Quantum. By Irwin Edman 76
A Prophet of Trees. By Lewis S. Gannett 76
Fiction Briefs 76
Drama: Portrait of an Egotist. By Joseph Wood Krutch 78

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The Vatican and the Kremlin. By Louis Fischer 82
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 83

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor
HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THOSE ADHERENTS OF THE LEAGUE of Nations who brought General Smuts to this country were well advised in doing so. They could have invited no one who would impress the thoughtful public more, for he has been a discriminating critic as well as a supporter of the League since its inception. Moreover, General Smuts is the accredited inventor of the mandate system; it appeared first in his proposal for the League of Nations which The Nation had the privilege of publishing in America early in 1919. That the idea was born of a laudable purpose to improve the administration of backward nations by the self-appointed colonizing nations is beyond question. General Smuts is certainly not to be blamed for the failure of the League of Nations to supervise the mandatory Powers as he planned that they should. We cannot help wondering, however, if any system by which government is imposed upon any people by another can ever be made honorable or workable or bearable. Certainly the dark spots on General Smuts's own record are his relations with the exploited races in South Africa and the use of force to control them. None the less we recognize that General Smuts is one of the few great men of the world, and we especially recall with gratitude that although he signed the Treaty of Versailles, he at the same time caused to be circulated a protest against it.

IT IS A MATTER FOR REGRET that the arrival of Count Karolyi in this country, from which he had been barred by the State Department for five years, should have been marked by misunderstanding between the count and his friends here, who have carried on a valiant fight for his admission. The Rand School of Social Science arranged with his lecture manager for a great welcome meeting in Carnegie Hall under the sponsorship of a representative committee of Socialists and liberals, including such men as Norman Thomas, Morris Hillquit, John Dewey, Charles A. Beard, and the editor of The Nation, to mention only a few. The American Communists, with their usual genius for mischief making, sent word to the count that the members of this committee were persons with the same views as those who support Horthy in Hungary—referring to the agreement between the dictator and the Hungarian Social Democracy. Thereupon Count Karolyi instructed his manager not to accept the sponsorship of the Rand School or other political groups, thus turning his back on his best friends in this country. Count Karolyi has been extremely ill advised in this matter. We are confident that his action has been due to a misunderstanding of the real situation here, and we trust that this unfortunate beginning may not interfere too seriously with the success of his lecture trip.

OF ALL THE SAD SHOWS ever staged, unquestionably the saddest was William B. Shearer's New York lecture on "The Inside Story of Ten Years of International Intrigue against United States Sea Power." Lost in the immense reaches of Carnegie Hall, three or four hundred persons sat in bored or amused silence while a handful applauded every other sentence as Mr. Shearer repeated his testimony of last summer before the Senate investigating committee, declaring pathetically enough that the Navy Department did not tell him that his celebrated "secret document" was a hoax. He was introduced by the incredible Admiral Fiske, who in a newspaper interview had already indorsed him: "I have looked into his alleged activities at Geneva and I find he was only doing what the government was trying to do. The only people he was opposing were the British." The London Conference, the Admiral declared, "is going to be the greatest game, played for the greatest stakes, that the world has ever known." That is exactly the nationalistic spirit which, as we pointed out last week, if unchecked will reduce the conference to nullity. The visit of Ramsay MacDonald did much to set the people of this country thinking in different terms, and the flat failure of Mr. Shearer's meeting is encouraging evidence that anti-British propaganda is at present unpopular. As we have already suggested, success at London depends on the delegates coming together in friendly spirit to do everything possible to lift a common burden.

A MASS MEETING in Faneuil Hall, protesting against a new massacre, though in Newport and not in Boston, sending a vigorously defiant message to the highest authority, and then tearing down official posters on Boston

Common—what good reading that is! At last it seems Americans are capable of working themselves into a fury and asserting that they have rights and liberties which they intend to have respected. Since the war it has seemed as if the spirit of 1776 were dead, laid to rest by the war to end war. Not that we have much affection for the victims of the "Newport massacre"—three rum-runners, confessed lawbreakers, who were killed when their rum-laden craft was stopped by Coast Guard bullets. The meeting was on better ground when it protested against the cocksure way in which Assistant Secretary Lowman upheld the Coast Guard without making any inquiries as to the facts. He has, however, now been sustained by Secretary Mellon himself. But we should still rejoice even if the occasion for this protest were less worthy. The members of the Boston audience who were so vigorously outspoken to Mr. Hoover have done a genuine service. So, too, we like the continued pounding away of Senator Borah and the Drys in Washington. As we said last week, Mr. Hoover must be made to face this issue and must not be allowed to follow his usual custom of dodging. We are aware that there is a lot of the usual hypocrisy and politics in the Washington controversy, but still we rejoice in the protests.

WE THOUGHT that the Navy Department had safely bottled up General Smedley D. Butler for its own good and his, but we note with profound regret that he has fizzed over again. According to an Associated Press dispatch the brave general recently addressed an American Legion post in the outskirts of Harrisburg as follows:

> I believe that God made us the most influential nation in the world for a purpose, and that it is our duty to keep our neighboring nations from murdering one another.
>
> When the marines get a job, they go and do it. We are not diplomats. Soldiering makes a man direct in his methods and sometimes abrupt.

To kill people, as the marines have done in Haiti, in order to prevent them from murdering one another is, as the general says, direct, not to say abrupt. It reminds us of the State that proposed to make attempted suicide a capital offense.

MAHATMA GANDHI'S influence in India is still powerful, as the proceedings of the All-India National Congress at Lahore show, but the immediate outlook for the Swaraj or home-rule movement which he directs and inspires is not altogether clear. The congress, called to pave the way for a conference out of which, it was hoped, India would emerge with the much-discussed dominion status, rejected that solution of the problem by adopting almost unanimously a resolution offered by Gandhi demanding complete independence. No useful purpose would be served, the resolution declared, by Indian participation in the round-table conference at London at which the question of constitutional reform for India was to be threshed out, and the Nationalist members of the central and provincial legislatures were called upon to resign. But while a proposal championed by Subhas Chandra Bose, leader of the Youth League, for the adoption of a militant program was overwhelmingly voted down and a more moderate amendment deferring action on the question of independence was also rejected, the executive committee of the congress was nevertheless authorized to inaugurate whenever it thought fit a program of non-cooperation or civil disobedience, this last including non-payment of taxes to British authorities.

JUST WHAT IS Gandhi's purpose? Apparently he has abandoned dominion status as only a halfway house and has committed himself and his followers to absolute independence. On the other hand, the discretion given to the executive committee of the congress, a body of some 300 members, to adopt a program of passive resistance if, when, and as the committee thinks the moment opportune, seems to suggest that the attainment of independence is not looked for immediately, but is nevertheless to be held over the heads of the British government while further negotiations are carried on or preparations for action are being made. Not all of India's population of 320,000,000, of course, is behind Gandhi; most of the 70,000,000 Moslems have never recognized his leadership, the 3,000,000 Sikhs have yet to be conciliated, and the attitude of the 70,000,000 inhabitants of the native states is uncertain. The National Liberal Federation, representing moderate Indian opinion, is reported to have rejected the idea of independence and reasserted adherence to the program of dominion status. The thing most to be hoped for at the moment is that Great Britain may not feel compelled to send additional troops to India.

FRENCH POLITICS should be livelier than ever now that Léon Daudet, guiding genius of the Action Française and protagonist of a monarchy in place of the republic, has been pardoned and allowed to return from comfortable exile in Belgium. There was nothing to do but pardon him, of course, for the circumstances of his exile were ridiculous. Daudet bitterly attacked the Paris police about three years ago for alleged complicity in the death of his son, and for that was convicted of libel and sentenced to prison. The Santé prison is an ancient structure, but it had a telephone; so also had the Ministry of the Interior; and when, one day, somebody telephoned from the Ministry of the Interior, or from some place temporarily dubbed such, to say that Daudet was to be released, the obliging governor of the Santé opened the doors, bowed M. Daudet to a waiting automobile, and the whilom libellist sipped his aperatif that evening in Belgium. In that safe retreat he has continued to write his daily editorials for the Action Française, and the monarchist agitation has gone on in spite of a ban from Rome. Now a Tardieu Government (Tardieu the Poincarist and Clemencist, of all persons), backed by Edouard Herriot and political leaders of various stripes, has moved for a pardon and President Doumergue has graciously acquiesced.

> What you need is for me to have you in a two-by-four room. What wouldn't I do to you? I'd blacken your eyes and give you some real American spirit and do for you what your parents should have done. . . . In your diseased mind do you think the United States and communism are in any way alike? . . . We spend billions in this country for schools and what have we educated here —a mongrel and a moron who tries to go out and defy the American people.
>
> It would be a grand thing for me to send you back to Poland. It is too bad this government has so much red tape, that makes it hard to get rid of people like you. . . . The sentence that I am going to give you is not the one I had in mind. I am not going to sentence you to jail.

That would make a martyr of you. Get out of this court room. You are not fit to be here.

THESE were the hysterical outpourings, as reported in the New York press, of Magistrate Silvester Sabbatino as he sat in his court in Brooklyn to pass judgment upon David Weiss, seventeen, confessed Communist, arrested for collecting funds for the strikers of Gastonia, North Carolina, and charged with vagrancy. The irrelevance of these remarks is exceeded only by their stupidity. The campaign of the American Civil Liberties Union to have the magistrate removed from the bench deserves to succeed. Incidentally, if Mr. Sabbatino and his like are really interested in winning over to American ideals impressionable young men like David Weiss who have accepted the easy and spectacular simplifications of communism, they should adopt other tactics.

AN INDIGNANT READER of the London Nation and Athenaeum is profoundly hurt that the Encyclopaedia Britannica employed the vice-president of a great American motor combination to write its article on the modern motor industry. The article declares that "America has admittedly taken the lead in this industry," a statement which further rouses the ire of the protestant. He lists a number of achievements in the development of the motor car in which England has led. First of all he points out that "the car which any unbiased American will own is the best car in the world is a car made in this country." More than that, he says, the first six-cylinder car was produced in Great Britain, the first free-wheel device was put into practical use on British soil, and British manufacturers were the first to adopt "dipping head lamps, non-splinterable glass, all-weather bodies, and sunshine saloons"—we hope that the latter term, with which we confess our unfamiliarity, has nothing to do with the question of alcoholic drinks! Finally, this aroused Englishman declares that his country has led in adoption of the front-wheel drive and in the use of the medium-pressure tire, which was evolved in England, and he hopes that these facts will show the difference "between taking the lead in number of cars sold and taking the lead in motor engineering." We are inclined to think that there is a good deal to be said on his side.

SIX THOUSAND ITALIAN PRISONERS were freed as a gesture in the general program of rejoicing over the marriage of the Italian Crown Prince and Princess Marie José of Belgium. This strikes us as an excellent idea and we have a proposal to make with regard to it. Let Allan Hoover, younger son of President Hoover, announce his approaching marriage (we are even willing to let him choose the fortunate young lady); and then, just to show how happy everybody is or ought to be, let Tom Mooney, Warren K. Billings, all the Centralia prisoners, the young California Communists who had the children at a summer camp make a red flag, the young Communists in Ohio who passed pamphlets at a meeting—let all these and any other political prisoners we have not mentioned be sent home by President or Governor with a pardon in their pocket. That would be as pretty a gesture as one could make. In addition we should recommend that the bride be dressed in white velvet and ermine and the groom in a dashing military uniform; that a large military escort in full-dress uniform on horseback ride fore and aft in the procession; that bands play on the route from the bride's home to the church; that flowers be cast at all concerned. In short, that we have a celebration that is a celebration. None of these quiet democratic weddings for us, with a young woman in a tweed jacket married to a young man in a blue serge suit. We want action, noise, color, splendor. And in such a setting what could be more fitting than a little princely generosity toward the unfortunates who, for their opinions, languish in our jails?

WE APPLAUD the brave words of President Frank Parker Day, of Union College, denouncing the commercialization of college sports, the employment of highly paid professional coaches, and all the other well-known athletic abuses of our institutions of higher learning. But such brave words are fairly cheap, even when they are spoken to the men who themselves run college athletics, so we applaud even more highly President Day's specific suggestions for correcting the evils he denounces. Rightly enough, he blames college executives as being largely responsible for these abuses, and he suggests the formation of a league of small colleges, beginning with Hamilton, Rensselaer Polytechnic, Amherst, Williams, Wesleyan, and Union, which shall agree to do away with gate receipts, professional coaches, and all compensation of any kind to athletes. That sounds like business, and we stand ready to applaud most heartily any such program if instituted by the colleges mentioned, or, failing that, by President Day and his associates at Union acting by and for themselves. President Lowell of Harvard has also made the compromise suggestion that only one intercollegiate game be held in each sport annually. These are beginnings; we hope they will shortly be translated into action.

ONE OF THE GREATEST of American teachers and critics, George Woodberry died in his seventy-fifth year on January 2. Professor Woodberry was for long years one of The Nation's most valued critics and reviewers and for a time a member of its staff, and this journal cannot but record now, in advance of a longer appreciation, its deep and sincere regret at this loss to American letters. Heir to the New England tradition, a graduate of Harvard in the class of 1877, for several years under the direct personal influence of James Russell Lowell, Mr. Woodberry early became a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly, The Nation, and similar publications, and was among the first scholars to take up the teaching of comparative literature, holding for five years a chair in that subject at Columbia. Inspired as he was, students came to him for a spiritual refreshment and quickening all too rare in this day and generation, and when he was virtually forced out of Columbia by the refusal of the authorities adequately to maintain his department and to overlook the inability of a man of near-genius to do routine committee and administrative work, a mighty protest arose from the students. But in vain. Scholars of this type were not congenial to the Butler regime at Columbia—Edward MacDowell went when Woodberry did, and Joel Spingarn followed in later years. But Mr. Woodberry never lacked adequate recognition for the long list of his published works, and among other honors was the rare one of being chosen Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature. Fortunate is a country to whom is vouchsafed so great a teacher and scholar!

The League of Nations

THAT the League of Nations has grown and developed since its foundation none can deny. Its supporters can point, like Felix Morley elsewhere in this issue of The Nation, to fundamental changes in the mechanism of the League, to a new emphasis in its policies, to a certain detachment from the spirit in which it was founded, and to a marked tendency to free itself from the domination of the "Big Five" nations which completely controlled it in 1919. Then it was that Professor Gilbert Murray declared truthfully that the League "does not put the world at the mercy of the Big Five; it is there already." "Without the League," he added, "the Big Five would be so many robber chieftains." Lord Robert Cecil, its great protagonist, was at the same time for excluding "definitely untrustworthy and hostile states, e.g., Russia, should the Bolshevist government remain in power." "Otherwise," he opined, "it is desirable not to be too rigid in scrutinizing qualifications, since the small Powers will in any case not exercise any considerable influence"! Let us then admit that the League has gone far beyond that amazing conception of one who still poses as a statesman and humanist. We are willing also to concede that the constitutional evolution of which Mr. Morley speaks has gone in the right direction, in part because of Europe's evolution out of the period of war liquidation; in part because of events in Europe outside the League, and often in spite of it. The Locarno treaties; the economic settlements; the Kellogg pact; the removal of the troops from the Rhineland —the credit for all these goes not to the League but to outsiders, to statesmen of the caliber of Briand, Stresemann, and MacDonald, who stepped in to pacify Europe at the time when the League was nearest collapse. But we must also record thankfully the dramatic incident of December 15, 1928, when the Council of the League, supporting Germany against the Poles, for the first time put one of the war victors in the wrong. There was progress, there at least the promise of genuine justice and a final breach with the conception of the League as an instrument of the victors to enforce their will upon the vanquished.

But it is in the development of the various technical bureaus of the League that one finds the greatest satisfaction —in the battle against opium and the white slave traffic; in the great progress of the International Labor Office toward handling the common problems of the working classes everywhere as a world entity; in the direct discussion of numerous problems such as agriculture, instead, as Mr. Morley points out, of requiring them to go through the circumlocution offices which handle the nations' foreign affairs. There lies the real gain for humanity; there the chief possibility of a solution of international ills at a table face to face, by men ruled by other considerations than politics; there the true inception of an eventual parliament of mankind of which the ages have dreamed. Beyond doubt the creation of this clearing house for discussion and adjustment and reform has been a great step forward for the world.

But when all this has been freely admitted, when praise has been given as all lovers of humanity must give it where and when it is due, there remains the other side. That still prevents us from joining those who all over the United States will be seizing upon the tenth anniversary of the League to urge anew the entrance of the United States into its membership. For the League is still part and parcel of that body of death, the Treaty of Versailles, which still prevents the final pacification of Europe; which keeps alive a dozen sore spots that threaten another catastrophe. The League has permitted the increase of the armed forces of Europe to a point where there are at least a million more men under arms in Europe than the day the World War started; it has been silent and complaisant in the face of such monstrous wrongs as the crucifixion of the entire people of the lower Tyrol; it has been unable to find its voice when the Treaty of Versailles, of which it is at once the child and the guardian, has been openly and flagrantly violated. Indeed, it has itself violated the treaty while strictly enforcing the worst provisions against the beaten or violated peoples. On these and other counts, the League is and has been "a magnificent conspiracy against justice," keeping alive the spirit of war.

It is in this very matter of peace that we must indict it most directly and most searchingly. It was the League that abdicated its functions and turned over its task to a nonlegal body, the Council of Ambassadors, when Mussolini shot up the island of Corfu. It was the League that sat silent when the Poles stole Vilna which they have ever since kept. It was the League that, in its cowardice, kept silence when the French, violating the treaty, entered the Ruhr to enslave, to torture, to debase, to murder a people whom the League itself had helped to disarm. It was the League that shut its eyes to chicanery, deceit, and fraud on the eastern German frontier. It is the League that has achieved not one step toward the real disarmament to which it and the treaty are pledged, and has ignored and scorned the only true and honest proposal for that disarmament yet presented in Geneva—that of the Russians voiced by Litvinov—the Russians to whom the League still refuses fellowship.

The United States enter this League? Some time in the distant future perhaps but not now. We are utterly opposed to our country's becoming a party to the iniquities of the Treaty of Versailles which this country refused to sign, which we shall be bound to uphold, to sanctify, and to enforce if we join. We are well aware of the stock argument that it took the United States eight years to grow out of the loose and weak Confederation into a true and effective union of States. The parallel is not to the point for the Confederation was not charged with preserving the peace of the world, was not solemnly pledged to the abolition of that system of brute force which came so close in 1914-1918 to the destruction of civilization. The League was and is so pledged. It has been recreant to its trust while advocates have praised it to the skies and covered reams of good paper with adulation over its gradual acquisition of the strength to keep its solemn pledges to do what is right. And the horrible thing about it has been that while it hid its head in the sand the military forces of evil have grown and not lessened; that the world is hourly menaced by the threat of a new warfare of the nations to make the horrors of 1914-1918 seem child's play.

New York's Power

THERE is beautiful fighting all along the line in the water-power battle, but nowhere prettier than in the State of New York. Ever since Alfred E. Smith, with his unerring instinct for the popular well-being, succeeded in dragging the matter into the open, the issue has been growing clearer and clearer. In the exigencies of party politics, a Republican majority in the legislature, its back to the wall, has been standing doggedly for the interests of the power companies, insisting that there should be no development of the State's water resources except on terms that give the companies the lion's share of the benefit; a Democratic governor with tenacity and apparently growing clearness of insight has been standing more or less definitely for the interests of the industries and the domestic consumers of electricity who want current supplied as cheaply as possible. New York, a highly industrialized State with an extensive agricultural territory and population, controls the great St. Lawrence power. If New York can solve its power problem along right lines, the other States will profit by its experience. The longer such a solution can be delayed, the farther may the power companies carry the pleasant process of skimming the cream off our electrical development.

Following in the path marked by his great predecessor, Governor Roosevelt in a special message last year urged the retention and operation of the proposed power plant by the State, with distribution by private companies under contract. This year he goes farther. After reasserting that "the ownership, development, and operation of the St. Lawrence power resources" should "remain forever in the actual possession of the people of the State or of an agency created by them," he goes on thus:

> At the same time I thought it advisable that the State agency should at least provide the financing of and retain the fee to any system of State-wide transmission of electricity made necessary by the new power development. As a mere matter of saving in interest rates alone this would reduce the cost of electricity many millions of dollars each year, for the consumer, of course, pays the interest and dividend charges on the project.

The Governor, it will be recalled, has proposed a board of trustees, a separate corporate entity like the New York Port Authority, with power to issue to private investors securities based on the structures to be built. The board of trustees will make contracts with private companies for the actual distribution of current at rates to be fixed in the contracts. Whether the transmission lines are to be leased to such companies is not clear from the Governor's plan. If what he proposes is that the State shall own and operate both generating plant and transmission lines, there will be left to private companies the local distribution of current at prices to be fixed by contract with the board. Under present legislation there is little possibility of municipalities going extensively into the business of distributing current. Local distribution, with all its extensive possibilities of economy, will then perforce remain for the most part in private hands.

The weakness of such a system (and it is a serious one) lies in the absence of any threat of effective public competition with the private companies in distribution. Lacking such a club the trustees may well have difficulty in bringing about economies of distribution and in exercising effective rate control. The plan does promise, however, the benefits of inexpensive public financing and unified operation of the generating and transmission system, and it perhaps represents as long a step as it is possible at this time to take in New York in the direction of outright public production and distribution of light and power. Of course, the power companies insist that the plan is not practical and that private capital cannot be induced to take over the task of local distribution under such conditions. If this be true, they are simply saying that private capital cannot be induced to distribute electricity under conditions that give any promise of safeguarding the public interest. We venture the guess, however, that the opposition of the companies is due to their fear not that the plan will fail but that it will succeed.

The striking feature of the New York situation, and in our judgment the promising one, lies in the frank recognition of the failure of public regulation of the private power industry. A quarter of a century ago people were looking hopefully to the movement for regulatory commissions of various kinds. As far as the power industry goes, the failure of that movement is confessed by everybody except the power companies, who have discovered astonishing virtues in public regulation since they learned how to control it. The history of the past two decades has made one thing abundantly clear: in the development of electric power there is no effective way of safeguarding the public interest except for the organized community to keep in its own hands the ownership and operation of the basic generating and transmission system, letting private enterprise come in, if at all, only in a minor capacity under conditions of strictest control by a public authority which actually has the whip hand. That is what the power companies are trying to prevent in New York and everywhere else.

The Talkies' Future

THE immediate and overwhelming popularity of the talkies gives evidence of the fact that they have come to stay. Not only have the most important producers ceased to make anything else, but the "wiring" of even the village nickelodeons has gone on so rapidly that the silent movie house is already almost a thing of the past. The wave of public protest predicted by certain critics never showed the slightest sign of materializing, and audiences, instead of troubling themselves about the alleged threat to an independent art form, accepted dialogue as an obvious addition to their favorite entertainment. Probably only America could have released so rapidly the capital and energy necessary to revolutionize an industry overnight, but that revolution is already a fait accompli.

Nor can it be denied that the technical development of the talkies has been almost as rapid as their spread. Voices sound far more human than they did six months ago and a method of story telling, half way between that of the stage and that of the screen, has been developed so successfully that it is possible to maintain with some show of reason that a film like that of George Arliss in "Disraeli" is better than the original production of the play from which it is taken.

Yet despite these facts there is not, at present, the slightest reason for supposing that the talkie is destined to rise above the artistic level of its silent progenitor. The best dialogue pictures yet seen are not in any significant respect superior to the best of the old-style films, and the pity of it is that, whatever the theoretical possibilities of the new device may be, they do not seem any more likely to be realized than those possibilities which enthusiasts have been, for ten years past, vainly discussing in connection with the traditional cinema. The word "movie" remains synonymous with all that is cheap and vulgar, not because cheapness and vulgarity are obviously inherent in the medium, but because the moving picture was developed under certain definite limiting conditions; and the prospects are that the talkie, developing under the same conditions, will continue as it has begun—that it will be merely a movie made more ghastly because it has learned to say in words the nonsense which it formerly could only imply in pantomime.

If there were any way of rescuing it from the already established tradition of the film, then the hopes expressed for it might possibly be justified, but the movie was stultified by mass production and censorship and it is not easy to see how the new-style films can fail to feel the full force of these destructive influences. They passed almost automatically into the control of the same censoring bodies, official and unofficial, which had already been accepted by the magnates of the cinema, and the very fact that they could appeal to the population at large made it inevitable that the whole effort of the producers should be, as it had been in the past, to hit the largest common denominator of a vast public. It is obvious that the censorship has succeeded only in removing from the films every trace of intelligence, while it has left them dripping with every variety of implied sensuality. It is equally obvious that the effort to construct stories of universal appeal has resulted only in the mechanical repetition of the most elementary fables. But the movies have paid too well for the industry to wish to try any other method, and the censorship has proved so little harmful to the box office that there is not the slightest likelihood of any effectual protest against it. The talkies are made by the same people, with the same aims, and for the same public, as the movies. How can they possibly be other than what the movies have always been?

Much talk is heard again of "intimate" theaters and of films made for special audiences, but though similar proposals were made in connection with the silent movies, and several "art" theaters were established in New York and elsewhere, they were compelled to depend almost exclusively upon foreign films. Production is far too expensive to be undertaken without the prospect of a very large audience, and unfortunately the talkies, being even more costly than the silent films, are even less likely to be produced for any except the largest public. The very fact that they can be so easily transported and shown simultaneously in a hundred places turns out to be a curse which makes any production not intended for a hundred places almost unthinkable.

Under the circumstances all discussion of the purely theoretical possibilities of the new medium is futile until some method is devised for rescuing it from those who invented and exploited it. Yet so many are contented with what it is that it is not easy to see how it can be made into what it well might be.

"Hey, Skin-nay!"

CLARE BRIGGS was just a grown-up small boy and, to an America made up of small boys of all ages, one of the most appealing cartoonists in our national history. We do not really take politics seriously; the town swimming-hole and the small boy's houn'-dog and the pettinesses of home life and the sorrows of kelly pool and golf loom larger on the national horizon. Briggs was their artist laureate.

And it was a pretty good small boy's America that Clare Briggs pictured. Perhaps it was not an entirely true, or a truly entire, America, for it had so little meanness or malice in it. One reason that Briggs could not do political cartoons was that politics almost requires a little meanness and malice, and Briggs did not have them in him. Perhaps the Reedsburg, Wisconsin, in which he lived until he was nine, or the Dixon, Illinois, where he lived his next five years, or even the Lincoln, Nebraska, of Briggs's pre-Bryan years, had less meanness in them than the cities of today. At any rate, they provided Briggs with the material for his immortal series, "When a Feller Needs a Friend" and "The Days of Real Sport"; and similar small towns and small-town graduates built up the vast newspaper audiences that looked for Briggs first, even before they turned to the sporting pages.

It may be nonsense to say, as some do, that the comic strips are the authentic art of present-day America. But it is certainly true that they are an authentic expression of America today; when newspapers by the hundreds subscribe to a strip or a series it is because their canny editors know that the artist-author touches the hearts of his readers. The social historian could find much to ponder in Briggs and his success. His picture of the golf fan, all dressed up in plaid knickerbockers and tasseled stockings, who got up early to get a good start at the country club, and tried to be unconscious of the stares and remarks of the husky laborers who crowded into the same street car, has material in it for an essay on America—its democracy and its standardization both. The infinite series "Mr. and Mrs." might provide material for a dozen volumes on Marriage in America, on Life in the Suburbs, on the American Home. And they would be all the richer material because Briggs almost never consciously preached a moral or tried to drive a lesson home. He just looked about him, amused, and recorded upon his pad the ridiculous pettinesses he saw.

In his amusement there was always a certain zestful sympathy. "The Male Quartette," absurd as it was, was a dramatization of Briggs's own life. He adored singing, and had a marvelous repertory, not all recorded in print. He drew kelly-pool pictures when he was playing kelly pool for enthusiastic hours every day; he drew golf cartoons after he turned to golf. One large reason for his success was that perpetual fountain of small-boy enthusiasm for life that was his. It was never forced; it welled up in the man; and it stamped his brand of humor. Not in all Briggs's work can one find the cheap snicker which so often makes the comic strip a synonym for vulgarity.

We shall miss him; he was the great comic artist of small-town America, and the machine age has not yet produced his peer.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

THERE is nothing essentially childish in communism. Individuals of high intelligence have been the adherents of its cause. Grant the original premises on which this economic philosophy is based, and the rest follows logically enough. Nor is there any sound reason why American communities should grow excited and pass all sorts of silly and savage laws to check communism. To be sure, the Communist frankly admits his desire to overthrow the existing governmental and economic structure by force, but what of that? Nobody can legislate the right of revolution out of existence. When your revolutionist is strong enough to effect his coup he will hardly be restrained because of some statute in a book. And when he isn't strong enough why bother with him?

I shall be told by some that if no check is put upon Communist propagandists the cause may gain sufficient converts to become a realistic menace in this country. People who say this have not heard Communist speeches. But though the party has been cursed with many dreadfully dull leaders it has not lacked men and women of dignity and sincerity. Accordingly, I wonder just what they have been doing during several recent Communist jamborees. I am no red baiter but I feel that the Communists themselves should purge their ranks of shrill and trivial recruits.

It has always been my contention that the left wing's reliance on force made it an inevitable and natural ally of American militarism. All who put their trust in guns and bullets are brothers under the skin. Striking proof of this was furnished just the other day in Washington when twenty-eight boys and girls calling themselves members of the Young Communist Party staged a hostile demonstration in front of the Mexican Embassy. Among the banners which they carried was one inscribed "Down with Ortiz Rubio, President-elect of Mexico." And, curiously enough, someone else in that same procession carried a placard with the slogan, "Down with American imperialism."

Here, surely, there was some lack of team work because these rattle-headed radicals were distinctly playing the game of American jingoes. Patrioteers who declare that the stars and stripes should float over every foot of territory from the Rio Grande to the Panama Canal could well afford to hire such muddle-minded revolutionists to demonstrate in the same manner every afternoon. Only by vigilance can peace with Mexico be preserved. Many powerful public leaders are patiently waiting for some incident sufficient to raise a conflagration which will permit them to sweep the American public into a receptive mood for a Mexican invasion. And if war came and our forces penetrated deeply enough into Mexican territory you may depend upon it that the United States would be hopelessly embarked upon a great and tragic imperialistic venture. Isn't it enough that we already have a Haiti on our conscience?

To be sure, the young Communists did carry a banner in which they attempted to explain their demonstration upon the grounds of class consciousness. "Ortiz Rubio is the murderer of workers and peasants in Mexico" was the slogan which they displayed. Waiving any argument as to the justice of this assertion, I might point out to the adolescent Communists that precisely the same thing was charged by our jingoes against Huerta when the disgraceful Vera Cruz adventure was launched by Woodrow Wilson. A general conflict was averted at that time only by a narrow squeak and it became evident as soon as our forces landed that in the face of foreign invasion left- and right-wing Mexicans immediately came together to make cause against the alien. It would be utterly ironic if some such demonstration against the ambassador of a friendly nation as the chuckle-headed Communists launched in Washington should become the exciting incident of an imperialistic war. And such a possibility is not utterly fantastic. Riots against the representatives of foreign governments have always been grave symptoms of impending conflict. Excited nationals are very fond of venting their patriotism upon some isolated group of aliens.

If there had been a scuffle and some one attached to the legation had been hurt the consequences might have been serious indeed. Out of just such thoughtless escapades arise questions of national honor which press peace treaties to the breaking-point. I do not make the charge that this particular set of reds was actually inspired by native jingoes. Just for the mere devilment of it they played the game of one of the most dangerous factions which exists in America. And already they have succeeded in adding some little fuel to the woodpile of misunderstanding and distrust which looms up between the United States and Mexico. No red flag belonged in this procession but the saffron banner of jingoistic, yellow journalism.

Less reprehensible but just as silly are many other Communist college pranks. I think it is ridiculous for a nation to believe that it can legislate the right of revolution out of existence, but if you strike at a king you must kill him. I wonder just what the Young Communists believe is gained by various wrist-slapping tactics. How is the Utopia of which they dream advanced by a single day when left-wing hecklers succeed in breaking up a Socialist meeting? Can't the Communists leave this to the American Legion? I'm afraid that the average American Communist sees this revolution, so freely prated of, as a sort of second-act curtain in a musical comedy with red sashes and barricades.

With no particular good-will I give the American Communist Party a little good advice. It has made the fatal error of becoming comic, and most of the opposition against repressive red-baiting laws comes from men and women who feel that it is silly to level blunderbusses at butterflies. Here and there, as in Gastonia, Communist organizers have done hard, dangerous, and necessary missionary work. But for the most part American communism is out of Greenwich Village by Gordon Gin. The movement has little chance to grow because it has become just about as exclusive as the Union Club. For instance, the latest test for membership in the militant proletariat is exceedingly hard to pass. It may even limit the party to a total of one. As I understand the latest by-law of the party, as expounded in the New Masses, no one can be a good Communist unless he likes the plays of Michael Gold.

HEYWOOD BROUN

My Brother's Peeper

By GARDNER JACKSON

Boston, January 2

THE methods of the New England Watch and Ward Society and, incidentally, the workings of that peculiar mechanism, the mind of the censor, have been suddenly thrust into the limelight. The glare of publicity has been revealing, if not complimentary. Felix, the Greek newsdealer who sold a copy of the American Mercury containing the story, Hatrack, a few years ago, was poor and without prestige. In the latest instance, the society was unlucky enough to catch in one of its numerous traps a bookseller who had sufficient influence to enlist noted counsel, a scholarly clientele, and a press campaign in his defense.

The Watch and Ward Society sent an agent some months ago to the Dunster House Bookshop in Cambridge to buy a copy of D. H. Lawrence's novel, "Lady Chatterly's Lover." The society knew that James A. DeLacey, the manager, had already sold five of the "obscene" books. The fact that three of the five had been sold to members of the Harvard faculty, one to "a prominent lawyer," and one to a book collector did not deter the society's directors. Temptation must be removed wherever it exists. The agent, John Tait Slaymaker, experienced representative of the society, approached DeLacey and his clerk, Joseph Sullivan. He said his name was "John Tait." This was no error of dishonesty but merely one of omission, according to Charles S. Bodwell, executive secretary of the society, who explained that Slaymaker's name had recently appeared in the news and "it would have been announcing himself an agent of the society to have used it in securing evidence." Slaymaker also said that he was an agent of the Automobile Legal Association. DeLacey and Sullivan told Slaymaker that they did not keep Lawrence's book in stock and had none at hand. Slaymaker was persistent and persuasive, and suggested that there might be ways of getting one. He returned another day and chance produced a second-hand copy from a Harvard student which DeLacey sold to him without profit.

After trial in the District Court of East Cambridge before Judge Arthur P. Stone, DeLacey was sentenced to pay a fine of $800 and spend four months in the House of Correction; Sullivan drew a $200 fine and two weeks in the House of Correction. The case was appealed to the Superior Court of Middlesex County. DeLacey waived jury trial and appeared before Judge Frederick W. Fosdick, with District Attorney Robert T. Bushnell prosecuting. Judge Fosdick found DeLacey guilty and sentenced him to pay a fine of $500 and spend one month in the House of Correction. The case of Sullivan, the clerk, was placed on file. DeLacey has appealed to the Supreme Court on technical exceptions. During the trial in the District Court Richard C. Evarts, well-known Harvard graduate, son of the Reverend Prescott Evarts, was subjected to a bitter tongue-lashing and was threatened with the charge of contempt of court by Judge Stone because he (Evarts) questioned the methods used by the Watch and Ward to procure the evidence.

The sentence in the District Court aroused the Harvard elements of Boston and Cambridge to an even greater extent than the banning of "Strange Interlude." It was the common tea-table and dinner talk in all Boston intellectual circles. The Boston Herald, in a vigorous editorial, dissected the Watch and Ward Society and its methods, pointing out incidentally that a number of former agents of the society had been convicted of crime. The board of directors of the society struck back with a letter to the Herald charging unfairness. It was signed by the Reverend Raymond Calkins, president, Godfrey L. Cabot, treasurer, Dr. Mark W. Richardson, Sumner Clement, Grosvenor Calkins, and Bernard J. Rothwell, former president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, directors. These gentlemen complained at the prominence given to the fact that the criminals referred to were once agents for the society. The editor of the Herald replied by again listing some of the former agents by name. "One of them, Joseph Farrell, a degenerate of the worst type, is now serving a thirty-year sentence." The campaign of the Herald and the Transcript whetted general as well as Harvard interest. (The Post alone upheld the censors' position.) Sympathetic Harvard students (who form a large part of the Dunster House Bookshop's clientele) started a subscription fund to pay DeLacey's fine and help him along during his incarceration.

When the case came up on appeal in the Superior Court, the courtroom was crowded. Mr. Evarts, more at home with pen than with tongue, had associated with him as defense counsel Herbert Parker, white-haired and elderly, former attorney general of the State. Mr. Parker elicited all the sordid details from Slaymaker of the Watch and Ward and his active superior, Mr. Bodwell. Then he pointed his patrician finger at the Watch and Warders and called them "depraved and perverted procurers . . . deceivers . . . falsifiers." He was so vehement that the Herald subsequently felt called upon to justify his words.

Meanwhile the prosecutor, District Attorney Bushnell, young Harvard graduate who is loudly steaming ahead to higher political office on his record of convictions in Middlesex County, found himself in a difficult position. To preserve his reputation as a "killer"—a name bestowed upon him by reporters—he must answer the immaculately fervent Mr. Parker. But if he convicted the favorite bookseller of Harvard intellectuals on charges of obscenity, what would his classmates, some of whom were among those same intellectuals, think of him? Mr. Bushnell was clever. He straddled the issue, stole part of the limelight from Mr. Parker, and received at the moment the uncritical praise of everyone concerned. He did this by attacking the Watch and Ward Society himself—the society which had induced him to prosecute DeLacey. He pounded the jury rail and shouted:

> I want the public to understand that the district attorney does not indorse the Watch and Ward Society's policy or tactics. I serve warning here and now that as long as I am district attorney of this district and agents of this society go into a bookstore of good repute and induce and procure the commission of a crime, I will proceed against them for criminal conspiracy.

Bravely spoken, cried the Herald. Bravely spoken, echoed those who had been thrilled by his words in the courtroom and in print. But then one or two reflective minds detected Mr. Bushnell's trick. Why not proceed against the society for criminal conspiracy in this case? Certainly it was as good a test case as any conscientious district attorney, holding the avowed sentiments of Mr. Bushnell, could possibly wish for.

Judge Fosdick, in finding DeLacey guilty, joined the chorus against the Watch and Ward. "I do think," said Judge Fosdick, "that the way in which the defendant was induced to sell the book calls for every part of the condemnation that has been placed on it by counsel for either side. . . . The Court entertains no cordiality for the society."

There was little or no discussion at the trial as to the meaning of obscenity and as to Lawrence's book in relation to that meaning. Defense counsel admitted that the book was obscene within the meaning of the Massachusetts statute. They did not object when the careering Mr. Bushnell labeled Lawrence "a filthy degenerate with a sewer brain." One wonders what these gentlemen of the bench and bar would say of Harvard faculty members and their wives who discuss the book as a serious attempt on the part of Lawrence to accomplish a significant and difficult task of writing. This faculty interest is hardly pornographic.

The drive on the society has continued with increasing vigor. The Herald epitomized the castigation from counsel, court, and prosecution, printed the list of officers and directors of the society, spoke of their prominence in the community, and suggested that "it is impossible these reprehensible methods have the indorsement of these gentlemen." The list includes, in addition to the names already mentioned: Bishop W. F. Anderson of the Methodist church, Rev. Daniel L. Marsh, president of Boston University, Rev. W. H. van Allen, Rev. Austin K. DeBlois, Rev. Endicott Peabody, Joseph Lee, and Arthur McArthur, all vice-presidents; Frank Chouteau Brown, Thomas Dudley Cabot, Francis J. Moors, Dr. David D. Scannell, and David Claghorn, directors. The blue blood of old New England is well represented in the list.

An amusing interlude was the resignation of Professor Julian Coolidge of Harvard from the society's board because, according to first newspaper reports, the Harvard boys are boycotting the particular Harkness house of which he is to be head next year. He later denied this, insisting that his resignation was prompted by mere press of duties connected with the new Harvard housing plan. And he showed a long waiting list of applicants for his house. But the later resignation of Bishop William Lawrence of the Episcopal church from his vice-presidency of the society could not be laughed away or concealed by silence. All the newspapers headlined his defection and gave as the reason his disapproval of the society's tactics. The bishop, however, has uttered not a word of denial or affirmation. In the face of this unprecedented attack some of the directors counterattacked with a bitter arraignment of young Mr. Bushnell and DeLacey's defenders. They held long meetings behind locked doors with "nothing to say" afterward. At one of these conferences a lengthy defense of the society's conduct was prepared for private distribution, over the signatures of Messrs. Calkins and Bodwell, to the 500 or more contributors to the society. It was a pitiful plea. The society, it said, was "founded by such men as Edward Everett Hale and Phillips Brooks. Some of Boston's best citizens have been in its service. It has achieved an international reputation in its field. It is entitled to be treated with some respect." It attempted to justify the agent's tactics in the DeLacey case by insisting at length that detective methods are essential to uncover such evidence and that government detectives would get nowhere without using them.

But the society's directors soon had another, volunteer defender. E. Tallmadge Root, executive secretary of the Massachusetts Federation of Churches, resented, as did many others, "the abuse being heaped upon" the Watch and Warders. "One who scatters cholera germs," he declared, "is less of a menace to society than one who sells an impure book." The Herald replied that if Mr. Root is right, DeLacey ought to go to the electric chair. Mr. Root replied by saying that he advocated abolition of the death penalty, with quotations from Christ and St. Paul and with the assertion that the underlying question is: Is our civilization to be pagan or Christian?

Meanwhile the booksellers, the Massachusetts Library Club, and a committee of prominent citizens have a well-organized campaign for their bill which changes the present law governing books primarily by substituting for the words, "containing obscene language," the words, "which considered as a whole is obscene." The Dunster Bookshop furor will sharpen the issue when it comes before the legislature just now convening. The bill, sponsored by Representative Henry Shattuck, treasurer of Harvard, has a fair chance of passing the Senate but probably not the House. Even if it is enacted, it seems to me that it will make little difference. The state of mind in administering a law often counts more than the law, and the Dunster House case shows the dilemma. The Reverend Raymond Calkins is a supporter of the American Civil Liberties Union, Joseph Lee is a member of the advisory board and one of the chief bulwarks of the Civil Liberties Committee of Massachusetts, yet these two men are, respectively, president and vice-president of the Watch and Ward Society.

With obscenity to be had in two-bit, four-bit, and six-bit lots at several theaters and burlesque shows, as well as in countless dirty magazines on the newsstands—in fact, wherever one hunts it—Mr. Calkins devotes the energy of his society to procuring a sale of Lawrence's book by deception. And there are plenty of legislators on Beacon Hill, and on many another legislative hill in America, who think he's right.

It must be frightfully uncomfortable to be "an expert" in obscenity—Mr. Bodwell told an interviewer that it takes "an expert to find the dirt in 'The Well of Loneliness.'" For relief from contemplation of this anguish of the Watch and Warders one turns with joy to the censor bill written by Eliot H. Paul and filed recently on Beacon Hill by Senator Henry Parkman, Jr. The first section of that bill reads as follows:

> Any person acting as censor of either books, plays, pictures, music, or dancing, for the commonwealth or any county, city, or town thereof, shall first pass a civil-service examination including the standard Binet intelligence test for mentality of eighteen years, general information and language test similar to those required for employees of the Boston Public Library, and shall submit to the State department of public health satisfactory evidence of normal sex experience.

Lame-Duck Diplomats

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, January 4

IF there was one concession that Herbert Hoover's critics were willing to make when he entered the White House, it was that he undoubtedly would seek to improve the quality of the country's foreign diplomatic service. He was no callow New England provincial, but a traveler who knew the world and its variegated politics, and was fully aware of the enormous disadvantages which the United States suffers from being officially represented abroad by men who speak but one language and speak it none too well. Having personally observed the ineptness or downright ignorance of these dressed-up bankers, brokers, pork packers, and publishers, it was natural to suppose that Mr. Hoover would replace them with emissaries having some knowledge of the history, language, policies, and problems of the respective countries to which they were accredited. Exactly the reverse has happened. We may pass over his selection of that 200 per cent patrioteering poseur, Charles G. Dawes, for the London post, although on at least one occasion the State Department has been seriously embarrassed by "Hell-and-Maria's" plain incompetence in reporting the facts of the British government's position on naval limitation. But what occurred when it was necessary to fill the position of second importance, that of Ambassador to France? Senator Walter E. Edge of New Jersey, a typical Babbitt, distinguished from other Old Guardsmen by his incoherence and the fogginess of his mental processes, was facing a stiff if not entirely hopeless fight for reelection. What did it matter that upon the attitude of the French government might depend the success or failure of the arms conference to which Mr. Hoover was hopefully looking forward? Senator Edge had been a faithful party henchman, he was very wealthy (from newspaper advertising), and his young wife had strong social inclinations. So off he went to Paris—and a few days ago all Washington chuckled when press dispatches reported that the Ambassador "sees nothing discouraging" in the French attitude toward the London conference. The word "discouraging" probably might have been omitted without any loss of accuracy.

* * * * *

BUT worse was yet to come. A few days ago the capital and the country were astounded by the announcement that Senator Sackett of Kentucky would be made Ambassador to Germany. A report of this appointment had been current for days, but it was treated as a joke. An obscure back-bencher known only for his timid manner and his panicky straddling on nearly every question that had arisen during his five years in the Senate, Sackett had made no impression on legislation. He ranked well down among such senatorial nonentities as Keyes of New Hampshire, Shortridge of California, and Trammell of Florida. And yet there must have been some reason for designating him to represent the United States at a capital whose policies will furnish one of the principal answers to the problem of future peace in Europe. There was: the explanation lay in the political situation in Kentucky. The backbone of the Republican organization in that State consists of the mountaineer vote of the Eastern counties. Its leader is Governor Flem Sampson, a Kentucky Heflin locally celebrated as "Flim-Flam Flem." To him and his gaunt cohorts the millionaire Sackett has always been a "Louisville dude," whose frightened sponsorship of an alien exclusion amendment to the census bill was not sufficient to win their trust. They were all set to retire him this year in favor of Representative John M. Robsion, a fire-eating, fundamentalist statesman of their own tribe. Since Sackett had announced his candidacy, and since his millions plus command of the Louisville machine would enable him to put up a struggle that would disrupt the party and probably insure Democratic victory in this important border State, it seemed incumbent on the party leaders, especially such leaders as National Chairman Huston and Senator George Moses, to do something. The answer to the problem presented by the prejudices of the Kentucky poor whites was found, of all places, in Berlin. Mr. Hoover is the first of our Presidents to save politicians from impending lame duckery by making them ambassadors. Another triumph for efficiency!

* * * * *

CHAIRMAN ALEXANDER LEGGE of the Farm Board continues to follow his own sweet will, and grower-owned and grower-controlled organizations for the marketing of agricultural products spring up in the West and South like gigantic mushrooms, although the grain trade has been quick to recognize the unmistakable and sinister odor of the toadstool. It begins to look as if the "pink-slip boys" really are through, unless Providence or some influence more powerful than Julius Barnes intervenes. Piteous cries issue from Minneapolis, Chicago, Duluth, and Kansas City; paunchy gentlemen who contributed real money for the defeat of Al Smith and the hated McNary-Haugen plan wear a look of betrayal, and George Akerson's gloom must be attributed to something more than the White House fire. Legge is not merely adamant, he is as bellicose as a badger, and the backward States are still guffawing over his blunt suggestion to President Butterworth that the United States Chamber of Commerce divest itself of economic theories that belonged to the horse-and-buggy era. At a press conference someone asked Chairman Legge what would become of all the "pink-slip boys" if he carried out his program of eliminating speculation. The Chairman replied that it was not one of his problems, but he chuckled grimly when someone else remarked that they might have to go back to work. This rough diamond from Chicago impresses me as being just about the brightest gem in the Administration's crown.

* * * * *

THE writer is sometimes accused of commenting in this place with undue severity on the professional courage and standards of his colleagues. It is true that to see newspaper men abasing themselves before such characters as Calvin Coolidge and Andrew Mellon, to see them presenting Jim Watson, John Tilson, and Bert Snell as statesmen, fills me with nausea. But it is often said in their defense that it is extremely difficult for a reporter to be any more honest than his newspaper. That is true. It requires no particular courage to write the truth for the Baltimore Sun, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, or the Scripps-Howard papers. Such newspapers as these expect it. But what would happen to the correspondent who tried to write the truth about "Coolidge economy" for the Boston Transcript, or about the Mellon tax refunds for the Philadelphia Public Ledger, or about the social lobby for the Washington Star? What would happen to any man who insisted on dishing up the bald truth about any Republican administration for such papers as the New York Herald Tribune, the Detroit Free Press, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, the Chicago Tribune, or the Los Angeles Times? The Washington corps of correspondents has its inevitable percentage of sycophants, climbers, politicians, and lads with an eye on the main chance, and it has, sad to relate, a solemn bevy of "gallery statesmen" who have been duped into a bogus sense of being "part of the Government," and hence bound to conceal its blunders and knaveries. But on the whole they are ten times better men than the owners of their papers. I present herewith my own Honor Roll of Washington correspondents for 1929:

JOHN A. KENNEDY and EDWARD L. RODDAN, of Universal Service, who dug up and printed the facts that led to public exposure of the Bingham-Eyanson tariff scandal.

PAUL R. MALLON and RAYMOND CLAPPER, of the United Press, who broke up secret executive sessions of the Senate on appointments, by publishing the secret roll call on the confirmation of ex-Senator Lenroot.

HAROLD BRAYMAN of the New York Evening Post, and PHELPS H. ADAMS, of the New York Sun, who discovered that the suspension of cruiser construction indicated in a White House statement last July actually never was ordered and did not occur.

M. FARMER MURPHY, of the Baltimore Sun, who investigated and wrote a remarkably illuminating series on conditions among the North Carolina mill workers, and capped it with a brilliantly ironical description of the reception by Senator Overman, first, of a party of sight-seeing plutocrats from that State, and immediately afterward, of a delegation of mill workers.

RUTH FINNEY, of the Scripps-Howard papers, whose reporting of the Boulder Dam legislation and the ensuing chicaneries ought to be emulated by several dozen of her masculine colleagues.

MARION L. RAMSAY, of Universal Service, who declined to join in the chorus of ecstatic ohs and ahs when the eminent Owen D. Young appeared before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, and proceeded to report the devastating truth about the Radio Corporation's claims as they were revealed in the subsequent cross-examinations.

DREW PEARSON, of the Baltimore Sun, who has startled the bureaucrats and shocked the poll-parrots by his realistic reporting of the conduct of our foreign relations.

ROBERT B. SMITH, of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, who despite poor health and a paper that is too stupid and reactionary to appreciate him, continues to exemplify for all of us the finest qualities of the true reporter—an insatiable zest for getting the truth, an incorruptible mind, a contempt for sham, a fluent style, and an irrepressible sense of humor under difficulties.

Ten Years of the League

By FELIX MORLEY

Geneva, December 3

THROUGHOUT the world plans are now being made for celebrating during January the tenth anniversary of the launching of the League of Nations. There will be banquets and speeches from Nanking to Cape Town. Russia will not be able to ignore the occasion and the United States will dine it with just as much enthusiasm as if Washington were the capital of a member state. Almost in spite of ourselves we are intrigued by the persistent vitality of an institution which President Harding years ago pronounced "dead."

Only one sizable city is likely to pass over the anniversary as a matter of course. That city is Geneva. Sir Eric Drummond, the thoughtful, tactful Secretary-General of the League, has always made it a positive policy to decry League self-advertisement. The laying of the cornerstone of the permanent buildings last September was an occasion of super-Jeffersonian simplicity. And Sir Eric will have his way again in January. "What's ten years in the life of the League?" he asks, and then with a Scotch twinkle, "I agree that when we get around to the hundredth anniversary we shall be justified in putting on a bit of a show." The evolution of the League has been so rapid that there is doubt as to the propriety of regarding the truly international institution of 1930 as the same organ which the victors in the World War created at Paris in 1919.

With the recession of the war and its problems into the background, the League is for the first time coming into its own. In the early days the greater part of its work was concentrated on such subjects as boundary disputes, plebiscites, prisoner repatriation, fiscal reconstruction in Central Europe, and other problems which were a direct heritage of the hostilities. But of late years the League has more and more turned its attention to problems of peace, though they are often none the less controversial. It concerns itself today with such questions as multilateral customs agreements looking toward a less hampered international trade, improvement in international transport and communications, examination of production problems affecting the economies of all countries, standardization of the purchasing power of gold, codification of international law, regulation of the traffic in dangerous drugs, international supervision of politically backward areas through the mandate system, and many other matters affecting the welfare of the world community. One of the best reasons for believing that this League, and no other, has come to stay is the increasing extent to which non-European states are calling upon it for vital work. It was to Geneva, not to the Pan-American Union, that the Bolivian government turned recently when it decided to reorganize its public-health service.

Side by side with the transformation in the character of the League's work a most interesting constitutional evolution has been in progress. Ten years is a short time to measure a development of this kind, but it is quite clear that changes have already come about which fundamentally alter the mechanism designed at Paris in 1919. The Secretariat is a much more expert, influential, and potent organ than anyone then thought it would be. Because its members are always on the job of organizing international cooperation they have developed not merely an international viewpoint, but, what is more significant, unsuspected powers and directive abilities which make it a strong force in international relations.

Pari passu has come an increase of the authority of the Secretary-General. This international official, who holds a life appointment and is subject to a regular accounting at the triannual Council and annual Assembly sessions, may in the future be much more in the public eye than at present. Sir Eric Drummond, the first and present "S. G.," is a retiring individual who exercises the greatest caution in utilizing the large theoretical powers within his grasp. Will Drummond's eventual successor, who by the politics of the present situation is likely to be a Frenchman, be equally diplomatic? It is a question of great importance, for the wrong kind of man in this potentially autocratic post could go far toward wrecking all the careful work of the past decade. Incidentally, the title of Secretary-General gives a very inaccurate idea of the large executive powers in the hands of that official. He would be much better described had the originally suggested title of chancellor been kept. We recall how much authority a medieval chancellor could acquire in the reign of a weak king. The League Council, composed of busy men with widely varying viewpoints on many problems, is, as a composite, the inevitably weak king to the chancellor of the League.

The growing authority of the Secretariat illustrates one of the substantial difficulties in the present relationship between the United States and the League. As everyone knows, official cooperation between Washington and Geneva has been steadily increasing, though the formality of keeping our legation at Berne as intermediary is still observed. We are now represented, either officially or quasi-officially, on a good half of the threescore international committees and commissions engaged under League auspices in studies of more than transient importance. But among the 700 members of the League Secretariat, the different sections of which serve as planning and strategy boards for the appropriate international commissions which meet at Geneva periodically, there are only a half-dozen Americans, and these with no official standing whatsoever. While the United States is generally in a position, then, to block League policies which it does not like, it is handicapped in initiating plans for international cooperative action which it favors. To take a concrete case, the American representative on the Economic Committee can there point out that it is useless to expect our cooperation in a world program for lowering tariffs on aluminum, but he cannot tell that body in what specific respect it may expect American cooperation. Our present negative intimacy with the League seems to spring from the tendency of the Administration to associate itself ever more closely with all the technical work at Geneva, while Congress as a whole remains in the most profound ignorance of what the League is doing. The anomalous situation created is one which can scarcely continue indefinitely.

Yet it is probably due partially to the almost surreptitious nature of American participation that the beginnings of a change of very great importance are now apparent in the League's technique. This change is coming in the theory of international administration, a theory which was really born with the various interallied control commissions which had to be set up to win the war.

Before the war, as Sir Arthur Salter has pointed out, such international administration as existed had to be initiated through the clumsy and inexpert method of foreign-office collaboration. If some problem arose affecting the mutual agricultural interests of X, Y, and Z, it could be solved only by treaties laboriously concluded between X and Y, X and Z, and Y and Z, treaties in which the technical agricultural needs of all three countries were sure to be subordinated to diplomatic considerations. From the outset the League has tried to substitute a more scientific method, by bringing together on its various technical commissions men who could speak not merely for their governments, but more particularly for specialized interests with the care of which their governments are charged. Thus, officials from the ministries of agriculture of X, Y, and Z confer with colleagues from a score of other countries in a League commission at Geneva. If the subject at issue is susceptible of settlement, this direct relationship between the appropriate government officials will point a way to much more fruitful collaboration than when contacts were limited to the foreign offices.

International cooperation, at first carried on through the medium of a single government department in each country—the state department or foreign office—has through the agency of the League developed into a whole network of contacts between most of the government departments of the participating nations. In the development of the science of politics this is obviously a step of great importance, and its perfection has been one of the most notable achievements of the League's first decade. Only the traditions of the past—the idea that the public are more interested in conversations between the French and German foreign ministers at Geneva than they are in the more basic negotiations between the French and German ministers of commerce and industry—have prevented the extent of the development from being generally realized. But even those Americans who have appreciated the possibilities of the new theory of international administration have found themselves baffled as to how the United States could best play its part therein. There is not merely the artificial obstacle caused by the fact that our departmental officials and experts cannot frequently be appointed to membership on League commissions as long as we try to maintain the fiction that the organization is primarily a European affair. There is the deeper difficulty that both the tradition and the technique of American government are largely opposed to such an enforcement of bureaucratic power. The popularity of state socialism in Europe is something alien to most American minds. And it has not escaped unnoticed that the original League technique was something which would develop international bureaucratic cooperation—superimpose a sort of interstate socialism upon the state socialism of the past.

Therefore, it was not only the least provocative way, but also the natural American way, to have most of our first appointments to League commissions those of private citizens, who acted, however, with tacit government approval. The American representative on the League Economic Committee, for instance, is not a representative of the Department of Commerce, though most of his colleagues are officials of the analogous departments in their own governments. On the contrary, he is an active business man, a former president of the Merchants' Association of New York, an ideal spokesman for thousands of his fellows in large-scale commercial affairs. As is the case with Lucius Eastman, so also with Jeremiah Smith, American representative on the League's Financial Committee. Mr. Smith has no official connection with the Treasury Department, but he is for that reason none the less able to present the attitude of American finance on international problems.

In other words, our active participants in League work are to a large extent functional rather than governmental spokesmen. And it is a matter of great interest to close students of the League that this policy, adopted quite naturally by the United States, is now being followed to an increasing extent by other countries. Along with their bureaucrats they are also sending leading technicians, industrialists, and financiers to speak as representative nationals on League commissions. This new stage is one which is coming the more naturally because the International Labor Office has always done its share of the League's work on a functional basis, employers and labor being represented separately from their governments. And while the trend is too recent to make it advisable to overemphasize the point, it requires no ardent imagination to realize that it may be one of great significance. But in any case, the gradual substitution of a basically syndicalist for a basically socialist technique would make American cooperation with the League much easier. For we know that Mr. Babbitt would not hate the I.W.W. so much if Rotary and syndicalism did not have a common philosophical basis.

The steadily increasing power of the Secretariat and the rapid development of administrative technique on the part of the international commissions which the Secretariat serves (and sometimes does much to direct) are vital changes of the League's first decade which have passed almost unnoticed in the public eye. Much more attention has been paid to the obvious changes in its parliamentary organs, the Council and the Assembly. And it is noticeable that while the technical commissions are developing the idea of functional representation, both Council and Assembly are becoming accurately representative of the governments of the member states.

The Council is today a much less dominant organ than was anticipated by those who framed the Covenant of the League during the peace conference. To mention only the most striking outward alteration, the Great Powers are no longer numerically supreme. The five permanent members, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan, are now outnumbered nearly two to one by the nine non-permanent members, three of which are elected by the Assembly every year for three-year terms. One effect of this change, among others, has been to make the Council much more nearly an executive cabinet for the Assembly than the upper legislative house to which the smaller body has sometimes been falsely compared.

Actually, though not theoretically, the executive functions of the Council are shared in an undefinable degree with the heads of the Secretariat. These full-time servants of the League are frequently better informed on problems before the Council than are the busy national statesmen who control the latter. The Council, however, still maintains in latent form the powers attributed to it by the framers of the Covenant. It formally appoints, though the Secretariat may actually name, the personnel of the various international commissions. The reports of these commissions must receive Council approval before they take the form of international conventions to be acted upon by the governments of the world. And no development of the World Court or of other machinery to preserve peace is likely to rob the Council of its essential function as a tribune of first instance for the consideration of problems affecting peace.

The Assembly, on the other hand, is steadily tending to increase its authority and to develop powers which few people in Paris in 1919 thought this "talking shop" would ever dream of assuming. Its growing importance is reflected in the character of the national delegations which compose it. At the First Assembly, for instance, only four European nations were represented by their foreign ministers, while at the Tenth Assembly, last September, only four European nations failed to send their foreign ministers. In the case of non-European countries, it is now the custom for the national delegation to be headed by the dean of the diplomats accredited to Europe, though even lands distant from Geneva are beginning to send those responsible for foreign policy to the annual sessions, as Cuba and Panama did in 1929. The result of this concentration of authority is that the Assembly is becoming a great world forum for public declarations of national policy. It is not merely the League program, but also a general picture of the current foreign policy of all the member states, which is adumbrated in the formal Assembly speeches each September.

Less dramatic, but no less important, has been the development of the Assembly organization, which now functions with an almost too machine-like precision. With the development of this organization the Assembly has taken over from the Council the control of League finance and thereby established its right to be considered the most important of the League organs. At the last Assembly preliminary steps were taken toward giving this body a permanent organization which would be prepared to function during the eleven months of the year when the Assembly is not in formal session. It is the smaller nations, notably Norway, which have taken the lead in increasing the power of the Assembly. Yet it is only eleven years since Lord Robert Cecil observed with engaging frankness that in the work of the League "the smaller Powers will in any case not exercise any considerable influence."

The rapid organic development of the League—in itself probably a symptom of health and vitality—does not stop short with the central mechanism of Secretariat and commissions, Council and Assembly. The International Labor Office, founded perhaps on too grandiose a scale because of the feeling that it would prove a counter-attraction to Bolshevism in the workers' minds, has now settled down as an important, though secondary, technical and humanitarian arm of the League. The Permanent Court of International Justice is closely linked with Geneva as the League's supreme tribunal. Before the International Bank is organized, pressure to bring it under the League aegis gets under way. Undoubtedly, those who maintain that American membership in either court or labor office or bank would be a move toward membership in the League are correct in that conclusion.

In short, evolution has brought about a League of Nations which is very different from that sketched out in Paris during those recent, yet very distant, days when the Allied representatives sought a compromise between the ideal of an organized world community and an organization which should serve to stereotype the war-time settlements. The old emphasis on the enforcement of peace has passed. The idea of a League army is a patent absurdity to anyone who knows of the direction in which the League is going. As the fog of suspicion passes away, Americans see a patient, tireless, and unspectacular organization working to secure peace by the development of cooperative agencies for the mutual benefit of all. Successes in this line are not of the type to create newspaper headlines, but perhaps they are none the less vital for that. And more and more we see revealing indications that along with its daily grind the League is bringing a new outlook upon world politics. The Chinese representative at the last Assembly proclaimed with no open protest that the time is drawing near for that body to exercise its authority under Article XIX of the Covenant, which says: "The Assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by members of the League of treaties which have become inapplicable. . . ."

Thus it is that here in Geneva a formal anniversary—even the tenth—is subordinate in interest to the limitless possibilities of the unfolding future. The League looks forward, not back, and leaves the dead past to bury its dead. Too much is being done, too much remains to be done, to linger at this early milestone on a road where the way ahead is just beginning to be clear.

In the Driftway

WILL science save us from war? Robert A. Millikan said it would in his presidential address before the American Association for the Advancement of Science the other day, but the Drifter thinks that in that particular the distinguished physicist was not on as firm ground as elsewhere in his remarks. He relaxed as a scientist to become a prophet, and although Dr. Millikan is not without honor in his own country, that honor has come to him for his science, not for his prophesying. The Drifter might hesitate to attack Dr. Millikan as a scientist, but prophecy is everybody's domain and one in which the Drifter finds himself especially at home because there is little responsibility attached to it—and practically no retribution. In fact, prophecies are usually forgotten unless they come true. Dr. Millikan is quoted as saying:

> In my judgment, war is now in process of being abolished, chiefly by this relentless advance of science, its most powerful enemy. It has existed in spite of religion, and in spite of philosophy, and in spite of social ethics, and in spite of the Golden Rule, since the days of the caveman . . . simply because it has had survival value.
>
> It will disappear like the dinosaur when, and only when, the conditions which have given it survival value have disappeared, and those conditions are disappearing now, primarily because of changes in the world situation being brought about by the growth of modern science.

The Drifter can see nothing in the history of science, unfortunately, that justifies such a position. If Dr. Millikan is using the word science in its strict sense as knowledge of the physical world, then it is almost a truism that science has done nothing about war since time began except to make it more deadly. During the past century the physical sciences have advanced more than they did for a thousand years preceding. Yet the past hundred years, in which science has risen side by side with the capitalist system of industry, have seen a prodigious increase in the scope if not in the causes of war. Present economic tendencies are all away from competition among individuals or small groups and toward fights among great cartels or combinations, each backed by its respective government, the latter supported by a nationalistic patriotism which has largely displaced the old-time religions in its emotional and unreasoning character.

* * * * *

JUST previous to 1914 Norman Angell suggested the incompatibility of internationalized industry and war. It didn't turn out quite that way, and one surmises that advancing science will of itself be equally powerless to prevent war. We shall have, after all, to call upon philosophy, which Dr. Millikan—in the quoted statement—would seem to regard as impotent. In other words, the one probable cure for war is the adoption of cooperation in industry, individual and national, in place of the present insane, cut-throat competition, the essence of which is mutual extermination. Meanwhile war will continue to have its "survival value." Human beings will have to progress further toward reasonable and reasoning animals before they can banish the specter of war, no matter how much they possess of science. And here it is interesting to remark the ideas expressed before the American Philosophical Association by William Ernest Hocking of Harvard University the day after Dr. Millikan's address. Denying the popular notion that Americans are flexible—that is, real—thinkers, Professor Hocking said:

> It is because we are dominantly a people of deeds that we are inclined to be a dogmatic nation, believing stiffly in eternal principles, final convictions, natural rights, an unchanging Constitution, and mechanical theologies. The great public work of the instrumental philosophy has been to limber up the ways of knowing of this people, to give the intellectually traditional, authority-making, hero-worshiping American the courage of his own experience.

* * * * *

THE Drifter sees immense possibilities in modern philosophy and psychology for the direction and control of the human mind, so that man in a surprisingly short time may make astounding gains in rationalism. We are not impossibly at the beginning of a great mental age just as we are in the midst of a great material one. There lies the end of war rather than in science, which has never done anything but stand behind the ropes, fan the fighters when they flop in their corners, and push them out again with a fresher, more deadly punch in their fists.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

New York Has Magistrates

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I should like to register my protest against the undeserved tongue-lashing given to young David Weiss by Magistrate Sabbatino. When I read the case, I thought that the decision had been rendered in some small "hick" town. Imagine, therefore, my surprise and disgust when I read that the case had been decided in a court of enlightened New York.

How is it possible for a magistrate completely to ignore the charge on which young Weiss was arraigned in order to challenge his political beliefs?

New York, December 30 D. Halpern

And There You Are!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the Christmas Day edition of the Chicago Tribune was a news item to the effect that Cardinal Mundelein's chauffeur-driven $14,000 limousine was stolen. (It was promptly recovered.) I may be mistaken, of course, but in my naive way I associate the ownership of such an expensive automobile with wealth—with great wealth even. Jesus admonished men that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. Cardinal Mundelein evidently prefers his heaven on earth.

In the same issue of the Chicago Tribune, several columns removed from the report of the theft of Cardinal Mundelein's limousine, are to be found glowing accounts of the felicity spread among Chicago's poor by the "Good Fellows." Thirty-three hundred of these "Good Fellows," recruited by the Chicago Tribune, made one day in the year pleasant for some 22,000 of the most indigent of the city's "have-nots." Which is very nice. But what about the other 364 days?

I even make so bold as to hint that most, if not all, of these miserable poor would have been better off if they had never been born, and that they probably wouldn't have been if a plutocratically endowed church, in conjunction with the state, hadn't kept them in the dark about such matters as birth control. Cardinal Mundelein, high representative of the Christ, is driven around in a $14,000 limousine. The Catholic church is uncompromisingly against birth control. And there you are.

Chicago, December 25 Mandel Packard

Two Monopolies

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have read with great interest an article in a recent issue of your periodical by Mr. Paul Anderson in which two monopolies are described, one being the radio trust and the other The Nation. The radio trust monopolizes the air and The Nation monopolizes intelligence about the air monopoly. I believe Mr. Anderson did suggest that occasionally he sent a brief item about the radio trust to his own paper, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Inadvertently I have been guilty of a feeble effort to interfere with your intelligence monopoly. I attended Senate committee hearings on the radio trust, consulted Mr. Anderson, conferred with him, and actually wrote a few thousand words about the probe for the Raleigh, N. C., News and Observer. It did not occur to me that anybody had a monopoly on the reports. Imagine my surprise when I learned of your claim. If you feel that I am unduly intruding, I suggest that you get out an injunction. The radio trust would surely do so if I intruded into its exclusive patent field.

Washington, January 1 John A. Livingstone

Prejudice North and South

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The N. Y. U.-Georgia football game was played many weeks ago, but I read your comment on the Myers episode, which occasions this letter, only quite recently. I think one can assume with confidence that you would like to see an end of Southern prejudice against the Negro.

May I remind you what a relative thing tolerance is? The prejudiced Southerner is not alone in drawing the color line; he simply draws it at a different place from where his "unprejudiced" Northern brother draws it. The former balks at playing football with the Negro; the latter balks at having him marry into his own family. In France the degree of difference would be thought small.

Viewing race hatred as a social phenomenon flourishing inevitably in certain environments all over the world, with causes that can be as readily adduced as the causes for, say, goiter, scurvy, and pellagra, one is puzzled by the rancor with which you so insistently styled the youngsters on the Georgia football team "Southern gentlemen." Surely in an era as scientific as this one there are better expedients for fighting fire than fire itself.

Albemarle, N. C., December 6 L. J. McGinty

The "Lie-Detector"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The "lie-detector" used by the prosecuting attorney here is all that you say it is in the Driftway of December 11. But you evidently didn't get the last report. You will be glad to learn that when the "evidence" so obtained came before Judge Malcolm Douglas, he ruled against recognition of it and ordered the prosecutor to discontinue the use of the instrument, at which that gentleman was sorely aggrieved.

The case is one that has aroused considerable feeling against the accused man, but despite that and despite the deplorable apathy with which the public usually regards the administration of justice, the use of this modern instrument of torture has not added anything to the prestige of Mr. Colvin, the prosecutor. The local Hearst paper, the Post-Intelligencer, made much of the device and its use, in the sensational and unscrupulous manner of certain newspapers of the day, but after several days of glaring headlines, numerous photographs, and reams of copy, the entire business suddenly collapsed.

The "Oregon boot" which was mentioned in the account you read is the name formerly applied to a strap fastened to the ankle to which was attached a piece of iron shaped somewhat like a pick. These were used on prisoners working in road gangs to encumber their movements. It hardly seems necessary to handicap a man who is safely behind prison walls, but our prosecutor's mind evidently is of a medieval cast. It is also possible that what is here spoken of as the "Oregon boot" is an entirely different contrivance from the one which was known by that name among migratory workers of the West ten or fifteen years ago.

Seattle, December 16 Victoria Marshang

Books and Drama

These Humble People

By EDA LOU WALTON

Looking upon their mountains all day long
Where shadows slipping downward like cooled lava
Leave the white heart burning;
Looking upon their mountains crumbling
To ashes in the windy night,
These humble people never lift their hands
Palm-lit in prayer to sunlight, never carve
Their granite to thin altars toward unpitying skies.
Heaven will have its way, they know,
Even with mountains, smelting them in sun,
And shadows will run downward into valleys;
Under some star these iron peaks will flow
Like ribbons out across the pit of night,
They know, and they have followed with their hands
This sure decay,
Have seen the flesh withering on the bough,
And the tree ash; and will not pray
Before their graven images.
To mountains which endure beyond their sight
They look, and pass their hands before their eyes
And stare on darkness, hearing rivers run
Under the stone, and wings beat down piled dust.

Insight and Charm

Lord Lansdowne: A Biography. By Lord Newton, P.C. The Macmillan Company. $8.50.

LORD NEWTON'S charming biography of Lord Lansdowne is a joy to the casual reader no less than to the serious scholar. Any intelligent person will delight in the skill, the humor, and the sympathetic but independent attitude with which one British aristocrat has drawn the portrait of another great personality. The serious student of history and politics will admire Lord Newton's perfect acquaintance with the vast mass of documents now available on pre-war diplomacy, his self-restraint in quoting but sparingly from it, and the judiciousness with which he has drawn fresh material from the Lansdowne papers to supplement it.

Lord Lansdowne, who was born in 1845, was well qualified by inheritance for diplomacy, as his grandfather was probably Talleyrand and not Count de Flahault. He entered office under Gladstone, but soon resigned because he profoundly disapproved, as a great Irish landlord, of some of Gladstone's legislation for Ireland. Under a Conservative government, as Governor-General of Canada and Viceroy of India, his tact, industry, and good sense brought him success. He introduced no striking changes, but he avoided serious blunders, and that is saying much. Becoming Secretary of War in the Salisbury Cabinet of 1895, he had the ungrateful task of conducting the Boer War until Lord Salisbury's failing health and resignation brought him to the head of the Foreign Office in the autumn of 1900.

The new Foreign Secretary had difficult furrows to plow in a flinty soil. The Germans were raging over the treatment of the Boers. The French were still sore over Fashoda. The Russians held to their traditional hostility. Lord Lansdowne was desirous of better relations with the Kaiser, but the obstacles in the way of an alliance were too great. Lord Newton is undoubtedly correct in his view that the failure of the alliance negotiations with Germany was not altogether Germany's fault; but even if successful, "William II would have been almost intolerable as an ally." The failure of the German negotiations was followed by the alliance with Japan and the entente with France. The credit for the latter belongs mainly to Lansdowne and Paul Cambon. Edward VII's influence, Lord Newton thinks, has been greatly exaggerated in this connection. Delcassé he depicts as secretive and unreliable, a man "whose stock of courage barely lasted long enough to achieve a successful result, and who imperiled the whole agreement by haggling over details in the final stages of the negotiations." Delcassé's claim in 1905 that Lansdowne had promised British armed support Lord Newton declares to have been the preposterous figment of the French minister's imagination. But he also quotes a letter from Lord Sanderson that in 1905 "there was some loose talk by Lord Fisher and even more exalted persons as to a possible landing on the Schleswig coast." This seems to support the view which the present reviewer has ventured to express that Sir John Fisher's reckless utterances may have been part of the basis of Delcassé's exaggerated claim about British promises of support.

Lord Lansdowne was never obsessed by the anti-German hysteria which afflicted some of his countrymen. He regretted that England did not cooperate at the outset in the building of the Bagdad Railway. He found it difficult to deal with such a theatrical, susceptible, and unstable person as the Kaiser, but was forced to admit that his own sovereign's attitude was embarrassing; Edward VII wrote and talked about the Kaiser, he says, "in terms which make one's flesh creep, and the official papers which go to him, whenever they refer to H. I. M., come back with all sorts of annotations of a most incendiary character."

Lord Lansdowne's famous peace letter of November, 1917, which certainly contributed to the formulation of Wilson's Fourteen Points, brought down a storm of criticism on his old head. Geoffrey Dawson hesitated to accept it for the London Times, but Lord Burnham was glad to print it in the Daily Telegraph. It is often spoken of as though it originated in a sudden fit of pessimism; Lord Newton shows that it was almost identical with a memorandum which Lansdowne laid before the Cabinet a year earlier, and that it expressed his long-felt conviction that the Allies should come to a clear understanding as to reasonable terms of peace and the possibility of Germany's acceptance of them.

Lord Newton frequently indulges in interesting and often humorous comments. He concludes his highly diverting account of the Persian Shah's struggle for the Garter, which King Edward at first refused to give him, with a sage observation on "how large a part decorations played, and presumably still play, in exalted circles" as valuable assets in diplomacy. In connection with the decisive letter of August 2, 1914, pledging the support of the Conservatives to Sir Edward Grey, the author says the Germans were unlucky in making war when a Liberal government was in office in England, "for it is inconceivable that a Conservative government, under similar circumstances, could have received assurances of support from a united Liberal Party." Lansdowne's success as leader in such a peculiar body as the House of Lords was owing to "his gift of suffering fools gladly."

Not the least attractive feature of the volume are the photographs and cartoons picturing Lord Lansdowne in varied activities from a boy of thirteen to a sportsman of eighty landing a twenty-one pound fish.

Sidney B. Fay

Russian Irony

The Embezzlers. By Valentine Kataev. Translated from the Russian by L. Zarine. With an Introduction by Stephen Graham. The Dial Press. $2.50.

THIS is an excellent and beautifully translated story of two very ordinary exemplars of the human species: two Soviet citizens—a henpecked, middle-aged accountant who in his reveries of "high life" imagines himself to be "that wonderful and unattainable Count Guido . . . who . . . leaped on his charger . . . etc. . . ." and an impressionable, hero-worshiping little cashier, his subordinate. Inadvertently, as a result of a few innocent drinks on top of a romantic disposition, these most ordinary citizens launch upon a dizzy career of embezzlement and drunken debauchery. They begin in Moscow but, before realizing it, they find themselves, with the pay-roll in their pockets and a harlot by their side, en route for Leningrad, the imagined El Dorado. Thereafter, through a phantasmagoria of trains, cabs, clubs, and doss-houses, in the company of prostitutes, ex-princesses, paupers, and peasants, our adventurers, while the money lasts, fatuously pursue a "vaguely imagined" but "never attained" ecstasy. Finally the moment comes when, their money gone, they are forced to pawn their overcoats and, beaten and despondent, make their way back to Moscow. The story ends with the sorry spectacle of two desolate knights errant marching to prison.

In his introduction Stephen Graham praises this "very clever book . . . written in the vein of Gogol's 'Dead Souls' " as "more real in detail and color than any picture given us" of Soviet Russia, and as the cause of much "whole-hearted laughter." This praise brings to mind an episode famous in the annals of Russian letters. Once, the story goes, Gogol was reading to Pushkin chapters from "Dead Souls." At first the great poet laughed "whole-heartedly" at Gogol's immortal Chichikov and his roguish schemes. Gradually, however, as the reading progressed, and as the distressing gallery of grafting officials and savage serf-owners, the Sobakeviches, Pliushkins, Manilovs, and Korobochkas passed before his eyes, the poet grew terribly silent and morose. At the end, utterly crushed, he muttered: "What a wretched, wretched place our Russia is!"

One wonders what the poet's reaction would have been to "The Embezzlers," a work so similar in vein to "Dead Souls." On me, I confess, this novel has a strangely depressing effect. And this, I am certain, is not at all due to any outraged sense of civic virtue, or to any belief that the picture of Soviet Russia presented by Kataev is "more real in detail and color than any picture given us" of that country. On the contrary, the dire punishment of the peculators is enough to appease the most vindictive virtue, while the fact that "The Embezzlers" is a satire is reassuring evidence that it is not "more real" than many another picture given us of Soviet life. Clearly, a satire is never, strictly speaking, real; it is a caricature, a distortion; it emphasizes out of all proportion one feature, one aspect, one phase of a very complex reality. Indeed, there are numerous Russian books, many of them obtainable in English translation (Veresaiev's "Deadlock," Pilniak's "Naked Year," Babel's "Cavalry Sketches," Libedinsky's "A Week," Tolstoy's "Azure Cities," Gladkov's "Cement," Ognyov's "Diary of a Communist Schoolboy"), that would correct any such lopsided notion of Soviet Russia as one might form from reading the present satire. Moreover, the high literary quality of the story as well as the large measure of self-criticism contained in it is further striking proof of the great vitality of Russian letters, and of the generous latitude granted to Soviet writers by the Communist censor. Seen thus from a purely Russian point of view, Kataev's novel, despite the lurid light it throws on the "strange peculations prevalent in the offices of the Soviet trusts," is distinctly hope-inspiring.

It is the universal, all-human implications of the book that are depressing. It is the realization that this story is as American or German or Chinese as it is Russian, and that the two unfortunate heroes, so utterly innocent of any wrong intentions, so pathetically frustrated in their delirious pursuit after a will-o'-the-wisp, are replicas of the vast majority of mankind, that is depressing. The story contains neither the purifying exaltation of tragedy nor the amusing relief of comedy. What it does have is a dark, persistent, haunting, and in its cumulative effect utterly crushing overtone of irony—an irony which, rising as it does above any particular time or place, provokes anything but "whole-hearted" laughter.

JOSHUA KUNITZ

An American Knight

The Book of Arthur Gleason. My People. By Arthur Gleason. "A. G.": An Appreciation. By Helen Hayes Gleason. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

I FEEL as I lay down "The Book of Arthur Gleason" that it represents the man infinitely better than a complete, proportionate work all neated up about the edges. Seventy-five pages of his essays and private writings, varying between mere chips from his literary workshop to pages of astonishing beauty, completeness, and meaning; a hundred and fifty pages of scattered but vital reminiscence by Mrs. Gleason; the book has no conscious pattern. But it depicts him as no biography, novelized after the modern plan, could possibly do. It has not been necessary to prune episodes and incidents to fit a plot of action or character, to prove a thesis. Such a book might have created a fine picture; this conveys a thing of flesh and blood, a man.

And what a man—above all, what an American! The book, I think, would have proved that to me even had I not known Arthur Gleason. We are not likely again to see in our time such a flowering of the American colonial breed. He had even the background. There was distinguished public service in his ancestry, including a signer of the Declaration; and almost typically he was a minister's son. He had the aristocratic mind, which sees and judges everything from the standpoint of taste and tolerance, along with thoroughly democratic instincts and beliefs. That combination, it seems to me, has marked all our great Americans of the old stock from Washington down. He abandoned early the dogmatic Puritanism in which he was reared but he kept the fine essence of Puritanism in the obligations which he laid upon his own soul—the Puritanism not of Praise-God Barebones and Cotton Mather, but of Milton and Emerson. That old-American stock was a breed of poets, whether they expressed themselves in action like John Brown and Kit Carson, in daily speech like Lincoln, or on paper like Whitman. That streak infused not only those fine-cut sentences of the essays, but his daily life; as witness the tender fantasy of the Star which Mrs. Gleason records.

Though in politics he saw the necessity of collective forces, he was personally an individualist almost to madness. He quit even the old Collier's, where he might have been happy if anywhere in chains, because his spirit could not endure the time-clock. His faction in politics was mostly anti-Ally in the early stages of the late war. He saw for himself during the German advance into Belgium, and became convinced that what he desired of this world could never come to fulfilment if Germany won. Being what he was, he could not draw without shooting, could not let others bear the burden of his beliefs.

So he tried, simply and quietly, to enlist in the British army. Refused, he became heart and soul of a free-lance "ambulance outfit" in Flanders, braving the concentrated German shell-fire to save the lives of the wounded. In this service he was not the knight without fear and reproach; he has confessed that himself. Better, he was the knight with fear and without reproach. He faced danger as any man of imagination must, and faced it imperturbably nevertheless.

He had a touch of that cosmic consciousness which has marked all our greater American mystics like Whitman, Thoreau, and Lincoln. Above all, he radiated kindness. I am not exaggerating my conviction when I call this quality of his Christ-like. Mrs. Gleason, in her simple, eloquent, delicately reserved narrative of her husband's life with her, cites a few instances; I could cite many more. When they met, he was keeping his nose to the grindstone putting a boy through college, helping a friend in difficulties, "carrying people." Though he needed money desperately at the time, he gave most of the receipts from his war books to war charities. Miraculously, he finished the war a thousand dollars ahead of the game. Though the worldly-wise considered the investment very risky, he put the money into French bonds; he wanted to do his bit to help a people with whose sufferings he had suffered, and whom he admired. I think sometimes of those boys who died in his arms in Flanders. Their passing had better benediction than any priest could give.

I had forgotten until I renewed acquaintance in these essays how well Gleason wrote, what a mastery he had of his working tools. It may be association with him, it may be inherent quality, but Mrs. Gleason's writing, in the major part of this book, has something of the same final and simple poetic quality as her husband's. In recommending it as a whole, I am obliged to fall back on an old Samuel Smiles phrase of my boyhood; it is "a good book to put into the hands of youth." For here, all expressed, is the finest model for American manhood and gentlemanhood that I have known in my time.

WILL IRWIN

Speculation

A History of Financial Speculation. By R. H. Mottram. Little, Brown, and Company. $4.

THIS volume has little significance for those who have participated in the recent campaign on the New York stock exchange. It contains no recipes for bulls or bears who seek rules for reducing losses or increasing gains by trading in securities. On the other hand, the student of history may, by close and attentive reading, find clues to the forces which have determined the development of the economic life of the world.

Speculation is generously interpreted. It applies to all human activity which is directed to the acquisition of more than is needed for immediate consumptive wants, for the purpose of trading such acquisition for gain. According to Mr. Mottram, this activity is inherent in human nature, for his narrative opens with several pages describing the flint-mining industry of a neolithic tribe in England, as an illustration of primitive efforts to produce more than could be personally or directly used. Speculation is of immemorial antiquity. Speculation in brief is "dealing in fluctuating values." As long as there are fluctuating values, there will be speculation. But economic institutions are becoming more and more stabilized, and monopolies, in whose soil speculation thrives, are less and less potent. The leveling-up processes of democracy are gradually lessening inequalities. Mr. Mottram's exposition is much broader than his title and concerns political and commercial movements as well as the narrower field of financial investments.

Mr. Mottram traces the rise of financial speculation from ancient times through the development of banking and commercial institutions in Italy, Holland, and England down to the present time. Unfortunately the material is not well organized. The reader jumps back and forth from one country to another—from England to France, to Germany, and occasionally to the United States, frequently seeking in vain for dates which will record his rapid progress. The author, formerly a banker and more recently the recipient of the Hawthornden prize for the "Spanish Farm" trilogy, has read widely, but only those who have a well-stocked background of historical knowledge can follow his comments and interpretation with utmost advantage. With this background, one will find the scholarly analysis illuminating and suggestive.

DAVIS R. DEWEY

Hardly Worth While

The Sound and the Fury. By William Faulkner. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

PROBABLY someone has already remarked that the perfect enjoyment of great literature involves two factors. The reader should make an analysis of the methods employed by the artist to produce a given effect; and at the same time he should experience a synthetic appreciation of that effect in its emotional totality. The analysis must be almost instantaneous, almost unconscious. Otherwise the reader may become enmeshed in a tangle of aesthetic judgments, and experience difficulty in feeling the work of art as a whole.

Here, perhaps, lies the problem of comprehending the present-day revolutionary novelist. Frequently the intelligent reader can grasp the newer literary anarchies only by an effort of analytical attention so strained that it fatigues and dulls his emotional perception. He is so occupied in being a detective that by the time he has to his own satisfaction clarified the artist's intentions and technique he is too worn out to feel anything further. This is why the Joycean method of discontinuity has been entirely successful only when applied to materials of Joycean proportions. For it is obvious that if the theme is sufficiently profound, the characters sufficiently extraordinary, the plot sufficiently powerful, the reader is bound to absorb some of all this despite the strain on his attention. But if, after an interval of puzzle-solving, it dawns upon him that the action and characters are minuscular, he is likely to throw the book away in irritation. The analysis has taken too long for the synthesis to be worth the trouble.

This seems to me to be the case with "The Sound and the Fury," a novel by an extremely talented young writer dealing with the mental and physical disintegration of a Southern family. Mr. Faulkner's work has been magnificently praised by Evelyn Scott and other critics for whose opinions one must have respect. It is in all humility, therefore, that I record the feeling that the theme and the characters are trivial, unworthy of the enormous and complex craftsmanship expended on them. I do not see, for example, that Dilsey is more than a faithful old Negress; she is not, for me at least, "stoic as some immemorial carving of heroism," nor does she "recover for us the spirit of tragedy which the patter of cynicism has often made seem lost." I admit that the idiocy of the thirty-three-year-old Benjy is admirably grasped by Mr. Faulkner, but one hundred pages of an imbecile's simplified sense perceptions and monosyllabic gibberings, no matter how accurately recorded, are too much of a good thing. Similarly, Quentin and Jason are not sufficiently interesting, not large enough, in a symbolic sense, to make it worth while to follow painfully the ramifications of their minds and memories.

One has the feeling that Mr. Faulkner's experiments in the breaking-up of consciousness, in the abolition of chronology and psychological continuity, are both ingenious and sincere, but they are not absolutely necessary to his story. The fact that his material includes imbecility, incest, paranoia, and sadism does not mean that his tale is therefore complicated or obscure and in need of oblique and bizarre treatment. The relationships between his characters are a trifle unhealthy, one must admit, but must the prose in which they are described therefore be feverish? After one has penetrated the mad, echoing labyrinth of Mr. Faulkner's style one finds a rather banal Poe-esque plot, a set of degenerate whites whose disintegration is irritating rather than appalling, and two or three Negro characters who, if they were reproduced in straight prose, would appear as fairly conventional types. Sound and fury indeed. Signifying (the witticism is cheap, but inevitable) almost nothing. CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Two English Poets

Collected Poems (1914-1926). By Robert Graves. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Poems: 1929. By Robert Graves. Hammersmith, London: The Seizin Press. 8s. 6d.

Collected Poems. By D. H. Lawrence. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. Two volumes. $5.

Pansies. Poems. By D. H. Lawrence. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

NEITHER Mr. Graves nor Mr. Lawrence has gained very much by collecting his poems. Both, indeed, may have lost, for at least one reader has decided, after going through a great deal here which disappointed him, that they were not quite the poets he had thought they were when their separate works survived only as memories. The cold test of print is too much for a pair who previously had every right to be considered among the most interesting poets in contemporary England.

Mr. Graves, for instance, has for several years seemed to me the most noteworthy member of his generation. I remembered The Pier-Glass, "The General Elliott," The Gnat, Lost Love, The Dialecticians, In Procession, and other pieces of remarkable skill and originality. The difficulty now is in finding enough of those other pieces to make the whole achievement of the man impressive. What I do find, outside of the titles I have mentioned, is an interminable series of forced and silly gaieties, labored antics in none too readable verse, and complicated controversies with contemporaries who do not matter. Doubtless I exaggerate; and I must not neglect to mention two poems at the end of the collection, Pure Death and The Cool Web, which seem to me incontestably subtle and fine. But the net effect is disappointment. I still think Mr. Graves more interesting than most of his generation, and of course it is much to have made so deep a mark with so few poems. It is merely a pity that they are so few; bulk after all has its value.

Mr. Graves's new book, "Poems: 1929," takes him farther in the "metaphysical" direction indicated by Pure Death and The Cool Web. If anything it takes him too far, since he gets—as was perhaps inevitable—into excesses of ingenuity. The book is clever and searching, yet once again I feel that Mr. Graves is betrayed by the very intelligence that made him first interesting; there is always the danger that as he flies from sentiment, which he hates too bitterly, he will run into aridity. Mr. Graves is so worried lest he shall write bad—meaning for him conventional—poetry that he does indeed write bad poetry of a very special kind. I wish he could free himself from a sense that he is chosen to keep English poetry pure. Perhaps English poetry will take care of itself, and meanwhile these brilliant gifts of his might exhibit themselves with a becoming freedom.

Mr. Lawrence was never a poet whom one could be concerned about in this way. He was windy, wordy, blustering, sprawling, and frequently absurd. I supposed that in spite of such qualities, or even because of them, the two volumes of his collected poems would be entertaining; the gusto of his prejudices, I thought, would carry one through. It did not. The first of the two volumes, containing early pieces in rhyme, was positively dreary in its insistence upon the uniqueness and dark excellence of the author's personality; and the second volume, while much better than this, still waved a wilted greatness at the reader. Look! We Have Come Through is sometimes a noble autobiography in verse, and Birds, Beasts, and Flowers must long be remembered for its section on the love life (as a certain American humorist would put it) of the tortoise; yet in general the brooding done by Mr. Lawrence is hectic, and the shouting is horribly loud.

"Pansies," which is Mr. Lawrence's English for "Pensées," shows him still hot on the trail of truth and still convinced that it is important for him to tell us how he feels about everything. It is a series of capricious utterances, most of them brief and many of them pointed with a luminous if half-mad irony. The volume is valuable as an anthology of his opinions, even when they are expressed, as they often are, without any poetry whatever. When poetry does creep in the note is grim or amusing, or both; as here:

> Elephants in the circus > have aeons of weariness round their eyes.
> Yet they sit up > and show vast bellies to the children.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Quaker and the Quantum

Science and the Unseen World. By A. S. Eddington. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

EDDINGTON has three reputations and three streams of influence. He is an astronomer, both mathematical and experimental, of first importance. He has influenced and won the undoubted respect of his professional colleagues. He is a gifted humanistic expounder of the new physics and astrophysics and of the general theory of relativity. He has won a large popular following. He is a man of religious feeling, mystical in character and specifically Quaker in persuasion. To a great many persons who for one reason or another wish to escape a "nightmare" reality such as nineteenth-century materialism seems to provide, he comes as a leading and kindly light. There is salvation, there is still belief. The new physics apparently makes place for something very like the old God.

A careful examination of this small but revealing book indicates not the nature of the physical world, but the nature of the mind of Eddington when it touches religious matters. Liberal theologians have taken him up because they think here is the latest scientific support for the belief in the existence of God. Eddington himself expressly denies that it is his intention to produce such proof or that he thinks science can do it: "It is probably true that the recent changes of scientific thought remove some of the obstacles to a reconciliation of religion with science; but this must be carefully distinguished from any proposal to base religion on scientific discovery. For my own part I am wholly opposed to such an attempt."

Eddington's counsel toward religious faith derives indeed not so much from the new physics but from an old philosophy, a philosophy as old at least as Kant. Eddington wishes, to start with, to go back to consciousness. "Consciousness alone can determine the validity of its convictions." "There shines no light save its own light to show itself to itself. The world of science is a realm of symbols, a system of shadows. It is revealed to, it is indeed determined by, the nature of mind. The realm of values and significances is likewise a system of symbols, borrowed from the elements of consciousness. But the world of value must use as its symbols those personal elements which the physical sciences must disregard." "We have to build the spiritual world out of symbols taken from our own personality, as we build the scientific world out of the symbols of the mathematician."

To many minds this assumption of two "worlds" constructed out of two sets of symbols will not seem so much the latest word from a scientist as the latest echo of Kant. This little book indeed is a classical example of the Kantian attempt to save science from chaos and religion from science. But it reveals more than it attempts to demonstrate, and its revelation is not so much of the objects of religious belief as the nature of religious experience. Eddington is an avowed Quaker, and the persistent appeal of that creedless sect lies largely in the atmosphere of mysticism, quiet, personal, and uncontroversial, which is the center and the circumference of its religious teaching and experience. There are not two worlds, one revealed by science, the other revealed by religion. The fact is Eddington has far from demonstrated that there are two worlds, one seen and the other unseen. He has simply given a renewed illustration of the fact that experience is wider than any set of intellectual structures which may be developed in its regulation and control. In this book he is not a scientist talking about the Unseen. He is a Quaker talking about a kind of experience, a sense of searching and a sense of light to which the formulas of quanta and of relativity are irrelevant. His Quakerism and his science are as usual beautifully stated, with humor, lucidity, and color. But they are not logically related to each other. The astronomer and the Friend meet here purely by accident.

IRWIN EDMAN

A Prophet of Trees

Tree Crops. By J. Russell Smith. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

J. RUSSELL SMITH is a poet-geographer and a preacher, despite the fact that he was once professor of industry at Pennsylvania and is now professor of economic geography at Columbia. He loves the green hillsides of America; and he wants to rouse America to the menace of corn-fields and make it the promised land of what he calls tree corn, tree beans, and tree meat.

"We Americans," he says, "are destroying soil by field wash faster than any people that ever lived—ancient or modern, savage, civilized, or barbarian." Wheat and rye hold the soil; our tillage of corn, cotton, and tobacco is "the most efficient known way for destroying the farm that is not made of level land." And he fills his book with savage photographs of washed-out gullies in Georgia that were good cotton land a few decades ago, today "gone to economic Hades." Major André, famous traitor, he remarks, "was not going to destroy any land; he would merely have changed the law-makers from one group to another." So we need a new definition of patriot and traitor: Smith's traitor is a man who plows a hillside; his patriot plants tree crops and studies them. He calls for an Institute of Mountain Agriculture to study the great problem of growing tree crops on hillsides, where the agricultural methods of the flat plain are an economic crime.

A man with a mission is always either a joy or a bore. Russell Smith is an unmitigated joy; his enthusiasm is infectious; he leaves you yearning to plant an acre—at least—to black walnuts and hybrid chestnuts and persimmons, and to make acorn meal and acorn bread such as sustained the Indians and John Muir. He wants the American farmer to learn that acorns and mulberries are cheaper hog food than is corn, that nut orchards are profitable, that honey locusts yield more sugar than sugar maples. And he wants scores of plant specialists to set to work, doing the same kind of painstaking hybridizing and experimentation which has produced golden bantam corn and the Des Moines Table Queen sweet potato squash. In his mind's eye he sees the rocky hillsides of New England and the hungry slopes of the Appalachians repopulated, bearing tree crops comparable to those of the finest Sicilian chestnut mountains. I suspect that he is one of the major prophets of our day.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

Fiction Briefs

Hudson River Bracketed. By Edith Wharton. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

Mrs. Wharton, like all writers great and small, has her failures; "Hudson River Bracketed" is one of them. No one belittles an author's attempt to extend his scope, but Mid-Westerners have shown themselves so able to express their neighbors' frustrations that Mrs. Wharton's unsuccessful foray into their field adds nothing to her laurels. Her ambitious young genius from Illinois is only the husk of a character because his creator, scorning to exaggerate his potentialities or to allow him to become melodramatic about himself, fails equally to plumb the depths of his character, to show the internal play between his dawning self-consciousness and the pathetic experience of his career. As is to be expected, the description of the uninhabited house on the Hudson filled with the personality of the dead, the projection of the past into the present, the brief sketch of the Spears, are the best parts of the book—an observation which forces the repetition that Mrs. Wharton is still the one fine novelist of that small but tenacious class of Americans with a social and cultural tradition.

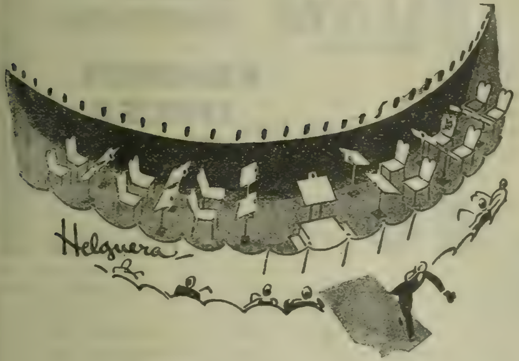
It's a Great War. By Mary Lee. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

This is the book which shared the American Legion prize for the best war novel. It is written by a woman who first served as a clerical worker with the army and later as a canteen worker with the "Y," and it records the frequently referred to but seldom explained Battle of Paris, and life in the rest camps behind the front and with the army of occupation. Miss Lee's keen eyes and ears did not miss much either good or bad, heroic or cowardly, fine or ridiculous, pure or foul that occurred around her behind the lines. In groups of unconnected words, phrases, and clauses she fires from her journalistic pen hundreds of varied scenes depicting the tell-tale truth about the general, the colonel, the captain, and the private. Besides giving evidence she draws three or four excellent character sketches, and sustains with breathless persistence the impression of the exciting abnormality of armed conflict.

The Desert of Love. By François Mauriac. Translated from the French by Samuel Putnam. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

A father and son love the same woman; the father's affection is undeclared because unreturned, the son's is misunderstood and repulsed. The parent stoically accepts an unhappy, embittered old age; the boy attempts to revenge his wounded vanity by inflicting pain on every other woman he meets throughout his life. As in all Mauriac's novels the scene is laid in the

WHAT is wrong with this picture? . . . Why is the man leaving the theatre? . . . Ah! The orchestra pit is empty . . . Perhaps the man is bored with factory-made music . . . Perhaps it has occurred to him that HE IS NOT GETTING HIS MONEY'S WORTH . . . He used to hear Living Music and see a movie—all for one price of admission . . . Now he gets the movie story, with talk, AND CANNED MUSIC, which is cheaper . . .



Can it be that Big Business has over-estimated the patience of Mr. Pro Bono Publico? . . . Can it be that old Bono is not so easy after all? . . . Is he weary of supporting an economy in which he gets no share . . . What, Mr. Reader, do you think about it ?

TREAT yourself to a sigh of relief. Sign the coupon below.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF MUSICIANS,
1440 Broadway, New York, N. Y.
Please enroll my name as one of those who deplore the elimination of Living Music from the theatre program.
Name.........
Address.........
City.........
State.........

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF MUSICIANS

(Comprising 140,000 professional musicians in the United States and Canada)

JOSEPH N. WEBER, President, 1440 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

southwest of France in the region around Bordeaux, but like all his characters the doctor, Raymond, and Maria are provincial only in the sense that they are creatures of a specialized environment in which their characteristics are more pronounced, more sharply developed, simplified, and intensified, and show more clearly than in a complex setting. The conflict arises not from the situation but from the action and reaction of temperaments dominated by relentless desires. Mauriac is a master of such impassioned people and of these strained, intimate dramas, and "The Desert of Love" is, like "Thérèse," a book for all who cherish fine writing.

Chariot Wheels. By Sylvia Thompson. Little, Brown, and Company. $2.50.

Sylvia Thompson's latest novel tells the story of Cressida Midge who, born into a conventional Victorian home, becomes interested in the new literary and political movements that are a part of her generation. Carried away by her admiration for him as a literary figure, she falls in love with and marries Lester Midge, a rising young radical editor-novelist. Midge has dealt with the various aspects of "modern love" and a "new freedom" in his novels and essays, but Cressida finds it difficult to adjust her life to his ideas when he puts them into practice. Part of the novel consists of an autobiographical sketch by their daughter who is of the post-war generation which her father describes as having a vitiated palate. "Chariot Wheels" is a thoroughly unimportant novel, but to those who like that kind of thing it may have a passing interest because of real or fancied resemblances which some of its characters bear to certain figures in the English literary world.

Doctor Fogg. By Norman Matson. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Doctor Fogg is a mechanical magician of the age of literary sophistication. His radio experiments produce an astral creature who has all the qualities of a D. W. Griffith heroine, and he is also able to communicate with other solar bodies. When his experiments are announced, the newspapers transform his work into a Graf Zeppelin exploit; the island where he works becomes a show place, and governments and capitalists bid for rights in Doctor Fogg's discoveries. Eventually Fogg destroys his creations and escapes to live in a comfortable cottage with his astral female. The book is better than similar works by Edgar Rice Burroughs, but it creaks with the workings of a correspondence-school plot formula. At best it is a rather dull book with several good wisecracks.

Drama

Portrait of an Egotist

IN "Meteor" (Guild Theater) Mr. S. N. Behrman has drawn a dramatic portrait of extraordinary richness and originality. Even the casual observer cannot fail to be intrigued by the vivid personality of his central character, but I doubt if such a casual observer is very likely to realize what a difficult feat the author has achieved. It is easy to say that your hero is a genius and it is not especially difficult to make the other dramatis personae act as though he were, but it is a very different matter to convince your audience and that is exactly what Mr. Behrman does.

The story which he has chosen to tell is not, in itself, very novel or very important. Indeed there is something artificial about this tale of his hero's rise to financial eminence—something factitious which suggests that it was invented without

The Luxury of Leisure

LLOYD CABIN QUARTET

BERLIN
STUTTGART
MUENCHEN
DRESDEN
To England, Ireland, France, Bremen

The Gaiety of Speed

LLOYD EXPRESS

BREMEN
EUROPA
COLUMBUS
To England, France, Bremen
 World's fastest Liner

Every Lloyd Liner Carries Tourist Third

NORTH GERMAN LLOYD

57 Broadway New York, or your local agent

. . . From One Nation Reader to Another Nation Reader

You have the opportunity to rent your house or apartment or sublet it, or sell it, or rent your farm for the summer, to more than 40,000 other Nation readers, through the classified columns of The Nation.

Rates: One inch $6.16. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

THE NATION

20 Vesey St., N. Y. Fitzroy 9074

"Eat for Health"

Health Food Store
and Luncheonette
45-n East 34th St.
(Bet. Park & Madison Aves.)
Health Foods Distributors

Appetizing and Nourishing Meals
of Freshest Unprocessed Food-Stuffs
Served at our Health Food Counter

Phones: Lexington 6926
Ashland 6366

Free Delivery Service
Ask for Catalog

Books on Health, Sex & Psychology; Health Periodicals

great enthusiasm and for no other reason than that a story of some sort was necessary. But this relative conventionality of plot is thrown into sharp relief by the vivid reality of its protagonist. From the very moment when this consummate and yet ingratiating egotist appears upon the scene he seizes upon the imagination of the spectator and holds it by virtue of that very fascination which is supposed to reduce his companions to impotent wonder. We are not asked to understand him and we never do. For us as for those who share the play with him he remains an all but incredible mixture of vanity and power—a man to be laughed at and to be labeled with all the names which psychologists have invented to chastise the pride of those who think abnormally well of themselves. But his reality is as indubitable as his secret is dark, and though the last curtain leaves us still wondering how much of his success is due to genius and how much to a delusion so powerful that it hypnotizes others as completely as it does its victim, the one thing we never doubt is the existence of the man whose portrait Mr. Behrman has so skilfully drawn. His vigor, his confidence, and his maniacal self-absorption are all there. So, too, are the touches of weakness and folly which make him human. Sometimes we suspect, as his companions sometimes do, that he is merely naive, but our doubts are never so strong as his faith and that, perhaps, is the secret of his power.

Some part of the credit for the brilliant effect must of course be given to Alfred Lunt, who plays the role, not only with great gusto but with a fine sense of its humorous overtones. Some part of it must also be accorded to Philip Moeller, who is said to have labored long over the production and to have introduced some important modifications into the spirit of the playing after the try-out in Boston. But the backbone of the character is in the text of the author and he has, I think, succeeded because of the extent to which he has been willing (and able!) to let his hero speak for himself. Whenever Mr. Behrman succumbs to the temptation to explain or analyze he is relatively weak. Even the touch of mysticism seems to me a blemish and so do all the other efforts to get inside the character or to explain him in terms of normal human nature. We can know such a man only from the outside. He takes our breath away with the directness of his vanity; he dazzles us with his success in realizing his own conception of his powers; and it is in the representation of these things that Mr. Behrman excels. In one sense his character is too much for him just as he is too much for his companions, but the record of his words and deeds is too vivid to be forgotten. If "Meteor" be considered as a whole it is doubtless far from perfect, but I cannot, at least offhand, think of any character in American drama who is likely to remain longer in the imagination of the spectator.

St. John Ervine's "The First Mrs. Fraser" (Playhouse) is as amusing as a comedy completely devoid of any kind of originality can very well be. Take all the drawing-room pieces written since Pinero and Jones popularized the "Mrs." titles; cut them into strips; shake in a hat; draw out a sufficient number of fragments; paste them together; and you will have something very like the new play. Nevertheless the pasting has been smoothly done, the whole is well acted, and the result, accordingly, an amusing evening.

"Death Takes a Holiday" (Ethel Barrymore Theater) aspires toward a macabre sort of poetry. The story of how Death took on human shape, fell in love with a beautiful girl, and carried her off to his own realm, is of dubious profundity, but the play has its moments of suspense and an element of grisly fascination.

Of the new musical reviews "Top Speed" (Forty-sixth Street Theater) is the fastest and most amusing. Revivals include "Babes in Toyland" at the Jolson and Walter Hampden's production of that ponderous old melodrama "Richelieu" (Hampden's Theater).

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

JUST OUT

WALTHER RATHENAU
HIS LIFE AND WORK
Count Harry Kessler

Henry Ford, interested in material ends only for the sake of spiritual regeneration—Woodrow Wilson, with a clear-headed and practical vision—that was Walther Rathenau, one of the first and greatest representatives of a new type of business man. He saved Germany from early defeat in the War—and was assassinated for his loyalty to the terms of the Versailles Treaty. "A remarkable biography of a remarkable man."—London Nation. $3.75

NATURE IN ENGLISH LITERATURE
by Edmund Blunden. $1.25

THE PROVING OF PSYCHE
Hugh I'Anson Faussett author of WILLIAM COWPER Probably $3.75

THE SENSE OF GLORY
Herbert Read. Probable price $3.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York City

THE NEW SCHOOL
for Social Research
Second Term: Jan. 13—April 4

Among other courses:

Problems in Abnormal Psychology — Joseph Jastrow
Twelve lectures—Tuesdays, 8:20 P.M.

Behavior Problems in Children — David M. Levy
Twelve lectures—Wednesdays, 5:20 P.M.

Psychoanalysis and Culture — Fritz Wittels
Twelve lectures—Thursdays, 8:20 P.M.
beginning January 23

Dominant Ideals of Western Civilization — H. M. Kallen
Twelve lectures—Fridays, 8:20 P.M.
beginning January 24

American Literature 1920-30 — Gorham B. Munson
Twelve lectures—Wednesdays, 8:20 P.M.

Creative Attitude Toward Life — Ralph M. Pearson, Thomas Munro, Lewis Mumford, H. A. Overstreet and others
Twelve lectures—Wednesdays, 8:20 P.M.

Fee for twelve lectures, $15

465 West 23rd Street New York City

☐ THEATRES ☐ ☐ ☐ FILMS ☐

LEO BULGAKOV
THEATRE ASSOCIATES, INC. presents

AT THE BOTTOM

by MAXIM GORKY
New version by William L. Laurence
POPULAR PRICES $2.50 to 75c
Phone reservations accepted Circle 1407
WALDORF THEATRE—50th St., Bet. 6th & 7th Aves. Eve., 8:50
MATINEES Thursday and Saturday, 2:30

WILLIAM HARRIS JR. PRESENTS
"THE FIRST PLAY OF THE SEASON WITH TEETH IN IT."
ROBERT LITTELL, WORLD.

CRIMINAL CODE

By MARTIN FLAVIN with ARTHUR BYRON
NATIONAL THEATRE 41st St., West of 7th Ave. Evenings 8:50
Matinees Wednesdays & Saturdays, 2:30

The Actor-Managers, Inc., introduce

DANCE REPERTORY THEATRE

Martha Graham, Doris Humphrey, Charles Weidman, Tamiris
Week of Joint and Individual Dance Programs
Every Evg. Incl. Sun., Jan. 12 at 8:50. Mat. Sat. only at 2:30.
MAXINE ELLIOTT'S Thea., W. 39th St.

The Actor-Managers Inc. has the honor to present

RUTH DRAPER in her ORIGINAL CHARACTER SKETCHES (Including 5 new ones)

Every eve. including Sunday except Monday and Thursday nights, 8:50.
COMEDY Theatre 41st. East of Broadway. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:30. VERY GOODS SEATS at $1.00

The Theatre Guild Presents

METEOR

By S. N. BEHRMAN
Guild THEA., 52nd St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

The Theatre Guild Presents

RED RUST

By KIRCHON & OUSPENSKY
Martin Beck THEA., 45th St. W. of 8th Ave.
Evgs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs & Sat. 2:40

ALAN PORTER
(of London)
on Individual Psychology: Its Sociological Aspects

In a series of twelve lectures, beginning January 13th:
Mondays, 8:20 to 9:50 P. M. Course $15.00
The New School for Social Research
465 West 23rd Street, New York City

Mr. Porter comes to this country on the invitation of a group of Dr. Alfred Adler's students. Dr. Adler says of him: "I would not know a better man to spread the views of Individual Psychology in the field of sociology."

Mr. Porter is a distinguished sociologist and literary critic.

(Advertisement paid for by Dr. Adler's students.)

Starting this Saturday, January 11th

Tolstoy's "RESURRECTION"

a powerful screen-version of the famous Russian classic.

—AND ON THE SAME PROGRAM—

ACTUAL!! AUTHENTIC!!

"A DAY WITH TOLSTOY" an intimate film-record of his daily life made when Tolstoy was 80 years old . . . on his estate at Yasnaia Poliana . . . in Moscow . . . etc.

—the only documentary film extant of a great, universal and legendary figure!

—ALSO—

Special Soviet news reel just arrived from MOSCOW showing vivid scenes of celebration of the 12th Anniversary of the Russian Revolution.

FILM GUILD CINEMA

New York's Unique Theatre—Direction: Symon Gould
52 West 8th Street, bet. 5th and 6th Avenues
Continuous Daily Noon to Midnight
Popular Prices Spring 5095-5090
Special Forenoon Prices—Weekdays 12 to 2—35c.
Sat. and Sun., 12 to 2—50c.

LAST TWO DAYS—Thursday-Friday, Jan. 9-10—"THE GOLEM"—famous drama of demonology—and POLA NEGRI in Carl Van Vechten's "A WOMAN OF THE WORLD" ("The Tattooed Countess").

MATINEES: GOOD SEATS, ALL PRICES, AT BOX OFFICE

WARNER BROS. Present

GEORGE ARLISS
in
"DISRAELI"

(A Vitaphone All-Talking Picture)

CENTRAL THEATRE Daily 2:45—8:45
Broadway and 47th St. Sunday 3—6—8:45

55TH STREET PLAYHOUSE
Just east of 7th Ave.—Popular prices
Continuous from 1 until Midnight
Commencing January 4th
THE GREATEST HINDU SPECTACLE

"THROW OF THE DICE"

successor to "SHIRAZ" and "THE LIGHT OF ASIA," produced by the same director with the same cast of Hindu stars.

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

Plays to See

At the Bottom—Waldorf—116 W. 50th St.
Berkeley Square—Lyceum—E. 45th St.
Bitter Sweet—Ziegfeld—54th St. & 6th Ave.
Broken Dishes—Ritz—48th St., West of B'dway.
Candlelight—Empire—B'dway & 40th St.
Children of Darkness—Biltmore—W. 47th St.
City Haul—Eltinge—236 W. 42nd St.
Criminal Code—National—W. 41st St.
Dance Repertory Theater—Maxine Elliott—E. 39th St.
Death Takes a Holiday—Barrymore Theater—47th St., W. of B'dway.
First Mrs. Fraser—Playhouse—E. 48th St.
Journey's End—Miller— 124 W. 43rd St.
June Moon—Broadhurst—W. 44th St.
Marionette Theater—Garrick, W. 35th St.—Sat. mornings.
Meteor—Guild—W. 52nd St.
Playboy of the Western World—Irish—7th Ave. & Christopher St.
Red Rust—Beck—302 W. 45th St.
Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45th St.
Sweet Adeline—Hammerstein—Broadway & 53rd St.
The Little Show—Music Box—W. 45th St.
Waterloo Bridge—Fulton—W. 46th St.
Yiddish Art Theatre—Jew Süss—Broadway & 28th St.

Films

Disraeli—Central Theater—Broadway and 47th St.
Resurrection—Film Guild—52 W. 8th St.
Throw of the Dice—55th St. Playhouse—East of Seventh Ave.

Concerts and Recitals

Arthur Hackett—Guild—Sun. Eve., Jan. 12.
Fifth Concert Judson Celebrity Series—Carnegie Hall—Wed. Eve., Jan. 22.
Katherine Goodson—Carnegie Hall—Wed. Aft., Jan. 22—Pianist.
Josef Hofmann—Carnegie Hall—Sun. Aft., Jan. 12.
Paul Haakon—Guild—Sun. Eve., Jan. 19—Dance Recital.
Olga Averino—Town Hall—Wed. Eve., Jan. 22—Russian Soprano.
Philharmonic Students' Concert—Carnegie—Sat. Eve., Jan. 18.
Philharmonic Symphony—Carnegie—Thurs. Eve., Jan. 16, 23; Fri. Aft., Jan. 17, 24; Sun. Aft., Jan. 19—Metropolitan Opera House—Jan. 12, 19.
Philharmonic Symphony—Junior Orchestral Concert—Sat. Morn., Jan. 11, 25—Carnegie Hall.
Ruth Draper—Comedy—41st St., E. of Broadway.
Society of Ancient Instruments—Town Hall—Sun. Aft., Jan. 12.
Young People's Concert Hour—Town Hall—Sat. Aft., Jan. 25.

Ingersoll Forum

Jan. 12—DEBATE: "Spiritualism, Fact or Fake?" M. S. Kesner and T. Stamm vs. A. J. Goldsmith and K. Blanchett.
Jan. 19—Morris Goldberg: "Atheistic Materialism."
LECTURES EXTRAORDINARY by KARL E. PAULI:
Jan. 25—"The Sexual Origin of Religion."
Jan. 26—"Phallic Rites and Ceremonials." With charts
PYTHIAN TEMPLE, 135 W. 70th Street, New York City
Sundays, 8 P. M. Admission, 50 cents.

List of lectures and debates for three months and book catalogue mailed free. Set of Atheist tracts, 10c. write:

American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, Inc.
119 E. 14th St. New York City

HELENA HILL WEED will lecture on
HAITI
at Temple Emanu-El 65th St. and 5th Ave.
Saturday evening, January 18th, at 8:15
under the auspices of American Women's Ort. Admission free

LECTURES DEBATE

A Momentous 3-Cornered DEBATE!!!

COMMUNISM, or SOCIALISM, or CAPITALISM?

Scott
NEARING says Communism
Noted Sociologist and Lecturer

Fenner
BROCKWAY says Socialism
Brilliant Labor Member of British Parliament

Prof. Edwin R. A.
SELIGMAN says Capitalism
Foremost Economist, Columbia University

Chairmen, SAMUEL UNTERMYER & ROGER N. BALDWIN

RESOLVED: That Capitalism offers more to the workers of the world than Socialism or Communism.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1930—8:30 P. M.
MECCA TEMPLE—133 W. 55TH STREET

Reserved Seats $1.00, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00 & $2.75
Reservations advisable now for best seat locations

Obtainable by mail or in person at Civic Club, 18 E. 10th Street; Columbia University Bookstore; Rand School Bookstore; 7 E. 15th Street, and New School Bookshop, 465 W. 23rd St.

Also by mail or in person at offices of
LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
11 W. 42nd St. Chickering 5789 or Spring 1716

TO OUT-OF-TOWNERS—This debate will be published in book form. Reserve your copy now by sending $1.00.

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE

7 E. 15 St. Alg. 3094

NEW COURSES: NEW LECTURERS

Winter term begins January 6.

PHILOSOPHY OF EVERYDAY LIFE
R. N. Boardman Mon., 8.30 p. m.
AMERICAN LABOR MOVEMENT
Louis Stanley Mon., 7.00 p. m.
RECENT ECONOMIC CHANGES
Marius Hansome Tues., 7.00 p. m.
CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN LITERATURE
Aben Kandel Tues., 7.00 p. m.
SOCIALIST POLITICS AND POLICIES
Morris Hillquit Norman Thomas
Harry W. Laidler Algernon Lee
Tues., 8.30 p. m.
BASIS OF HUMAN BEHAVIOR
Joseph M. Osman Tues., 8.30 p. m.
BRITISH LABOR'S RISE TO POWER
Mark Starr Wed., 8.30 p. m.
PROGRESS IN THE ARTS
Herman Epstein Anita Block
Gilbert Seldes Lewis Mumford
Douglas Haskell Wed., 8.30 p. m.
HISTORY OF INDIAN CIVILIZATION
J. Vijaya-Tunga Wed., 7.00 p. m.
SCIENCE AND CIVILIZATION
Dominic d'Eustachio Thurs., 8.30 p. m.
WORLD SOCIALISM TODAY
David P. Berenberg Thurs., 7.00 p. m.
SEMINAR ON MARXIAN ECONOMICS
Algernon Lee Thurs., 8.30 p. m.

Registration now open.

Nominal fees—Single admission 50 cents.

International Relations Section

The Vatican and the Kremlin*

By LOUIS FISCHER

WHEN Pius XI ascended the throne in 1922 he was presented with the opportunity of achieving the greatest papal conquest in modern times: he could break up the Greek Catholic church and convert ninety million Eastern Orthodox Christians to Roman Catholicism. The separation of church from state in Russia after the Bolshevik revolution had weakened Greek orthodoxy economically and politically, and Communist campaigns against the church, specifically against the solidly and bitterly anti-Bolshevik Greek church which represented one of the chief organized opponents of the new regime, appeared to make Rome's task easier. Italian papers of the day published sarcastic cartoons showing the Holy See in the act of granting its blessing to Bolshevik efforts to combat Greek Catholicism.

The Polish Roman Catholic clergy obstructed the Pope's policy in the realization that it would succeed only at their expense. A Bolshevik understanding with the Vatican was possible only if the Holy Father consented to strip the Roman church in Russia of its Polish influence and leadership, yet even then Moscow would never sign a concordat or agreement with the Pope. The Bolsheviks merely offered to submit to the Vatican's examination a circular of the Commissariat of Justice relating to the rights of the Catholic church in the Soviet Union.

Father Edmund A. Walsh of Georgetown University, Washington, D. C., who was the Curia's official delegate to Moscow, directly told Chicherin that two tendencies existed at the Vatican: one led by the Pope which aimed at a compromise with the Bolsheviks and the winning of the vast multitude of simple-minded followers; the other represented by Walsh himself whose program was to combat Bolshevism.

The Bolsheviks noted this unique juxtaposition, but expected the Holy Father to dominate. In 1922 and 1923 they had not yet been recognized by the major Powers. Friendly relations with the Vatican could bring them certain benefits in Catholic countries and with Catholic parties in other countries. Such advantages are not to be overlooked by the makers of a realistic foreign policy. Moreover, the triumph of Roman Catholicism in Russia would be won at the expense of Greek Catholicism and of Polish prestige—results the Soviets were ready to greet and facilitate. Years would elapse before Roman Catholicism became a menace, and then Moscow could cope with it. In like manner, the Bolsheviks encouraged reformistic schisms in the Greek Catholic church as well as independent sects. The purpose was to destroy the solid phalanx of Greek Catholicism.

During the Genoa Conference in 1922 Chicherin found himself seated opposite the Archbishop of Genoa at a small dinner given by the King of Italy aboard the cruiser Dante. The Archbishop inquired about the condition of Catholics in Soviet Russia. Thereupon Chicherin elaborated on the advantages of separation of church from state. Separation, the Bolsheviks believed, should arouse no serious objections among Roman Catholics. Independence made for greater virility. Official protection undermined moral fiber. Spain was an instance in point, Russians contended. Chicherin's remarks reflected this view. Archbishop Signori listened with rapt attention; then he rose, clinked his wine-glass to Chicherin's, and said: "I thoroughly agree with you." The Archbishop's view was not that of the Vatican as a whole, yet important influences within the walls of the Curia felt that at least in Russia the new status might prove of practical benefit.

Father Walsh constituted the chief obstacle to the successful consummation of the Pope's plan. The Bolsheviks found him "most objectionable, proud, and inclined to make a terrible scandal out of every little issue." At one time they even suspected him of contacts with the United States Steel Corporation. He had come to Russia in 1922 to administer relief in Russia on behalf of world Catholic organizations, and to act as the Vatican's plenipotentiary. His implacable and undisguised enmity soon caused difficulties. First he demanded that his food shipments for the famine sufferers be accompanied by foreign monks—mostly Italian. This the Bolsheviks could not allow; they expected the starving to be fed bread without religion. Then he proposed a method of money transmittances from foreign countries to Russia and from Russia abroad which the Bolsheviks interpreted as an effort to establish financial contacts between Roman Catholicism in the Soviet Union and the White émigrés in Europe. The bitterest feud arose over the question of church property. The Bolsheviks, having nationalized all property in Russia, nationalized also the churches, but were willing to grant them to religious communities for use. This was an issue on which Roman Catholicism had fought unyieldingly through the ages. The church is sacred and remains sacred and in the hands of the faithful forever, is Rome's principle. Was not Thomas à Becket killed on this account? The stand of the Petrograd Catholics had become particularly unrelenting, and the Bolsheviks finally agreed on a formula, limited in time and to Petrograd, which settled the conflict. But Father Walsh, the Bolsheviks declare, immediately informed the Vatican that this formula applied to all Russia, so that when Jordansky arrived in Rome to negotiate with Macchi-Venturi, Cardinal Ledochovski's assistant in the Jesuit order, he was told that the problem no longer existed. He likewise learned that modifications suggested by Walsh to a draft Bolshevik agreement had been submitted to Rome as accepted by Moscow. Here again, therefore, Father Macchi-Venturi appeared to be under the impression that all moot questions had been solved. The Jordansky-Venturi conferences that had given promise of a settlement accordingly proved abortive as a result of the strategy of Walsh.

In 1924 a change of attitude became noticeable in both camps. The Bolsheviks had obtained British, Italian, and French de jure recognition. Signs were not wanting that they would patch up a peace with Patriarch Tikhon. The Vatican, on the other hand, began to orient itself on the White emigration in Europe. A group of prominent Russian noble families living in exile had adopted Roman Catholicism, and the Curia, remembering that the nobility in Russia and even the royal family had at various times in history toyed with the idea of conversion to the Roman church—see, for instance, the rumor that Alexander I had accepted Catholicism before death, and the practice in certain Russian circles of employing Catholic teachers—changed its tactics and commenced to place its hope on political developments in Russia which would sweep away the Bolsheviks. The Vatican now became indifferent to the Soviet Union, and prospects of an agreement grew more distant.

---

* This article is a chapter from a two-volume book on "The History of Soviet Foreign Affairs," to be published in February, 1930, by Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith, New York.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Father Walsh was succeeded in 1924 by a German named Germann who, in June, was joined by Marquis Ray, an Italian. Although these representatives of the Vatican impressed the Bolsheviks with their superior tact and greater tolerance, the obstacles remained insurmountable. Germann and Ray left Moscow in September, 1925.

The Bolsheviks, nevertheless, had not despaired of an understanding with Rome on practical problems. In 1925 Chicherin and Krestinsky handed Pacelli, the Papal Nuncio at Berlin, two documents—one outlining Soviet principles in Roman Catholic church matters, the other dealing concretely with the appointment of bishops, the transmission of Vatican funds to the Russian church, and education. In the matter of moneys and schools there was and is a feeling that if the Vatican respected Soviet laws—and nothing else could be expected—an accord would present no great difficulties. As to bishops, the Bolsheviks preferred a preliminary agreement on their part about the candidate, or they would probably be satisfied should the Vatican consent in advance to appoint only Russians. Their objection was to Poles who might further the national interests of their country. The Russians likewise objected to the publication in Russia of papal bulls and to uncensored communication between the Russian hierarchy of the Roman Catholic church and Rome.

The Vatican kept the Soviet documents for one year and then returned a reply on three of the twelve or more questions involved. In 1927 Rome intimated that the Soviet proposal did not satisfy. The negotiations were never resumed. Today the church in Russia has no definite legal status. The Vatican, in the absence of its own representative, has on numerous occasions availed itself of the friendly services of accredited diplomatic agents of foreign states at Moscow. During Wirth's term as German chancellor, Brockdorff-Rantzau was frequently burdened with what for him was the unwelcome task of intervening with Chicherin on behalf of the Vatican. More recently, Herbette, the late French ambassador, regarded himself as a sort of papal legate. In 1925 a man reputed to be a private French citizen named d'Herbigny came to Moscow under Herbette's protection. D'Herbigny, in fact, was a Catholic bishop, and he immediately set to work ordaining a complete list of Russian bishops and reconstituting the Catholic clergy which had been disorganized by the new state of affairs in Russia. He did without Soviet consent and previous knowledge what Moscow would have allowed only on conditions carefully laid down after consultation with the Vatican. Not only the Bolsheviks were furious. Count von Brockdorff-Rantzau regarded Herbette's step as an intolerable attempt to place the Roman Catholic church in Russia under the French aegis. Herbette's interest for the Vatican thus served to worsen Soviet relations with his own country.

Papal envoys at Tokyo, Kovno, and other capitals have, on occasion, interceded with Soviet agents on behalf of Catholic priests under trial in Russia. This and similar issues might conceivably be regulated by an agreement between Moscow and the papacy. The Bolsheviks do not want the Vatican's de jure recognition nor would they recognize the Vatican. In this respect, the recent treaty between the Pope and Mussolini changes nothing. Yet the Soviet Government is prepared to consider the international character of the Roman Catholic church and to permit a relationship between its center and the Russian section.

It seems incongruous that two institutions so different and distant as the Roman Catholic church and the Bolshevik state should have sought to bridge the gap that separated them. Yet such a desire moved both sides. Practical considerations ruled. Ideologically, of course, no common ground exists on which they could meet. The militant atheism of the Communists and their doctrine of revolution must be as abhorrent to the Vatican as the theology, highly developed private-property sense, and conservatism of the Roman Catholic church are to the Kremlin. The papal philosophy of temporal and clerical condominium confronts not only the diametrically opposed Bolshevik principle of disestablishment but also the Soviet tendency to use the state in checking church power. Opportunist considerations may conceivably bring the realists in the Kremlin and the Vatican to arrive at a modus vivendi—although the likelihood continues to diminish—but no such development could disguise the fundamental gulf and hostility that must divide the Pope of Rome from the ruling disciples of Karl Marx in Moscow.

Contributors to This Issue

Gardner Jackson is a Boston newspaper man, best known for his work in behalf of Sacco and Vanzetti.
Paul Y. Anderson is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.
Felix Morley is the Geneva representative of the League of Nations Association of the United States.
Eda Lou Walton is assistant professor of English at New York University.
Sidney B. Fay is professor of European history at Smith College.
Joshua Kunitz is author of "Russian Literature and the Jew."
Will Irwin is author of "The House That Shadows Build."
Davis R. Dewey is professor of economics and statistics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.
Clifton P. Fadiman is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.
Mark Van Doren is editor of "An Autobiography of America."
Irwin Edman is assistant professor of philosophy at Columbia University.
Lewis S. Gannett is a contributing editor of The Nation.
Joseph Wood Krutch is dramatic editor of The Nation.
Louis Fischer, Moscow correspondent of The Nation, will soon publish "The Soviet in World Affairs."

FOR RENT

FURNISHED ROOMS

Manhattan Beach Hotel

Manhattan Beach, N. Y. C.

LIVE in a modern fireproof hotel by the seashore for less than in the crowded city—$9.00 per week and up for one; $12.00 per week and up for two. All hotel services included. Tennis and handball courts. 37 minutes from Times Square (B.M.T. Brighton Beach Station). Phone Sheepshead 3000.

93D STREET—252 West—Room for business mother and board and care child (school age) during day. Schuyler 9838.

LARGE beautiful furnished room in Woodside, Queens. 20 minutes from Times Square. Kitchen privileges, modern conveniences, available to congenial woman (or couple) with language teacher. References. Telephone mornings between 11 and 12, Havemeyer 0707.

APARTMENTS TO SHARE

DENTIST will sublet. 243 W. 70th. 2 unusually large rooms, excellent kitchen; dinette and bath. Part of larger apartment. $90. Business couple or similar preferred. Dr. Alstadt. Endicott 8288.

WILL share my comfortable and convenient four-room apartment in Greenwich Village with intelligent woman. Box 2264, % The Nation.

A YOUNG LADY wanted to share a beautiful 3-room apartment near Prospect Park, Brooklyn. Call Slocum 9662 at 8 A. M. for further information.

FURNISHED front apartment, 2 rooms, bath, kitchenette, with congenial young woman of about 25-35. $36 per month. Inquire or write 2848 Broadway, Apt. 14, Near 110th St.

RESORTS

RUSTIC Beauty for your relaxation and recreation, convenient for week ends. 1½ hours from Grand Central. Skating, Skiing and tobogganing.

HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 353

THE LAKE VIEW

SILVER & CAMEN

Surpassing Accommodations
Atmosphere of Refinement
Excellent Cuisine

Moderate Rates

59 Madison Ave. Phone Lakewood 287
Lakewood - New Jersey

RUSSIAN NOOK. Accommodation weekends or week. Congenial surroundings, homelike atmosphere. Skating, hiking. Very reasonable rates. Excellent cooking. 50 minutes from New York. M. Mardfin, Croton on Hudson, N. Y. Tel. Croton 604.

SUMMER CAMP

YOU can enjoy your next summer's vacation in a new camp, equipped with all most modern improvements, at a 25% reduction from the regular rates if you join the Mounts Mill Country Club now.

Positions for Social Director, Physical Director, Head Cook, Dining Room Manager, Musician, etc., are still open. Address, A. Greenblatt, 215 E. 149th St., Bronx, N. Y.

EDUCATIONAL

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

PROGRAM—Jan. 10-18

AT COOPER UNION

8th Street and Astor Place at 8 o'clock. Admission Free.

Friday, Jan. 10—DR. EVERETT DEAN MARTIN——

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF PROGRESS

In What Sense are "Ideals" Social Forces? A lecture on the Nature of Public Opinion.

ETHICS AND SOCIAL SCIENCE

Sunday, Jan. 12—Dr. Albert E. Wiggam—"Genius."

NATURAL SCIENCE

Tuesday, Jan. 14—Mr. William B. Curry—"The Development of the Science of Mechanics Since Newton."

MUHLENBERG BRANCH LIBRARY

209 West 23rd St. at 8:30 o'clock.

Monday, Jan. 13—Dr. Mark Van Doren—The Autobiography of America—"Civil War and Reconstruction."

Wednesday, Jan. 15—Dr. Rexford Guy Tugwell—The Industrial Discipline—"The Processes of the Market."

Thursday, Jan. 16—Dr. E. G. Spaulding—The Development of Fundamental Ideas and Fundamental Problems in Philosophy and Science. "Change, Development and Evolution."

Saturday, Jan. 18.—Dr. Houston Peterson—Types of Character—"Types of Character in Modern Fiction."

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN, ENGLISH

Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 9 to 9 daily. 18th year.

FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

UNIVERSAL INSTITUTE OF LANGUAGES

ITALIAN—GERMAN
FRENCH—SPANISH

Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Simplified conversational method. 18 years' experience. Also neglected English education.

1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

GERMAN LESSONS. German visitor, Columbia graduate student, experienced, gives lessons. Moderate rates. Write Box 2269, % The Nation.

FRENCH INSTRUCTION

FRENCH—modern instruction suited individual needs, or small group, by professional young native. Evenings. Rates fair—depending on kind and length lessons. Box 2268, % The Nation.

SCHOOL

NOAH'S ARK

A year-round home and kindergarten school conducted on modern principles. 56 acres on Croton Lake. Varied activities. Children of all ages accommodated for weekends. Railroad Station: Harmon, N. Y. For information communicate with Erika Feist, R.F.D. 15, Yorktown Heights, N. Y. Telephone Yorktown 46 F-3.

GRAPHOLOGY

CHARACTER read from handwriting. Send dollar with specimen for analysis. Box 2267, % The Nation.

HELP WANTED

SOCIAL DIRECTOR wanted by Jewish Adult Camp of distinction. Only experienced men of sociable nature, versatile and competent to assume leadership in Camp activities need apply. Box 2270, % The Nation.

SHOPPERS' CORNER

MARITZA—of 172 West 4th Street—is having an anniversary sale. Wonderful assortment of dresses, blouses, hats, Russian smocks, Russian pajamas, and shirts for men. Orders taken at sale prices.

OPEN SHELF

DEMOCRATIC YOUTH

Published for young idealists who still believe in democracy. Six months' trial subscription, 25c. Sample copy, 10c. ROSCO BRONG, publisher, West Liberty, Ky.

THAT BOOK YOU WANT! We hold 2,000,000 of the best books—new, second-hand, out-of-print, rare—all subjects. Also Sets of Authors. Catalogues free (25 issued). Outline requirements and interests. Books sent on approval. FOYLES, Charing Cross Rd., London, Eng.

BOOK MANUSCRIPTS

Wanted—Let us publish your book. The best service at lowest cost. MEADOR PUBLISHING CO., 27 Beach St., Boston, Mass.

DISCUSSIONS—FORUMS

THE GROUP

A Clearing House of Opinion

meets at Auditorium—150 West 85th St.
Tuesday, January 14th, at 8:30 P. M.

KONRAD BERCOVICI
(Distinguished Author)
will speak on
"LIFE OF THE GYPSIES"

Sunday afternoon at 4 P. M. (Jan. 19th)
Informal Discussion Group
SEYMOUR A. SELIGSON
will speak on
"SINCLAIR LEWIS"
(A Critic of America)

Admission 50c Organized 1918

THE INTERNATIONAL CLUB
2 West 64th St. New York.

Sunday, Jan. 12th, 4:00 P. M. Discussion under leadership of RALPH SEWARD. Subject: "TEN YEARS OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS." TEA. Admission to non-members 50 cents.

Sunday, Jan. 19th, 4:00 P. M. AN HOUR OF MUSIC. Excellent program of vocal and instrumental music. TEA. Admission to non-members 50 cents.

Please Write for Our Complete Program.

Student Forum

W. E. BURGHARDT DUBOIS, editor of "The Crisis"

HAITI—HAS AMERICAN OCCUPATION FAILED?

Sunday, January 12, 3 P.M.
Congregation Emanu-El
1 East 65 Street Discussion and Tea

POSITIONS WANTED

OBJECT: MATRIMONY

No, this isn't a search for a mate. It's a declaration from a young man who's already found the lady but doesn't earn enough to start housekeeping. He has a good mind, a literate pen, a college education, experience, and sufficient adaptability to fit himself into any business which can use the services and mind of an energetic, intelligent young man. Can you use him? Write Box 2266, % The Nation.

UNIVERSITY woman of mature years, professor Biology, successful executive, varied research, wishes responsible position—instruction, executive, secretarial, research. Box 2271, % The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1930 No. 3368

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 85
EDITORIALS;
  The Issues at London 88
  The Report on Law Enforcement 89
  Air Monopoly Again 90
  Our Imperial Burden 90
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 91
CLEMENCEAU THE DESTROYER. By Robert Dell 92
A RAILROAD VIEW OF CONSOLIDATION. By J. G. Lyne 94
UNEMPLOYMENT IN ENGLAND. By John A. Hobson 96
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 98
CORRESPONDENCE 98
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 99
BOOKS, FILMS, DRAMA:
  Parting. By Stanley J. Kunitz 100
  Consolation or Control. By Henry Hazlitt 100
  An American Augustus. By William Spence Robertson 101
  Dream and Be Free. By Norah Meade 101
  Victorian Biography. By Granville Hicks 102
  The Navajo in Fiction. By Eda Lou Walton 102
  Two Views of Germany. By Karl F. Geiser 103
  Books in Brief 103
  Drama: Magdalene. By Joseph Wood Krutch 106
  Films: As You Were. By Alexander Bakshy 106
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  Madame Sun Yat-sen Keeps Faith. By Randall Gould 109

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor Literary Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE SUPREME COURT of the United States seems determined to drive us willy-nilly into public ownership and operation of public utilities. In a long series of decisions it has been making us pay more and more dearly for the privilege of having utility services furnished by private companies instead of providing them ourselves. The latest case is that of the Baltimore street railways, decided on January 6. The court held that under existing conditions a return of 6.26 per cent on the present value of the property used by the company is so inadequate as to constitute confiscation, adding: "It is not certain that rates securing a return of 7½ or even 8 per cent on the value of the property would not be necessary to avoid confiscation." The company claimed rates yielding 7.44 per cent, asserting that even such rates were inadequate, and the court decided: "Upon the present record, we are of opinion that to enforce rates producing less than this would be confiscatory." This is not all. Asserting "the settled rule of this court that the rate base is present value" the court held that depreciation also must be figured on present value and not on cost, thus raising even farther the rates necessary to avoid confiscation. Finally, it declined on technical grounds to exclude from the value claimed as a basis for rate-making purposes easements in the streets valued at $5,000,000. In other words, the city, having allowed the corporation the use of the streets, must now pay it a 7.44 per cent return on the estimated value of the privilege thus given it. The whole spirit of the majority opinion is summed up in this observation: "The fundamental principle to be observed is that the property of a public utility, although devoted to the public service and impressed with a public interest, is still private property; and neither the corpus of that property nor the use thereof constitutionally can be taken for a compulsory price which falls below the measure of just compensation. One is confiscation no less than the other."

THE DECISION brought vigorous dissents from Justices Brandeis (Justice Holmes concurring) and Stone. In his dissenting opinion Justice Brandeis declared that the estimated present return of 6.26 per cent is in fact much larger if the rules which he deems applicable are followed; that is, if the easements are excluded from the rate base, the return becomes 6.70 per cent, and if the depreciation charge is computed according to ordinary business rules, instead of following the doctrine now laid down by the court, it rises to 7.78 per cent. He points out that franchises are not included in valuing plant for rate-making purposes and that to call the company's rights in the streets easements makes them none the less franchises. On the basis of both history and logic he makes what seems to us an impregnable case in favor of basing the depreciation charge on cost and not on present value, as was done in reaching the majority decision. The practical result of the rule laid down by the majority concerning depreciation is suggested in the last paragraph of Justice Stone's dissenting opinion:

> To say that the present price level is necessarily the true measure of future replacement cost is to substitute for a relevant fact, which I should have thought ought to have been established as are other facts, a rule of law which seems not to follow from Smyth v. Ames, and to be founded neither upon experience nor expert opinion and to be unworkable in practice.

To take present value rather than prudent investment as the rate base is a principle likely in a period of falling prices to prove disastrous to the companies themselves, and every student recognizes that it makes effective control of rates impossible. The present decision goes farther than any preceding one in the application of this mistaken principle. It works to the present advantage of the companies, but, as the present case indicates, it makes the public pay handsomely.

TO BE THE SON of a great father is not easy, but the same uncompromising honesty, courage, and genius for grueling hard work that made his father at once the most feared and the best loved man in Washington have marked the Senatorial career of Robert M. La Follette up to this time. His appointment to the powerful Committee on Finance, in the teeth of the bitter opposition of the Republican Old Guard, is an event well worthy of note. It means a powerful reinforcement to the liberal forces at this strategic point in the Senate battle line, and it will make it vastly more difficult for Senator Smoot and his cohorts to override opposition in the committee and sacrifice the interests of the public at large to those of their big business friends, as they did in writing the tariff schedules now under fire on the floor of the Senate. Senator La Follette's appointment, further, is testimony to the growing power of that little group of honest and independent Progressives in the Senate whose sturdy battle for popular rights against predatory privilege of various kinds has been the most heartening feature of American public life during the years of sodden Coolidge prosperity.

BOSTON'S WATCH AND WARD Society has suffered three defections since its last encounter with "obscenity," which was described by Gardner Jackson in our issue of January 15. The society won its case against the Dunster House Bookshop, to be sure, but the fact that the bookdealer had been persuaded to obtain and sell the guilty book by one of the society's paid procurers was a little more than even Boston could endure. The judge who presided, the attorney who prosecuted, and most of the Boston press attacked the society and its methods with a fierceness which, added to general public ridicule, penetrated the righteous armor of that snooper-dreadnought, the Watch and Ward. Three distinguished Bostonians, Professor Julian Coolidge, Bishop Lawrence, and Dr. David Scannell, have resigned from the board of directors. According to a report issued by the society on January 13, none of these resignations was the result of disapproval of the society's tactics in the Dunster House case—which, of course, makes them at this particular moment most inopportune. At any rate, the society seems to be perilously near to going on the rocks. We wish it the worst of luck.

TWO PARTICULARLY odious assaults by Negroes on white women were recently committed in the city of Baltimore. Since Baltimore is a civilized community, civilized even on the Negro question, neither of the offenders was taken out and subjected to the loathsome caprices of a mob. Both will be dealt with swiftly and justly under the law which governs their offenses. The Baltimore Sun, in commenting editorially on the matter, quotes with approval the resolution drawn up by various Negro societies in the city, denouncing recent crimes committed by members of their race and promising their whole-hearted support in suppressing such crimes in the future. We recommend the Baltimore attitude on the race question to the sovereign State of Florida, which admits to four of the ten lynchings which took place last year. It is encouraging to note, in considering the figures on lynching, that in twenty-seven cases lynchings were prevented by the prompt and courageous action of officers of the law, and that twenty-four of these were in Southern States. We can only hope that some of the twenty-four took place in Florida.

THE SECOND HAGUE CONFERENCE on the Young plan evidently thought to clear the way for a consideration of the proposed international bank by first disposing of a number of less important matters. Some of these proved unexpectedly troublesome. The Germans, who haggled over various details until Mr. Snowden, British Chancellor of the Exchequer, warned them to stop objecting and either take the Young plan or go on under the Dawes plan, made a great point of the proposal that payments should be made on the fifteenth of the month instead of on the first, and did their best to escape from the possible imposition of sanctions in case of default. On this latter point they found a weighty argument in the recent treaty with the United States for the separate payment of war claims and the costs of the American army of occupation, the treaty saying nothing about sanctions and specifically recognizing German good faith; but the other creditors were not ready to give up the right to compel payment if necessary. When the bank question was finally reached, Dr. Schacht, president of the Reichsbank, announced that his bank would not subscribe to stock in the proposed bank because of changes which had been made in the Young report, but his opposition, it was thought, would not prevent the establishment of the bank.

LABOR CONTRACTS SHOULD BE BROKEN, according to Charles G. Wood, Commissioner of Conciliation in the United States Department of Labor, if the laborer who is party to the agreement turns out to be a Communist. The La Valle Shoe Company of New York City entered into an agreement with the Independent Shoe Workers Union, in April, 1929, under which it was agreed, among other things, that the company should employ only members of the union and that there should be no strike or lockout while the agreement lasted. In August Mr. Wood wrote to the company advising them that Fred B. Biedenkapp, general manager of the union, was a Communist and "a very active enemy of our form of government, municipal, State, and federal," and stating that "it is desirable that employers who voluntarily or involuntarily sign an agreement purporting to bind them to recognize this Communist organization and give employment only to persons belonging to it withdraw forthwith from participating in it." Called into court as a witness in a case involving an application for an injunction against a strike which had occurred in the La Valle shop Wood admitted the authorship of the letter and asserted that his superiors knew of it and had never repudiated it. Mr. Justice Callahan, before whom the application was heard, dismissed the case with the remark that if the Wood letter "advised the plaintiff to break a solemn contract because of the political views of the other contracting party" the court "disagrees with that advice." All honor to the court for rebuking another display of government insolence.

MAHATMA GANDHI drew up the resolution, passed on December 31 by the Indian National Congress in session at Lahore, which rejected the offer of a round-table conference to discuss dominion status and declared for complete independence from Great Britain, an end to be achieved if necessary by a program of civil disobedience and boycott of the English government of India. Less than two weeks later Gandhi made two statements, one printed in his magazine, Young India, the other released by the North American Newspaper Alliance. He said that "the independence resolution need frighten nobody. I had repeatedly declared that for me, as for all other congressmen, dominion status could mean only virtual independence." Moreover, he said that the Lahore resolution did not rule out the possibility of a conference with the British. "If the British government invites the congress to a conference to discuss and frame, not any scheme, but a scheme definitely for an independent government . . . I take it the congress leaders will gladly respond." Gandhi stated also that in his opinion India was not ready for a campaign of civil disobedience. Such a campaign at this time would inevitably end in violence. In such an event Gandhi, according to his principles, would be compelled to withdraw his leadership and his withdrawal would certainly mean complete failure and more violence. Gandhi wants freedom for India, whether it is called dominion status or independence. He is willing to wait, and he will not refuse to consider new offers from Great Britain.

AND NOW RUSSIA has gone communist. When the first period of military communism came to an end with the introduction of the New Economic Policy in 1921, critics rightly enough saw economic necessity asserting itself and calling private trade again into existence; wrongly enough they proceeded accordingly to write the obituary of communism. It was less than three years before the Nepmen received their first check, and from that day to this the government has been drawing the rope tighter and tighter about their necks. As the economic situation has improved, the Communists have grown more communistic and they are driving swiftly forward with their five-year program, apparently confident that the people can and will stand the strain. Now come dispatches from the well-informed correspondent Walter Duranty, reporting the astounding decision of the Central Committee of the Communist Party that the grain-producing areas are to be completely collectivized by the spring of 1932, instead of 20 per cent of them being collectivized by 1933, as originally contemplated in the five-year program. Mr. Duranty also reports the demand of the Moscow Committee of the party for the prompt "liquidation" of the private traders. The Communists are proceeding with their usual directness to put into effect the thoroughgoing communist policy recently announced by Stalin. Whether they are going to succeed or not is a question to which they themselves do not yet seem to have a confident answer.

THE MANAGERS of the National Automobile Show report that sales at the show of most makes of cars were higher than last year, and that for a number of cars the average increase was slightly more than 10 per cent. Two months ago few persons either outside or inside of the automobile trade would have dared to predict such a result. If anything seemed certain then it was that the unparalleled stock-market collapse would bring a drastic reduction in all "luxury" buying. Yet the General Motors Corporation soon reported that its dealers had sold 90,871 cars to users in November, a decrease of only 539 cars from November of the year before. While December sales show a falling off, much of this decrease is attributed to the fact that numerous changes in car models have led to a brief postponement of buying. In considering the effect of the stock-market collapse on "luxury" sales, it must be kept in mind that the October-November crash came after an unprecedented advance in stock-market prices during the preceding months of 1929, and that there has already been a substantial recovery; at present the average level of prices is only about 10 per cent below the level at this time last year. This decline is not negligible, but neither is it necessarily a presage of national disaster!

PITY THE CARNEGIE FOUNDATION for the Advancement of Teaching and the professors who are its uncertain beneficiaries! It will be recalled that the foundation, having in 1922 adopted rules which appeared to assure to professors in accepted institutions certain rates of pensions or retiring allowances, found in 1929 that it had failed to cut the coat according to the cloth and that the expected payments must be considerably reduced. The latest report of the president of the Carnegie Corporation of New York, just issued, tells how the corporation had to come to the aid of the foundation to the extent of providing nine annual grants of $600,000 each out of which professors at the age of seventy are to benefit to the extent of $500 a year. Incidentally, the report reveals that the corporation has granted over $20,800,000 since 1911 in aid of retiring allowances for professors. What the foundation and the corporation between them have been unable to do the accepted colleges and universities must now do for themselves, and the report notes that some forty-nine institutions, representing collectively more than 75 per cent of the pensionables, have either made the needed provision or are trying to devise ways and means of doing so.

IT IS PLEASANT to welcome again to this country Mary Agnes Hamilton, British writer and lecturer, to whose name the magic letters "M.P." are now appended. An alternate British delegate to the Assembly of the League of Nations last year, Mrs. Hamilton made her debut in the House of Commons early in December. Her maiden speech, which the London Nation and Athenaeum declares "gave evidence of a clear and powerful intelligence," to be applauded not merely by comparison with other maiden speeches "but by Front-Bench standards," was immediately followed by one by Mr. Runciman, a veteran of the House, who not only praised her for her achievement, but paid her the greater compliment of analyzing her argument and testing it step by step. Certainly the women in the British Parliament are winning more laurels than the corresponding group of members of the American House of Representatives. This is, however, in large part due to the opportunities for training in debate offered by the House of Commons.

UNQUESTIONABLY the greatest living American humorist is the make-up man of the New York Times. The other day Mr. Calvin Coolidge, of Northampton, Massachusetts, who, it will be recalled, was at one time President of the United States, but who has now gone into life insurance, addressed a few burning words to a gathering of insurance executives at St. Petersburg, Florida. "The advocates of defeat have often asserted that the only economic salvation law is communism," he declared, the habit of Presidential oratory apparently reasserting itself; "but the independent spirit of the American has constantly replied that the individual is sovereign, that private ownership of property is a sovereign right, and he is able to take care of his economic destiny." And the naughty make-up joker put into a box at the top of the next column but one: "Ninety-eight people out of every 100 are financially incompetent, Dr. S. S. Huebner, professor of Insurance and Commerce at the University of Pennsylvania, told Toronto underwriters in convention today." Poor team-work somewhere among these insurance fellows!

The Issues at London

ON January 7, two days before the American delegation to the naval conference at London sailed from New York, President Hoover issued a statement in which he expressed the hope "that the people of our country will cooperate in the progress of the conference by patience, encouragement, and freedom from criticism." This unusual appeal followed a frank admission that "the difficulties of finding a basis" for "actual reduction in naval burdens of the world" that will be "acceptable to five different nations are great, but they are not insuperable," that "the technology and the complexities of the problem are such that we need hope for no immediate and quick results," and that "to complete the conference in three or four months would be in itself a great accomplishment, and we should not expect any hurried conclusions."

Mr. Hoover's appeal for patience, hopefulness, and an open mind on the part of the American public was doubtless called out by his recognition of the unexpectedly complicated situation which the conference will have to meet. The London conference will have before it two radically different proposals for dealing with the question of reducing and limiting naval armaments. The original Anglo-American program of Mr. Hoover and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald contemplated a direct approach to the question through an agreement between those two Powers to establish a parity of cruiser strength by limiting both the total cruiser tonnage and the number of cruisers which each country should maintain. A difference of opinion developed regarding the terms of this adjustment and a matter of three cruisers or 30,000 tons remains to be apportioned; but it was understood that, in order to attain parity, Great Britain would be willing to reduce the number of its cruisers from about seventy, the present number, to fifty, and that the United States should be entitled to the same number even though, in view of its present disparity in cruiser strength, it should decide to build up to the limit of fifty and thereby make parity actual as well as theoretical.

It very soon became apparent, even before France, Italy, and Japan were invited to take part in a five-Power conference at which the Anglo-American agreement should be discussed, that the question of naval reduction was not so simple. It was pointed out that naval strength does not depend upon cruisers alone but involves consideration of other types of vessels, especially battleships and submarines. Intimations that Great Britain and the United States would like to see the submarine abolished were met by statements that the other three Powers held the submarine to be essential to their defense, while Japan injected a further element into the discussion by expressing informally a desire for a larger allotment of cruiser tonnage than the Washington conference had given it. It was learned that Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Hoover had also discussed the questions of freedom of the seas and the British naval bases in America, only to find that on these points they were not agreed. The net result of some weeks of criticism, explanation, and rejoinder was to leave the United States and Great Britain still committed to parity in cruisers, but to widen the scope of the conference so as to include other types of vessels.

To this Anglo-American proposal France presently opposed an entirely different thesis. Naval reduction or limitation, it was pointed out, however desirable in itself, is only one aspect of the general question of armaments, which includes armaments on land and in the air as well as on the sea. Any general agreement must take account of the special needs of each country for security; France, for example, with two seacoasts, an extensive land frontier, and a colonial empire second only to that of Great Britain, has need of an army as well as of a navy, and the nature of the one force is affected by the nature of the other. Moreover, since the League of Nations is bound by the Covenant to prepare a plan for general disarmament, France insisted that whatever decisions were reached at London ought to be regarded as provisional only, dependent for their validity upon their harmony with the League plan. Instead of segregating the naval problems of the five Powers, the French thesis called for the treatment of naval reduction in the light of a general problem whose solution had been, by international agreement, assigned to the League.

These, in substance, are the opposing views which will confront the conference when it assembles. Out of the maze of affirmations, denials, qualifications, explanations, and arguments which the two proposals have engendered it is possible to distinguish a few points about which debate seems likely to center. Mr. Hoover wants an agreement that will bring about actual reduction of naval armaments and put an end to competitive building. Mr. MacDonald also wants the same practical outcome. Both Mr. Hoover and Mr. MacDonald appear to be ready to discuss the reduction or limitation of all classes of naval vessels.

France, on the other hand, unless it makes a complete change of front, may be expected to keep its own special needs, the League of Nations, and the general armament question clearly before the conference, and to join with Italy and Japan in defending the submarine. Japan has not abandoned its purpose to secure, if possible, a larger cruiser tonnage and Italy declines to accept a naval limitation inferior to that of France, but it is believed that Italy will support France in its proposal of a Mediterranean Locarno which would regulate the naval forces of those two Powers and Great Britain in the Mediterranean. The Department of State has already taken the position that a naval treaty, if one is made at London, cannot be considered as provisional and that unless all five of the Powers agree there will be no treaty at all, but Secretary Stimson has also intimated that the United States has no intention of embarrassing the League.

Mr. Hoover is right in emphasizing the supreme importance of the London conference. A failure to bring about some substantial measure of naval reduction and limitation at London would be nothing short of a calamity for the cause of world peace. The difficulties are great, but they are not insuperable. The hope of success, as Mr. Hoover has said, lies in "the importance and the gravity of the occasion" and the good-will with which the delegates approach their task.

The Report on Law Enforcement

STAMPEDED by loud political cries in both Houses of Congress and by reproachful editorials in most of the newspapers of the country, Mr. Hoover's Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement has issued a preliminary report of its findings to date. The commission was chosen and put to work because of a widespread notion that certain laws in the United States were not being enforced; therefore the main contention of the present report—that certain laws in the United States are not being enforced—is not exactly news. The report as a whole contains little except promises; it is unfortunate that political pressure elicited them so far ahead of performance. The commission announces division of the subject into eleven parts with a committee for each; it promises studies of the most careful and thoroughgoing kind on each part; it has appointed for each committee a group of experts of irreproachable experience, judgment, and honorable intent. This report, when it is finally made, should be a report worth reading. There is, of course, the danger that it will be so long, so detailed, so exhaustive that nobody will read it except a few experts. But there is no reason for quarreling with a report merely because it is too long. There is need for just such an exhaustive study as the present one promises to be.

Meanwhile life goes on. The law continues to be unenforced, the judicial enforcement machinery continues to be inadequate to enforce it. Law-enforcement officials continue to be corruptible, prisoners continue to be ill-used in our courts and in our jails—and the "noble experiment" of prohibition continues, in its many and varied manifestations, to make us as a nation the subject for polite amusement to other nations of the earth. We believe—we dare to admit it even before we see the commission's report on the subject—that the relations between our police departments and our criminals are scandalous, that the third degree is a crying shame, that the congestion of our courts makes the orderly processes of justice impossible, that our penal institutions are relics of a more barbarous age than the present. But we are inclined to believe also that—in spite of the commission's warning that since frontier days we have always been a lawless people—if it were possible to get down to cases on the subject of "American lawlessness," "official lawlessness," and all the similar loose terms that have been flung about during the last few years, we should see one very significant thing: "American lawlessness," in its present manifestation, means that many thousands of American citizens refuse to obey one law; "official lawlessness" means that many hundreds of American officials neglect to enforce that law. It may be possible, if we spend money enough and build jails enough and can find a sufficient number of incorruptible officials, to enforce the prohibition laws. But we shall never even begin to enforce them until we have government officers, from the highest down, who are first of all willing to admit that the question of whether or not those laws can be enforced, and whether or not they will be enforced, are the major questions before the American people today.

In view of the foregoing, it is pertinent to examine the findings of Mr. Hoover's commission on the subject of prohibition—one of the eleven sections into which it has divided its report. The first recommendation of the commission is to transfer the agencies for the enforcement of prohibition from the Treasury Department to the Department of Justice. The work of investigation and prosecution for violation of the prohibition statutes has nothing properly to do with the business of internal revenue or the granting of permits for the legal manufacture and sale of spirits. The second recommendation of the commission's report, for the codification of existing legislation on the subject of prohibition, also seems eminently reasonable. So with the commission's third recommendation, provision for making so-called padlock injunctions more effective. A padlock does no good if the owner of the premises so treated can move next door, or can transfer the lease to his partner or his brother who immediately proceeds to operate a speakeasy and must be proceeded against in the same way as was the original offender. The fourth recommendation offers some complications. It is, in brief, for the definition by Congress of a class of minor infractions of the prohibition statutes which may be proceeded against without the necessity of an indictment by a grand jury, but may be heard before a United States Commissioner in the manner of an ordinary magistrate's court. If the offender pleads guilty, the judge may sentence him on the spot—to not more than $500 fine or more than six months in jail; if he pleads not guilty, the judge may render judgment which may be appealed by the offender, who may then demand and receive a jury trial.

This, of course, involves first the passage of certain legislation by Congress. But as Congress is in a melting mood just now with respect to enforcement of the prohibition laws, this may not present any difficulties. It involves also, however, granting to the district attorney the right to determine whether a case comes under the class of minor infractions or whether the offender should be subjected to indictment and jury trial. This is a rather large amount of discretion in a very controversial issue. Moreover, it must be remembered that if the purpose of the proposal is to expedite justice in minor offenses, thus relieving the federal courts of the burden which prohibition has imposed upon them, any offender has the right to demand the full process of law in his case, and, more perplexing still, the most vigorous champions of prohibition will hesitate to admit, for any purpose however laudable, that such a thing as a minor infraction exists. The whole tendency, of which the Jones law is an outstanding example, has been in the opposite direction.

It is evident that some very lively debates will take place throughout the country as a result of the law-enforcement commission's report. But the report will do one very valuable thing, whatever the value of its various recommendations: it will focus the wandering attention of American politicians and Americans as a whole on the necessity for an immediate, disinterested, and whole-hearted attempt to enforce the prohibition law. Such an attempt has never been made. We have laughed at the law, we have wept over it, we have disregarded it, we have invoked it as the greatest blessing of mankind. Now let us enforce it—if we can.

Air Monopoly Again

THE omniscience of Owen D. Young, alas, has been seriously questioned by two of his associated gods of the big-business pantheon. In fact, that mocking Hermes, Newcomb Carlton, president of the Western Union Company, testifying before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, goes so far as to say: "In respect to Mr. Young's views on international communications, with all respect, of course, I put them in the class with any advice he might be moved to give to nursing mothers." This verges perilously close on lèse majesté, not to say lèse divinité. Both Mr. Carlton and Ellery W. Stone, president of the Kolster Radio Corporation and the Federal Telegraph Company, challenge sharply Mr. Young's reasons for wanting a monopoly in the field of international communications.

In our issue of December 25, in commenting on Mr. Young's testimony and approving his views on the advantages of unification as opposed to competition in the communications industry, we pointed out that both he and General Harbord put forward nationalistic considerations as the basis of their appeal for monopoly in the international field. Mr. Young besought unification "in the national interest." The merger of British communications in intimate relations with the British government, it was suggested, was a serious menace to our companies and to us, and must be met by a union of American companies (under government control, of course). Now this is precisely the same kind of nonsense that American oil companies, at that time in sharp rivalry with the Royal Dutch-Shell, were putting forward in 1920. Mr. Carlton characterizes Mr. Young's presentation of the menace of the British communications merger as "one of the most fantastic bogies ever dressed up in my experience," and he goes on: "The British merger doesn't present the slightest menace to anyone. Right now the Radio Corporation of America and the Western Union hold the British merger in the hollow of their hand."

Replying to Mr. Carlton, General Harbord, who echoes Mr. Young's views, appeals to us "to maintain the present enviable position of our country in both radio and cables, and to aspire to their combined leadership against the world," and urges that we "must not cut the ground from under those who are fighting America's battles on the frontiers of world-wide communication." Frontiers of world-wide bunk! Mr. Young wants to sell the communications system of the Radio Corporation of America, valued by Mr. Stone at $15,000,000 at the outside, to the International Telephone and Telegraph Company for $97,000,000. The law of the United States (a foolish law, in our judgment) stands in the way. Mr. Young beseeches us to sanction his trade in order to save American business and the American people from God knows what disasters in future. His business rivals take the stand and show up his appeal to the national interest for exactly what it is, a means to put across a business deal worth perhaps eighty millions to his stockholders. If Mr. Young wants to make such a deal, let him not try to persuade himself and us that he is thereby saving his fellow-countrymen from imminent dangers.

We reiterate our judgment of the essential soundness of Mr. Young's view that a unified, intelligently planned communications system offers great possibilities of economy by comparison with the duplication and higgledy-piggledy wastefulness of competition in this field; and at the same time we again point to Mr. Young as a striking example of the danger of accepting business men as safe guides in public policy in matters where their own interests are involved. Business deals ought to go about naked, not dressed up in political clothes. Business men like Mr. Young are extraordinarily naive in arraying them in such habiliments, and peoples go to war because they look at the clothes and not at the unshapely forms inside the clothes. In public affairs give us the leadership of impractical theorists.

Our Imperial Burden

NOT all the serious thinking and good writing in the newspaper world are done in the offices of the big metropolitan papers, nor do the small-town dailies live wholly on boiler plate. In the Urbana (Illinois) Daily Courier we note two recent editorials on American imperialism that deserve quotation. Under the caption Destiny Rides on Its Way the editor, A. T. Burrows, writes:

> The struggling nationettes of the Caribbean Sea, of Central America, and even of South America, look upon the Colossus of the North, and plainly see their doom written in letters of fire. . . .
>
> Latin America is frankly incredulous as to the unselfishness of our motives. Our explanations to her do not explain. . . .
>
> The policy they decry is not one thought out by careful schemers, but is simply the inevitable march of destiny. Incompetence must fall before competence. The superior will prevail over the inferior.

Another day, under the heading Look Out, World, the same writer says:

> It is sad but true that the world doesn't want to be reformed. It prefers its own vices to the obvious and undisputed virtues imposed on it from without—no matter what that source might be.
>
> The Haitians just want to be Haitians. . . . They do not want to be reformed. They do not care to be solvent. They are not asking for hard roads, or school houses, or fur coats. Our mission among them is to compel them to do something they do not want to do; and very properly they resent it. . . .
>
> Some day we will learn that it is not possible to impose benefits on an unwilling and objecting recipient. Some day we will learn, what others already know, that "the white man's burden" means nothing more or less than the domination of the world—by persuasion if possible—by force if gentler means fail.
>
> We have taken up the burden. Look out, World.

We are by no means wholly in agreement with the editor of the Courier. In particular, we long ago became extremely suspicious of the march of destiny, because we always found someone who seemed determined to make destiny march that way. But we are delighted to find this striking example of the serious attention being given to our international responsibilities in some of the smaller newspaper offices of the country.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

THE doctrine of papal infallibility is a subtle one, I'm told, and does not mean that the titular head of the Catholic church can never be wrong in any opinion. I trust that this is true, for it will be unfortunate if the latest message from Rome about education is accepted by all Catholics without criticism or question. After all, many of the points touched upon are distinctly secular. It seems to me that in such matters even the wise head of a great church could be wrong. Moreover, the field of education is wide and it is difficult for the closest student of the subject to advance and defend generalizations. In recent years, at any rate, the present Pope has hardly been in a position to pay close personal attention to American school conditions. I do not think that anyone familiar with the field would speak quite so harshly of co-education.

The Pope, to be sure, is interested chiefly in the sort of education which will best promote allegiance and fidelity to the church which he leads. Yet even admitting this it seems to me that the Pontiff has some misconceptions and that the educational theories which he attacks constitute no danger whatsoever to the faith which he upholds. According to the encyclical:

> The sexes were made distinct by the Creator. They complement each other reciprocally owing to their diversity, which must therefore be maintained in education, with the necessary separation proportional to the various ages and circumstances. These principles must be applied in all schools, especially during the most delicate and decisive period of growth, namely adolescence, and especially, also, in gymnastic exercises and sports for girls with due regard for their Christian modesty.

I have only seen the newspaper reports and it may be that the Pope's proclamation makes a clearer case if read in its entirety. Frankly, this extract does not seem to me to make much sense. It seems to say that God created two sexes; which nobody will deny. From this accepted fact the leap is made that they must be separated in the schools. But why? Little boys remain little boys and little girls can still be feminine even though they happen to have shared a class room while hearing how Washington crossed the Delaware. Anybody who feels that co-education promotes looseness of thought and deed has made an imperfect study of the subject. Someone might rise at this point to ask me to qualify as an expert on the subject of education before I undertake to criticize the theories of the Pope. Unfortunately I cannot. But after all I did go to Horace Mann High School, which was co-educational, while the Pope, I assume, went to some separatist school as is the custom of his church and country. Obviously, one of the Pontiff's chief worries is about the activity of girls in athletics. Here he is dealing with a problem which has local aspects. Mussolini has encouraged women to participate in sports. The Pope seems to feel that sport clothes, when worn by women, are an offense to Christian modesty. Now modesty is difficult of definition. Even a Pope must admit that in various parts of the world, what with climate and one thing and another, the extent of raiment varies. Good Catholic girls and women in Africa cannot be expected to have precisely the same idea as Eskimos as to what constitutes quiet and refined attire. I've seen pictures of Italian women engaged in public demonstrations of gymnastic skill. They wore bloomers which once shocked and horrified American taste, but by now bloomers are accepted here as a matter of course even by persons of high moral standards. I think the Pope could be wrong about bloomers. At least I do not see why an individual might not faithfully follow every article of Catholic faith and still remain pro-bloomers. In fact it seems to me extraordinary that a great religious leader should think it necessary to include such things within the province of his authority.

Moreover, co-education does not stand or fall with bloomers. Girls and boys may study algebra together and still maintain wholly separate basketball teams. And I think that co-education is most valuable at the very time when the Pope would chiefly discourage it. Adolescence is a decisive period but I fail to see in what way segregation is supposed to soften the blow. Sexual development is at least a natural process and the more calmly it is accepted by the individuals concerned by just so much are health and morality promoted. This is, as the Pope has pointed out, a world of two sexes. All but the comparatively small number of persons who become members of holy orders have to live in this world. Then why not have them accept it as a place of diversity from the very beginning? Sex distinction is far more marked in mixed companies than in schools where boys and girls are herded separately. In fact I am not familiar with any problem which is best solved by running away from it.

Again, I wish respectfully to note a disagreement with the Pope's idea of what modernists are trying to do in the matter of sex education.

> An extremely dangerous thing [the encyclical says] is that naturalism which invades the field of education in such delicate subjects as moral purity. Very widespread is the error of those who with dangerous presumptuousness and with ugly words promote so-called sexual education, falsely believing that they can forearm youths against the dangers of the senses with purely natural means, such as foolhardy inaction and preventive instruction or, worse still, by exposing them early in life to temptations in order to accustom them, as they say, and harden their hearts against those dangers. They err gravely in not recognizing the innate frailty of human nature and also in neglecting the experience which warns us that sins against morality are not so much the result of intellectual unpreparedness as of a weak will exposed to temptation and unsupported by grace.

And here I think no true issue exists. The Pontiff has very largely manufactured it. He says that intellectual preparation is not enough. Yet surely it is not impossible to equip a youth with both grace and understanding. They are not mutually exclusive. When one prays to be guarded against some certain temptation he is not necessarily fatally handicapped because he happens to have some knowledge of the nature of that temptation.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Clemenceau the Destroyer

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, December 18

MAYNARD KEYNES said in his "Economic Consequences of the Peace" that Clemenceau had one illusion, France, and one disillusion, the whole of mankind, especially his fellow-countrymen. It would be difficult to give in a sentence a more exact summary of Clemenceau's psychology.

Georges Clemenceau was a very remarkable and very exceptional man, but not in the sense indicated in most of his obituary notices. Of all the newspaper articles that I have read about him since his death, few showed such an understanding of his character as that published in the Manchester Guardian of November 25 with the title, A Daemonic Figure. It was written by an anonymous author whom others besides myself must have identified as one of the most brilliant journalists of our time, who, alas! will write no more. The style no less than the penetrating analysis revealed the late J. G. Hamilton. Clemenceau has been called in every language "the greatest French statesman of his time." As Hamilton said in the article just mentioned, he had none of the qualities of a statesman: "There was nothing constructive about him, no suppleness, none of that feeling for compromise that is the mark of true statesmanship. Instead, he had an insatiable passion for destruction; he gloried in his own instinctive nihilism." But, as Hamilton also said, Clemenceau was a formidable personality, and few men have so impressed their personality on their contemporaries.

How did this come about? To what did Clemenceau owe his hold on the French, why did they turn to him in the hour of danger and submit to his dictatorship for two years? Certainly not because of his past political or diplomatic achievements. He was seventy-six years old when he became prime minister for the second time in November, 1917, and his long political career had been barren of any constructive action. He had been in active politics nearly all his life—he was only twenty-nine when he became mayor of Montmartre in 1871 under the Paris Commune—and he had not a single reform, not a single political achievement of any sort to his credit. Most of his political career had been spent voluntarily in opposition, a purely destructive opposition, for even his criticism was not constructive. Clemenceau always denied, never affirmed—he was negation made flesh. He made his reputation in the Chamber as a wrecker, as the man that overthrew ministries, and it was in a great measure thanks to him that France had twenty-nine successive cabinets in twenty years (1873-1893). It was not until October 25, 1906, when he was sixty-five, that he became a minister for the first time in the stop-gap cabinet of M. Sarrien, whom he succeeded as prime minister seven months later. He was prime minister on that occasion for nearly three years and the best comment on his term of office is his own cynical remark in the Chamber: "Nous sommes en pleine incohérence." In those three years Clemenceau broke up the Bloc of the Left that had governed France since 1899, disintegrated the Radical Party to which he himself belonged, stirred up by his arrogance and domineering methods disorders which he repressed with bloodshed, and very nearly plunged France into war with Germany over the Casablanca incident in September, 1908, when German deserters from the French Foreign Legion, protected by the German consul, were arrested by the French authorities. Clemenceau sat up the whole of one night with the mobilization orders ready to be sent out, but war was averted by the consent of the German Government to submit the matter to the Hague arbitration tribunal. Had there been war France would have been easily and quickly beaten, for the French army was then much less efficient than in 1914, France was not prepared for war as she was at the later date, and neither England nor Russia would have consented to be dragged into a war over so trivial a matter. It was during Clemenceau's premiership that the Seventeenth Regiment mutinied when ordered to fire on the wine growers of the South, goaded to revolt by his treatment of their demands, and his term of office was marked by some of the most violent strikes ever known in France. It was proved—and Clemenceau could not deny it—that he had paid an agent provocateur called Métivier to incite the workmen to violence to give him an excuse for shooting them down. When Clemenceau resigned in July, 1909, he left French politics in a state of confusion from which they have not yet entirely recovered.

Clemenceau's career in the press was as negative and destructive as his career in Parliament. He was out of Parliament from 1893, when he lost his seat in the Chamber, to 1902, when he was elected to the Senate, but during that time he retained immense influence as a political journalist. His defeat in 1893 was due to his connection with the Panama scandal. There seems to be little or no doubt that he had had money for his paper from Baron Reinach and a financier of British nationality called Cornelius Herz, both of whom were implicated in the Panama affair, but the chief reason of his disgrace was the absurd legend that he was a British agent, based on forged documents representing him to have been in relations with a mythical British agent called Norton. In fact Clemenceau desired good relations between England and France, no doubt in the hope that they would serve the cause of revanche as they ultimately did, but he was never under British influence and certainly did not follow British policy. He was, for instance, an ardent supporter of the Franco-Russian alliance at a time when it was regarded in England with suspicion and distrust, and in 1896 he said in an article in the Dépèche de Toulouse:

> We wish Russia, after having been the accomplice of our downfall, to become the instrument of our complete resuscitation; that is, to call it by its right name, our revenge. If we said the contrary, nobody would believe us. It is therefore more simple to avow it.

When Clemenceau became prime minister for the first time in 1906, he was personally unknown in Downing Street, where his accession to office caused some uneasiness, for his reputation was that of a rather reckless and irresponsible extremist. Edward VII was sent off post-haste to Paris to make his acquaintance and try to tame the tiger and came back with a reassuring report about the new prime minister's intentions, but Clemenceau's reckless conduct in 1908 justified the fears of Downing Street.

The one bright spot in Clemenceau's career was his attitude in the Dreyfus affair; it was in his paper, L'Aurore, that Zola's J'accuse was published. Anatole France, however, who had been brought into close contact with Clemenceau during the affair, never believed him to have been sincere or disinterested in that matter. I do not know on what evidence France's opinion was based, but Clemenceau's subsequent evolution was certainly not inconsistent with it. It is right to say that Anatole France always detested Clemenceau, even when they were on the same side in politics. He held him to be cruel and malevolent by nature, to be a man who had never done anything but harm and who delighted in doing harm. France himself has often been called cynical, and in a sense no doubt he was, but only a fool can fail to recognize the unbounded tolerance of human weaknesses and the immense sympathy with human suffering that underlie his raillery at human folly. He might have said of himself, with Beaumarchais's Figaro, "Je me hâte de rire de tout de peur d'en pleurer." Clemenceau, on the other hand, despised human sympathy as a sign of weakness. "Vous n'êtes qu'un sot avec votre pitié," he said to a friend; "dans la vie il faut être méchant, méchant, méchant." And he acted on his own maxim all his life. He hated the whole human race, as Keynes implied. In both private and public relations he was intensely vindictive and utterly unscrupulous as to the means that he used against his enemies and opponents and even against members of his own family that had incurred his displeasure. I doubt whether he ever had a real friendship or affection for any individual. His former private secretary and ardent admirer, M. Jean Martet, says of him in the current number of the Revue de Paris that he took no pleasure in the friendship of anybody that did not constantly keep him amused and excite his curiosity, and that he never understood or cared to understand the characters of those with whom he came into contact. That is to say, Clemenceau was a perfect egoist, utterly lacking in sympathy with others. Both his egoism and his ambition reached such proportions as to become monstrous and inhuman. He was prepared to sacrifice everybody and everything to them and to his idol—an abstraction called "France." For Clemenceau, who thought himself irreligious and indeed anti-religious, was an adept in what Anatole France called the worst of all religions, Patriotism. He was the super-patriot, and, as is always the case, there was a great deal of egoism and personal vanity in his patriotism. When people bitterly resent what they consider to be an affront to their church or their country, what they really resent is the affront to their own vanity. Clemenceau identified himself with "France," so that the supposed humiliation of France in 1871 was the humiliation of Georges Clemenceau, and he could never forget it.

This man, delighting as he did in bloodshed and destruction, was bound to come to the top in the war, if it lasted long enough. Anatole France, who foresaw so many things, foresaw this. In letters that he wrote to me quite early in 1915 he anticipated with dread a Clemenceau ministry. At that time he thought that it might be a Clemenceau-Barthou ministry—"the terrible Janus, Clemenceau-Barthou" was what he called it. France foresaw, too, that if and when Clemenceau did come into power he would behave exactly as he did in fact behave. He knew the man. It is said that Clemenceau "saved France." It is true that he saved France—and the Allies—from a negotiated peace in 1917, but who will venture to say now that it could have been worse for Europe and the world than the peace afterward made? There is every reason to think that it would have been better for everybody, including France—not the mystical abstraction of Clemenceau's devotion, but the real country and its inhabitants. In 1917 there had been two serious offers of peace negotiations, the first from the Austrian Emperor through Prince Sixtus de Bourbon, the second from the German Emperor through the Belgians, when it was suggested that Briand should go to Switzerland incognito to meet Baron von der Lancken. The facts about the second had become known to the Chamber in a secret session in October, 1917, and such was the indignation at Ribot's conduct in turning down the German proposal that he was forced to resign. It was then that Poincaré reluctantly came to the conclusion that his old personal enemy, Clemenceau, was the only man capable of forcing France to continue the war. The folly of the Socialists in combining with the Right to overthrow the Painlevé Cabinet gave the opportunity a few weeks later of putting Clemenceau in power.

It is not true that Clemenceau believed in the victory of the Allies. He himself said after the war—the fact has been published since his death by more than one of his intimates—that he had never believed in victory until June, 1918. Before he became prime minister he was one of the worst "defeatists" in France. Day after day his factotum, Jeroboam Rothschild, alias Georges Mandel, came to the lobbies of the Chamber and drew deputies and journalists aside one after the other into a recess where he imparted to them terrifying and usually imaginary stories of appalling military disasters that had been concealed from the public. Clemenceau's paper, L'Homme Enchaîné, was in constant difficulties with the censors, often for publishing information likely to help the enemy and hamper the military operations of the Allies. These maneuvers were part of a desperate intrigue to get into power at all costs. It was not easy for Clemenceau to get into power, for he was generally distrusted and, as he himself said, had not half a dozen friends. Finally he secured the support of the Action Française and the Right by promising to have Caillaux and Malvy arrested on charges in which he himself certainly did not believe. Léon Daudet hinted in an article the other day that Clemenceau had not kept to the bargain in that he had not had Caillaux and Malvy shot. Clemenceau ruled by fear and terrorism. He had always inspired fear by his biting tongue and unscrupulous methods—that was how he imposed his personality—and when all the power was in his hands everybody knew that he would stick at nothing to gain his ends. Every means of terrorism was resorted to, including that of listening in on the telephone communications of politicians and blackmailing them by threatening to show their wives verbatim reports of compromising conversations. Over the heads of others hung the threat that they would share the fate of Caillaux and Malvy if they were not careful. Clemenceau even said that he would have Anatole France arrested if he said "a word too much," although the fact was not known to France himself until after the end of the war.

The end was victory, no doubt, but if it had not been? And it would not have been, but for American intervention and the British blockade. Even as it was, the Germans came within an ace of victory in 1918. In May of that year Clemenceau believed so little in victory that he said that there was nothing left for the French people but to go down to the sea and perish there together. The truth—the dreadful truth—is that he was quite prepared to sacrifice the French people to "France"—and Georges Clemenceau. Victory and revenge, if possible, but if not, then ruin and annihilation rather than a negotiated peace though it should give Alsace-Lorraine to France as a negotiated peace in 1917 probably would have done. Clemenceau was, as Hamilton said in the article already quoted, a "daemonic figure."

His pride had a terrible fall when the worms turned against their tyrant under cover of a secret ballot and he was rejected as candidate for the presidency. Clemenceau never recovered from the blow and never forgave the affront. He isolated himself from an ungrateful world and indulged his spite by confiding to his few visitors, mostly royalists and reactionaries, his poor opinion of all his contemporaries and his conviction that democracy was a failure (had it not rejected Georges Clemenceau?) and that the Republican regime would be the ruin of France. But although the tiger could still roar a little his claws were drawn and nobody was any longer afraid of him. His hold on France is ended. The attempts since his death to exalt him into a national hero have failed. He was never loved; he is rapidly ceasing even to be admired. The indifference of the public was shown by the poor attendance at the grotesque function in his honor at the Arc de Triomphe. The victory for which he sacrificed so many French lives has turned to dust and ashes; the peace treaties that he made are crumbling to pieces. And there are signs that the French people are beginning to recognize that wiser and better than the spirit of Georges Clemenceau is the spirit of the man who wrote in a book published only a few months before the outbreak of the war:

> War engenders war and victory defeat. God, conquered, will become Satan; Satan, conquering, will become God. . . . As to ourselves, celestial spirits, sublime daemons, we have destroyed Ialdabaoth, our tyrant, if in ourselves we have destroyed Ignorance and Fear.

A Railroad View of Consolidation

By J. G. LYNE

It is now nearly ten years since the Transportation Act of 1920 was passed. Yet consolidation under its provisions seems even more remote now than it did at the time of its passage, even though the Interstate Commerce Commission has adopted a consolidation plan. The consolidation provisions of the Transportation Act are briefly as follows:

> That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, "as soon as practicable" adopt a plan for the consolidation of the railroads into a limited number of systems,
>
> That the new systems shall preserve competition and existing channels of trade "as fully as possible,"
>
> That the new systems shall be so arranged that their costs of transportation as related to their values shall be approximately the same,
>
> That the adoption by the commission of its plan must be a condition precedent to the authorization of any particular consolidation proposal and that such particular plans must conform to the commission's general plan if they are to be approved, and
>
> That the outstanding securities of an amalgamated railroad corporation must not exceed the valuation as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

What has the Interstate Commerce Commission been doing in the ten years which have passed since the enactment of the Transportation Act? Its first step was to engage the services of Professor William Z. Ripley of Harvard University to draft a proposed plan, as a basis upon which to start. The commission took Professor Ripley's plan, made a few changes in it, and then, in September, 1921, served it upon the railways as a tentative report. In March of the following year hearings were begun and lasted through that year and 1923. Oral arguments were heard in February, 1924.

By 1925 the commission had apparently run into difficulties in arriving at a decision. In its annual report for that year it reproduced a letter sent to Congress in which it recommended, among other things, that the law be amended to absolve it from the duty of adopting a complete plan of consolidation and to permit a more expeditious determination of value of properties proposed to be consolidated. These recommendations were repeated in the annual reports of 1926, 1927, and 1928, in the last year with the explanation that action in adopting a final consolidation plan was being delayed awaiting some action on the part of Congress. Now, apparently weary of waiting for Congress, the commission has announced its complete plan.

It should not be overlooked that consolidation of a sort is possible under the present law. One railroad acquires control, by lease or stock purchase, of another. Quasi-consolidation of this kind is going on all the time, but not at a very rapid rate. It does not involve the scrambling of properties so that they cannot later be unscrambled. Still, the commission has refrained from encouraging such quasi-consolidation along lines which might conflict with its putative general plan. Furthermore, consolidation of this kind does not secure the benefits of complete amalgamation, since the companies involved must be separately maintained and no simplification in accounting or other overhead activities is possible.

It is acknowledged that the motive force toward consolidation must come from the railroads. The Interstate Commerce Commission has no power to compel consolidation, and it would probably be difficult to frame a constitutional law which would give it that power. No external authority is needed, however, to bring about railroad consolidation, which is a development dating from the infancy of the industry and continuing steadily until it was almost completely stopped by the Sherman Act, which forbade combinations in restraint of trade, and particularly by the decision in the Northern Securities case in 1904. Such consolidation as has taken place has been a natural economic development proceeding on an ordinary business basis, the A & B railroad foreseeing economies in the acquisition of the C & D which would enable it to offer more to the owners of that railroad as purchase money than the owners could hope to earn from continuing to operate the property independently. Consolidation of this kind is a natural economic phenomenon to be observed in many industries. It has a distinct advantage over any nation-wide, pre-arranged plan in that each step in the process must stand the test of its economic desirability, which test, if railroad efficiency is to be promoted, is absolutely essential.

It seems to be taken for granted that a large industrial enterprise is ipso facto more efficient than a smaller one, and that this general principle is also true of the railroad industry. But there is an outstanding difference between the railroads and most other industries. In the latter, combination results in the elimination of small and inefficient plants and concentration of production in modern factories, where a heavy investment in modern machinery can be utilized to the utmost. The product of the railway industry is ton-miles and passenger-miles. If consolidation meant that production of ton-miles and passenger-miles now performed on far-flung, light-traffic lines could be abandoned and such production concentrated upon highly developed, level, four-track lines, then we might expect railroad combination to produce economies similar to those in industry. Of course this is not possible, and the economies to be expected from railroad consolidation are much less than might at first be supposed. There is a size beyond which railroad management is likely to become less effective; for a railroad is widely scattered and, even with modern facilities for communication, extremely difficult of intelligent centralized control. There are economies to be expected from consolidation, with its probable savings from standardization and mass-production methods in shops, but it is easily possible to overestimate such advantages and overlook the more effective managerial control of the smaller property.

Consolidation to promote economy in transportation, then, ought to take place only when railroad managers intimately concerned with the properties believe the amalgamation economically desirable. There are undoubtedly many railroad lines which, because of their peculiar traffic conditions or other reasons, can operate more efficiently as independent companies than they could as parts of large systems. If economy in transportation is to be fostered, then such lines should remain independent.

Is there any better method for determining whether a given consolidation will be economical than the fact that a buyer and a seller, both knowing intimately the properties involved, can agree upon a transaction, believing it to be to their mutual advantage? This is not an appeal for complete laissez faire in railroad consolidation. There is more involved in consolidation than the self-interest of the railroads engaging in it. There is, for instance, the maintenance of competition, the desirability of which is quite generally accepted by both railroad men and their patrons. There is also the matter of the absorption of weak lines. The extent to which it would be ethical for the government to prescribe the absorption of such lines as a condition precedent to the approval of a specific consolidation plan is debatable. On the other hand, authority to consolidate in some degree according to their own plans would be a concession to railroad owners for which they could afford also to concede something. The authority which the commission now has over the issue of railroad securities affords ample protection against capital inflation from the process, and the provision in the present law, that valuation agreement must precede consolidation and be used to control its security issues, serves only to make progress even more difficult.

The primary purpose of consolidation is to avoid the possibility that, with uniform rates, some lines will prosper unduly while others will starve. If this were the only consideration, then the logical way to meet it would be to combine all railways into one huge company. But there are other considerations, one of them being the preservation of competition. Since competition is to be preserved, which approach to consolidation promises to bring the earlier solution of the problem of the weak roads—that contained in the present law or the more liberal one here advocated?

A regulated laissez faire policy like that outlined herein is the more promising, I believe, primarily for the reason that it is a policy which will encourage, and not hinder, consolidation of railroads that are already prepared to amalgamate. A preconceived, nation-wide plan such as is now put forward by the commission will unavoidably throw some railroads together against their owners' wishes and separate others whose owners wish to join forces. There is no compulsion in the law, and there probably could not be any without much time-consuming litigation. The insistence upon consolidation according to a preconceived plan, therefore, while it will permit some consolidations, promises to postpone general consolidation indefinitely. If, on the other hand, any consolidation were permitted which would conform to certain definite principles—public convenience and necessity, maintenance of competition, absence of financial manipulation, some consideration of including necessitous weak lines—then great and immediate progress would be forthcoming. The Interstate Commerce Commission would not be forced, as it now is, to inject itself into situations where the parties concerned can themselves reach an agreement, but would restrict itself to the much simpler task of adjudicating differences and passing on specific plans in the light of the public interest.

If the commission were empowered, without any reference to a prescribed plan, to approve or disapprove any consolidation proposal put before it, it would be just as easy to hinder development of gross differences as between companies as it is under the present law. In fact, it would really be easier, since the present law acts as a brake on almost all consolidation progress and we continue to have weak and strong roads, with no effective steps being taken to solve the problem which they present.

Nor must we lose sight of the fact that nobody knows, for a certainty just what is the ideal size of a railroad company. Is it wise to plan the amalgamation of all our railways into a definite number of approximately comparable systems, when we know that such action will include many smaller railways which might have operated more efficiently and more satisfactorily to their patrons if they remained independent? Consolidation ought to produce some economies, but the only way to be sure of them is to weigh each proposal carefully and put to proof each step in the process.

Fortunately, it is not necessary to proceed entirely on assumption in the matter of consolidation. While the subject was in the early stages of examination and study in this country, a consolidation bill was passed in Great Britain and its provisions were speedily carried out; 124 railway companies were reduced to four, which have been in operation since 1923. Consolidation was effected on a territorial basis, rather than one of maintaining competition; that is to say, each company is dominant in its own territory. There is some overlapping of territories, it is true, and some competition remains, but nothing of the sort contemplated by the consolidation provisions of our Transportation Act. Consolidation without competition should tend to promote greater economies than where competition is retained—the abandonment of competing and parallel facilities being made possible, as well as the savings from standardization, mass methods in repair work, and like gains which can be secured under any form of consolidation. Presumably, therefore, consolidation in Great Britain ought to have brought economies as great as anything we can expect in the United States, and possibly greater. What has actually occurred? Opinions differ widely, but it seems evident that the savings have been far from startling. Indeed it could probably be demonstrated without much difficulty that the American railways, without consolidation, have shown a greater ratio of improved efficiency since the war than the British railways under amalgamation. The economies to be expected from consolidation per se, therefore, seem to be relatively less than those obtainable through a constant effort to develop better operating methods and a willingness to spend money to secure the advantages of modern equipment.

The complexity of the situation is infinite—the details of corporate relationships, the ebb and flow of traffic, the possible combinations which can be worked out. To expect to lay a prearranged pattern of railway systems upon such a crazy-quilt and have it conform is the height of futility. The problem can be worked out satisfactorily only if it is tackled piecemeal—and then preferably by the parties at interest, with the Interstate Commerce Commission keeping a watchful eye from the standpoint of the public and acting as arbiter on points of difference. This is the economical method of achieving desirable consolidations.

Unemployment in England

By JOHN A. HOBSON

A LABOR government is expected to improve the conditions of the laboring classes. So far the successes of Mr. MacDonald's Government have been in other fields, especially in foreign policy, which though making perhaps valuable indirect contributions to our economic resources in improved foreign trade and reduced costs of armaments, have brought no present relief to our industrial distresses. Though some slight improvement is visible in our iron and steel trade, our export trades in general still remain in the trough of the deepest and most prolonged depression recorded in our history. During the past eight years there have been two slight flickers of recovery, but they have soon vanished, and we are all now convinced that the policy of waiting with folded arms for a recovery of world trade which shall absorb our million and a quarter unemployed is sheer imbecility. A Labor government that fails to tackle unemployment successfully, and with reasonable speed, will certainly go under, whether by its own fault or not. It may be that a satisfactory solution of the problem is beyond the power of any government, that the new economic conditions of the post-war world, with its new national industries protected by tariff walls, and the rapid advances of productive power in Germany, the United States, and other countries, have permanently diminished the volume of our export trades, and reduced the number of workers that can be sustained on British soil at the standard of living which earlier conditions have enabled them to reach. If so, nothing but a slow process of emigration, impeded by the "dole" policy and the immigration obstructions of foreign countries and our dominions, seems to offer an escape from our plight.

Few economists or business men really believe that the immediate proposals for stimulating employment by public expenditure upon roads, housing, and other public works will greatly reduce the volume of unemployment during the next few years. The speech made recently by Mr. Thomas, who is in charge of this department of governmental policy, has confirmed this view of the unsubstantiality of such measures for stimulating unemployment. Moreover, the finance of the situation, taken in conjunction with the enlarged provisions for unemployed relief under the new measure piloted through the House of Commons by Miss Bondfield, is bound to cause great embarrassment to Mr. Snowden when he is confronted with the necessity of raising increased revenues to meet these obligations. The wilder members of the Labor Party, under the leadership of Mr. Maxton and Mr. Wheatley, no doubt hold that capitalist profiteers and landlords can be easily made to disgorge the necessary sums. But no such illusions possess the minds of Mr. MacDonald or of his Chancellor. That some fresh taxation must be imposed is certain in view of the financial weakness of Mr. Churchill's predatory finance. But no such large increase of revenue is possible as would be needed to make a substantial impression upon the mass of unemployment by means of public works or even subsidies for semi-public enterprises such as railway, gas, and water companies. The statement just issued by Mr. Thomas relating to such grants and guaranties does not profess to provide more than a year's employment for some 84,000 men, not 7 per cent of the present volume of unemployed. The more liberal provisions for unemployed relief under the new act will take off a considerable amount of public money without providing any increased employment. These policies are to be regarded as emergency or palliative measures rather than as remedies.

Such considerations are exercising the minds of more thoughtful statesmen and business men in favor of exploring the possibilities of larger and more fundamental policies. Though the demand for a removal of these problems from the category of a purely party issue, voiced by Mr. Snowden, and supported by many members of the Liberal and Labor Parties, has not been openly adopted by the Government, it has not been rejected. There are signs at any rate of a willingness to take outside men, both economists and business men, into conference on the graver aspects of the situation. Mr. MacDonald has long been known to favor the establishment of a General Economic Staff, to correlate the economic information of the various departments handling economic administration, and to offer expert counsel to the government for guidance of this policy. Several lunches have been held at Downing Street where economists and business men of various political complexions have been brought into private conference to discuss not only this proposal but other methods of bringing authoritative advice to bear upon the industrialists and labor leaders whose intelligence and active good-will are required for the application of any larger remedies. These larger remedies fall under the now familiar heads of "rationalization, reorganization, stabilization, the cooperation of firms in an industry for the elimination of waste, specialization of production, and, in general, improved technique and organization." It is recognized that a large part of our coal trouble is due to the survival of mines with inferior seams or inferior equipment, that many of our cotton and woolen mills are not up to the modern standard in plant or management, and that the same is true in our metal, engineering, and other trades. The war and post-war troubles lost us many of our foreign markets, in addition to those lost by the new economic nationalism. While the public works and subsidies may be of some immediate service in reducing unemployment and stimulating trade through enlarged consumption, nothing short of a widespread and carefully designed method of cutting costs of production in our staple manufacturers can go far toward restoring trade prosperity and reducing unemployment to its normal pre-war limits. Rejecting as socially unsound and impracticable the demand for wage-cuts which to unintelligent employers is the only way of reducing costs, we come to that larger policy of reconditioning of industries as unitary wholes to which we have alluded, as the only way of salvation.

But is it practicable in a sufficient measure? Here our problems arise. Is the capital available for the scrapping of obsolete plants and replacement by up-to-date plants, and for other necessary expenditures in adjusting business to the specialized requirements of a well-organized industry? Secondly, if the capital is available, is the mentality of employers and workers capable of responding to the demands for readjustment of their stereotyped habits, rules, and natures? Taking first the question of capital, I find economists and business men generally agreed that for schemes of reconditioning, as likewise for new productive businesses, there is no lack of monetary capital, provided the applicants can show a reasonable prospect of profitable sales. Though most firms in the depressed industries have depleted their resources, and must look outside for any new investment capital they require, such capital is obtainable on reasonable terms for well-indorsed business propositions. The sums recklessly invested during the past year or two in bogus or wild-cat enterprises show that investment capital is not lacking. So, likewise, with bank facilities in the way of loans and overdrafts for running expenses; such credits are available to assist in financing sound amalgamations and the general work of industrial reconstruction. Nor is the required flow of new capital confined to our own investible savings.

In a word, it is not want of capital that is the obstacle to the reconditioning of our industries. It is the slow response of our industrialists and workers to the urgent need for revolutionizing the structure and operation of their industries. Few employers can yet be got to recognize that the capitalist era of individual enterprise and laissez faire must in the staple industries be replaced by an era of combination, financial, industrial, and commercial. The few experiments in the chemical, the steel-rail, and some minor trades in rationalization or cartelization are still regarded as abnormalities by the general run of business men, who cling closely to purely personal control, established practices, and old-fashioned manufacturing. It is true that larger business units are being produced in staple trades by amalgamation, but the idea of a unitary policy, involving distribution of orders, concerted specialization, cooperative marketing, price agreements, the elimination of obsolete plants, is still distasteful to the average business man. Nothing short of the slow education of necessity and the struggle for survival will make him willing to enter the new industrial order.

Labor is in the same position. The prolonged depression has made workers more reluctant than ever to eye with favor a "rationalization" of their industry which would lower costs of production either by cutting wage rates or by displacing skilled labor by machinery. For it is true that in many, if not most, cases the first immediate effect of the proposed amalgamation and technical economies will be to "save labor" by reducing the number of skilled employees. This may be compensated for a time by increased employment in other trades making the new machines and other appliances which up-to-date production requires. But each trade looks to its own employment, and though lowered costs of production may eventually restore or enlarge the volume of employment by increased productivity and markets, the trade economist will be slow to accept any present risk or sacrifice for a speculative future gain which he may not live to share.

The restoration of our industrial prosperity and the absorption of our unemployed cannot in any case be a rapid process. Any early bettering of trade conditions, either by government aids or by more intelligent business organization, will not be likely to satisfy the sanguine expectation raised by electioneering promises. This will not be the fault of the Government. They are bent on doing what they can to stimulate productivity and reduce unemployment by public aids and pressures. But Britain is to a less extent than any other great nation a self-contained economic system. Our great foreign trade cannot revive and expand to maintain our working population on its higher standard of living without something like a corresponding rise in the wages and other conditions of industry in other countries. For there are limits to "the efficiency of high wages and short hours," and where scientific technique and highly organized industry can be operated by relatively low-paid "robot" labor, there is no guaranty possible of the foreign or even the domestic markets Britain requires for the full output of her industries. Rationalization, therefore, if accepted as a policy, must be supported by a vigorous economic internationalism which, working at Geneva or by trade-union action, shall raise the standard of real wages in the more backward countries toward our own standard, thus enlarging the world market for those commodities which form the staples of working-class consumption and of standardized production.

In the Driftway

EXCURSION rates for the holidays, railroad consolidations, and the fact that the Drifter had to wait a half hour for a train not long ago have caused him to reflect once more upon the desolation of railroad stations. Wherever one goes by rail, he will find a place which will seem familiar to him, one place he will never feel at home in, the railway station. In the mysterious vistas of the Gare du Quai d'Orsay, under the great arch of the station at Tours, in the simple, forthright station at Cadiz, all above ground and somnolent under the white sun, the traveler feels exactly as he feels in the cindered shadow of a depot in Minnedoka, Idaho.

* * * * *

IT is true that, in America, railroad stations seem to have been built by the most unpleasant, if not the worst, architects available. This is partially explained by the fact that most of them were built in the latter half of the nineteenth century, though even that ample cloak does not cover all the sins against aesthetics of which the ordinary railroad station is guilty. Likewise, economics explains, though it does not extenuate, the crime of the cheap red paint which combines with the smoke of locomotives to mar many an American countryside. A sagebrush flat, with its sterile white alkali dust whipped into futile whirls by a wind that can bring no rain, is a sad sight. But set in the center of it a dull red railroad station, with its gingerbread gables rising above the treeless prairie like lost and useless ghosts—that is a sight to make the gods weep.

* * * * *

THE inside of the ordinary railroad station is of course even more depressing than the outside. The tick of the large, ungainly clock with the seemingly motionless hands; the sullen benches, strung along a dingy wall or bound back to back like desperate prisoners, divided by hard unyielding iron bars into spaces too large for one lonely traveler but too small for two; the tight-closed maw that opens only before train time to swallow up the hard-earned pennies; the inadequate lights in their dirty globes; the sound of impatient, slowed footsteps in the great dim cavern. And the insides of railway stations are even more alike than the outsides. A waiting-room seems to attract to itself certain aspects of dreariness that yield neither to race, to religion, nor to morals. It is desolate because it has no life of its own. Except in the ticket office, where no one may enter, there is neither warmth nor friendliness. Nobody goes to a railroad station except on his way to some other place. Always there is the clang, heard or unheard, of a train going somewhere else.

* * * * *

AND the Drifter doubts whether his favorite architect—or even he himself—could design a railroad station devoid of desolation. Grand Central Terminal, in New York, is the nearest approach to it, but Grand Central has what most stations lack. It has never-ceasing crowds that mill through it most of the twenty-four hours; it has bright lights; most important, it has dozens of shops where hundreds of people lead a consecutive daily existence. In fact the station at Grand Central is not the bright world that whirls under its own starry sky. It is that dark void filled with the sounds of departure and arrival, of going and coming but never of staying, that lies beyond the ticket-taker.

* * * * *

PENNSYLVANIA Station, on the other hand, is first and last a railway station. One never loses there the sense of trains and travel. Like Grand Central, it has crowds and lights and shops, yet it has somehow managed to preserve, on a scale so grand that it attains a kind of magnificence, that unique quality which is to be found in railroad stations from Lahore to South Bend. In its gray recesses the traveler is reduced to his rightful, insignificant role, that of a crawler on the face of the earth. And despite unkind remarks that have passed here, the Drifter prefers Pennsylvania Station to Grand Central. A railroad station, after all, should not try to be anything else.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

"The Smallest Investor"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It was with intense interest that I read the article, The National City Fiasco, in the issue of The Nation for January 1. The writer states that the banks sold securities even to the smallest investor. The following story may illustrate clearly how they did it.

At the beginning of August my aged father sent me $1,500 requesting me to invest it for him safely. Prompted by advertisements of the National City Bank in which it recommended sound bonds for investment, I decided to go there. I consulted an "investment specialist" and asked him for a good bond yielding about 6 per cent. Much to my surprise he told me that I would be foolish to buy bonds. Anaconda Copper would be the right investment and, since it was selling around $118 per share with a dividend of $7, it would yield 6 per cent, just what I wanted. In two or three months the stock would sell for at least $135 and would be still cheap at that. I asked to have some time to think this over, but, nevertheless, the stock was bought the same day for me, although I did not have any money with me at all. You probably know what happened. The stock is selling around $70 (instead of $135), a loss of almost $600 on an investment of $1,416 (twelve shares at $118).

I wrote to the bank twice. In my first letter I asked them how the bank was going to protect its customers' interest if it persuaded them to buy stocks instead of bonds. The answer was that it was fairly sure that the dividend was being kept on the present level. Although the bank regretted the break in the market, it could not assume any responsibility. It pointed out that the stock rose shortly after the purchase to $133, to which I answered that I did not buy it for speculation, but for investment. As their answers were not satisfactory (in their last letter they stated that Anaconda is now a much better purchase than sale—I suppose they want to sell me still more shares!), I wrote to Mr. Mitchell himself, asking whether it is in line with the investment policy of the bank to persuade a small investor to buy stocks instead of bonds and, when the investment turns out a total failure with regard to the safety of the principal, to decline all responsibility. Vice-President Byrnes answered for Mr. Mitchell that the bank was perfectly justified in recommending Anaconda, and that it was rather weak on my part to assent to buy stocks.

New York, January 2 W. H. HOEFLICH

The News Reel Theater

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Permit me to enter vigorous protest against one of the items on your honor roll for 1929. I mean the News Reel Theater. I assume that the people of this town are willing to pay a quarter in order to see United States marines marching aboard transports, President Hoover enforcing prohibition, battleships laying smoke-screens, and West Point cadets drilling, for an hour. The News Reel gives these people what they want. But on that principle, why not put on your list the News Reel's first cousin, the Daily News, to say nothing of the funny paper?

New York, January 6 A. F. Bockmann

Dispenser with Justice

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Brooklyn magistrate who, besides wielding a gavel in court, swings a cat-o'-nine-tails at home does not reflect much credit on whoever appointed him as a dispenser with justice. The home of an individual who can work himself up to such a frenzy should receive the immediate investigation of the Association for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

In my opinion, Magistrate Sabbatino has earned a rest from his judicial duties for the remainder of his natural life.

Larchmont, N. Y., January 4 I. Block

Mr. Layman Complains

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In plain, direct, understandable English, the main body of The Nation discusses the social, economic, and political affairs of the day in such manner that its layman readers can readily obtain a liberal interpretation of current events. Yet in that section of its pages devoted to the theater, literature, music, and poetry, The Nation becomes a forum for the esoteric and sophisticated literati. In these latter pages the layman wanders as in a daze, catching here a sentence that is vaguely intelligible, but missing there whole paragraphs of hidden thoughts. He feels like Mr. Barnstaple, in Wells's "Men Like Gods." Is this failure to comprehend these bewildering criticisms, reviews, and essays to be dismissed with the patronizing remark that the layman should build himself better foundations and otherwise improve himself so as not to be such a blank when he encounters the profundities? Is it permissible to remark here that often depth is not so much depth as poor writing?

Mr. Layman is not unusual in that he wishes to provide himself with food, clothing, and shelter. To insure these primary essentials of life, it is necessary that he hire himself out for wages. To earn these wages, he must be at his mercenary labors an average of eight hours per day for five days, and four or five hours on the sixth, with one day only of the seven untrammeled by this vulgar necessity. Ordinarily, he must sleep eight hours of the twenty-four, and some three hours each day are spent at table and in going to and from work. Thus, of the twenty-four hours of the workday, there remain about five in which to attend to such matters as shaving, bathing, repairing little breaks about the house, exercising, reading the daily newspaper, The Nation, two or three other periodicals necessary for a balanced diet, keeping up with the better books, attending the theater, the concert, the lecture-hall, receiving the occasional visitor and paying back the call.

These perfectly obvious but sordid facts are here tediously narrated to bring home to the worthy scriveners (who are really such good fellows and whom we really like) that we of the laity cannot possibly develop the breadth of intelligence necessary to imbibe with any success an English which has meaning only to the narrow circle of critics who spend most of their hours in libraries and bookshops.

St. Louis, January 9 Carl F. Roth

Prosperity and the Land

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Is it really worth while to use pages of The Nation for such unscientific articles as those of Stuart Chase on prosperity? The only kind of prosperity to be sought and maintained is that which must come from unhindered, free production of wealth (products of labor and nothing else), and the distribution of this wealth among the three primary factors—land, labor, and capital. This is the natural distribution. Farmers, as farmers, as producers of wealth, have no interest whatever in economic rent or in the renting or selling values of land, and in considering the prosperity of farmers as a class—the share of general prosperity they have been getting or are getting—it is absurd to consider they gain by increasing land values or lose by decreasing land prices.

This would easily be seen if all farmers were renters, but it certainly should not be overlooked by such investigators as Mr. Chase. Dr. Copeland's "beautiful profit and loss account," quoted by Mr. Chase in his article, The Farmer's Share, is properly a subject for ridicule rather than use in a serious examination of prosperity. The natural law which tends to apportion to landowners, as such, a very large and absolutely unearned share in the wealth annually produced is so plain, so undisputed, so universally orthodox in its professorial explanations, that there is no excuse for its being ignored by writers for and editors of The Nation.

Long Branch, N. J., December 20 George White

Contributors to This Issue

Robert Dell is The Nation's correspondent in France.

J. G. Lyne is financial editor of the Railway Age.

John A. Hobson is a foremost British economist and a contributing editor of The Nation.

Stanley J. Kunitz will publish in the spring a book of poetry, "Intellectual Things."

Henry Hazlitt is literary editor of The Nation.

William Spence Robertson is professor of history at the University of Illinois.

Norah Meade reviews novels regularly for The Nation.

Granville Hicks frequently reviews books for The Nation.

Eda Lou Walton is assistant professor of English at New York University.

Karl F. Geiser is professor of political science at Oberlin College.

Joseph Wood Krutch is dramatic editor of The Nation.

Alexander Bakshy, author of several books on the theater, writes on motion pictures for The Nation.

Randall Gould is Shanghai correspondent of the United Press.

Books, Films, Drama

Parting

By STANLEY J. KUNITZ

Parting, I take with me completed June,
Remembered hoard of time in thought compact;
Eventual winds will not dissolve a tune
Of solid air, the body of this fact.
Mind's acres are forever green. Oh, I Shall keep perpetual summer here; I shall Refuse to let one startled swallow die,
One petal of this colored beauty fall.

Here, wandered from confusion, I shall greet
My youth immaculate in memory's urn;
This is my country, where the tireless feet
Of my adventure, homing, will return.
Each day will end in this day; every ship
Will bring me back, bright lip on lonely lip.

Consolation or Control?

The Quest for Certainty: A Study of the Relation of Knowledge and Action. By John Dewey. Gifford Lectures, 1929. Minton, Balch and Company. $4.

The Sources of a Science of Education. By John Dewey. Horace Liveright. $1.50.

A Bibliography of John Dewey. By Milton Halsey Thomas and Herbert Wallace Schneider. Columbia University Press. $3.

Essays in Honor of John Dewey. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

"THE Quest for Certainty" is devoted to the elaboration, the insistent iteration, directly and by antithesis, of one idea—that of the intimate connection between knowledge and action. It is an apotheosis of the experimental procedure. It instals doing as the heart of knowing. Mr. Dewey contends that all ideas must be defined ultimately in terms of operations performed or to be performed. These operations need not always be actual; they may be imaginatively possible, or they may merely be performed symbolically. Symbols—words, mathematical formulas—enable us to act without acting. But all thinking, all experimental inquiry, finally means directed action of some kind.

Mr. Dewey contrasts this view with that of the traditional theory of knowledge, which he calls the "spectator theory." Nature must be understood, he holds, not by a mind thinking about it from without but by operations conducted from within. The human organism is a part of the natural world; its interactions with that world are "genuine additive phenomena." The experimental method consists essentially in altering existing natural arrangements to produce new arrangements. Knowledge is the fruit of the undertakings that transform problematic into resolved situations. Where tradition makes the test of ideas their agreement with some antecedent state of things, Dewey finds this test in the consequences of the acts to which the ideas lead—in the new arrangements of things which directed operations bring into existence.

Mr. Dewey brushes all the great classical philosophic systems quietly aside. He seeks to dispose of them, in the present volume, not by any detailed logical or technical criticism, but by suggesting that they owe their existence to dubious motives. They are not disinterested; they are rationalizations of desire. The philosophic quest for certainty is at bottom nothing more than a quest for peace of soul, a quest for a refuge. That is why philosophy, from the time of Plato, has glorified the eternal at the expense of the transitory, the invariant at the expense of the changing. It has translated into a rational form the doctrine of escape from the vicissitudes of existence. It has substituted a feeling of certainty for an active coping with conditions, assurance for insurance.

Hence any quest for certainty that is universal, applying to everything, is in Dewey's view a compensatory perversion. Attainment of the relatively secure and settled can take place, he maintains, only with respect to specified problematic situations. For the quest for certainty Dewey would substitute the search for methods of control. Ideas, he holds, apart from their aesthetic appeal, are intellectually worthless except as they pass into actions which rearrange and reconstruct in some way, be it little or large, the world in which we live. As for values, they are the products of our inevitable desires and affections, and need no wholesale scientific or philosophic "justification."

The present volume reinforces Dewey's position as the most original and important American thinker of our time. Its philosophy, to my mind, embodies the implications of the new physics in a more integral as well as more plausible manner than any other that has yet been formulated. There is little of that flirtation with dubious paradoxes which we find in Russell and Eddington. One is almost disposed to agree with Dewey when he holds that the profound change in outlook which he has personally helped so much to bring about, the attitude which seeks security through regulation of change rather than through ascribing absolute certainty to the unchangeable, which tests truths not by antecedents but by consequents, constitutes a reversal in philosophy "comparable to a Copernican revolution."

Yet the very importance of Dewey's thought makes his shortcomings more evident. Most of these lie in his style, not only in its diction and sentence structure, but in its larger elements. Mr. Dewey's argument is carried forward too exclusively in abstract terms; his work would gain immensely in vividness and conviction if he kept returning to concrete illustrations and verifications. It is curious that a thinker who seeks a philosophy that shall retain its contact with our everyday life, who constantly emphasizes the particular and the specific, should do it almost entirely by generalities. The writing in detail, while it is not devoid of occasional felicitous phrases, is for the most part clumsy and careless. One comes upon obvious redundancies, predicates that do not agree with their subjects, and other solecisms. Perhaps Mr. Dewey's most serious faults, from the standpoint of making himself clear, are his frequent failure to indicate the logical connection between one sentence and the next, and the indefinite reference of his pronouns, which are constantly sending the reader off on false scents. All this results in a disproportionate wear and tear on the mind, which tends to make one's reading of Dewey, in spite of the importance of what he has to say, a duty rather than a delight.

I must confess, finally, that I cannot rid myself of the suspicion that Mr. Dewey pushes his "experimental empiricism" too far. While I can readily see that the experimental procedure adds facts to nature, and that its ultimate effect may be radically to alter the course of "natural" events, the primary purpose of experiment still seems to me to be the discovery of an antecedent reality—the cause of a disease, the distance of a star, or what not.

In "The Sources of a Science of Education" Mr. Dewey sees education as essentially in practice an art like engineering, which still allows room for the original and daring projects of exceptional individuals, but which progressively incorporates more and more of science into itself.

"A Bibliography of John Dewey" illustrates at once Dewey's astonishing productiveness and the extent of his influence. It lists upward of five hundred items of his authorship, and some two hundred relating to him. It covers everything up to the summer of 1929. "Essays in Honor of John Dewey," with its twenty-nine contributors, must be added to this impressive total.

Henry Hazlitt

An American Augustus

Polk: The Diary of a President, 1845-1849. Edited by Allan Nevins. Longmans, Green and Company. $5.

POLK may be appropriately styled the American Augustus. Few national leaders have directed such an expansion of their country as was promoted by the eleventh President of the United States. Not many chief magistrates of the republic have been so much misunderstood during their lifetime, and indeed for some time afterwards, and this in spite of the fact that only one other President has left us so careful a record of his manifold activities in a diary. In the present case the misunderstanding is probably not unconnected with the fact that it was not until 1908 that Professor Charles W. Mann of the Lewis Institute of Technology undertook to edit and publish the diary of Polk, which had been purchased with letters and miscellaneous papers from his relatives by the Chicago Historical Society. After Professor Mann's death the task was carefully completed by Milo M. Quaife. The diary was thus first printed in 1910 as Volumes VI–IX of the Chicago Historical Society's "Collections" in an edition of five hundred copies. The scarcity of this work amply warrants [illegible]tion of salient portions in a one-volume edition.

The text of the new edition has not always been collated with the Quaife text with exactness. In one place (page 118) "would" becomes "should"; two pages farther on "to" is transmuted into "through." Although in the main the selections have been well made, yet some passages are omitted which another editor would presumably have included. The editor has not always been consistent in the use of leaders to indicate omissions from the Quaife text. In one instance (page 116) leaders are not even used to apprise the unwary reader that fourteen pages of the original diary have been omitted. The diarist's sententious statement that he considered the passage of the Walker tariff bill as "the most important domestic measure" of his administration is unwisely deleted (page 125), presumably because this series of selections is mainly concerned with territorial expansion. In an important passage concerning the Oregon boundary dispute (page 114) the phrase "backing out from 54° 40′" appears as "caking out from 54° 40′." Historical scholars will perforce still have to rely upon the four-volume edition.

Nevertheless Mr. Nevins's edition will be cordially welcomed by teachers of American history as a useful sourcebook. Brackets in the Quaife text have been omitted, abbreviations spelled out, and misspelled words corrected. The reading public should peruse with interest this epic of expansion. In it one can read the thoughts of a taciturn, determined, and patriotic President concerning his foreign policy. Through its pages flit the leading personalities of our national life during those stirring years when American dominion was extended to the shores of the Pacific and when the United States narrowly escaped annexing the northern provinces of present Mexico.

William Spence Robertson

Dream and Be Free

Tomorrow's Voyage. By Leonard Hess. Ives Washburn. $2.50.

THIS is the story of a man seeking permanent values in life and pinning an untried faith on the sea. As a boy Samuel Jones had loved to board the Ventura, to meet the captain and the captain's daughter, Amanda Stark. He failed to ship on the boat, and when later Carrie seduces him into marriage, he settles down to his grocery job on the Bowery. But all the time he dreams of "waterways and places green with trees"—and Amanda. When he finds day-to-day happiness, it is in a daughter who proves to have been his wife's child by another man. When he finds Amanda again, it is in a brothel. And yet, when he finally goes to sea as a passenger and not as the sailor he had hoped to be, his companions on his first and last voyage are the false daughter and the reformed harlot.

This is not a tragic book despite its plot, for its theme is: "Dreams take flight. When you dream, you are all free things. Day dreams. Night dreams, too. Flight need not lead anywhere. It is in itself liberation." Samuel Jones, grocery clerk, is the congenital dreamer, sensitive, imaginative, intelligent. Mr. Hess's character sense is subtle and acute, and he gives a life-like portrait of the little man behind the counter and the man behind the figure that faced the world. He is less reliable in his manner of writing. He uses at times to excellent purpose the system of the "aside," now credited to O'Neill as far as the stage is concerned but for which Shakespeare was also to blame. His use of the telegraphic sentence is, however, tiresome. A telegram is meant to condense meaning; if used for the purpose of isolating one word from another, then the words should be sufficiently striking to deserve the emphasis. "Large, hot drops. Splashing. Rattling"—neither adjective deserves the majesty of isolation. On the other hand, there is no waste verbiage in this book and much that is memorable in the writing as well as in the character drawing.

Norah Meade

Victorian Biography

The Life of George Meredith. By Robert Esmonde Sencourt. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Sencourt has had access to more material than previous biographers of Meredith, it can scarcely be said that his study necessitates any drastic reinterpretation or revaluation of the poet and novelist. Indeed, Mr. Sencourt fails to deal at all decisively with the major problem which other biographers have raised: the problem of Meredith as poseur. Though this book supplants its predecessors simply because Mr. Sencourt has used all the information hitherto available together with a certain amount of new material, it leaves room for a more penetrating analysis of Meredith's personality. Perhaps the requisite data for an honest and convincing analysis of the rather uncommonly mysterious temperament of this man are not and never will be available; certainly Mr. Sencourt has not given us such a study, nor, if one can judge from the prejudices and timidities of this volume, could he ever do so.

What Mr. Sencourt has done best is to show how Meredith's energy, pressing against the obstacles of life, surged into his art. Meredith is a beautiful example of the theory of art as compensation—a peculiarly beautiful example because his work shows that theory must be qualified if such truth as there is in it is to be brought out. Far from being an unusually maladjusted or thwarted person, he was, as the world goes, rather happily established in relation to his environment. Nevertheless, many of his novels and his poems use the material of his own life—with a difference. He does in art what most of us do in day-dreams—imagines the course events would have taken if circumstances had been just a hair's breadth altered. But because his assumptions were firmly rooted in fact, and because he abandoned himself so completely to the guidance of the Comic Spirit, the resulting vision of what might have been is quite as real as any account of what was.

All this Mr. Sencourt brings out more or less clearly, and for this we can be grateful. In all his criticism he displays some sensitiveness, and his abounding admiration for Meredith is pleasant rather than otherwise. Nevertheless his critical powers, though by no means negligible, are not equal to the attempt to evaluate Meredith in relation to his Victorian background. On one page we find him rejoicing over Meredith's freedom from the canting smugness of his time; on another we find him arguing rather bitterly for the conventionality of Meredith's views. He treats at length Meredith's views on sex and religion, but it is with unconcealed uneasiness and with every intention of putting Meredith on the side of the angels. Of course, Meredith was partly a Victorian and partly something better or worse—most of us would say better. Mr. Sencourt's difficulty is that he is not himself sufficiently emancipated from Victorianism to distinguish with perfect clarity the points at which Meredith rose above the Victorian mentality and the points at which he was submerged by it.

Despite Mr. Sencourt's friendship with M. Maurois, who offers kind words of commendation, the book bears few traits of the new biography. It has not the faults of the cheap, mechanical, fictionalized biography that passes for new; nor has it the clarity, precision, and carefulness of form of the new biography at its best. It is a somewhat confused and confusing account, a useful compilation of facts illuminated by flashes of sound criticism, but yielding neither a complete and satisfying portrait of Meredith nor any striking estimate of his place in literature. GRANVILLE HICKS

The Navajo in Fiction

Laughing Boy. By Oliver La Farge. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

THE American Indian has appeared frequently in American poetry and essays and occasionally as a minor character in fiction. He has never before, as far as I know, been the whole subject matter of a novel. Mr. La Farge has taken for his hero a Northern Navajo and for his heroine a Southern Navajo. His plot is the only plot of mental struggle conceivable and interesting with such characters—the struggle of the Navajo girl, educated in American schools, to return to her own people. Slim Girl, by nature deeply religious, had accepted Christianity and all its implications only to find that as a code of ethics it was always disobeyed by the whites. Unhappy and bewildered she returns to her people, but she has determined on revenge and this flaw in her character leads to her destruction. She will make a white man pay for her love and with his money she will rise above the very people she wishes to accept. She fears the decay and early aging which come to Navajo women who do the heavy work expected of them, and will not accept this as her future. Then she falls in love with Laughing Boy, a Northern Navajo and a noble and orthodox young Indian. Suddenly she is afraid of her past, but she determines again to use her wits after the fashion of the whites, and to keep her Navajo lover and force her white lover to grant wealth to both herself and her husband. Of course in the end she is discovered and tragedy swiftly follows.

Such an ordinary plot would hold little interest did not Mr. La Farge know the psychology of the Navajo. The interest of the book and its richness lie in his familiarity with these people, their myths and customs. He has taken pains to familiarize himself with the works of Washington Matthews, the best authority on the Navajo, and many of the stories, the customs, the rituals, and the songs which form a natural part of the narrative are taken from Mr. Matthews's "Night Chant," "Mountain Chant," or "Navajo Legends." Along with this scientific knowledge of the Navajo goes familiarity with and a love for the Southwest. The book, accordingly, is not merely a novel but also a study of a folk, of their ideas of art, religion, marriage, and kinship. The contrast between the dignity of the Navajo and the natural purity of their outlook and the impurity of the whites would, probably, have been better emphasized had we known more of Mr. La Farge's whites, but as the latter are merely background and do not enter as important actors in the little drama, we are not entirely convinced of their villainy. Nor, I think, is the revenge motive in the heroine brought to the reader's knowledge soon enough. The book is almost finished before one realizes that Slim Girl has some reason for her duplicity toward her husband other than a desire for ease and money. These technical faults may be to some degree overlooked if one is willing to enjoy the book for its folk-lore. EDA LOU WALTON

Two Views of Germany

Meet the Germans. By Henry Albert Phillips. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

The New German Republic. By Elmer Luehr. Minton, Balch and Company. $5.

THE general scope and purport of the book by Mr. Phillips may best be characterized by saying that it is the observations of a tourist. In the author's own words: "This is simply My Book—a Me-Book About Germany: What I Saw, What I Felt, and How It Affected Me." We are asked at the outset to be tolerant and try to ignore the errors of his "facts" because he is not interested in facts as such; he merely wants "a few representative impressions from which you may form some idea of what the whole of Germany is like." Now it is all very well for the reader to be tolerant, but if the reviewer has any real mission, candor compels him to point out that in reading this book we do not get a representative picture of the life of Germany today; for while the author's meanderings lead him to many interesting cities and villages and through many by-paths that are not usually followed by tourists, the excursions invariably end in a restaurant or cafe where the meditations here recorded make all German life revolve about beer and sausages. That the writer is having the time of his life is evident, but it is not tax-burdened Germany that is here described; there is no hint of the distress of the shopkeeper and the farmer, or of the discouragement of the artist, or of the poverty and hard lot of the great toiling masses who make up the bulk of the population. One wonders whether the change from the bone-dry atmosphere of the States to the jolly life of the German cafe may not account for the numerous errors—sometimes three or four on a single page—that would otherwise be inexcusable. The imperfections are to be regretted because there is a place for a book such as this might have been, and it is written with a sympathetic enthusiasm that is commendable; but written, nevertheless for Main Street. It may lure George Babbitt from his comfortable sleeping porch to pay a visit to "Munich—City of the Amber Flood," or to Weimar in the hope of meeting the German

"Andy Gump"; but the thoughtful reader who goes beyond the illustrations—which are well selected and excellent—will scarcely care to meet the Germans if this description is to serve as an introduction to their life, characteristics, or social institutions.

Of a different scope and character is the work of Mr. Luehr, a book that holds the interest of the reader from start to finish because of the author's obvious mastery of material and the lucid and interesting style in which it is written. It is a comprehensive and authoritative account of recent German history, from the events that led up to the revolution, through the dark and tragic period of convulsions and rapid changes, to the triumph of the republic. The causes of the revolution, the struggle among the political parties, the Weimar Assembly and the making of the constitution, the peace treaty, reparations, the Ruhr invasion, inflation, and then the successive plans aiming at recovery and stabilization are all placed before the reader with telling force and conviction. But while Mr. Luehr has convictions of his own, and does not hesitate to express them, he does not distort the facts nor bend them to plead any particular cause. He writes Germany neither up nor down, but is guided in his narrative solely by the facts as he sees them and by the conduct of men and the course of events that have shaped the history of Germany during the last decade.

Mr. Luehr is in thorough sympathy with the republic, though not blind to its mistakes; he believes that "with all its faults, the institutions created by the Weimar constitution contain the necessary contents for the successful government of Germany." In conclusion:

> The indifference and open suspicion to which the young German Republic was treated is one of the amazing facts of modern history. In an age confronted with the war breakdowns, the disillusions of war settlements, with the loss of faith in democracy, and the jubilant denial of liberty and personal rights, the German experiment had to show its vitality by asserting itself against opposition and crouching hostility. Through the blistering blasts of bolshevism, through the degradation of treaty and reparations, through the ferocity of fascism, German democracy stood as the strongest bulwark of free representative government on the European continent. Today when its enemies have receded into the background the republic stands firm, tolerant, and superior, ready to pull the country out from the last soft spots of the war mire.

This book is one of the best and most readable works covering this period that has thus far appeared in English. A select bibliography of recent works bearing upon the period, and an admirable index, add to its usefulness.

KARL F. GEISER

Books in Brief

The Black Venus. By André Salmon. Translated from the French by Slater Brown. The Macaulay Company. $2.50.

This novel was published in France in 1920 and created a considerable stir, partly because of the brilliance of the writing and the absurd grotesquerie of the story, but chiefly because the author introduces under assumed names the friends of his youth in the first decade of this century. These include Picasso, Derain, Max Jacob, MacOrlan, the German poet Wedekind, and other pioneers of the days when the modern movement in art and letters, departing from the spirit of the nineties, set out to mold in new forms the eternal verities. Stringing his incidents together along the preposterous story-thread of the "Planter" of Montmartre—who dresses like a pirate, endeavors to cultivate in his ash dump of a yard exotic West Indian

AFTER MOTHER INDIA
Harry H. Field

So much has been said pro and con the accuracy of the books of Miss Mayo and Mr. Field that we are reproducing a series of comments on AFTER MOTHER INDIA. May we here quote Mr. Edward Thompson in the Saturday Review, who says that "Mr. Field shows up the pathetic feebleness of much of the reply to MOTHER INDIA,"—and the Boston Transcript, which finds Mr. Field's book "an excellent documentation of Miss Mayo's thesis, almost impossible to challenge."

This is a necessary companion volume to your copy of "Mother India."

$3.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

LONDON—A MILESTONE?

The coming Disarmament Conference in London may well be the most significant event of the present century.

Important decisions may be taken by the principal nations of the world bringing the dream of idealists for centuries—a condition of world peace—close to accomplishment.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

will give a sympathetic and, what is more important, an accurate and unbiased account of this epoch-making conference.

At all times The Manchester Guardian Weekly keeps its readers advised of progress in international affairs.

To leaders of intelligence in more than sixty countries, it is a constant source of reliable information on all important world happenings and a faithful guide in keeping their viewpoint on vital events, clear and unprejudiced.

MAIL THIS COUPON

The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
224 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

Gentlemen:
Enclosed please find $3.00 for which send THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY for one year to the below address.

Name ....

Address ....

plants, and keeps for his "slave" a black dancing-girl—M. Salmon paints in words modernistic pictures of artists and poets, and also of the beggars, soldiers, urchins, and small tradesfolk who surrounded them and helped to form their lives and their art. In addition to the celebrities the reader meets Mumu, the male courtesan in love with his own body; the tragic child Leontine and her drunken grandmother; Amédée, the stool pigeon, factotum on the "Plantation," who has a head like a crumpled ball of newspaper; the corrupt Martha, and her absurd husband who combines the careers of clerk and "fleshly" poet. Over the whole the author pours his sardonic humor and scorn. The book has a hard luster which, however, is not entirely impervious to thrusts of sadness and pity. It is unfortunate that the many snatches of song and verse have lost their charm in the translation.

Gardens of This World. By Henry B. Fuller. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The tour which the Chevalier of Pensieri-Vani and the Seigneur of Hors-Concours make through Spain, around the borders of the Mediterranean and the Adriatic, and back to Paris by way of northern Italy is as allegorical as the two travelers' names. It is an adventure of age with youth, of the Latin tradition with the American innovation, of unassertive appreciation with untutored acquisitiveness. It is a pleasantry, sophisticated and cultured, full of wit, satire, and enjoyment. Dancing nuns and trans-Atlantic fliers make a romance out of a tourist's note-book. This is the next to the last piece of work Mr. Fuller finished before his death in July last year, and it is as fortunate an introduction to his neglected list of novels as it is a fitting penult to his achievement as a writer.

The Robber Band. By Leonhard Frank. Translated from the German by Cyrus Brooks. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

This novel, first published in Germany over fifteen years ago, introduces another European author to American readers. It is particularly worthy of revival and translation because of the first half of the book, which is an extraordinarily realistic study of a group of working boys on both sides of adolescence. These boys form the "robber band" and find compensation for the harsh tyranny of home, school, and workshop in dreams of escape to the wild West and a life of adventure. As a temporary substitute for fighting Indians they organize marauding expeditions to bakers' shops and vineyards. One of the boys, "Old Hammer-fist," holds to his dreams after the others have outgrown them and until, in the adventure of art, he finds an outlet. There are passages of violence, coarseness, and brutality, for Herr Frank is a realist who does not shrink from any aspect of the lives of the laboring people of whom he writes. As a study of boys and young men in a harsh environment the book is a valuable and luminous piece of work.

The Sleeping Fury. By Martin Armstrong. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Desire for passionate love may lie sleeping even in the quiet lives of conventional English women. Sometimes it bursts through the barriers of pride, family, caste, prejudices; sometimes it is thrust back into its place; in either case the result may prove tragic. Lady Marbury came upon love only after marriage, a marriage which up to then had been a happy one. She barely succeeded in repressing her wild impulse to throw over everything for the man she loved. Later, through the understanding gained from this bitter experience, she is able to do for her daughter what her own mother would never have been able to do for her. On this slender framework Mr. Armstrong has written his novel—the kind of novel which depends

NEW WORLD MONTHLY

February issue now out

ARTHUR E. MURPHY on Whitehead's Philosophy.

The most lucid exposition of the Relativity Theory yet published, by DR. GEORGE DE BOTHEZAT, inventor of the first successful Helicopter.

MIND IDOLATRY, by CLAUDE BRAGDON.

MOTION PICTURE COMEDY, by HARRY ALAN POTAMKIN.

H. L. MENCKEN, by C. A. TACKE.

Stories, poems, book reviews, etc.

3 months trial $1.00

$4.00 a Year

New World Monthly, 62 W. 37th St., New York

VISIT RUSSIA

Short, low rate Winter trips from $280 Up

Including round trip passage and a five day complete service and sightseeing in Leningrad and Moscow.

AMALGAMATED BANK
Travel Dept.
11-15 Union Square, N. Y. C. or
Amalgamated Trust & Savings Bank
111 West Jackson Blvd.
Chicago, Ill.

For information on Spring and Summer trips, write for booklet "N."

DEMOCRATIC YOUTH

Published for young idealists who still believe in democracy. Six months' trial subscription, 25c. Sample copy, 10c. ROSCO BRONG, publisher, West Liberty, Ky.

for its success entirely on its power to throw light, subtly and delicately, into the secret places of human emotions. In its best chapters it approaches in excellence the fine studies of E. H. Young, a novelist who has received altogether too little praise in this country; but some of the key situations appear so unconvincing as to weaken the general impression of an otherwise fine book. Love at first sight needs more than the mere statement to convince; and the character of Lord Marbury, exquisitely touched upon in spots, falls in pieces before the author is through with it. The book is not a first novel but one is tempted nevertheless to call it "promising."

An Hour of the American Novel. By Grant Overton. J. B. Lippincott Company. $1.
The Georgian Novel and Mr. Robinson. By Storm Jameson. William Morrow & Company. $1.

Mr. Overton's purpose is frankly informative rather than critical. He crowds into a very brief space an account of the chief American novelists from Charles Brockden Brown to Joseph Hergesheimer and adds a running commentary to each. He is readable but elementary. Miss Jameson takes even less space to discuss with a hypothetical Mr. Robinson the virtues and defects of contemporary writers of fiction. The latter recognizes the intelligence and honesty of Virginia Woolf, Aldous Huxley, and the rest, but finds it impossible to say what their books are "about." His cicerone admits her inability to tell him but expresses the hope that some day these novelists themselves (or some younger successor) will find out.

The Roadmender. By Michael Fairless. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.50.

Mr. Fairless's reflections on life, the preparation for death, and death itself have been well known in England for nearly thirty years; their reappearance in this recent American edition only offers fresh proof of their timeless quality. The author became a stonebreaker on a country road, content to find his complete satisfaction in the simplest vista and humblest passerby. His observations are Franciscan in spirit, lowly, generous, loving. A meek good sense directs the peaceful record of his thoughts which glitter in the purity of the strong Christian faith.

Blake and Modern Thought. By Denis Saurat. The Dial Press. $4.

M. Saurat's reference is not forward from Blake, as one might suppose from the title, but backward. His interest is in the sources of Blake's thought, and, as any reader of his previous volumes on both Milton and Blake would have reason to expect, he finds these sources at the bottom of the occultist well. The Gnostics, the Cabalists, and the Hindus are drawn upon for parallels with Blake which become as convincing as at first they are startling. M. Saurat is undoubtedly partial to the tradition which he here explores with a view of explaining Blake, but in large measure he vindicates himself, and at any rate he shows his poet in remarkably clear perspective.

John Donne, Dean of St. Paul's. Complete Poetry and Selected Prose. Edited by John Hayward. The Nonesuch Press. Random House. $3.75.

Uniform except for color of binding with the Nonesuch one-volume Blake, this compact and beautiful edition of all of Donne that any reader needs entitles both editor and publishers to very high praise. Since the prose of Donne is so voluminous Mr. Hayward could not give it all, and indeed should not have given it all; but he has furnished excellent specimens of the "Paradoxes and Problemes," the letters, the "Devotions," and the sermons; and has reprinted "Ignatius and His Conclave," a satire against the Jesuits, for the first time since 1652. The poetry, of course, comes first, in an authentic text.

CRITIQUE OF LOVE
by FRITZ WITTELS

Dr. Fritz Wittels has explained Freud's theory of the dominating power of sex so plainly and simply there is no longer any reason for not understanding it correctly. There is no reason, either, for considering sex as a terrifying or loathsome disease.

Dr. Wittels is an eminent Viennese psychoanalyst, disciple and biographer of Freud. His discussions of sadism, masochism, bisexuality, and narcissism, of love and marriage, of the modern child woman, will clarify in your mind the sanity of sex. $3.50

Dr. Ira S. Wile: "He has performed a valuable service in reducing the principles of Freudian doctrine to readable form without sacrifice of any inherent values and without any violence to the sensitivities of the public."

Dr. A. A. Brill: "A very interesting and stimulating exposition of some of the manifestations of love."

MACAULAY, Publishers, N. Y.

Visits to Soviet Russia
FOURTH SEASON

EXPLORATIVE itineraries worked out with reference to social, economic, historic, artistic and scenic features.

Visits to factories, schools, children's communities, collective farms and villages . . . art treasures, palaces and workers' rest homes . . . for the adventurous . . . camping in the Caucasus and study of primitive tribes.

Small groups, each accompanied by a qualified American leader and Russian interpreter. From $410 including express steamship passage. Literature available.

Individual itineraries also executed ▲ Independent year-'round representation in Russia

20-30 WEST 43rd STREET ▲ NEW YORK

THE OPEN ROAD

PUBLIC LIB.

Drama

Magdalene

BEFORE the end of his sophomore year almost every budding writer composes something in verse or prose about a prostitute. Unconsciously aware that his technique is insecure, he naturally gravitates toward themes with an intrinsic interest and there is no story whose values lie closer to the surface than do those in the tale of the daughter of joy—especially if she happen (as in fiction she almost always does) to possess virtues which are vulgarly supposed to be incompatible with her profession.

The ostensible point of the tale will, to be sure, vary in accordance with the literary milieu of the writer. If his youth has been nourished upon the literature of the nineties he is almost certain to speak of Splendid Sins and to invoke the Implacable Aphrodite, while if, on the contrary, his thoughts have been given a sociological turn he will very probably seize the occasion to inveigh against the hypocrisy of society and not improbably reveal that the president of the Purity League was himself seen on a particularly dark night bending his furtive steps in the direction of the forbidden quarter. If, however, neither of these effects appeal to him, if, that is to say, he has given his first allegiance neither to Oscar Wilde nor to the less imaginative followers of Ibsen, then he is certain to belong to what, for want of a better name, we may call the Tout Comprendre school, with the result that his prostitute will stand revealed as not essentially different from her more fortunate sisters and that, like Camille, she will ultimately give up her own happiness for the sake of the man whom she has come to love too well.

But the more the story changes the more it is the same thing. The ironies are so obvious that one can hardly develop them without offering a sort of insult to the intelligence of the reader; and there is, besides, still another difficulty involved in the fact that the story has too much interest of a sort not primarily artistic or intellectual, and not even the frequency with which the prostitute has been discussed has served to deprive her entirely of her secret fascination. She stands for sin with a capital S; it is she who most conspicuously violates the most provoking of all the taboos and she who assists in the breaking of the one commandment of which everyone knows the number. Only the most abandoned can wholly escape a sort of irrational envy when her name is mentioned, and there are few so respectable that they do not feel a curiosity which they are glad to conceal under the guise of an artistic interest. This fact is, of course, highly advantageous to the young writer, since he may be perfectly sure that he will never completely bore his audience with that story, but the more accomplished craftsman avoids it for the same reason. Success is too easy and he has no desire to compete in a field where the veriest third-rater can produce the illusion of being almost as good as he.

Now Mr. Robert Sherwood is not a sophomore. On the contrary he is the author of several plays of which one, "The Road to Rome," was generally praised for its air of sophistication. Yet Mr. Sherwood is responsible for "Waterloo Bridge," now to be seen at the Fulton Theater, and in it he has written, with singularly few variations, the sophomore's story of the Fallen Woman and the Nice Young Man. From the moment when one sees the heroine take up her accustomed stand on the bridge after explaining to a companion how her effort to "go straight" has met with failure, one knows exactly what to expect and never once is one given an opportunity to find oneself agreeably wrong. The innocent and lonesome soldier is not long in appearing and not long in mistaking her for the virgin of his innocent dreams. He proposes an honorable marriage with the promptitude which becomes him, and the prostitute, with the fundamental goodness of heart which becomes her no less, manages to escape after leaving a note behind. Only one scene still remains and if anyone in the whole theater doubted that the scene would be Waterloo Bridge once more and that there, under the moonlight, the two would be reunited, then that person must have been someone extraordinarily unfamiliar with both the stage and those movies which Mr. Sherwood professionally criticizes and from which he must have imbibed the idea that his story was worth telling again.

Some plays are unconvincing because they are obviously untrue to life; others for no other reason than that they have been seen so often that they inevitably remind one of the theater; and the present piece belongs to the latter class. For all I know, events something like those it recounts may have happened frequently and, in so far as I am able to judge again a bit of writing so much like countless others, I am inclined to suspect that the author has done a reasonably competent job. But a tale told so often inevitably lulls the faculties to sleep.

It is said that the English revue "Wake Up and Dream" (Selwyn) underwent a number of changes intended to adapt it more to American taste before it was presented at the Selwyn. Even in its original form it must, however, have been more in the style of our spectacular exhibitions than in that of Charlot's "intimate" entertainments. Yet it is, nevertheless, sufficiently different in the decor and the dancing to be refreshing. Jack Buchanan and Jessie Matthews are the featured performers, but the dancing of Tilly Losch and her corps is the finest thing in the show. As a whole it belongs with the very best current entertainments of the sort.

A new Dance Repertory Theater (Maxine Elliott's) is celebrating its opening by a series of eight recitals in which Martha Graham, Tamiris, Doris Humphrey, and Charles Weidman are presented. The art of Miss Graham, though very widely acclaimed, seems to me to be almost too slight to fill a stage, but the vivacity, strength, and fire of Tamiris are electrifying.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Films

As You Were

A CURIOUS change has come over Hollywood within the space of a single year. Last winter when the film producers decided to take a plunge in the production of talking pictures, Hollywood was all in a state of turmoil as it peered anxiously into the future and made frantic efforts to adjust itself to the new conditions. Today, to judge by its recent films, it must be again enjoying the comfortable feeling of restored stability, in fact, of being back where it was before all this rumpus began. There is indeed something almost uncanny in the ease with which the new medium has been turned to the old uses and the whole industry placed back on its accustomed rails. After all the talk about the revolution that the talking picture was going to make in the art of the cinema, one is startled to find that the Hollywood talkie of today is barely distinguishable from its familiar silent predecessor. To be sure, subtitles have given place to spoken dialogue, but in refutation of the early fears that dialogue is bound to slow up action, one finds the talkie just as fast moving as the silent picture ever was. Side by side with this undeniably positive achievement Hollywood has succeeded in retaining practically all the other features which characterized its typical product. In spite of the Russians and the Germans, it still glories in the straight photography

☐ THEATRES ☐ ☐ ☐ FILMS ☐

LEO BULGAKOV
THEATRE ASSOCIATES, INC., presents

AT THE BOTTOM

by MAXIM GORKY
New version by William L. Laurence
POPULAR PRICES $2.50 to 75c
Phone reservations accepted—Circle 1407
WALDORF THEATRE—50th St., Bet. 6th & 7th Aves. Eve., 8:50
MATINEES Thursday and Saturday, 2:30

Kenneth Macgowan and J. V. Reed present
BASIL SYDNEY and MARY ELLIS
in CHILDREN of DARKNESS
A Rich Satire on Exploiters of All Ages
by Edwin Justus Mayer, author of "The Firebrand"
BILTMORE THEATRE—47th Street, West of Broadway
Evenings, 8:50—Mats., Wed. and Sat., 2:40.

CIVIC REPERTORY
14th St.-6th Ave. Eves. 8:30. 50c, $1, $1.50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30.
EVA LE GALLIENNE, Director
Fri. eve., Jan. 17, "Master Builder," Sat. Mat., Jan. 18, "Peter Pan," Sat., Mon. and Wed. eves. Jan. 18, 20, 22, "The Living Corpse," Tues. eve. and Thurs. Mat., Jan. 21 and 23, "Sea Gull," Thurs. eve., Jan. 23, "Mlle. Mourrat," Fri. eve., Jan. 24, "The Would-Be Gentleman."

WILLIAM HARRIS, JR., PRESENTS
"THE FIRST PLAY OF THE SEASON WITH TEETH IN IT."
ROBERT LITTELL, WORLD.

CRIMINAL CODE

By MARTIN FLAVIN with ARTHUR BYRON
NATIONAL THEATRE 41st St., West of 7th Ave. Evenings 8:50
Matinees Wednesdays & Saturdays, 2:30

The Actor-Managers, Inc., has the honor to present
RUTH DRAPER in her ORIGINAL CHARACTER SKETCHES (Including 5 new ones)
Every Eve. including Sunday except Monday & Thursday nights at 8:50.
COMEDY THEATRE, 41st East of Broadway. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:30. VERY GOOD SEATS at $1.00.

The Theatre Guild Presents
METEOR
By S. N. BEHRMAN
Guild THEA., 52nd St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

The Theatre Guild Presents
RED RUST
By KIRCHON & OUSPENSKY
Martin Beck THEA., 45th St. W. of 8th Ave.
Evgs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs & Sat. 2:40

"Within the Fortnight"

appears this week

on the page following.

Starting today (Thurs.) Jan. 16th
First Showing in America
Dynamic! Stirring! Intense!

"DEMON of the STEPPES"
a stirring and powerful drama of the Russian Revolution introducing a remarkable Soviet artiste

OXANA PODELSNAYA
as the woman-leader of the Cossacks
—and in the cast—
NIKOLAI SALTYKOV,
who played the martyred-sailor of "POTEMKIN"

Unusual Added Attractions
"Cheating Mothers" unique UFA film
—
Harry Langdon in "Saturday Afternoon"
—
"Celebration of the 12th Anniversary of the Russian Revolution" —vivid scenes and outstanding personalities of the Soviet experiment.

FILM GUILD CINEMA
Direction: Symon Gould
52 West 8th St., bet. 5th and 6th Aves.
Popular Prices Spring 5095-5090
Continuous Daily Noon to Midnight
Special Forenoon Prices: Sat.-Sun., 12-2—50c.
Weekdays, 12-2—35c.

55th Street Playhouse Just East of 7th Avenue
Popular Prices—Continuous from 1 until Midnight
NOW—SECOND BIG WEEK
THE HINDU SCREEN CLASSIC
"THROW OF THE DICE"
enacted and produced by the creators of "Shiraz" and "The Light of Asia."
". . . amazingly beautiful."—New York Times

MATINEES: GOOD SEATS, ALL PRICES, AT BOX OFFICE
WARNER BROS. Present
GEORGE ARLISS
in
"DISRAELI"
(A Vitaphone All-Talking Picture)
CENTRAL THEATRE Daily 2:45—8:45
Broadway and 47th St. Sunday 3—6—8:45

which refuses to look for anything but the obvious. Its treatment of character and dramatic situation is still as impersonal as it is in a news reel. And in its choice of subject matter, with a few rare exceptions, it clings stubbornly to the kind of story that is best appreciated by juvenile intelligence.

But even on the existing popular level of Hollywood pictures there are degrees of quality and some established standards of competence. It is by bearing in mind these standards that one can at all comment on the recent crop of pictures on Broadway. Choosing the most notable among the latter, it is possible to say that "The Virginian" (Rialto) is quite up to the standard of a good Hollywood "Western," with perhaps a little more respect for the realities of the life described than is usual in this highly conventional but entertaining genre; that "The Mighty" (Rivoli) is as thrilling a drama of the underworld as a story of a gunman reformed by the love of a respectable young lady and enforcing the law against his old associates can possibly be; and that "The Laughing Lady" (Paramount), which attempts a picture of society life, is rather more deliberate and heavy in the mechanics of its plot than can be acquiesced in even by the movie-trained credulity.

For real originality in the use of sound on the screen one has to turn to the remarkable animated cartoons designed by Walter Desney. One of them, "Spring Time," belonging to the Silly Symphony series, is shown on the same program with "The Virginian." Like its predecessor in the same series, "The Skeleton Dance," "Spring Time" makes an extremely clever use of characteristic rhythm and melody to enhance its grotesque humor and fancy.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

*At the Bottom—Waldorf—116 W. 50th St.
*Berkeley Square—Lyceum—E. 45th St.
Bitter Sweet—Ziegfeld—54th St. & 6th Ave.
Candlelight—Empire—B'dway & 40th St.
Children of Darkness—Biltmore—W. 47th St.
*Civic Repertory—See advertisement.
*Criminal Code—National—W. 41st St.
*Death Takes a Holiday—Barrymore Theater—47th St., W. of B'dway.
First Mrs. Fraser—Playhouse—E. 48th St.
*Journey's End—Miller—124 W. 43rd St.
June Moon—Broadhurst—W. 44th St.
Meteor—Guild—W. 52nd St.
Playboy of the Western World—Irish—7th Ave. & Christopher St.
*Red Rust—Beck—302 W. 45th St .
Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45th St.
Sweet Adeline—Hammerstein—Broadway & 53rd St.
*Waterloo Bridge—Fulton—W. 46th St.
Angels on Earth—Yiddish Art Theatre—Broadway & 28th St.

---

*Drama. Comedy. Musical.

FILMS

Disraeli—Central Theater—Broadway and 47th St.
Demon of the Steppes—Film Guild—52 W. 8th St.
Throw of the Dice—55th St. Playhouse—East of Seventh Ave.

CONCERTS AND RECITALS

Fifth Concert Judson Celebrity Series—Carnegie—Wed. Eve., Jan. 22.
Olga Averino—Town Hall—Wed. Eve., Jan. 22—Russian Soprano.
Manhattan Symphony—Mecca Temple—Sun. Eve., Jan. 26.
Philharmonic Students' Concert—Carnegie—Sat. Eve., Jan. 18.
Philharmonic Symphony—Carnegie—Thurs. Eve., Jan. 23; Fri-Aft., Jan. 24; Sun. Aft., Jan. 19—Metropolitan Opera Jan. 26.
Philharmonic Symphony — Junior Orchestral Concert — Sat. Morn., Jan. 25, Feb. 1—Carnegie Hall.
Ruth Draper—Comedy—41st St., E. of Broadway.
Albert Spaulding—Carnegie Hall—Sun. Eve., Jan. 26.
Young People's Concert Hour—Town Hall—Sat. Aft., Jan. 25.

Why a Training School for JEWISH SOCIAL WORK?

BECAUSE experience has shown that the social worker can only be successful if he knows and reckons with the social, religious and cultural background of the people among whom he works.

BECAUSE the Jewish group in America represents a religious and cultural group possessing a highly distinctive character.

BECAUSE the social worker who identifies his work with the Jewish group in America should, by special training and knowledge, be able to contribute to the problems of its adjustment to American life with a view to its own greater happiness and to the greater enrichment of the culture of America.

College graduates are invited to examine carefully the advantages of Jewish social work as a profession.

Scholarships and Fellowships ranging from $150 to $1,000 for each school year are available for especially qualified students.

For further information address
M. J. KARPF, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

A graduate school
71 W. 47th St., New York City

☐ ☐ DEBATE ☐ ☐

A Momentous 3-Cornered DEBATE!!!
Which Offers More to the Workers of the World?

COMMUNISM, or SOCIALISM, or CAPITALISM?

Scott
NEARING says Communism
Noted Sociologist and Lecturer

Fenner
BROCKWAY says Socialism
Brilliant Labor Member of British Parliament

Prof. Edwin R. A.
SELIGMAN says Capitalism
Foremost Economist, Columbia University

Chairmen, SAMUEL UNTERMYER & ROGER N. BALDWIN

SUBJECT

RESOLVED: That Capitalism offers more to the workers of the world than Socialism or Communism.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1930—8:30 P. M.
MECCA TEMPLE—133 W. 55TH STREET

Reserved Seats $1.00, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00 & $2.75
Reservations advisable now for best seat locations

Obtainable by mail or in person at Civic Club, 18 E. 10th Street; Columbia University Bookstore; Rand School Bookstore; 7 E. 15th Street, and New School Bookshop, 465 W. 23rd St.

Also by mail or in person at offices of
LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
11 W. 42nd St. Chickering 5789 or Spring 1716

TO OUT-OF-TOWNERS—This debate will be published in book form. Reserve your copy now by mailing $1.00.

Madame Sun Yat-sen Keeps Faith

By RANDALL GOULD

A CHINESE attached to the present Nationalist Government once called upon Madame Sun Yat-sen at her green-shuttered house in the French Concession and said, in effect: "If you were anyone but Madame Sun, we would cut your head off." And she replied, smiling cheerily at her sullen visitor: "If you were the revolutionists you pretend to be, you'd cut it off anyway!"

After only four brief years, Dr. Sun Yat-sen has already been elevated to the status of a Chinese saint whose doctrines, like those of Christ, are excellent to use as wall mottoes but "too impractical" for serious guidance in the workaday world. Madame Sun's intransigence lies in her refusal to believe that Dr. Sun's ideas will not work. The peculiar obnoxiousness of this attitude lies in the fact that she is not merely a sorrowing widow, but in her own right a staunch individual who is keeping the words of Dr. Sun alive.

Fully to understand the reasons why Madame Sun as a Left-Wing leader is particularly harassing to the present decidedly Right-Wing government, it must be borne in mind how closely she is linked with that government by ties of blood. First of all, she is the sister of the former Soong May-ling, now Madame Chiang Kai-shek, wife of the President of the State Council. Likewise is she the sister of Soong Tse-voo, Minister of Finance and close to Chiang himself in importance. She is sister to Madame H. H. Kung; Kung is Minister of Industry, Commerce, and Labor, as well as being a direct descendant of Confucius. Sun Fo, only child of Dr. Sun and at present Minister of Railways, is Madame Sun's step-son. Against all these and the things they stand for Madame Sun set herself firmly in a statement issued in Hankow on July 14, 1927, and she has never once since that time stirred from her position. The statement began thus:

> We have reached a point where definition is necessary and where some members of the party executive are so defining the principles and policies of Dr. Sun Yat-sen that they seem to me to do violence to Dr. Sun's ideas and ideals. Feeling thus, I must dissociate myself from active participation in carrying out the new policies of the party.
>
> In the last analysis, all revolutions must be social revolutions, based upon fundamental changes in society; otherwise it is not a revolution, but merely a change of government.

The statement then pointed out that Dr. Sun's third vital principle, that of the "livelihood of the people," was at stake in the existing crisis, and it was emphasized that Dr. Sun had felt this principle to be basic in the revolution.

> In this principle [said Madame Sun] we find his analysis of social values and the place of the laboring and peasant classes defined. These classes become the basis of our strength in our struggle to overthrow imperialism, cancel the unequal treaties that enslave us, and effectively unify the country. These are the new pillars for the building up of a free China. Without their support the Kuomintang, as a revolutionary party, becomes weak and chaotic and illogical in its social platform; without their support, political issues are vague. If we adopt any policy that weakens these supports, we shake the very foundation of our party, betray the masses, and are falsely loyal to our leader. . . .
>
> We must not betray the people. We have built up in them a great hope. They have placed in us a great faith.

And there is a bit about the background of Dr. Sun:

> Dr. Sun was poor. Not until he was fifteen years old did he have shoes for his feet, and he lived in a hilly region where it is not easy to be a barefoot boy. His family, until he and his brother were grown, lived almost from hand to mouth in a hut. As a child he ate the cheapest food—not rice, for rice was too dear. His main nourishment was sweet potatoes.
>
> Many times Dr. Sun told me that it was in those early days as a poor son of a poor peasant family that he became a revolutionary. He was determined that the lot of the Chinese peasant should not continue to be so wretched, that little boys in China should have shoes to wear and rice to eat. For this ideal he gave forty years of his life.
>
> Yet today the lot of the Chinese peasant is even more wretched than in those days when Dr. Sun was driven by his great sense of human wrongs into a life of revolution. And today men who profess to follow his banner talk of classes and think in terms of a "revolution" that would virtually disregard the sufferings of those millions. . . .

In giving out the Hankow statement Madame Sun was doing a hard and dangerous thing which meant not only a risk of life—which would mean little to a woman of such caliber—but also the breaking of family ties and a generation of great enmity. Almost two years of voluntary exile followed the issuance of the Hankow declaration. Then in Berlin on May 6, 1929, Madame Sun announced:

> I am proceeding to China for the purpose of attending the removal of the remains of Dr. Sun Yat-sen to the Purple Mountain where he desired to be buried.
>
> In order to avoid any possible misunderstanding, I have to state that I emphatically adhere to my declaration made at Hankow on July 14, 1927, in which I announced my withdrawal from active participation in the work of the Kuomintang, on account of counter-revolutionary policy and activities of the central executive committee. . . .
>
> It must therefore be abundantly clear that my attendance at the burial will not mean and is not to be interpreted as in any sense implying a modification or reversal of my decision to abstain from any direct or indirect work of the Kuomintang so long as its leadership is opposed to the fundamental policies of Dr. Sun; namely, the policy of effective anti-imperialism, the policies of cooperation with Soviet Russia and the Workers and Peasant policy. When these policies were the moving forces of the revolution we made rapid progress toward the realization of the principles of the party. Now that the three policies have been discarded, our party has again become the tool of militarists and counter-revolutionaries. . . .

In spite of her absence from the country, Madame Sun had been elected to the central executive committee of the Kuomintang at its hand-picked congress of last spring. Upon her arrival at Peiping to start the long funeral journey from the Western Hills to the new mausoleum just outside the city walls of Nanking, Madame Sun made it abundantly clear that she had no intention of lending her name and reputation to the government or party. Keeping herself apart even from members of her family, she went through with the long and trying ceremonials, saw the casket safely deposited in its million-dollar resting place, and returned to her house in the Rue Molière in Shanghai. For some time she maintained silence. Then, on August 1, she fired a shot which would have echoed throughout the country had not suppression intervened. This took the form of a telegram sent to the Anti-Imperialist League in Berlin on the occasion of the international anti-war day. In view of the Sino-Russian tension, the message was timely to say the least. "Untimely" appears to have been the word favored by various frenzied callers who presently came to ask repudiation, retraction, or at least a promise to be good in future. The telegram in question read:

> While the oppressed nationalities today form a solid front against imperialist war and militarism, the reactionary Nanking Government is combining forces with the imperialists in brutal repressions against the Chinese masses.
>
> Never has the treacherous character of the counter-revolutionary Kuomintang leaders been so shamelessly exposed to the world as today. Having betrayed the Nationalist revolution, they have inevitably degenerated into imperialist tools and attempted to provoke war with Russia.
>
> But the Chinese masses, undaunted by repression and undeceived by lying propaganda, will fight only on the side of revolution. Terrorism will only serve to mobilize still broader masses and strengthen our determination to triumph over the present bloody reaction. . . .

This message was at first ignored locally. English-language papers of Shanghai felt that they had had enough of fighting with the government; one of the leading British-owned dailies was barred from the mails; they saw no reason for stirring up another row. A distorted version, translated from the Japanese and portraying Madame Sun as advocating a terroristic policy, finally appeared in one British paper which ignored a true version sent in as correction. The Chinese press took no chances with any version. But government officials and party chiefs soon learned of the latest statement. Their emotions, if rumor be true, were far from uniform. Some apparently felt a sympathy they did not dare express publicly. Others were furious. When efforts were made to distribute the message in Chinese in the form of leaflets, the distributor was arrested. Some one threw handbills off the roof of the large Sincere Company store on Nanking Road, and when police found that the bills contained the offending statement in Chinese they developed a lively curiosity as to the identity of the distributors. Madame Sun herself said: "I feel good inside"—touching her bosom—"since I sent that telegram. It was necessary to express myself. What happens to me personally as a result is not important."

Although her house is watched, although visitors to it are followed, although the tick-tacking of her typewriter at night has been mistaken for "a secret wireless to Moscow," Madame Sun is serene and without bitterness or dejection. Her feeling today is the feeling of two years ago, when she wrote: "There is no despair in my heart for the revolution. My disheartenment is only for the path into which some of those who had been leading the revolution have strayed."

Arrested, jailed, transported in chains to share with hundreds of others the harrowing life of a penal colony—all without trial or explanation—

Prisoners of Mussolini

Such is the story of Francesco Fausto Nitti, nephew of Italy's former Premier, who relates his gruesome experiences in the

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW

for February

This unique and dramatic personal document—vivid sidelight on current world history—is typical of the features in every issue of THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Other articles in the forthcoming numbers that reflect for intelligent readers the manifold and fascinating problems of modern life are:

Our Harassed Children
Josephine Daskam Bacon

Civilization at the Bridge Table
Ely Culbertson

This Is Anastasia
Gleb Botkin

Who Caused the Panic of 1929?
H. Parker Willis

The Protestant Confessional
George B. Cutten

Psychology of Crime
Joseph Jastrow

The Lady Boss
Estelle Mendelsohn

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER
5 MONTHS FOR ONE DOLLAR

On the newsstand THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW sells for 40 cents per copy. You may have the next 5 numbers for one dollar—half the newsstand price. Each edition of THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW is limited. We, therefore, suggest that you fill in and sign the coupon now.

NATION 1-30

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW
9 East 37th St., New York City

For the enclosed $1.00 send me THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW for 5 months. (Canadian price $1.25—Foreign price $1.50.)

Name ____________________

Address ____________________

City ____________ State ____________

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1930 No. 3369

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 111
EDITORIALS:
  The Hopes for London 114
  Buncoing the Farmer 115
  Exploiting Alaska 116
  The New Magazines 116
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 117
HARVARD—SCHOOL FOR SCRUBWOMEN. By Gardner Jackson 118
PROHIBITION AND POLITICS. By Paul Y. Anderson 119
WOODBERRY—A GREAT TEACHER. By Harold Kellock 120
DOLLARS AND SHIPS AT LONDON 122
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 124
CORRESPONDENCE 124
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
  Love Songs After the Aztec. By Joseph T. Shipley 126
  Cultural History. By Henry Hazlitt 126
  Dime Novels. By Herbert Asbury 127
  Religio Medici. By Joseph Wood Krutch 127
  Van Buren. By Claude G. Bowers 129
  The City of Dreams. By Walter Gutman 130
  More War Stories. By James B. Wharton 131
  All Kinds of Poets. By Eda Lou Walton 132
  Books in Brief 132
  Drama: Ideal Corruption. By Joseph Wood Krutch 134
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  South Africa's "White" Problem 136
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 137

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor Literary Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE YOUNG PLAN is in effect as far as the conference at The Hague could give effect to it, although the governments of the various countries concerned must give their approval before the plan can become legally operative, and the charter of the Bank for International Settlements must be accepted by the Swiss Parliament before the bank can be organized. The signature of the protocol, a voluminous document in some twenty-six different parts, was delayed mainly by the effort of Germany to avoid the possibility of sanctions in case it defaulted on its reparation payments, and by the vexatious difficulties which the settlement of the reparation claims of Rumania and Czecho-Slovakia against Hungary presented. The final adjustment at each of these points was, of course, a compromise. No sanctions are to be applied to Germany until the World Court has had an opportunity to pass upon the case, and Hungary, while paying more than it expected to pay after 1943, will be allowed to use a substantial part of its payments to satisfy the property claims of its subjects. A gratifying feature of the agreement is the release of Austria from all reparation obligations. Early steps will now be taken for the issuance of the first instalment of German bonds, representing the so-called mobilization or commercialization of the German annuities, and the personnel of the directors of the international bank will, of course, be actively canvassed. Burdensome as the annuities are, the Young Plan has at least gone a long way toward taking the reparations question out of politics, and for that the creditor countries as well as Germany may be grateful.

DESPITE THE FACT that the House of Representatives has passed the bill providing for a Haitian commission the measure seems to be in for hard sledding in the Senate, with some doubt as to whether or not it will be favorably acted upon in that body. Senator King, in voicing his disapproval of the commission, has again called for our retirement from the Island. Senator Borah is not, he declares, opposed to the commission, but he feels "that some things ought to be done without waiting for the report of the commission. We should appoint a civilian as high commissioner, or as governor, for that is what it is in Haiti. Secondly, we should give the Haitian people a free and untrammeled election." He added the truth that "we have not assisted them in the slightest in political affairs or in preparing them for self-government. . . . The United States Government ought to be ashamed to stand before the world at this time, with all our professions of peace and against military power, in the attitude of keeping a military heel upon a helpless people." That is, of course, what every American ought to believe. We cannot but think that this is a policy which will appeal to Mr. Hoover. If he feels that he must have a commission for face-saving purposes and in order to render the change of policy more palatable in certain quarters, by all odds let him have the commission. But in the end he must decide, and he must decide aright.

HOWARD LEE McBAIN, professor of Constitutional Law at Columbia University, has in an admirable letter to the New York World taken sharpest issue with Mr. Hoover's hand-picked and highly respectable Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement. Professor McBain discusses the recommendations in the Wickersham report on prohibition enforcement point by point. The "high standing and ability" of the commission, he declares, make it impossible for him to believe that the report was prematurely forced out of them by political pressure; therefore it must be taken "as the product of its [the commission's] mature deliberation and conviction. . . . This being so, it seems fair to say that this report is one of the most extraordinary public documents that has ever emanated from a non-partisan agency of inquiry." By "extraordinary" he means, at the kindest, "ill-considered." The Wickersham report displays, according to Mr. McBain, "an amazing ignorance of, or indifference to, both the law and the actual practice of district attorneys under the law." Nor does he retract a word of this criticism despite a sharp answer from Mr. Wickersham which, in fact, fails to meet Mr. McBain's chief objection.

THIS OBJECTION IS A SERIOUS ONE. The report's last point would permit the prosecuting attorney to decide whether to place a given offense in the class of a misdemeanor or a felony—after the case by the commission's own proposal has been classed as a misdemeanor. The commission, that is, in order to expedite justice and clear the federal courts of some of the thousands of prohibition cases that clog the dockets, has recommended that a class of "casual or slight violations"—not felonies—be specifically defined by Congress; that in order to avoid the delays of an indictment and a jury trial these cases be heard before a United States commissioner who will report his findings to a district judge for sentence; that if found guilty the offender may demand a jury trial; and that if he does demand a jury trial the district attorney may then decide whether or not the case shall be proceeded against as a felony. In other words, a "casual violation"—by definition not a felony—is a felony if the district attorney says it is. This, of course, is confusion worse confounded. It is difficult to doubt the reasoning and judgment of so sound a constitutional lawyer as Mr. McBain. He speaks with authority not to be lightly gainsaid. So far he has not been successfully answered.

A GOOD DEAL OF PREMATURE JUBILATION has been aroused over the "surrender" of the New York Legislature to Governor Roosevelt on the power question. The bill introduced by the Republican majority, it is true, does accept the principle that the St. Lawrence power sites shall forever remain inalienable to the people of New York, but as far as we can see that is really about all that it does do. It sets up a commission of five members to study and report plans for the development of power and a form of contract for its sale. It provides that, "if a development by a State authority is recommended in a plan which is approved by the legislature," then a corporate body of trustees shall be established with the powers necessary to carry out the plan. But as Senator Knight, majority leader, pointed out in an interview published on January 19:

> The so-called Roosevelt policy on water-power, as stated in his message to the legislature, is State development and State construction of transmission lines through a water-power authority. Now the bill just introduced does not declare any such policy.

So far as we can see, this is absolutely true. Further, as the Governor himself pointed out in an address delivered before the New York State Bar Association on January 18, the bill omits an important statement of policy contained in the Governor's bill of last year, namely:

> The development of the said power sites and the generation, transmission, and distribution of power therefrom shall be made in such manner and on such terms as to assure fair and impartial treatment of all consumers at the lowest rates compatible with a fair and reasonable return on the actual cost thereof.

We would not underestimate the gain involved in reaching any reasonable agreement for the development of New York's power resources. Nor would we detract one iota from the credit due to Governor Roosevelt and former Governor Smith for their admirable work. To those interested in seeing that the benefits of such development go to the people as a whole, however, we would point out that the battle is not ended, but just begun. Any plan recommended by the commission must be put through the legislature and, while one skirmish has been won, no one should imagine that the forces so long opposed to State development for public advantage rather than private gain have reached the end of their resources.

THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION closed its inquiry into the publicity activities of the utility companies by refusing to allow their counsel, Bernard F. Weadock, to insert into the record something like a hundred documents purporting to show a concerted drive for public ownership which made necessary "defensive" propaganda on the part of the companies. Commissioner McCulloch ruled, correctly enough, that the commission had no authority to go into the activities of anyone but the utility companies themselves. Mr. Weadock was, however, allowed to list for the record the organizations that have lifted their horrendous heads to affright the timorous rulers of our electric empire—the League for Industrial Democracy, the National Popular Government League, the People's Legislative Service, and the Public Ownership League of America. He might have pointed out, but probably did not, that the yearly budget of all of them combined would perhaps be big enough to keep one or two of his State committees going for a month if they were not too active.

RACIAL INTEGRITY has long been a phrase to conjure with, and its magical potency continues to be invoked notwithstanding repeated condemnation by the United States courts. The city of Richmond, Virginia, in its zeal for the preservation of racial integrity, undertook by ordinance early in 1929 to designate the parts of the city in which whites only might reside and to exclude Negro residents from such districts. Some months ago a Negro, J. D. Deans, who was denied by the city the right to occupy a house which he owned in a district set aside exclusively for whites, won his case in the Federal District Court, and the decision of the lower court has just been sustained by the Circuit Court of Appeals. The city has, of course, a right of appeal to the Supreme Court, and the Assistant City Attorney, who has conducted the case, has announced that an appeal will be taken notwithstanding that segregation by ordinance has already been defeated in Louisiana and in Dallas, Indianapolis, Norfolk, and Louisville. The persistence of Richmond in doing what the Supreme Court will almost certainly set aside constitutes a kind of moral contempt of court for which, unfortunately, there is no legal penalty. It is taking an unconscionably long time for the South to learn that discrimination against the Negro simply because he is a Negro is unconstitutional.

THE PREPOSTEROUS PROPOSAL sponsored by the United States Department of Labor for registration of all aliens has been officially indorsed by the American Federation of Labor. The ostensible aim of the federation is to prevent the smuggling in of laborers from Mexico, and probably Canada, who will further complicate the unemployment problem. The actual result of such registration, as has been pointed out many times, will be aid and comfort to witch-hunters of all sorts. The unhappy alien who cannot show a registration card—for whatever reason—will be hounded out of employment. And it is very easy to sit down and think up reasons for withholding the precious certificate of worthiness. Only good aliens will hold cards, of that one may be quite certain. And "good" means regular according to the customs and opinions of any given locality. The A. F. of L. is again aligning itself with regularity—with Big Business, respectability, with the maintenance of the status quo; and one may respectfully point out to the officials of the American labor movement that only when labor has been in united and militant opposition to these manifestations of the capitalist system have such gains as it now enjoys been obtained and sustained. The eight-hour day, the forty-four-hour week, a living wage, proper working conditions, where they exist, were not secured by holding hands with the employers, but by outspoken and independent opposition. The A. F. of L. too often is finding itself on the wrong side of the fence.

THAT A MEMBERSHIP CARD in the Communist Party is not ground for deportation of an alien is the decision of Federal Judge Charles C. Simons of Detroit in the recent case of Joseph Paczkowski. Arrested in 1920 in the Red raids, he was found to have the fatal ticket in his pocket, and this was the ground for the original deportation order. He was one of the group saved at Ellis Island by Felix Frankfurter of the Harvard Law School, who pointed out that the United States could not deport to Russia while refusing that country diplomatic recognition. Since then, Paczkowski has lived in Detroit, has conducted a restaurant, graduated from a motion-picture operators' school, and is completing high-school courses in night school. Recently he attempted to secure final citizenship papers—he made his first application, by a coincidence, on the very day of his first arrest—and was seized when he appeared for hearing. Judge Simons dismissed the case and at the same time rebuked the agents of the Department of Justice for "hounding" Paczkowski for nearly ten years, causing him great personal inconvenience and expense, not to mention detention in jail. The only evidence against him at any time was the membership card. The court pointed out that Paczkowski had never been asked whether he believed in the principles of the party—he maintained that he never had—and that he was not told of his right to counsel before his original trial.

GOVERNOR YOUNG of California has written a long apologia to Fremont Older's criticism of him for turning the Mooney and Billings case over to the State pardon board after spending many months on the testimony—or at least with the testimony in his possession. In answer to Older's remark that an hour with the testimony ought to be enough to convince anybody of Mooney's innocence, the Governor replies plaintively:

> I am not yet convinced as to the innocence of these men. . . . I do not think for a minute that the cases are so weak that they cannot safely be intrusted to the Supreme Court. . . . I cannot conceive of anything fairer to everyone concerned than an honest and conscientious continuation of this study on the part of the Supreme Court, the pardon board, and myself.

To Mooney and Billings, now spending their fourteenth year in jail, leisurely contemplation of their case will not recommend itself too highly. It took the Governor a year to make up his mind that he did not want to rule on the case and wanted instead to "pass the buck." Mr. Older's characteristic reply to his plea for more time and more light was short and to the point. He said: "The pardon appeals rest on proved facts and no man who is aware of these facts, as Governor Young is, can doubt the innocence of these two men."

WHEN IN TROUBLE, apply to the Soviet Government. This seems to be the present policy of the Administration. A few weeks ago it was the rescue of Eielson and Borland. Next it is the American minister to Persia, who according to a recent Federated Press dispatch has lately traveled across the Soviet Union on a visa granted by the Russian Government. Travel by automobile through the mountains along the southwestern frontier of Persia in winter is disagreeable and dangerous, so Mr. Charles C. Hart, our new representative at Teheran, sought to go through Russia. Through Boris E. Skvirsky, unofficial Soviet representative at Washington, permission was granted and Mr. Hart received his visa when he passed through Paris. The Bolsheviks do not claim to be Christians, but when they remember Secretary Kellogg's refusal to let Mme Kollontai pass through this country on her way to Mexico they apparently recall also the words of St. Paul, "Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

THE DREADFUL DISASTER in California, in which the pilots and fourteen passengers of a regular passenger liner lost their lives, is but another in a long series of accidents to passenger planes. Each one makes it more evident that commercial transportation in this country cannot be considered to be firmly established until the efficiency of the German lines can be achieved. The German planes fly hundreds of thousands of miles annually with not over one serious accident a year. There is something so appalling in being burned to death in a crash that the public will not embark on airliners in any great numbers until accidents are practically eliminated. In this connection it is interesting to note that the Curtiss Tanager plane, which, on January 6, was awarded a prize of $100,000 by the Daniel Guggenheim Fund for winning the safe aircraft competition, has nothing revolutionary about it. It does, however, embody a number of ideas to the end that the lay pilot may "fly with satisfaction, security, efficiency, and safety." An officer of the Curtiss company declared that this was the most significant competition in the history of airplane development. But at the same time an official of the Guggenheim Fund declared that a fool-proof plane was an impossibility. Of this we are not so sure; we are eagerly awaiting developments of the Spanish aero-gyroscope invention and similar planes.

IN THE WASHINGTON letter published in our issue of January 1 there appeared an account of the recent discharge of Frank K. Boal, Washington correspondent of the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette and six other papers owned by Mr. Paul Block. According to the information given to our correspondent, Mr. Boal's discharge was connected with the alleged fact that Mr. Block was under financial obligations to Charles E. Mitchell, president of the National City Bank. Mr. Block informs us that he is entirely unacquainted with Mr. Mitchell, that he is under no obligations of any kind to the National City Bank, and that his only connection with that organization is a small personal checking account. We are glad to accept Mr. Block's assurance on this point, and we sincerely regret the injustice done him.

The Hopes for London

AS we go to press the naval conference is meeting in London. King George has made his speech of welcome and, marvelous as it appears, the tones of his voice were relayed across the Atlantic and all over the American continent—a far cry from the days of that other King George who could not communicate with his American subjects and receive a reply within a period of three months. Besides the delegates to the conference a horde of newspaper correspondents and "trained seals" is deluging the American press with all sorts of contradictory rumors, guesses, opinions, and prophecies. It takes a stout-hearted reader to wade through the columns cabled every day. Indeed, we are inclined to urge that the public refrain from trying to winnow the grain from the chaff, and await accomplished facts. Many people, however, will not be ready to do this. For there is widespread recognition that the conference is of the utmost moment; that it is contending with headwinds and cross currents without number; and that its success or failure will tell tremendously in the history of the next few years. There can be no question that, if it fails, provided the several peoples involved do not assert themselves vigorously, we shall see the statesmen of the various countries embarking upon a naval race which will again fill the world with ill-will and suspicion.

We cannot at this moment contemplate anything of the kind. At the risk of again being called innocent and hapless optimists we shall believe until the last that something worth while will come out of this meeting of the Powers. What that will be no man can guess in the preliminary maneuvering that is going on. It may be only a further limitation of battleships, or the postponement of further construction of new battleships for a period of six years. Even this portion of a loaf would seem to us welcome and worth while if it should prove as successful in preventing further public irritation between the United States and Great Britain as was the Washington Conference in putting a definitive end to the talk of war between Japan and the United States. We remain hopeful, however, that more than that will be achieved —despite the wiseacres of the press. Certainly, the American delegation has every incentive to return with something more substantial. We are not even convinced that it is opposed to the total abolition of battleships. It has occurred to us that it may have been good strategy on the part of the American delegation not to espouse abolition of this obsolete weapon lest an immediate agreement upon this by the other Powers be used to prevent a limitation of other categories of ships. We believe that Mr. Stimson and Mr. Morrow are as sincerely desirous of achieving something worth while as any pacifist could ask. But if they were not, it would still be plain to them that, unless the Hoover Administration is to enter upon its second year with extraordinarily little on the credit side of its books, every political consideration demands a substantial achievement. Mr. Hoover sorely needs victory in London to have something to talk about in the coming campaign.

Nor can we believe that the delegates of the continental Powers will dare to return to their respective capitals without something accomplished. We cannot forget that when the conference was first proposed the press of France and Italy doubted very much that their respective countries would attend it. The success of Mr. MacDonald's visit to Washington brought about a marked change, and we cannot believe that when the whole world is longing for a genuine disarmament the ministers of France and Italy will be willing to put the Americans and English in the morally superior position of having been blocked by the two continental Powers. We do not deny the vigorous thundering in the index, or the marked diversity of opinion as evidenced by the French note of December 20, and the reply of the British Government on January 12. Both showed how wide the rift in the conference preliminaries had become. To the French observation that the Paris peace pact was not of itself sufficient to insure the world against war, the British Government could only answer that while it was true that "complete machinery for sanctions to enforce the various peace agreements now in existence" had not been devised, "public expectation will be disappointed" and "a tendency toward expansion in arms which is only too evident already will develop" unless those agreements are held to have brought such measure of security as to justify a beginning in the reduction of naval armaments. The French preference for limitation by global tonnage was met by a reiteration of the British preference for a "strict limitation of the types, tonnages, and guns of all categories of warships," although the British Government was willing to discuss the matter. The French insistence that all branches of national defense, sea, land, and air, should be taken into account in dealing with the navies was rejected, while in the matter of the proposal of a Mediterranean Locarno the British Government could only point to the League of Nations as affording facilities "for joint consultation in event of need" and express its readiness "to exchange views on the subject with all Powers concerned."

We know, too, that the emergence of related subjects, such as freedom of the seas, British naval bases, the allotment to Japan of a larger cruiser tonnage than the application of the battleship ratio of the Washington Conference would allow, and the future status of the battleship and the submarine had elicited so much difference of opinion as to lead Mr. MacDonald to assure the House of Commons that questions of general naval policy would not be brought up at the conference. Finally, on January 15 Mr. MacDonald, in an interview with the foreign correspondents at London, threw a sop to France by asserting in substance that no government will "propose or undertake" a naval reduction "that would endanger its people's sense of national security." Yet we believe that when the actual showdown comes, when the delegates sit around their tables aware of the high expectation with which the whole world has greeted this conference, they will find a way through the difficulties. Let us hope that it will be another milestone in the march toward peace, even though in its extent it is far, far behind what those who believe in complete disarmament would wish to see achieved.

Buncoing the Farmer

THE refusal of the Senate, by a vote of 48 to 38, to sanction the higher tariff rates on sugar urged by the Committee on Finance constitutes another smashing defeat for the Old Guard and the saccharine Senator from Utah. On the roll call the melancholy remnant of the regulars suffered no fewer than nine defections. Among the deserters were numbered Capper, Goff, Keyes, and Metcalf, all of whom come up for reelection this year. Apparently these brethren think high sugar prices unlikely to endear them to the folks back home. Apparently they are right. The long debate on the sugar tariff, in the press as well as in Congress, enlivened by the lobby investigation, has contributed a good deal to public education on this issue, and possibly the inability of the Finance Committee to put across the added exaction proposed is due in part to such knowledge.

It never does to be too hopeful, however. When it is observed that the leading farm organizations of the country have been supporting a higher sugar tariff, it would seem that the economic education of the sturdy agriculturist has not been entirely completed. The boost proposed by the Finance Committee would raise the nation's sugar bill by something between fifty and seventy-five million dollars. Call it only $50,000,000. Of this amount conceivably as much as $7,000,000 might be added to the earnings of the small number of farmers who grow beet and cane, to a large extent on land that might be devoted more productively to other purposes. Against this hypothetical $7,000,000 all the farmers of the country would pay perhaps $11,000,000 more for the sugar they use. And this is the way to bring back prosperity to the American farmer by raising the tariff on farm products!

The Minneapolis Tribune has had the genius to generalize the argument. It has occurred to the Tribune that industry should not worry about foreign markets "when the world's greatest market lies right at its doors." "Iowa," it seems, "is a better market than India, Kansas is better than Kamchatka, and Minnesota is better than Mesopotamia." Therefore, the thing to do is to increase the buying power of the American farmer. His present income is approximately twelve billion dollars, but "were agriculture enjoying the same proportion of income that the rest of the United States is enjoying, that income would be eighteen billion dollars." The Tribune then sagely adds that "parity for agriculture means just that: an added annual income of six billion dollars." So all we need do is enact legislation creating parity for agriculture by raising a few tariff schedules and, behold, there will be six billion dollars more for industry and agriculture to divide between them, mostly for industry because agriculture will, of course, rush off and spend every cent that it earns in the shops of the nearest towns. The Tribune, grandly enough, is not concerned with the question of who will contribute that six billion dollars; whether, for instance, a large part of it will not come out of the workers in industry and, therefore, decrease their buying power in other directions.

For naivete and economic innocence this proposal surpasses anything that we have ever read. A great trouble with the American farmer is that he is "overproducing"; that he has a "surplus" beyond what he can sell to his fellow-Americans. Notwithstanding, the theory runs that if the tariff is put up the rest of America will be cut off from buying an occasional egg from China or a few bushels of corn from the Argentine, and in some mysterious way everything the farmer sells must be paid for at a higher rate fixed by the tariffs on foodstuffs. But industry, too, produces a great "surplus" which it can dispose of only by selling abroad—not for cash, because that never happens, but on exchange for goods from other countries. The instant our tariff goes up and makes it harder for the foreigner to export goods to America, he will be able to buy fewer American goods in exchange. Therefore, the proposal of the Tribune, if its theory were correct, would be aiming a double-barreled shotgun at our industry, which would have to pay higher prices for food in order to live and would at the same time have reduced markets abroad.

Now that is bad enough, but the truth is that you cannot raise prices by putting tariffs on foodstuffs without economically injuring everybody, including the farmer, except in those rare cases where the farmer raises everything he eats. More than that, it is not foreign competition which in any degree keeps down the prices that our farmers get for their products, but faulty and costly marketing methods, domestic competition, and the inability of the farmer to organize for the control of domestic markets.

But, after all, the Tribune's greatest error is that it has put the cart before the horse. What the farmer needs is not that elusive and impossible thing, parity in tariff obstruction, but a reduction of the existing duties. When he gets up in the morning he gets out of cotton sheets and woolen blankets upon which there is a high tariff, and puts on woolen underwear and a woolen suit the tariff on which, if imported, will be forty-four cents a pound. The boots which he pulls on, if American made, have hitherto encountered free foreign competition; hereafter they will be protected by a tariff of 15 per cent ad valorem. The hat which his wife wears is protected by a duty of twenty-five cents, her hose by one of 50 per cent; her underwear, if cotton, by 45 per cent, her handkerchiefs 10 per cent, her corset steels and clasps 35 per cent. She drinks coffee for breakfast out of an aluminum pot taxed five cents a pound in order that Mr. Mellon, the owner of the aluminum trust, may still further increase his enormous fortune; her coffee, crockery, table-cloths, glasses, and cutlery are all highly protected, and so is practically every single item that goes into the construction of a house, barn, or silo.

Yet it has never occurred to the Minneapolis Tribune or to most of our legislators that the quickest and surest way to increase the buying power of the farmer would be to lower the tariff on the articles he buys. It might even be of interest to the Tribune that two of the recent tariff commissioners, Edward P. Costigan and David J. Lewis, have declared that tariff reduction alone will help the farmer. But the Tribune and our high-tariff Congressmen are not concerned with facts. It is so easy to wave a magic wand, institute tariff parity on March 1, and have the farmer spending six billions of dollars more by the first of the following October!

Exploiting Alaska

FIFTY million dollars' worth of salmon annually was the impressive investment discussed the other day in the House of Representatives at Washington. This is the maximum value of the catch taken—almost entirely by large canning companies—from Alaskan waters every year; the average, according to Dan Sutherland, Delegate from Alaska, is over forty millions. It represents a princely return to the large canneries which dominate the fishing industry; it represents at the same time penury and starvation to the natives, the Indians who are neither permitted, except under certain limited conditions, themselves to fish in their own waters nor to work for the canners who prefer, for good and financial reasons, to import Filipino or Chinese labor.

The population of Alaska, 55,000 in the census of 1920, is reported to be shrinking at the rate of more than 1,000 a year. The Indians are reported as destitute, living on a yearly income estimated by a generous government as something around $265 for a family and by Mr. Sutherland as about $150. In addition, they are permitted to catch all the salmon, for family consumption only, that they can. In other words, if they were willing to live on an exclusive diet of salmon, they would still have at most $265 left over for all other expenses. The income, such as it is, is derived entirely from salmon fishing. The natives fish by means of seines or nets, the canneries by traps which catch several hundred thousand fish in a season; in 1924, 57 per cent of the fishing was by traps; in 1928, 71 per cent. The percentage of seine-caught fish has declined from 38 to 25 per cent. Limitations on seine fishing are ostensibly for "conservation." That is, the ancient fishing streams may no longer be fished in because they interfere with spawning grounds, but traps a mile or so outside their bounds catch the run and leave none to escape. Yet when the native, individual fisherman seeks to attach his seine outside to give him somewhat the same effect as a trap, the government steps in and forbids the practice because it is contrary to its "conservation" plans. As Mr. Sutherland points out, the traps are permitted to operate day in and day out during the season of the run, with no attention given to the customary Sunday stoppage—which the natives are compelled to observe—or to shutting down for a period that may be rendered necessary in case the fish are not passing into the spawning grounds.

Mr. Sutherland, when pressed for a remedy for the double exploitation of a people and an industry, declared that the fault lay with the Bureau of Fisheries for permitting the canners to have their way, and the remedy with Congress, which can turn the fisheries over to the Territory itself for regulation and control, in imitation of every State in the Union and the Territory of Hawaii. No one pretends that any financial gain accrues to the government departments concerned because of the ruthless spoliation of the Territory. It is simply another case of bureaucratic stupidity and monopolistic cleverness. Together they make a splendid combination—for the monopolies. Mr. Sutherland's speech seems to have been received with open-mouthed indignation by his colleagues. "Why do you not introduce a bill?" they cried. "I have always had a bill," in effect he answered, "and so have my predecessors. You need only enact it."

The New Magazines

THE despairing comment that accompanied the death last year of the Little Review and the Dial, the lament that America could not support experimental literary magazines and that the old ardor of revolt was dying, was apparently premature. For this magazine-founding spirit is like some benign Hydra, and two quarterlies spring forth when one is cut down. Recent months have witnessed the appearance of the Gyroscope, the Miscellany, Pagany, the New World Monthly, and the Symposium, have nourished the Modern Quarterly, and have brought increased attention and prestige to the Hound & Horn.

The Miscellany, a bi-monthly edited by former Yale men, opens its December issue with a broadside against almost every reviewer in the country, and scores, incidentally, some palpable hits. For the most part, however, the new magazines are not bellicose in tone, and their announcements of policy are singularly non-committal and modest. Pagany, according to the declaration of its editor, Richard Johns, "will avoid any attempt to seek a standard, it is neither entering into connection nor competition with any magazine trying to make a point, to formulate a policy." The Symposium opens with the statement that "there is no critical tradition in America, nor can one be created by the mere enunciation of an editorial policy." And the New World Monthly informs us rather cryptically that "unlike the late lamented Dial," it does "not set up as a criterion of literary excellence," though later in the same article it accuses "the current so-called literary magazines" of "revolving about a central vacuum."

If we turn to actual content rather than to declaration of policy, what first strikes us in some of the new magazines is their marked interest in philosophical discussion. The first issue of the New World Monthly (January) devotes leading articles to John Dewey and Friedrich Nietzsche, while its February issue has articles on Whitehead's philosophy and on relativity. The Symposium contains an essay by John Dewey on Qualitative Thought and an admirable confession of faith by Morris R. Cohen which renews one's regret that he writes so little. The interests of Pagany, "a Native Quarterly," are almost purely literary. Many of its contributors are recruited from the transition group, and the leading influence seems to be William Carlos Williams, who compares Gertrude Stein to Laurence Sterne and issues a manifesto proclaiming his belief in "the word."

We regret to announce that the excellent Symposium has expired with its first issue; it has been taken over by the Hound & Horn. It contained no advertising, and neither does the New World Monthly, which announces that it is not subsidized, that it would not be kept alive artificially, that it depends solely on paid-in-advance subscriptions, and that it would "like to be able to get along without advertisers and the whole damned racket of magazine distributing." We wish it the best of luck. But because experimental magazines of high quality are so necessary a stimulus and so healthy a cultural sign, we hope, if present programs do not go well financially, that the new periodicals will not be too reluctant to allow fairly orthodox business methods to support unorthodox views.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

RECENTLY a well-known writer was shot and seriously wounded by masked bandits in a small New York restaurant. He was shot because he courageously refused to throw up his hands at the word of command, and instead advanced upon the leader of the gang. The fact that Mr. Garet Garrett was at one time managing editor of a New York newspaper might have earned him a certain consideration from his fellow-craftsmen. It did not. Naturally the fact of the shooting was front-page news, but the reporters did not let it go at that. An air of sinister romance was thrown over the whole affair. Desperately the press reports endeavored to suggest that this was no ordinary holdup but a shooting growing out of some ugly intrigue.

With all the facts in hand the police admitted that there was no ground whatsoever for this suspicion. The wounded man seems to have been placed in a false light for no better reason than that he did not care to talk to reporters at a moment when he lay in the hospital with severe hemorrhages from a punctured lung. Only this, together with the fact that a friend who bent over the bed was heard to say, "I'm sorry, G. G." This was taken for a code message. None of the detectives or reporters was bright enough to realize any relationship between the initials and the wounded man's name.

Probably Mr. Garrett has no redress in the matter of the incriminating rumors which were woven about him. A libel suit often serves to reinforce and call attention to a slander. In this case the bad taste and worse journalism cannot be laid at the door of the tabloids. One of the best and biggest of the New York newspapers was the chief offender.

However, the tabloids did have an opportunity to perform in their worst fashion a few days earlier. A young woman who was separated from her husband wandered into an apartment to see two young men who were casual acquaintances. She had been drinking and did not want to go home. The young men left her in the sitting-room of the small penthouse. In the morning she was found dead. She had suffered from heart disease. Here again the newspapers had every right to make prominent display of the facts in the case but none was quite content with that. And the tabloids not at all. The fact that the owner of the apartment happened to be a motion-picture director opened the way to suggestions of Hollywood orgies. The place itself became for tabloid purposes "a gilded bachelor's hall." This description must have been penned by some newspaper man or woman who had never been inside the apartment. I know it as a modest sort of penthouse, as I almost rented it myself a year ago.

"Broadway Film Romance Leads Rich Matron to Mystery Death" was the screaming headline in one of the tabloids. It proceeded to describe the likable young motion-picture man as "the blond playboy fresh from Paris's Montparnasse," "a favorite with women of two continents." The fact that the young man in question had not been abroad for six years did not in anywise cramp the style of the inquiring reporters. The dead woman fared even worse. She was "a wealthy woman known to the intelligentsia as 'the mysterious woman in black.'" Later it was said that "the vivacious" matron had a love for her host which "seemed to be a fixation." Also that she was "fond of smart clothes, dazzling jewels, and a life more exciting than her husband could give her," that she "began to trail celebrities," that she was "anxious to establish for herself a salon in the grand manner." And it was almost mentioned as the sin of sins that she frequented the restaurant of a hotel where New York columnists and actors often meet.

In all this there was scarcely a gram of truth. None of it represented any examination of facts by the reporter. Accidentally he was correct in speaking of the dead woman as vivacious. But that she "trailed celebrities," that "often she left her three-year-old son in order to entertain lavishly," and that she "paid marked attention" to the man in whose apartment she died—all this was pure invention. There was no reason why it should have been introduced except that the reporter said to himself, "This will help the story."

There ought to be a remedy. It cannot lie in law. Such libel laws as we have are of no use in such a case. The friends and relatives of the dead woman are so shocked and sorry that she died in a somewhat sensational manner that they do not care to stir up things. The remedy must lie in some effective way of expressing scorn for cheap and shabby newspaper work. This could best be expressed by the newspaper men themselves.

When a reporter refuses to divulge the source of information, as he certainly should, the point is raised that his position in the matter is much like that of the family physician. With this I agree, but there should be some sort of organization corresponding to the American Medical Association to establish rules of practice. Not quite like that, perhaps, because it seems to me that the association has had its moments of tyranny. I would not have the American Newspaper Association privileged to bar any reporter from practice. It should be enough for it to call fouls in order to discourage them. The scorn and disapproval of one's fellows on the job ought to be ample punishment.

And newspaper owners should abandon immediately one practice which tends to rob the individual of his rightful protection. Almost universally there is a tacit agreement among publishers never to mention libel suits against papers. A few are big enough and of sufficient importance to break through, but generally speaking libel suits against newspapers are not reported when they are instituted. When the action is ended that same silence is preserved unless the newspaper has won. In that event a very full account will be written. The idea is to create a public belief that no one gets very far in suing a newspaper. That indeed is the general idea, and for that reason many an individual permits a paper to hurt him vitally without striking back. I am willing to grant the fact that a newspaper can hardly avoid making a certain number of mistakes both mental and mechanical, but it has no right whatsoever to tolerate the cooperation of the reporter who invents mean and baseless slanders about individuals in trouble.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Harvard—School for Scrubwomen

By GARDNER JACKSON

HARVARD, richest of universities, recently discharged twenty cleaning women from Widener Library without advance notice or pay and without giving them any reason. These women had been in the employ of the university for periods ranging from thirty-three years to two. Harvard University is a vast business corporation employing hundreds of wage earners, excluding faculty members. Its ruthlessness in this case might perhaps be laid to our present industrial organization. But what are we to think when President A. Lawrence Lowell, asked by a minister to reconsider the case of one woman who is in dire poverty with her family of five depending on her as its sole support, replied that she and the others were dismissed because the State Minimum Wage Commission had complained that the university was employing scrubwomen at less than thirty-seven cents an hour?

The Massachusetts minimum-wage law provides for boards to set minimum rates of pay for women and minors in particular industries. In case any employer refuses to pay the prescribed rate, he is subject to no penalty except that the Minimum Wage Commission is to publish his name in the advertising columns of the newspapers. The decree covering "office and other building cleaners," effective February 1, 1921, fixes as the minimum payment "for the average worker of ordinary ability . . . for less than forty-two hours per week not less than thirty-seven cents per hour. . . ." In this particular case the women have been working since February 1, 1921, as employees of Harvard University at wages lower than those prescribed by the minimum-wage decree. Each year state inspectors have complained, but the complaints have been ignored. It is only within the past month that the matter has received any publicity. Meanwhile scrubwomen at the State House receive fifty cents an hour.

Reverend William M. Duvall, a young man, graduate of Boston University Theological School, who has taken courses in the Department of Social Ethics at Harvard under Dr. Richard C. Cabot and others, is pastor of the Trinity Community Methodist Episcopal Church in the slum district of East Cambridge. His church is, in effect, a settlement house to which he brings all races and religions. He wrote a personal letter to President Lowell expressing his astonishment that Harvard, with its traditions, should have treated Mrs. Emma Trafton (who lives in a dark, dreary tenement directly in the rear of Mr. Duvall's church) as it did. On December 30, 1929, President Lowell replied as follows:

> DEAR SIR: I have inquired into the discharge of Mrs. Emma Trafton from the Widener Library and I find that the Minimum Wage Board has been complaining of our employing women for these purposes at less than thirty-seven cents an hour, and hence the university has felt constrained to replace them with men. Some of them, I hope many of them, will be able to be employed at some other work in the university.
>
> (Signed) A. LAWRENCE LOWELL.

Mr. Duvall was bowled over by the president's letter. Until then he had not known the cause for the women's dismissal. He was complaining only about the heartless manner of it. But here was a brusque note from President Lowell announcing that Harvard University would not raise the wages of the cleaning women from thirty-five cents an hour (which Mr. Duvall knew Mrs. Trafton was receiving at the time of her sudden discharge) to thirty-seven cents to conform to the findings of a State board. Mr. Duvall, when he showed me the letter, asked if I did not agree that the circumstances warranted making it public. Fully appreciative of the ethical problem involved in disclosing a private letter, he did not finally decide to do so without serious thought. The sorry predicament of Mrs. Trafton was the precipitating factor. She has tramped the streets looking for work, making numerous trips to Harvard in search of the "some other work at the university."

Were human misery not involved in the cases of several of the women discharged the position taken by President Lowell would seem more humorous than anything else. The Boston Post, which published the facts on the front page on January 16, approached the situation from that angle. In his lead, the Post reporter figured out that the two-cents-an-hour increase in wages demanded by the State Minimum Wage Commission would amount to $2 a day (the women worked from six a.m. to eleven a.m. in Widener Library) or $12 a week for the twenty women. The increase would have given each woman sixty cents more a week, or $11.10 instead of $10.50. The Post did not point out, as it might have done, that Harvard has investments conservatively listed by the treasurer's recent annual report at $81,000,000.

All the women I interviewed told essentially the same story of their discharge as was told by Mrs. Trafton, who had been an employee of the university for thirteen years. About half of them were peremptorily discharged on November 1 last. The others were discharged without notice on the Saturday before Christmas—"a fine Christmas present," as Mrs. Katharine Donahue ruefully described it. Mrs. Donahue has been in the employ of Harvard for thirty-three years. She said that so far as she has been able to find out the university has neither pension nor compensation provisions for its old employees.

C. R. Apted, superintendent of the yard and buildings at Harvard, who signed the notices discharging the women, and other officials at Harvard say that it was the university's intention to replace the women with men anyway and to work the women into other jobs. One can only remark that it was most unfortunate that the Minimum Wage Commission's insistence should have been the factor crystallizing that intention. The Harvard officials further say that three or four of the women have already been put to work in the dormitories. That is true enough, but the dormitory women get only thirty-two cents an hour. Chambermaids do not come within the provisions of the minimum-wage law. The cleaning women at the Fogg Art Museum get thirty-seven cents an hour; thirty-five cents are paid by the university, the additional two cents by an alumnus.

Noting the facts in the case, Representative William H. Hearn of East Boston has introduced a resolution into the State Legislature calling upon that body to "deplore the action of Harvard University, or any of its officers, in refusing to accept the theory or principle of any of these statutes, and that said action was, in our opinion, contrary to what an overwhelming majority of the citizens of the Commonwealth had expected would be the action of the university or its officers under such circumstances." Particular significance attaches to Harvard's avoidance of the law because of the tax-free privileges the State accords the university.

The incident gives fresh illustration of the ineffectiveness of the minimum-wage law of Massachusetts, which provides no effective penalty for disregard of the findings of the Minimum Wage Board. Weak as the law is, the Minimum Wage Commission, headed by Commissioner of Labor E. LeRoy Sweetser, has been unwilling to enforce it aggressively. But for Miss Ethel M. Johnson, Assistant Commissioner, the commission would have been virtually inoperative for several years past.

Prohibition and Politics

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, January 18

PROHIBITION can hardly be said to have prohibited, or even reduced, the consumption of alcoholic beverages in Washington, but since the holidays it has effectively prohibited the discussion of any other issue. Tariff, farm relief, railroad consolidation, prosperity, the radio scandal—all have been forced to yield the rostrum to the Noble Experiment, regardless of whether anything new or valuable was being said on the subject. The Wickersham commission's recommendations for "tightening up" enforcement contain little that is new, and what is new is not sure of adoption. The transfer from the Treasury to the Department of Justice is an obvious and oft-urged step that would have been taken years ago if previous administrations had not been so fearful of offending the haughty Mr. Mellon. (Incidentally, it may be said for Mr. Hoover that he has never shown the slightest reluctance about stepping on those sacred toes; indeed, at times he has seemed to delight in it.) The truth about the preliminary report is that the commission was stampeded into premature action by the criticism of the professional and fanatical Drys in Congress. By tossing this hunk of raw meat into the pit the commission hoped to keep the animals quiet while it proceeds with its real task—that of making a thorough and comprehensive study of the whole vast field of law, its observance, violation, and enforcement. Royal commissions completed similar tasks in Great Britain and Canada—and saw their labors bear fruit—more than forty years ago. It is a pity that when at last the effort is begun in the United States it must be rendered more difficult by the selfish heckling of vote-hunting politicians. It is equally pitiful that the President who had the intelligence to inaugurate the task lacks the courage to stand between his commission and those who seek to make political capital by harassing it. Nothing that the commission could recommend concerning prohibition is likely to have much effect, because the lines on both sides of that question are too tightly drawn; but its studies and recommendations might have a tremendous effect in modernizing and improving our antiquated legal procedure, police methods, and penal system. The wet Senator La Follette and the dry Senator Norris realize that, and were quick to demand that the Joneses and Harrises keep their hands off. Unfortunately, all the commission's troubles do not arise from the outside. It has been seriously embarrassed by the attitude of two of its own members, one of whom is temperamentally unfitted for team-work, and the other of whom cannot forget that he was once a politician with a notable flair for publicity.

* * * * *

BUT it's an ill wind that fills no political sail. Prohibition produces more smoke screens than those utilized by rum runners, and many a Republican Congressman who was wondering a month ago how he would explain his tariff vote to the home folks this fall, breathes easier now. In the clamor over the fate of the Black Duck he sees an escape from becoming a lame duck himself. Noting the extent to which the prohibition tumult has obscured other things, a more suspicious observer might wonder whether it was wholly spontaneous. To say the very least, it was a godsend to such dry Republican Senators as Goff of West Virginia, Allen of Kansas, and Deneen of Illinois, who were confronting the imminent problem of defending the indefensible votes they had cast on numerous measures, as well as to such Democratic Drys as Glass of Virginia and Harris of Georgia, who similarly were contemplating the difficulty of making their dry Protestant constituents forget how valiantly they campaigned for Al Smith. In other words, it is demonstrated once more that the curse of prohibition, from a political standpoint, is that it is a red herring dragged across the records of public men on every other public question.

* * * * *

IF further proof were needed, the last straw would be forthcoming from Nebraska, where Senator Norris is faced with the opposition of the Anti-Saloon League in his campaign for reelection. As everyone knows, Norris has always voted dry. What is more unusual, he drinks dry. In the last Presidential campaign, after comparing the records and pledges of Hoover and Smith as a whole, especially on the subjects of farm relief and water-power, he supported Smith despite the latter's wetness. It was an exhibition of political courage and personal honesty almost without a modern parallel in this country. Yet because he realized that more than one issue was involved, and because he decided that other issues combined were sufficient to outweigh that one, the bigots of Nebraska would retire him to private life, and deprive the country and their State of its most valuable public servant! At present they appear to be in a minority, but Uncle George undoubtedly has a fight on his hands. His opposition is not confined to the Anti-saloon League. Indeed, there is evidence that the league merely occupies the front-line trench, and that behind it the electric-power industry is mobilizing its resources in preparation for a supreme effort to eliminate the man who has been the most persistent and successful opponent of schemes to grab the natural power resources of the country. It will be interesting to see whether Mr. Hoover consents to have his Administration made a party to this conspiracy.

* * * * *

IN the Senate, among political weapons, the sledgehammer is preferred to the mousetrap. The Progressives wielded it effectively when the Republicans went into conference behind closed doors to fight out the question of whether Bob La Follette should have the vacancy on the Finance Committee to which seniority entitled him. When the Old Guard trotted out Metcalf of Rhode Island as a candidate, it was pointed out that his selection would give representation on the committee to every New England State except Maine. Old Guardsmen protested that the West had been given many places on important committees. "Yes, you not only give us representation, but you pick our representatives for us," derisively retorted Norbeck of South Dakota. George Moses attempted to make a virtue of the fact that he had voted against Metcalf. "And everybody knows why," rejoined McMaster of South Dakota; "you voted against him because he told you to stay out of his State during Senatorial campaigns!" Young Standpatter Glenn of Illinois averred that Senators were asking for committee assignments as Republicans who had forfeited their right to the party name by refusing to support President Hoover. "True," cried Senator Norris. On the tariff, the most important matter before Congress, the President had asked for a limited revision, but the Old Guard, in utter defiance of his wishes, had attempted to carry out a general revision, and had only been prevented by the loyal insistence of the Progressives and Democrats that the bill follow the President's requirement. Norris was in favor of depriving every Old Guard Senator of his committee assignments. Two days of this sort of bludgeoning was enough for Moses, Smoot, Bingham, and Watson. Young Bob got the job.

I HAVE observed in recent days that some of my colleagues, or their editors, have been taking a more lively interest in—and a conspicuously different attitude toward—the Radio Corporation's activities and ambitions. This may or may not be due in part to Mr. Joseph Pierson's harrowing recital from the witness stand of what happened when newspapers endeavored to obtain equipment from the Radio Corporation for use in the transmission of news. First they could not obtain it at all. Then deliveries were inexplicably delayed. A corporation, Press Wireless, was formed to use and hold in trust twenty interoceanic channels that had been assigned to the American press. To use these channels it must have equipment which could be obtained only from the Radio Corporation. Officials of that company stated bluntly they were getting a nice rate on press messages, and desired to keep the business. Finally, after much dickering, they stated the terms on which Press Wireless could "rent" equipment. First, it could not engage in transoceanic communication at all—only within the United States. Second, it could not operate as a mutual association, but must be conducted to make a profit. Third, it must buy all parts from the Radio Corporation, and must pay the price of the General Electric Company for building the apparatus, plus a profit of 45 per cent to the Radio Corporation. The Radio Corporation must be allowed to inspect not only its apparatus, but its books and accounts, at will. Its facilities must always be at the disposal of the Radio Corporation's own clients. And so on. Pierson, general manager of Press Wireless, summed up the conclusions of himself and his associates thus: "These terms do not appear to have any purpose except that of preventing competition in the field of wireless communication. . . . Some of our directors are of the opinion that it is an effort to make the American press a colony of the electric-power empire which seems to be grasping for complete control of the water and air in the United States." I hope to be pardoned for reminding hero-worshipers that when the foregoing occurred, the head of the Radio Corporation and the head of the General Electric was that illustrious humanitarian and economic statesman, Owen D. Young.

Woodberry—A Great Teacher

By HAROLD KELLOCK

IT is over a quarter of a century since George Edward Woodberry resigned as professor of Comparative Literature at Columbia and ended his active teaching career. Yet for thousands of his former students his personality has remained as the most vital scholastic memory of their college days. Hundreds of them have kept in personal touch with him, and the Woodberry Society, organized years ago in his honor by the men who had sat under him, still endures. Only a few months ago I happened to sit at luncheon at the Columbia University Club with some half-dozen alumni, now mature men immersed in law, editorship, and real estate. Suddenly, out of random talk about prohibition, plays, Russia, the football team, one asked: "Has anyone heard from the Old Man lately?" One had had a letter from Mr. Woodberry and the others were all attention while he repeated phrases from it. There was no question from anyone as to the identity of the Old Man.

This continuing intimate feeling for Mr. Woodberry among his students of years ago has been all the more remarkable because most of these men have long since outgrown or grown away from or even wholly forgotten what might technically be called his teachings. A poet and a brilliant young scholar, out of Harvard with the class of 1877, he came to Columbia to teach in 1891 on the recommendation of James Russell Lowell. He had been reared in the Victorian New England tradition with its background of classicism, and he ripened at a time when the Victorian note was wearing thin and, in perspective, the New England giants were rapidly diminishing in stature. As the new century came on new forms were breaking through the old molds, and fresh ideas were contending with old values. Everywhere the young age was full of questionings—about the position of women, about the status of labor, about the validity of scores of accepted conventions and rituals, even about the very social structure itself. Mr. Shaw, Mr. Wells, and on the continent Anatole France and others were turning established systems of ethics topsy-turvy and playing hob with all sorts of social sanctities. All this ferment awoke no reaction in Mr. Woodberry. If he observed it at all he dismissed it as a passing irrationality. It had no relation to Keats and Shelley, Whittier and Emerson, and the Mediterranean classics.

Obviously he was old-fashioned. His horizons were restricted. When the World War broke out he worked himself into a state of tremendous excitement. When I gently took issue with him for wasting so much emotional energy on an international dogfight, he explained that the earliest recollection of his boyhood was of men marching off to save the Union, and probably war was in his blood. Later he apparently rationalized on the subject, for he wrote me at length to the effect that Germany had been untouched by the Renaissance or by Mediterranean culture, and therefore was merely a barbaric survival that must be destroyed. After the Soviet revolution he advanced a similar theory to explain the benighted Russians. I would not emphasize such naivetes unduly. In the case of Mr. Woodberry somehow they do not seem to matter, any more than the fact that he could never learn the technique of crossing a street in traffic or the simple art of getting his necktie straight. Moreover, despite his peculiar limitations, in his thought there was often something of that adventurous quality one finds sometimes in scholars whose ancestors have lived on the sea.

Mr. Woodberry's magic was sui generis. He was a great teacher, I believe, because he was an authentic poet. I am aware that his verse has been judged coldly among such latter-day critics as have deigned to notice it, and I am not concerned with that, though I have a feeling that at least one of his poems, The Mighty Mother, bears the true stamp of the muse. Had Mr. Woodberry never written a line of verse, he would be proved poet by his teaching. The proof lay not only in his tenderness and his rare understanding of the raw boys before him, but in the way in which he poured out himself and the best that was in him without stint or limit. Within his scope Mr. Woodberry had much to give, and only a poet could have given with such lavishness.

In my day, freshman classes were rough and undisciplined. The young animals took great delight in planning wild demonstrations to discomfit their professors. One would have expected Mr. Woodberry to be a shining mark for the disturbers. In appearance he was always a bit wrinkled and disheveled. His hair was usually parted in zigzags, his bow-tie (it was always the same tie, only once renewed during his thirteen years at Columbia) was invariably awry. As a disciplinarian he was a complete failure. He was painfully shy. Yet, while more competent custodians of order found themselves as the term advanced still struggling with their turbulent charges, Mr. Woodberry held his packed classrooms completely quiet after the first two or three lectures. Possibly the boys sensed in him something youthful and groping that made them recognize him as one of themselves. At any rate, from the outset, they seemed to realize that this slight stooping figure with the funny walrus mustache represented a personality that wanted to give them something, that had an affection for each of them as an individual.

Thus, from the beginning, a classroom rapport was established. Within a few days Woodberry would shyly begin calling this or the other boy by his first name. His private office at the university, where the door was never locked, would become a friendly club for such of the new classmen as cared to drop in, and his apartment downtown was revealed also as a student club, perhaps appreciably more select. He had a genius for getting on intimate terms with the ill-adjusted boys, and making them easy in their new environment. To the "literary" group among the students he became an affectionate mentor, but his particular friendships had a wide range and embraced many who had no special aptitude for belles-lettres, even poor chaps who seemed to have no aptitude for anything whatever.

In interpreting a poet, Mr. Woodberry never failed to interpret the man and to relate him to living problems and passions in terms which the students could understand. Once, in the course of a lecture on Keats, he paused in the midst of reading one of the poems. After a minute he removed his glasses and enveloped the class with his Mona Lisa smile. "Of course if young Keats were sitting among you he would probably be ranked lowest in the class," he said, "but assuredly he would have the best time. You see, he was a poet. If I were running a college I would work out an experiment whereby the boys who had the best time would get the highest marks. But then, I suspect I am not a real professor."

By touches like this he made Keats come alive. I think even dull-witted youths in Mr. Woodberry's courses came almost to "see Shelley plain." He never played for effects, but he was always getting them, largely because of the tenderness implicit in his attitude. His was the real magic of the poet-teacher. I think he never "prepared" a lecture in any real sense. He had the art of making a spontaneous orientation to his subject and to his hearers. The idea was there, as in a deeply filled reservoir, and he seemed always assured of a steady flow. In an old-fashioned sense he was too thoroughly the gentleman ever to resort to sham and too thoroughly the aristocrat either to play the superior or to stoop to conquer.

There is the curious story of a man of mature age who repeated the same series of courses under Woodberry for several successive years. He was a graduate of Yale who had been associated with Mr. Arthur Brisbane for a period in making the New York Evening Journal of that day a major disturbance of Park Row. This man decided to quit the Hearstian uproar for a time and acquire an acquaintance with literature. He listened in before a number of professors of literature in and about New York, and, as I recall it, was about to return to Mr. Brisbane when he wandered into one of Mr. Woodberry's classes; at the close of the hour he announced abruptly to the lecturer, "I've decided to take all your courses." After several years of sitting before Mr. Woodberry this student-repeater told me that he had never heard Mr. Woodberry give the same lecture twice and he had never come away from any lecture without new appreciations and ideas.

A peculiar tenderness was reserved by Mr. Woodberry for those students who were planning to become teachers themselves. These were not, as a rule, the more brilliant or the more interesting boys, but for Mr. Woodberry they were distinctly a class apart, the elect to whom he would pass on his torch. I fancy he gave them little to help them in a material way, for he was not what is called a practical man. Probably most of them discovered that it was necessary to revalue many of the Woodberrian values, in literature as well as in worldly matters. But he sent these fledgling teachers forth with gifts beyond price, to be transmitted to further generations of students, gifts of a quickened sensitiveness to beauty, a broader human understanding, gifts of patience, humility, and loving-kindness. It warms one's heart to believe that something of Mr. Woodberry's quick and gentle spirit has thus been carried to many a far-flung classroom to revivify the humanities for the American students of today and tomorrow. In an editorial on sham patrioteers in an early issue of the Irish Statesman, George Russell (Æ) defined patriotism as "improving the quality of life in a country." According to this definition, George Woodberry must be ranked as a great American patriot.

In Columbia College it was the custom for every graduating class to vote for its favorite teacher. In Mr. Woodberry's day there was never any doubt as to the choice. When he resigned his professorship his students paid him one of the finest tributes ever accorded an American teacher. The immediate cause of his resignation was his feeling that the college authorities had made inadequate provision for some of his assistants. Within a few days after he announced his intention to withdraw, his students had pledged a sum sufficient to continue his department for several years, and his former students among the alumni came forward with a similar fund. The three student periodicals at the university began a crusade to retain Mr. Woodberry on his own terms. The agitation did not cease until Mr. Woodberry had repeatedly requested that no further controversy be raised.

"For the teacher," said Mr. Woodberry, as he parted with us on graduation day, "life is a perpetual ave atque vale." His premonitory tenderness made him peculiarly sensitive to these annual partings. We had entered deeply into his heart, and most of us came to realize, perhaps only in later years, how he had penetrated ours. As the years wore on he sometimes came to think that he had been a failure. The world had moved beyond him, his writings were neglected, and his gentle personality seemed almost obliterated in retirement. Now that death brings him into perspective it becomes clear that however posterity may rate him as poet and critic, he is assured of the immortality of the teacher who gives to youth with generosity and love.

Dollars and Ships at London

THE assembling of the London Conference once more brings sharply to public attention the economic burden of armaments and the actual naval equipment of each of the Powers represented. For convenient reference the following memorandum has been prepared in the office of The Nation. The expenditure figures are taken from the valuable Armaments Supplement published by the Economist (London) in its issue of October 19 last. It was prepared by Mr. P. Jacobsen, Secretary General to the Defense Council of Sweden, and the figures in all cases were drawn from official sources. The naval data, taken from the World Almanac for 1930, were compiled by the Department of the Navy of the United States as of July 29, 1929.

The total armaments expenditure (including pensions) of the world for the latest available year (generally 1928) was 22,392,400,000 gold francs, or approximately $4,300,000,000. The expenditures of the leading Powers were as follows:

ARMAMENTS EXPENDITURES

	Millions of francs	Percentage of national income
United States	4,553	1.1
Great Britain	2,900	3.
France	2,286	4.6
Italy	1,333	4.3
Japan	1,215	—
Germany	942	1.3
Russia	2,440	—
India	1,069	—

The figures in the first column illustrate the statement made by President Hoover on July 29 last: "The American people should understand that current expenditure on strictly military activities of the army and navy constitute the largest military budget of any nation in the world today, and at a time when there is less real danger of extensive disturbance to peace than at any time in half a century." Our military expenses (including pensions), it will be noted, are more than one-half greater than those of Great Britain, and nearly as large as those of France, Italy, and Japan combined.

Nevertheless, owing to our enormous wealth, this huge expenditure absorbs only about 1 per cent of our national income. The United States, in fact, spends on armaments about the same proportion of its national income as Australia. What is even more striking, we spend a smaller proportion of our income on war-making than does disarmed Germany. France and Italy, on the other hand, spend more than 4 per cent of all they produce on these war activities. As for Europe as a whole we quote Mr. Jacobsen's words: "If full data were available, it would probably be found that Europe as a whole spent on armaments at least 3 per cent and perhaps not far from 4 per cent of its aggregate income." To make another comparison, the 120,000,000 people of the United States have a total income probably about as large as the 480,000,000 of Europe, and somewhat larger than the total received by the remaining 1,300,000,000 inhabitants of the globe living outside the United States and Europe; of the world's total real armament outlays, about two-thirds are expended by Europe, one-sixth by the United States, and one-sixth by the rest of the world. Thus Europe, with a trifle more than a third of the world's income, accounts for two-thirds of its armament expenses, while we, with an equal income, spend only one-sixth of the war moneys, and the rest of the world, with a slightly smaller income, an equal amount. It may be noted in passing that the armaments expenditure of all the Central and South American states put together, with an area of nearly 6,900,000 square miles and a population of 69,000,000, come to something less than $195,000,000, a sum smaller than that spent by Spain and Portugal, which have an area of only 225,000 square miles and a population somewhat above 27,000,000.

Armaments expenditures (this time excluding pension charges) before and after the war compare as follows (000,000's omitted):

PRE-WAR AND POST-WAR EXPENDITURES

	Average 1909-13	1928-9	Percentage of pre-war
United States (dollars)	300	658	219
Great Britain (pounds)	64	98	150
France (francs)	1,525	2,200	144
Italy (lire)	630	1,200	190
Japan (yen)	192	450	235
Germany (marks)	1,435	716	50
Russia* (rubles)	718	915	127

It will be noted that with the single exception of Japan we have increased our expenditures over those of the pre-war period more largely than any other Power, spending in the fiscal year 1928-29 considerably more than twice as much as the average of the five pre-war years. Of course the increase of prices must be taken into account, but even making that allowance, the actual expenditure of our country is largely increased. Europe as a whole is spending today 8 or 9 per cent more on armaments than in 1913. The countries outside Germany spent £386,000,000 a year before the war; they spend £487,000,000 now. Taking price changes into account, the present figures are somewhat greater than the average of 1909-13.

Turning to budgets, we find that in the United States, as has been pointed out over and over, if interest payments and pensions are included, 80 per cent or more of our federal expenditure goes for past or future wars, as against 70 per cent in Great Britain and a corresponding proportion in France. The higher proportion here is due to the fact of much greater government centralization in the other two countries, notably in France, so that our non-military activities and the corresponding expenditures here are more largely in the hands of State and local governments. The figures for these great countries, none the less, may profitably be compared with those of neutral states which have enjoyed peace for a century. The relatively decentralized Swiss government devotes less than a third of its expenditures to war purposes; Sweden less than 20 per cent.

In using any of these figures it must be remembered that it is not possible to make comparison of actual military or naval strength between countries on the basis simply of expenditures, owing to differences in military systems (as in voluntary versus conscript service, for example), in wages, prices, and a dozen other items. It should also be observed that such figures as these represent the absolute minimum of war costs, and that the actual burden is higher than that here pictured which takes no account of military measures that divert economic resources from their most productive uses.

We turn now from figures of expenditure to examine the actual fighting ships of the five Powers represented at London. As of July 29, 1929, our Navy Department reported their number and tonnage as follows:

CAPITAL SHIPS (BATTLESHIPS AND BATTLE CRUISERS)

	Number	Tonnage
United States	18	525,850
British Empire	20	556,350
Japan	10	301,320
France	9	194,556
Italy	4	89,976

AIRCRAFT CARRIERS

	Number	Tonnage
United States	4	92,500
British Empire	6	107,550
Japan	3	63,300
France	1	21,653
Italy	None

CRUISERS

	Built		Building		Approp. or Authorized		Total
	No.	Tonnage	No.	Tonnage	No.	Tonnage	No.	Tonnage
United States	10	75,000	8	80,000	15	150,000	33	305,000
British Empire	52	308,700	7	66,000	3	22,000	62	396,700
Japan	28	163,955	5	50,000	—	———	33	213,955
France	11	89,369	4	36,496	1	10,000	16	135,865
Italy	11	63,419	5	30,000	6	50,000	22	143,419

DESTROYERS

	Number	Tonnage
United States	284	337,996
British Empire	153	189,165
Japan	99	108,260
France	58	69,291
Italy	71	76,995

SUBMARINES

	Number	Tonnage
United States	108	81,807
British Empire	50	45,472
Japan	61	61,357
France	45	35,631
Italy	40	20,696

In examining these figures, certain facts may be noted. All capital ships listed are under the effective age of twenty years. There are no capital ships of either type building, appropriated for, or authorized. The cruiser figures show why attention has been centered on this category in recent years. Cruisers, it will be recalled, were not limited in number by the Washington treaty, but were restricted to 10,000 tons. In cruisers built we hold fourth place, and even when those under construction are completed we shall still be only a bad third. Hence the huge program urged by the Navy Department in 1928, and when that was defeated, the successful fifteen-cruiser bill. It will be observed that the tonnage of cruisers appropriated for or authorized by us is nearly twice as great as that correspondingly provided for by all the other Powers put together, which have authorized but ten. In destroyers and submarines, by contrast with cruisers, we are at present far in advance of any other Power. It may be observed that Great Britain is building twenty destroyers and fourteen submarines; Japan eight and nine respectively; France eighteen and thirty-two; and Italy eleven and thirteen.

[The first of Mr. Norman Angell's articles on the London Conference has been delayed in the mail, and will appear in our next issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

---

* Including pensions.

In the Driftway

LIKE the sailing ship and the hansom cab, the old-school proofreader is practically extinct in this country. There was a time when proofreading was a profession requiring as much preparation and knowledge as to be an editor—however much that may be. The proofreader was the peer of the editor, concerned not only with punctuation and spelling but with grammar and rhetoric, with slips in quotations and literary allusions, with errors in names and dates, and generally with the verification of fact. He had to be a scholar and a linguist. But within recent years proofreading has been largely taken over by the typographical unions and is often assigned to printers who because of age or other reasons are less useful for other work. They can be depended upon for typographical technique, for uniform punctuation and spelling, and occasionally for correcting a serious lapse in grammar. That is about all. The higher criticism exercised by the old-school proofreader is now done in part on an editorial desk before the copy goes to the printer and in part it is not done at all.

* * * * *

ONE of the last of the old-school proofreaders whom the Drifter has the honor and pleasure of knowing is George Schumm, the man who for many years has read proof for The Nation, made up its pages, and attended to a score of details. He has done those things which correspond to the small boy's definition of salt as what makes food taste bad when you forget to put it in. Recently, having more than passed three score and ten, he has dropped the exacting duties he has been performing to take up for The Nation the equally absorbing but less strenuous work of reading foreign periodicals. It is worth while to say a word about him here, partly because he is an old-school proofreader of the highest type and partly because he is a radical who was fighting the good fight when most of those now carrying on were in their cribs or yet unborn. He came into the world in a town in Illinois, but when about three years old was taken by his parents to a community of German freethinkers settled about Sauk City, Wisconsin. At the ripe age of fourteen he decided his future destiny by chucking up his school to be printer's devil for Der Pionier am Wisconsin in Sauk City. Here he learned the printing trade, but the home town couldn't hold him and before he was out of his teens he trekked to Milwaukee and thence to San Francisco, where he set type for the Abendpost. With a fellow-worker he conceived the idea of starting a radical weekly; they put up $250 apiece and launched Der Wecker.

* * * * *

ALTHOUGH he had found himself fed up with school at the age of fourteen he had been an avid reader, ever greedy for more knowledge. One day while with the Abendpost he had to set the advertisement of a man who offered lessons in algebra. Before the notice appeared in the paper the typesetter presented himself at the man's door as a pupil. From another teacher he took lessons in French. After a year or so of publishing Der Wecker he turned over his interest in it to a brother and set out for Cornell University, then recently inaugurated as a workingman's college. He earned his way by working in the college printing shop and after taking his degree went to Chicago. While setting type there for the Times he made the acquaintance of George C. Miln, one of a group of liberal-minded clergymen in the early eighties who were publishing a not-very-orthodox religious periodical. The printer soon became editor, with the title of the paper changed to the Radical Review. Like many another such publication, it was faced by financial difficulties. A wealthy manufacturer offered to support it, but with the mental integrity that is perhaps his strongest trait the editor decided that the two of them did not see eye to eye. As a declaration of independence he got out a number of the Radical Review advocating anarchy. It was the last issue. Soon afterward the editor was again setting type—in Boston. Coming to know Benjamin R. Tucker, who was publishing the anarchist weekly Liberty, he was presently editing a German edition of it. With the repetition for which history is famous, financial difficulties again stalked upon the scene and again the editor went back to the printer's case. Early in this century he followed Tucker to New York City, where the latter had revived Liberty and also was running a book-publishing business. He was with Tucker until the plant burned down, when he became proofreader for the Evening Post and finally tied up with The Nation.

* * * * *

NEXT to his mental integrity and his personal kindliness, the strongest trait of this man is his self-effacing modesty. He will be surprised, pained, and outraged when he reads these words. But they are no hot-house bouquet. They are a tying together of flowers which he himself has planted along the way he has walked as a scholar and, in the best sense of the word, a gentleman—gentle to a disarming degree, and every inch a man.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Dr. Crile and the Honor Roll

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation's Honor Roll for 1929, consisting of the names of persons "who have done honor to the United States as a whole or to their particular part of it," you include the name of Dr. George W. Crile for his heroism after the Cleveland Clinic explosion and fire.

The fire in question occurred on May 15, and 122 persons lost their lives in consequence. Two weeks later the National Fire Protection Association issued an illustrated report of the disaster, from which it is pertinent to quote:

> The properties of nitrocellulose film are a matter of common knowledge. Previous fires have given sufficiently gruesome evidence of the extreme inflammability of the film, and the noxious character of the gases given off when it burns. . . . Instead of being stored in a vault, protected by automatic sprinklers and provided with a vent to carry off fumes in case of fire, the film in the Cleveland Clinic was stored in an old coal bin, exposed to several potential sources of ignition, and with direct opening to a pipe tunnel and shafts that furnished a natural path of travel for the fumes to every room in the building. The most diabolical cunning could scarcely have devised an arrange> ment more surely calculated to spread death throughout the building. . . . For a number of years there has been available "safety" film, composed of cellulose acetate, and having no more fire hazard than paper or cardboard.

Dr. George W. Crile appears to have been the organizer and manager of the Cleveland Clinic. His bravery after the tragedy is commendable, but the 122 people who died because dangerous films were stored in an old coal bin are still dead.

ALEXANDER E. WIGHT

Wellesley Hills, Mass., January 8

Another Protest

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On your Honor Roll for 1929 I missed the name of the American Civil Liberties Union. In my opinion it should have headed the list.

New York, January 10 FANNY GOODMAN

Recompense for Injustice

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A question which should cause all Americans concern, in case pardons are granted to Mooney and Billings, is that of properly providing restitution for whatever injustice may be entailed in detaining innocent men in prison for thirteen years. It seems reasonable to hold that injustice by a court of justice should be righted as surely as that of any other social institution. If these two men are pardoned, and thereby acknowledged guiltless of the crime for which they have been mistakenly deprived of thirteen years of freedom, should not society do its utmost to repay in some measure for its mistake? This may not be easy to do. A substantial money payment may prove the best available form of recompense, inadequate as that would be. In case there is no precedent for such an essential act of justice does not the time approach for establishing one?

If this is impossible, I suggest the creation of a fund which should go to Mooney and Billings after their pardon. I will contribute twenty-five dollars if such a project is undertaken.

Berkeley, Cal., December 12 HARRY L. KINGMAN

Alexander William Mair

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When your reviewer wrote his notice of the Loeb Classical Library edition of "Oppian, Colluthus, and Tryphiodorus," for your issue of November 13, he apparently had not heard of the tragic death of its distinguished editor and translator, Professor Alexander William Mair. He was burned to death in his library, leaving a widow and twelve children to mourn his loss. Possibly misled by a remark in Mair's Preface, your reviewer says "here is the work of an old man." Mair was only fifty when he died. He says that the contents of this volume "are poor enough." This is true of Colluthus and Tryphiodorus, but very wide of the mark as far as Oppian is concerned. His work is of interest not only to the scholar but also to the sportsman and the zoologist. The Greeks had an immense knowledge of fishes and took great interest in them. We know that Alexander the Great allowed his friend and teacher, Aristotle, enormous sums for the study of ichthyology. In fact every zoologist should study Oppian. Mair died before his "Oppian," to which he had devoted so much learning and labor, was published. The "Callimachus and Lycophron," which he did for the Loeb Classical Library in 1921, is a further monument to his erudition, and has been highly praised by specialists in the field of Alexandrian poetry.

Professor Mair was not only an uncommonly fine Greek scholar and an inspiring teacher, but he also had the soul of a poet and a true poet's gift. Shortly after his death, H. J. C. Grierson brought out an attractive little volume containing a selection of Mair's poems (published by Messrs. Oliver and Boyd, Edinburgh). In the Preface will be found a tender description of the "silent frightened boy" who subsequently became the admired and beloved teacher of many a Scotch youth and maiden. The contents of this slight volume cannot fail to bring joy to every lover of true poetry and of perfect versification, and I hope that by calling attention to it I am doing a real service to many future readers. Besides many lovely original poems, the volume contains a number of translations from the Greek, Latin, French, and German. I doubt whether an ode of Horace or a bit of Virgil or from the "Anthologia Palatina" has ever been better rendered into another tongue. Then there are Mair's Greek versions of poems by such men as Tennyson, Landor, Heine, or Le Gallienne, to delight those who have command of that language. Of these Greek poems one may, without exaggeration, say that they are works of a genius. I know of nothing that equals his rendering of the doggerel:

> In a cavern, in a canyon
>   Excavating for a mine,
> Dwelt a miner, forty-niner
>   And his daughter Clementine, etc.

Murnau, Bavaria, December 5 JAMES LOEB

Who Shall Govern Antarctica?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The story of Commander Byrd's present expedition to the Antarctic regions will for a long time remain a source of inspiration to us all. The only disturbing feature is the recent discussion as to whether the newly explored regions shall be American or British territory. The Antarctic continent (if there is one) may in time become of some importance because of its animal and mineral resources and as a place for landing and radio stations in the future development of aerial navigation in the Southern hemisphere. Its strategic position in war can hardly be of much significance for some time to come. Is it therefore worth while wrangling about a territory whose value is entirely in an uncertain future?

I propose that the territory in question be turned over to the League of Nations, to be directly managed by it (no mandate to another nation!). The League could appoint a retired non-Anglo-Saxon diplomat to be governor, with the understanding that His Antarctic Excellency could continue to live on the Riviera. A small staff of assistants at the League headquarters could attend to the mapping of the region and other routine questions that might come up.

Should a private company desire to engage in fishing, mining, hunting fur-bearing animals, or scientific exploration, a charter or a license would be issued by the administration, under the governor's seal and signature. The same would apply to a landing field or a radio station, unless the administration should decide to build one on its own account, under rules and regulations approved by the League of Nations. Such a solution not only would do away with a vexatious discussion between this country and England, but would serve as a precedent in similar future territorial disputes and would strengthen the position of the League of Nations as an actual governing body.

Ithaca, New York, December 20 VLADIMIR KARAPETOFF

Love Songs After the Aztec

By JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY

I

Thou art a frozen mountain;
Let the sun of my love melt thee.

May the arrow of thy desire,
Winged with flame,
Find its home in my bosom
That I have bared for the dart.

Thou art come. Thy flaming arrow
Is aglow in my breast.
It feeds me and devours.
I shall press it closer, closer,
Till I am consumed.

Thou art a crater of fire
Beneath a cover of snow.

II

I rejoice, for my lover hath found me.
Shyly I hid, but he hath led me out.

Beneath the rock of modesty
I trembled into bud;
He hath hurled the rock down the cliff of desire
And bid me bloom.

The forest of maidenhood shadowed my yearnings;
He hath felled the trees with the ax of his longing
And bid me drink the sun.

I rejoice, for my lover hath found me.
Coyly I fled, but his arm encompassed the way.

As I eluded him, fear came upon me,
Fear of him tripped me;
I rested my head on his shoulder, and grew strong.

I rejoice, for my lover hath found me.

Cultural History

A Cultural History of the Modern Age. From the Black Death to the World War. Volume I: Renaissance and Reformation. By Egon Friedell. Translated from the German by Charles Francis Atkinson. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THIS is the first volume to be translated of a projected four-volume history of European civilization. Only two volumes have so far appeared in Germany. The first of these, "Renaissance and Reformation," covers roughly the period from the Black Death in 1348 to the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War in 1618.

The publishers assert that since "The Decline of the West" no other work has made so great a European sensation as this book by Egon Friedell. The comparison with Spengler would be inevitable in any case. Herr Friedell himself suggests it when he offers a "pedigree" of his book, a rapid sketch of certain peaks in the "history of cultural history," ending with the name of Spengler, "perhaps the most powerful and vivid thinker to appear on German soil since Nietzsche." The Spenglerian influence is very great; it largely determines Friedell's general attitude not only toward history itself, but toward other realms of thought: his condescension toward mere logic, reason, "causality," science; his relish of paradox, his "Credo quia absurdum," his mysticism, his faith in superficial analogies, even his style, with its peculiar italicization.

Yet there are important differences. The two writers have not the same end in view. It was Spengler's object to demonstrate the existence and the nature of a morphology of history: his references to persons, institutions, and ideas were made not primarily for their own sake, but to illustrate and enforce a thesis. Friedell, on the other hand, though Spengler's ideas remain implicit in his work, has aimed to write not a philosophy of history but history itself. He does not, of course, return to the orthodox political narrative. He wants no "dull, barren registering of troop movements and diplomatic shufflings, successive rulerships and parliamentary negotiations," but a history of the whole range of human manners and customs, intellectual and spiritual life. And he presents this not by a strict chronological recital, but rather by unfolding a series of pictures or panoramas.

From the standpoint of logic, accuracy, and authority, nothing could be easier than a detailed criticism of Friedell's work. His introduction alone will completely undermine the confidence of many readers. He declares that accuracy in a history is far less important than the artistic personality behind the work; that genuine accuracy is impossible in any case; that all history is legend; that his own aim is nothing more than to tell "today's legend of modern history"; that not only is incompleteness unavoidable in history, but that only when the historian aims at this incompleteness deliberately does his work take on an artistic aspect; and finally that all successful history involves exaggeration.

In the body of his work Friedell almost never documents his assertions, weighs conflicting testimony, or balances probabilities; he simply makes the flat cocksure statement. When he wants to prove a dubious point he blandly ignores all instances that tend to discredit it. Thus he maintains that in the Italian Renaissance art and literature were created exclusively for a select audience of connoisseurs and experts, while in Periclean Athens there was "a culture for all." He seeks to bolster this by remarking that "anyone could understand a Sophocles, a Phidias, a Socrates" and omits any embarrassing reference to Aristotle's metaphysics or Plato's "Laws."

In his constant straining for arresting paradoxes he talks a good deal of rubbish. He professes to see in the pre-logical attitude of primitive man a sort of super-logic, and dismisses the "rationalism" of the last four centuries as "nothing more than a temporary prejudice." He seriously pretends that we are greatly the poorer for the loss of the "irrecoverable science of astrology and destiny-calculation" of the Babylonians. He even affects such superstitions himself, and attributes the reported earthquakes at the time of the Black Death to the social upheaval: "If humanity was shaken by . . . a profound shudder . . . then the earth must have had some similar experience; and not the earth only but the neighboring planets, nay, the whole solar system."

Yet, as with Spengler, in spite of contradictions and absurdities, the final result is a book extremely readable and stimulating. I do not mean to imply that Friedell is a writer of Spengler's dimensions; he lacks the latter's force and originality and immense erudition. But he is intelligent, penetrating, and widely informed, and never obscure or heavy. His manner and tone, his capacity to portray an age compactly and vividly, often suggest Taine, and his prose has the vivacity, clarity, and lightness that we are accustomed to think of as French. There are, in addition to the rapid narrative, many fine expository passages scattered through the book—the analysis, for example, of the relation of geniuses to the age in which they appear, the criticisms of Rabelais and of the literary artistry of Bacon. One can only hope that the subsequent volumes of this history will prove as brilliant and absorbing as the first.

Henry Hazlitt

Dime Novels

Dime Novels; or, Following an Old Trail in Popular Literature. By Edmund Pearson. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

I CAN imagine no one better fitted than Mr. Pearson to write the stirring story of the rise and decline of the dime novel and its little brother, the nickel library; he is quite obviously one who as a boy gloated over the extraordinary exploits of Buffalo Bill, Old Cap Collier, the James Boys, and other celebrated hunters, detectives, and desperadoes, and who still holds them in affectionate remembrance. Nor can I imagine a better job than he has done. For one thing, he has effectively disposed of the ancient canard, even yet heard in pietistic circles, that the old-time thriller was pernicious and immoral. He shows clearly, what every lover of the dime novel has always known, that in reality it was grotesquely strict in its moral standards; its heroes were always giants of chivalry, and the ladies who swished through its pages were paragons of modesty and virtue. Indeed, it is probable that a dime novel, or a nickel one for that matter, was never written which would not receive the approval of the modern censor, even the curious specimens in Boston. And instead of a formal literary history, Mr. Pearson has written a delightfully informal book packed with amusing quotations, with reproductions of the amazing works of art which illustrated the stories, and with comment upon the authors and publishers which answers innumerable questions that perplexed the boys of another century. He writes fascinatingly of both the dime novel and the nickel library, and traces in detail their various phases—the stories of the Revolution and early Indian warfare in the East, the tales of the great plains and the pioneer West, the thrilling sagas of New York detectives, the pious accounts of righteous messenger boys and divinely guided clerks, and the exciting yarns of the college heroes of the nineties. Truly, "thar's gold in them thar pages," and as the publisher says on the jacket, "the quoted matter alone is worth the price of admission."

The traditional dime novel is a thin, tattered volume of unlovely saffron hue, the cover ornamented with a gaudy picture portraying the hero at a time of great stress, and inside a tale of wild and absurd sensationalism. Invariably, according to the tradition, the story begins: "Bang! Bang! Bang! Three shots rang out on the midnight air, and another redskin bit the dust!" But the tradition is true only of the dime novel in its later period, after it had swept the country for almost half a century and built up a popularity comparable only to the modern craze for detective stories. The first ever published by the great firm of I. P. Beadle and Company, later Beadle and Adams, was "Malaeska: The Indian Wife of the White Hunter," by Ann Sophia Winterbotham Stephens, a writer who stood in the first rank of American novelists of the day. It appeared first as a serial in the Ladies' Companion, and opens very prosaically: "The traveler who has stopped at Catskill, on his way up the Hudson, will remember that a creek of no insignificant breadth washes one side of the village." Not until page 10 does the reader taste red meat. Then the hero cries: "Touch but a hair of her head, and by the Lord that made me, I will bespatter that tree with your brains!" "It took twenty or thirty years," Mr. Pearson writes, "for such exciting sentences to move up until they became first words on page one."

The early dime novels were thus thoroughly respectable, and were written by prominent novelists who were only attempting to follow in the footsteps of Fenimore Cooper and Walter Scott. During the Civil War such novels formed the bulk of the soldiers' reading matter and were delivered to the military encampments in great bales. It was not until competition forced the Beadles to cheapen their own product and to issue books of wild adventure and combat that dime novels acquired their bad name and were denounced as a literary plague and breeders of iniquity. But despite the gloomy speeches of the moralists, dime novels harmed no one; on the contrary they pleased and entertained millions.

Mr. Pearson makes the interesting point that the dime novel is still with us, though changed somewhat in form. Tales as wild as the old thrillers ever dared to be fill the innumerable magazines that clutter the newsstands, and appear as standard-sized books. The difference is that they are sold for two dollars instead of a dime. What are the works of Edgar Wallace and of S. S. Van Dine but dime novels? The feats of Mr. Wallace's detectives from Scotland Yard differ only in detail and setting from the exploits of Old King Brady and Nick Carter, and that sissified sleuth, Mr. Philo Vance, is blood brother to Old Cap Collier.

To this reviewer, at least, Mr. Pearson's book is one of the most absorbing in many months. Every man over thirty-five who recalls the breath-taking hours with the yellowbacks or the "nickul lib'ries" will hug it to his breast amid a flood of happy memories.

Herbert Asbury

Religio Medici

The Sciences and Philosophy. Gifford Lectures 1927-28. By J. S. Haldane. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.75.

IN the present volume an eminent physiologist joins forces with those of his scientific confreres who have recently rushed into print with confessions of faith. Perhaps it is still a little too soon to be sure just how many of these flirtations with metaphysics and theology are actually necessitated by the latest developments in science and how many of them are the result of a fashion made possible by the confusion into which physics and chemistry have been thrown by the most recent investigations. But one thing at least is certain: if the process at present under way continues much longer, then the theologians (now headed toward skepticism) and the scientists (now headed toward religion) will pass one another on the road, and the preacher, discovering that he believes less than the physicist, will find that the traditional conflict between science and religion has not so much been resolved as stood on its head, and that the difficulty which faces him is the difficulty of reconciling a rationalistic theology with a scientific attitude which grows increasingly mystical. Professor Haldane, to be specific, undertakes to review those problems of bio-chemistry which seem unsolvable in the terms of that science, and after several genuflections in the direction of Kant and a few rather more guarded acknowledgments of his debt to the Holism of Smuts he gets finally to a chapter on The Belief in Immortality and emerges with a version of pantheism which is to be distinguished from other varieties of the same thing by little except the road which one travels to reach it.

Professor Haldane begins with the now familiar analysis of the element of pure assumption in Newtonian physics. That great-grandfather of scientific thought assumed, so he reminds us, that physical reality is ultimately reducible to infinitesimal and independent particles which are capable of acting upon one another only in a fashion determined by their mass and relative position. This assumption that the material stuff of the universe is essentially "dead" matter became the fundamental postulate of physical science; and though it justified itself pragmatically in the investigation of simpler mechanical problems, it becomes increasingly difficult to understand how a living organism can be built up out of such eternally limited and isolated particles, since, to take one example, though the lungs perform certain mechanical functions explainable in accordance with the laws of gases, they perform other selective functions in maintaining a nearly constant quantity of oxygen in the blood which no mechanical reconstruction of their mechanism could perform. From this difficulty one may attempt to escape either by assuming the existence of mechanisms more subtle than any we have been able to understand or by assuming (as Newton's contemporaries for the most part certainly did) that life is something added to matter by virtue of which it can do certain things which matter alone could not. But Professor Haldane, after reviewing the difficulties inherent in both the mechanistic and vitalistic theories, comes to the conclusion that neither is tenable, and proposes a solution which involves the rejection of the fundamental Newtonian postulate.

If life is not something imposed upon "dead" matter and if, on the other hand, it is not explainable in terms of such "dead" matter, then the capacity for exhibiting the characteristic phenomena of life must be inherent in matter itself which, therefore, must be endowed with qualities not to be accounted for in any description which pictures it as composed of particles capable of no more than a mechanical action upon one another. Moreover, since physics itself has come recently to doubt whether or not even purely physical phenomena can be explained upon the basis of the Newtonian conception, the physiologist may feel justified in demanding that the whole problem of the relation between the inorganic and the organic be approached from a new angle and the continuity of the two established, not by reducing life to mechanical terms, but by demonstrating that matter itself is living—at least in the sense that it can act in ways unexplainable on the basis of purely mechanical theories of its structure. Thus for the billiard-ball universe of Newton in which isolated particles bombard one another is substituted a conception of matter which makes it essentially organic.

Once one has gone this far the temptation to follow a similar line of speculation is strong, and Professor Haldane takes another long step. The world of consciousness—the world in which what we call values plays an important part—is as obviously different from the world of simple organic life as that latter world is different from the world of mere mechanism. But the difficulties in the way of regarding man as an animal to whom a "soul" has been added are as great as the difficulties in the way of regarding an animal as a mechanism to which "life" has been added; and by a process of reasoning analogous to that used before, it becomes necessary to assume that something in the nature of the physical universe itself corresponds, not merely to life, but to consciousness and the world of values also. Hence the stuff out of which physical reality is composed is not merely organic but spiritual as well.

Certain objections to Professor Haldane's argument naturally arise. In the first place it may be questioned how many of the functions of religion can be performed by a pantheism so

AFTER MOTHER INDIA
Harry H. Field

FROM INDIA
Extract from "The Englishman," Calcutta, India:
"Mr. Field's book is a most lucid verification of Miss Mayo's much discussed 'Mother India'. He deals with the various accusations that have been hurled at Miss Mayo, and successfully refutes them all."
From "The Civil and Military Gazette," Lahore, India:
"Mr. Gandhi and Dr. Rabindranath Tagore are refuted out of their own mouths, and many other wild Indian assertions are quietly taken to pieces and destroyed."

This is a necessary companion volume to your copy of "Mother India."

$3.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

The book that is being discussed in every intelligent person's home!

MARRIAGE AND MORALS
by Bertrand Russell

"A bold, fearless book—the kind we so much need, sensational in its courage and candor. Ten years ago it could not have got by the censor. But now they dare not suppress it."
—Ben B. Lindsey.

Fourth Large Printing. $3.00

HORACE LIVERIGHT N.Y. GOOD BOOKS

tenuous. In the second place it is not likely that a thoroughgoing mechanist would consent to be vanquished by an argument in which no mention is made of either conditioned reflexes or inherited engrams, and it is equally uncertain that the time has yet come to give up so completely the efforts to account for the existence of our sense of the reality of values in terms of a rationalistic psychology which proposes to deduce it from animal traits. But Professor Haldane would have, I fancy, a reply of sorts. He would reiterate his conviction that mechanistic theories have completely broken down and he would contend that he is offering (at the very least) a universe more livable than that of nineteenth-century science which left the animal alone in a dead universe and the human being alone in a world of beasts. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Van Buren

An Epoch and a Man: Martin Van Buren and His Times. By Denis Tilden Lynch. Horace Liveright. $5.

THERE have been few of the Presidents who furnish better material for a colorful biography than Martin Van Buren. A master politician, cunning in intrigue, suave as a Talleyrand, and resourceful beyond most men, it was the fashion of his time to put him down as the mere shadow of someone else —a superficial creature without depth or breadth or substance. Thus the average schoolboy for generations has been taught that Van Buren was one of the "little Presidents"; and he was nothing of the kind. Even his book on "The Origin and Cause of Political Parties" failed to affect this false conception of the man, but the long delayed publication of his autobiography has led to a reappraisal, and he has emerged at length as an able man of strong convictions and great courage. His contacts were such as to please a biographer. He knew and was advised by Aaron Burr, consulted with Jefferson, was an intimate of Jackson and, as an old man, was a friend of Tilden, thus covering a century of interesting figures in his friendships. But his methods, subtle, often subterranean, were not those that appeal to the imagination or catch the crowd. Essentially a leader of the leaders, his most important contributions to political history were more than half concealed. It has been more than forty years since Edward M. Shepard made the last serious attempt to give us a biography of Van Buren; now Mr. Lynch, fresh from his successful study of Tweed, gives us another and a new interpretation.

It is not so successful nor so clear as the biography of Tweed; but it is an improvement upon Shepard in its treatment of the Van Buren of pre-Jackson days. Here we have the intrigues and personalities of New York State politics from the time of Madison until Van Buren's retirement from the Presidency. Perhaps the author has gone too minutely into this provincial politics, introduced too many figures of little other than local importance, and thus created some confusion for the reader. The struggles of Clinton and the Livingstons, with Van Buren in the midst of them, are given with more or less detail, and the schemes of the Albany Regency are followed closely. The result is that the real bigness of Van Buren is almost lost in the detailed story of his minor intrigues. After all, his greatness, such as it was, is found in his national career, and this meant more than mere political management. Mr. Lynch combats the notion that his subject was a mere rubber stamp of Andrew Jackson. There has never been any justification for that assumption. The smaller man was overshadowed in the public view by the greater and more picturesque, but he was one of the wisest of Jackson's inner circle and there were times when he disagreed with his chief. On principles the two men were very close; they differed temperamentally as to

To Readers of The Nation:

H. L. Mencken declared that in THE TWILIGHT OF CHRISTIANITY Harry Elmer Barnes was "constantly over-prolix, often repetitious, and not infrequently somewhat vague."

On the other hand, Dr. Charles Prosper Fagnani, Professor Emeritus of Old Testament Literature, Union Theological Seminary, said of THE TWILIGHT OF CHRISTIANITY:

"It is a superb piece of work, so comprehensive, so judicial, so impersonal. There is not a word too much, yet the author has covered magisterially every phase of the subject."

In the New Republic Horace Ainsworth Eaton wrote:

"In style and purpose the book is bold and vigorous. The amazing knowledge of the literature of the field covered; the aptness of the citations; the orderly mastering of vast material—all these are admirable. THE TWILIGHT OF CHRISTIANITY is a book to be read by anyone concerned with the problems of religion and social progress."

Rupert Hughes asserts:

"I have just finished reading the last word of Professor Barnes' magnificent TWILIGHT OF CHRISTIANITY. It is a Götterdammerung indeed. It is overwhelming, like nature, tremendous and infinitely minute. The author seems to neglect nothing and his immense scholarship wields every weapon with easy grace."

The conservative Churchman admits:

"The loyal Christian can hardly accept the author's conclusions, but he must find an answer to them if his religion is to survive in the new age."

You are certain to be interested in a volume that has provoked such varied and unexpected responses. Who would have suspected that this anti-clerical book would be condemned by Mencken but praised, albeit grudgingly, by the Churchman?

You are quite right in concluding there must be something in this book.

Buy it today at any bookstore.

$3 $3

The Twilight of Christianity

By HARRY ELMER BARNES

published by

THE VANGUARD PRESS

100 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK CITY

methods. Jackson was the more courageous, though Van Buren would have written "less cautious"; this was shown in the difficulty Jackson had in pinning his friend down on the bank question. On domestic questions it can hardly be said that Jackson was influenced greatly by the Red Fox, as Van Buren was called. In the field of foreign relations no one influenced him more, though it is hardly fair to ascribe the amicable settlement of the controversy over French spoliations so exclusively to Van Buren as Mr. Lynch does. In that crisis Jackson was fortunate in the advice of three real statesmen with diplomatic experience and familiarity with foreign affairs —Van Buren, Edward Livingston, and John Forsyth. The three consulted together.

Mr. Lynch has crowded his volume with interesting and amusing episodes and with bits of drama which enliven it. He has contributed greatly to our knowledge of the New York career of Van Buren, but he is not so happy in his conception of relative values in the national field. His bibliography shows that he has read widely in preparation for his work; but unfortunately, I think, he has permitted himself to be dissuaded from the citations of authority that are essential in any historical or biographical work that is controversial in character.

CLAUDE G. BOWERS

The City of Dreams

The City of Tomorrow. By Le Corbusier. Translated from the eighth French edition. With an Introduction by Frederick Etchells. Payson and Clarke. $7.50.

THIS book might have been of great use as propaganda for building reform, since its author is one of the most successful architects of France and one of the greatest exponents of modern architectural theory. It was written, however, to convince a French public, and a good deal of it is unnecessary to an American reader and might actually keep him from taking the author seriously. A good many pages, for example, are devoted to showing that life in a modern apartment is superior in convenience and hygiene to life in an old-fashioned house or walk-up, and also that a skyscraper can be a thing of beauty; of all of which, of course, we are already convinced. More space is then taken by a quasi-philosophical hymn to the spirit of order. Man is conceived of as an animal who plans. He distinguishes himself by triumphing over rather than acceding to nature. His works, when he is at his best, appear in planned forms; that is, in straight lines, right angles, prisms, cylinders, etc.; hence the proper city is one built or planned with straight streets and well and sensibly spaced buildings. All this argument is employed to refute the proponents of cozy nooks and picturesque curves, but American readers will probably be sufficiently convinced by the point which Le Corbusier also emphasizes, namely, that the traffic of modern life forces city planning.

Where the book actually outlines a plan it should be valuable. Le Corbusier's idea is not original, but his knowledge and his persuasive style make it more forcible than it would be likely to be in other hands. The idea is to utilize the skyscraper to combine the virtues of urban and rural living. He would have one large building replace a number of small ones, and of the ground thus saved he would make a park. The whole city built in this way would be a great park traversed by wide roads and containing at intervals vast structures. The larger structures would be office buildings; they would be placed in the center, each with its own subway station, and the streets would radiate from them. Surrounding them would be apartment buildings built on a honeycomb plan so that each window would open on the great general park, thereby assuring the best light and air as well as a maximum of privacy. In the suburbs

Visits to Soviet Russia
FOURTH SEASON

EXPLORATIVE itineraries worked out with reference to social, economic, historic, artistic and scenic features. Visits to factories, schools, children's communities, collective farms and villages . . . art treasures, palaces and workers' rest homes . . . for the adventurous . . . camping in the Caucasus and study of primitive tribes.

Small groups, each accompanied by a qualified American leader and Russian interpreter. From $410 including express steamship passage. Literature available.

Individual itineraries also executed ▲ Independent year-'round representation in Russia

20-30 WEST 43rd STREET ▲ NEW YORK

THE OPEN ROAD

SCIENCE FOR CHILDREN

Nature Study groups for children, ages 8 to 12. Saturdays from 9 to 12 or from 2 to 5; and Thursdays and Fridays from 2 to 5.

We shall study animals and plants that live in ponds, woods, fields and marshes in Spring. The development of buds of trees; birds that come here in Spring; insects; rocks and minerals; use of the microscope. An all day field trip every third Sunday for those who wish to go—no extra charge.

15 periods, beginning February 15th. $15 for 5 Saturdays. Conducted by a teacher in charge of Nature Study at the Ethical Culture School and on the staff of the American Museum of Natural History. Address MARY GREIG, 523 WEST 121st STREET, NEW YORK CITY.

IF YOU BELIEVE IN FREEDOM OF THOUGHT you are invited to join
THE RATIONALIST PRESS ASSOCIATION, Ltd.

$2 subscribed now will enable you to receive (post free):
H. G. WELLS'S "FIRST AND LAST THINGS"
The famous author's "Confession of Faith and Rule of Life." (160 pp.)
CHARLES DARWIN'S "ORIGIN OF SPECIES"
The "Evolutionist's Bible." Complete and final edition: (434 pp.)
JOHN STUART MILL'S "ON LIBERTY"
The classic case against the Censorship. (160 pp.)
(ALL THE ABOVE, CLOTHETTE BOUND)
The Hon. BERTRAND RUSSELL'S "WHY I AM NOT A CHRISTIAN."
Twelve issues of "The Literary Guide", the Rationalist monthly of the English-speaking world: and "The Rationalist Annual for 1931" (to appear in October).

SEND $2 (MONEY ORDER) NOW TO THE SECRETARY, R.P.A., JOHNSON'S COURT, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.4. (England).

there would be garden cities. This arrangement, it is believed, would also solve traffic problems, since the population within a given area would be fixed and means of transportation could be adequately planned.

In the details of the houses Le Corbusier has some novel ideas. One of his premises is that beauty in a city comes from variety in the general plan and uniformity in detail. By detail he does not mean the decorative motifs but the nature of the roofs, the kinds of material, and the sizes and shapes of the walls. Accordingly he would design a unit apartment, to be reproduced en masse, which would be cheap and efficient and give agreeable formal sensations. The plan he suggests is a duplex arrangement, among its most attractive features being a convertible winter and summer garden. In the office buildings, because of the large park, set-backs would be done away with and we should have sheer structures, cruciform in plan and encased in glass brick. It is this brick and the masses of verdure that Le Corbusier counts upon to give warmth to his otherwise austere arrangement. WALTER GUTMAN

More War Stories

Storm of Steel. By Ernst Jünger. Translated by Basil Creighton, with an Introduction by R. H. Mottram. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Class of 1902. By Ernst Glaeser. Translated by Willa and Edwin Muir. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Schlump. The Story of a German Soldier Told by Himself. Translated by Maurice Samuel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

"STORM OF STEEL" is a diary-like narrative of a former German officer of infantry who was glad to fight for his fatherland and would fight for it again with relish if need be. Jünger, the author, was not "disillusioned" by the war. He sees war, not as a catastrophic social phenomenon with peculiar ramifications and unpredictable consequences, but as a welcome patriotic duty and a glorious experience. The book deals almost entirely with action at or near the front. Jünger's description of actual fighting and his commentaries on war from the point of view of the line soldier are good. "The notion that a soldier becomes hardier and bolder as war proceeds," he declares, "is mistaken. What he gains in the science and art of attacking his enemy he loses in strength of nerve." How true, yet how little known by those inexperienced in warfare of today!

To me the book is dull; it is not cast in any artistic form, and it is slightly irritating because of the author's references to his citations and awards for bravery. It is the book of one whom a great experience has inspired to turn to writing; unfortunately it is not the work of one inspired by literature to treat a great theme.

"Class of 1902" is every moment a first novel. It is autobiographically written, and deals with an adolescent youth before and during the World War. As far as information and interest go the book has value; it creates a picture of middle-class German life and presents the political and social ideas current just prior to and during the war. It is, however, inartistic and badly written. Ernst Glaeser does not put himself back into childhood skilfully. At times he and the autobiographical "I" are too close (with the typical subjectively sympathetic closeness of the first novelist) while elsewhere he appears to apply his psychology of today to the psychology of adolescence. He shows this in the Hilde episode in which the hero plans to fall in love, falsely, with a girl in order to learn about sex from her.

Of these three books only "Schlump," to my mind, has any "Sh-h-h—!

"Be calm, please, and quiet. I will do the talking.

"Splendid! Your expression assures me that you had no intention of printing any item distasteful to the Christian Science Mother Church.

"That's nice, because I'm censor for the Mother Church in this particular city. Just as surely as Right Thinking leads to Prosperity, your cooperative spirit will be reflected in the advertising revenues of your excellent and supine newspaper.

"We regard you highly for your uncommon sense. Good day, Mr. Pub. Restful catnaps to you!"

This one-sided conversation never took place in the actual words quoted. But in effect it illustrates the amazing censorship which the Christian Science Mother Church maintains over the press of the United States. The story and the machinery of this censorship will be revealed in a remarkable series of articles beginning in The Nation NEXT WEEK.

Beginning February 12*—DIVORCE AND AFTER—the most constructive approach to the divorce problem ever undertaken.

JUST ONE DOLLAR with the coupon below will bring you all the issues containing these two important features. Four additional monthly payments of $1 each will bring you The Nation for a full year (52 issues). Quick action is imperative.

THE NATION 20 Vesey St. NEW YORK

For the enclosed $1 start my one-year subscription with the February 5 number. I will send the balance at the rate of $1 a month for four months.

Name ....

Street ....

City ....

1-29-30

claim to literary quality. The anonymous author understands the art of fiction, utilizes form, seems to know what he wants to do, does it, and characterizes beguilingly his Schlump. He does not aim at the seriousness of the other two authors, but his book does show a bit of war, much of the life behind the front, and the break-up of the German army in the early days of November, 1918.

Schlump, a boy of sixteen at the outbreak of the war, volunteers for the infantry. After a taste of the front, of wounds, and the hospital mill, the emotion of patriotism wanes in the youthful breast. Schlump becomes content to hang on to any soft job he can get in the—to use an American army term—SOS; he "goldbricks." When the character of Schlump begins to deteriorate in the great military machine the author cleverly rehabilitates it through a certain circumstance and the vision of a sweetheart. All the while Schlump has very engaging casual love affairs, mainly of the body, which are the best points of quite a delightful book. JAMES B. WHARTON

All Kinds of Poets

Our Singing Strength. By Alfred Kreymborg. Coward-McCann. $5.

ALFRED KREYMBORG'S outline of American poetry from 1620 to 1930 is, unfortunately, just what he names it—an outline. The book shows enormous reading, enormous research into sometimes very dead poets, and an amazing familiarity with the names of living poets; it shows almost nothing of an original point of view in criticism of these poets or an ability to judge verse writers according to their relative importance. Mr. Kreymborg is considerate of even the dead, and when he moves among the living he is very fearful indeed of treading on toes. His chapters on the more important figures add very little to Amy Lowell's and Louis Untermeyer's comment; his discoveries of minor figures who serve to make the development of American poetry continuous are not always convincing. If he steps forward with one foot to criticize the living poets, he steps backward two steps to flatter each one in turn.

It is, perhaps, still too early to undertake the task of placing critically most of these figures in American poetry. A book that attempted this would include long analytical essays on the important poets only and mention, perhaps, in passing, their followers. Certainly in such a book two-thirds of the poets named by Mr. Kreymborg would be dropped entirely, and the essays would include much more pointed and decisive comment on the really important poets of the most modern group. To the criticism of Eliot, Crane, and Cummings Mr. Kreymborg contributes almost nothing. "Our Singing Strength" may serve well as a text for further study, for more accurate grouping, and for more critical judgment.

EDA LOU WALTON

Books in Brief

The Lost Child. By Rahel Sanzara. Translated from the German by Winifred Katzin. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

This book handles a somber, Dostoevskian theme. Christian Scheffel, a happy tenant farmer in North Germany, loses control of himself when his four-year-old daughter, Anna, disappears. Following a period of lonely brooding, interspersed with wild-goose pursuits of rumors, he achieves a new lease on life, the Christian emotion of selflessness becomes the center of gravity of his soul, and he vows to dedicate his life to others. When he returns home his wife is dead, and slowly and sadly he rebuilds his life and his half-ruined fortunes. Eventually Anna's body is uncovered in one of Christian's barns and the murderer, a trusted servant, is sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment; when the term has expired Scheffel takes the fellow back into service. When at last Scheffel dies he has been for years a spiritual corpse. The story is well told and is full of genuine feeling, but the burden of exaggerated romance and mysticism palls.

Paterfamilias. By W. B. Trites. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $2.50.

Mr. Trite's novel of American family life is written in a pre-war, realistic vein of painful and prosy explicitness which misses realism. It deals with a doctor in an Eastern mill city in his personal, professional, and civic relationships. The story, however, is not focused on the doctor; it flows loosely around the various members of his family who seem predestined to dull and sordid catastrophes. The book is written almost entirely in dialogue, and the dialogue does not ring true. None of the characters, not even the long-suffering doctor, is completely realized, and the continually shifting focus leaves the reader weary and irritated. The social background of "Paterfamilias" is, no doubt, accurate enough, but this virtue fails to compensate for the lack of an inner movement and for the ineffectual characterization.

The Decline of the Age of Louis XIV; or French Literature, 1687-1715. By Arthur Tilley. The Macmillan Company. $8.

It is regrettable that this latest contribution of an illustrious scholar to the understanding of French literature and

LONDON—A MILESTONE?

The present Disarmament Conference in London may well be the most significant event of the present century.

Important decisions may be taken by the principal nations of the world bringing the dream of idealists for centuries—a condition of world peace—close to accomplishment.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

will give a sympathetic and, what is more important, an accurate and unbiased account of this epoch-making conference.

At all times The Manchester Guardian Weekly keeps its readers advised of progress in international affairs.

To leaders of intelligence in more than sixty countries, it is a constant source of reliable information on all important world happenings and a faithful guide in keeping their viewpoint on vital events, clear and unprejudiced.

----------MAIL THIS COUPON----------

The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
224 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

Gentlemen:
Enclosed please find $3.00 for which send THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY for one year to the below address.

Name ....

Address ....

□ THEATRES □ □ □ FILMS □

LEO BULGAKOV
THEATRE ASSOCIATES, INC., presents
AT THE BOTTOM
by MAXIM GORKY
New version by William L. Laurence
POPULAR PRICES $2.50 to 75c
Phone reservations accepted—Circle 1407
"Really worth seeing."—Brown, Post.
"A fine play" —Mantle, News.
WALDORF THEATRE—50th St., Bet. 6th & 7th Aves. Eve., 8:50
MATINEES Thursday and Saturday, 2:30

Kenneth Macgowan and J. V. Reed present
BASIL SYDNEY and MARY ELLIS
in* CHILDREN of DARKNESS
A Rich Satire on Exploiters of All Ages
by Edwin Justus Mayer, author of "The Firebrand"
BILTMORE THEATRE—47th Street, West of Broadway
Evenings, 8:50—Mats., Wed. and Sat., 2:40.

CIVIC REPERTORY 14th St.—6th Ave. Evenings, 8:30.
50c, $1, $1.50. Matinees Thursdays and Saturdays, 2:30.
EVA LE GALLIENNE, Director
Thurs.Mat.,Jan.23, "The Sea Gull"; Thurs.Eve.,Jan.23, "Mlle. Bourrat"; Fr.Eve.,Jan.24, "Would-Be Gentleman"; Sat.Mat.,Jan.25, "Peter Pan"; Sat.Eve.,Jan.25, "The Cradle Song"; Mon.Eve.,Jan.27, Premiere, "The Open Door," "Women Have Their Way"; Tues.Eve.,Jan.28, "Living Corpse"; Wed.Eve.,Jan.29, "The Open Door" and "Women Have their Way"; Thurs.Mat.,Jan.30, "The Cherry Orchard"; Thurs. Eve.,Jan.30, "The Sea Gull." Seats four weeks in advance at Box Office and Town Hall, 113 West 43rd Street.

WILLIAM HARRIS, JR., PRESENTS
"THE FIRST PLAY OF THE SEASON WITH TEETH IN IT."
ROBERT LITTELL, WORLD.
CRIMINAL CODE
By MARTIN FLAVIN with ARTHUR BYRON
NATIONAL THEATRE 41st St., West of 7th Ave. Evenings 8:50
Matinees Wednesdays & Saturdays, 2:30

ETHEL BARRYMORE Theatre, 47th St., West of Broadway
Evenings 8:50; Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:30
LEE SHUBERT Presents
PHILIP MERIVALE
IN
DEATH TAKES A HOLIDAY
A COMEDY ABOUT LIFE
"BRAVE, AUDACIOUS, PROVOCATIVE"—Robert Garland, Telegram

The Actor-Managers, Inc., has the honor to present
RUTH DRAPER in her ORIGINAL CHARACTER SKETCHES
Every Eve. including Sunday except Monday & Thursday nights at 8:50.
COMEDY THEATRE, 41st East of Broadway. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:30. VERY GOOD SEATS at $1.00.

The Theatre Guild Presents
METEOR
By S. N. BEHRMAN
Guild THEA., 52nd St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

The Theatre Guild Presents
RED RUST
By KIRCHON & OUSPENSKY
Martin Beck THEA., 45th St. W. of 8th Ave.
Evgs. 8:40. Mats Thurs & Sat. 2:40

Starting this Sat., Jan. 25th
OUTSTANDING DOUBLE-FEATURE PROGRAM
Powerful! Stark! Cyclonic!
LILLIAN GISH
in
"WIND"
a stirring, realistic drama which reveals her emotional powers to the fullest.
directed by the famous Swedish director
VICTOR SEASTROM
—and on the same program—
An Extraordinary Screen-Document
"THE KAISER" in WAR and PEACE
a remarkable close-up study of the German war-lord in many of his most important activities. . . a vivid panorama of the busy monarch and his contacts with important world-figures.

Unusual Added Attraction
—
MARY PICKFORD
in
"THE MENDER OF NETS"
directed by D. W. Griffith a relic of 1911 . . . presented in the Christoper HOBOKEN Morley manner.

FILM GUILD CINEMA
Direction: Symon Gould
52 West 8th St., bet. 5th and 6th Aves.
Popular Prices Spring 5095-5090
Continuous Daily Noon to Midnight
Special Forenoon Prices: Sat.-Sun., 12-2—50c.
Weekdays, 12-2—35c.
LAST 2 DAYS—Jan. 23-24—Thurs. Fri.
"THE DEMON OF THE STEPPES"

MATINEES: GOOD SEATS, ALL PRICES, AT BOX OFFICE
WARNER BROS. Present
GEORGE ARLISS
in
"DISRAELI"
(A Vitaphone All-Talking Picture)
CENTRAL THEATRE Daily 2:45—8:45
Broadway and 47th St. Sunday 3—6—8:45

American Premier Starts Saturday, January 25.
"THE LAST NIGHT"
(Wedding of the Revolution)
A Powerful German Motion Picture of the French Revolution
Adapted from Max Reinhardt's stage success "Revolution Hochzeit"
55th St. Playhouse 55th St., East of 7th Ave.
Continuous from noon to Midnight

"WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT" appears on the page following history should be characterized by what the general public will consider a sober and uninteresting style; for the book is written with a surer knowledge and a keener insight than most so-called studies of the grand-siècle and would make an effective antidote to the propaganda of Bertrand and others. Despite the attention given to the few shining lights of the sun-king's reign (Saint Simon, La Bruyère, Madame de Maintenon, Fénelon, Massillon, and Bayle), the general impression is of an interim of darkness and mediocrity between the age of Racine, who had been commanded by the king to "give up everything" in order to write a history of the reign, and that of Montesquieu. The author, whose merits as a social and political historian have already been sufficiently manifested, has here devoted himself exclusively to an analysis of literary productions. But there is enough evidence in the letters and belles-lettres of the day to show that war, royal selfishness, court extravagance, and bourgeois indifference to general suffering signified more than the dramatist's striving for stage effect or the memoirist's effort to justify himself by disparaging others. The title of the book, though misleading, is thus not altogether inadvised.

The French Literature of Louisiana. By Ruby Van Allen Caulfield. Columbia University Press. $1.50.

A valuable contribution to the records of regional literature is made in this survey of French periodicals, books, and writers in the Creole corner of America, fragrant with the scents of old Europe. The colonial period and the early days of national history have elsewhere been surveyed; but of the later efforts to retain the French language in Louisiana and the pleasant, if not widely important, poems and novels and plays there produced this volume gives the fullest account. With brief biographical sketches and summaries of books, and an annotated bibliography of a hundred pages, the book indicates pleasant paths to the browser and points out sources for the scholar. The volume is one of the publications of the Institute of French Studies in Columbia University.

Drama

Ideal Corruption

NO regular theatergoer who sees "Children of Darkness" at the Biltmore Theater can fail to recognize in it the hand of the man who gave us, something more than five years ago, that delightful ironic comedy "The Firebrand." To say that is to say that Edwin Justus Mayer has kept his memory green over a period of silence which Broadway reckons as roughly equivalent to eternity, and it is, besides, to say even more, for it is to recognize the fact that Mr. Mayer has a style so nearly unique that any example of it is obviously his own.

The scene of the new play is ostensibly that of the private apartment where an eighteenth-century jailer keeps those of his unwilling guests who are able to pay for the privilege. Here a choice collection of villains practice upon one another the arts they had formerly cultivated in a wider sphere and, here, with the aid of the jailer's wanton daughter, they manage to find full scope for their genius. But wit flies back and forth—for these are accomplished scoundrels. Cynicism, refined and perfected, is carried to ineffable heights. Vice achieves a consistent code so perfect that it becomes an independent art, and man, deprived of everything except malice and wit, becomes an amazing creature whom one may admire without scruple for the simple reason that his victims are no better than he himself.

Success in a work of this kind depends, of course, upon the ability of the author to maintain a mood of ironic detachment, and this Mr. Mayer has found himself quite capable of doing. One of the characters remarks that "the most eminent poisoners have generally been of good family" and this observation will serve to suggest the tone consistently maintained and supported by a steady flow of brilliant phrases, sometimes as brittle and almost as cunningly wrought as those of Congreve. When a thief has reminded the wanton daughter of certain amorous favors which she has granted him, she reminds him that it is "a lady's privilege to remember, but a gentleman's duty to forget," and nothing could be better than that unless, perhaps, it is the reply of the same daughter to another declaration of love, made this time by a poet: "There are three things which a man says with equal ease: 'I love you.' 'Madam, I regret that it will be impossible for us to meet again.' And, 'By God she was as pretty a wench as ever I bedded with!' "

Yet polished phrases are only the ornaments of Mr. Mayer's writing. His greatest gift is a gift for comedy of the purest and most artificial kind, in which he leaves any real scene in order to create an imaginary world in which his fantastic yet clear-cut characters can function perfectly, and where, besides, they need be judged by no standards extraneous to themselves. He may call this world Renaissance Italy as he did in "The Firebrand," or eighteenth-century England as he does in the present play, but for him history is only a device for escaping from actuality, and the scene is really laid in one of the many provinces of the Realm of Comedy—in, to be precise, that particular province where nothing except wit and villainy count, and where, therefore, wit and villainy can achieve a perfection wholly delightful because they are, in that world, the measure of all things.

No one incapable of appreciating the comic possibilities of total depravity will enjoy this play. He will not perceive the charm of even Lord Wainwright (committed to prison because an inability to endure cant compelled him to poison "my wife and a few of her more intimate friends"); he may even fail to understand how a comedy which contains nothing except wickedness can be wholly exhilarating. But such an unfortunate is incapable of enjoying any manifestation of the comic spirit, for that spirit demands that the mind take a moral holiday more complete than it can ever enjoy outside the realm of art and that, for once, it judge all things as though its burdensome spouse, the heart, had never existed.

The trouble with the real world is that it is too badly mixed. In it, neither goodness on the one hand nor wit on the other is ever quite enough. But Mr. Mayer gives us a microcosm ideally corrupt and somehow delightful—perhaps because when we are in it we at least know where we are. The only pity is that he found it necessary at the end to introduce a touch of sentiment, for to suggest the possibility of virtue is not so much to relieve the corruption as to destroy the harmony of consistent depravity.

Mary Ellis stands out from a generally excellent cast which includes both Basil Sydney and Eugene Powers—the latter very fine as the ineffable Lord Wainwright. On the American stage Miss Ellis is hardly equaled for parts which require a hoydenish yet sophisticated wit, and it is too bad that in these days so few plays give full scope to a talent most completely at home in artificial comedy.

The new company established by Leo Bulgakov offers as its first production a performance of the familiar Gorki play, now called in a new and very slangy version "At the Bottom" (Waldorf Theater). The individual actors vary considerably in the finish and intelligence they bring to the play but the whole effect is good. It is worth seeing.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

*At the Bottom—Waldorf—116 W. 50th St.
Children of Darkness—Biltmore—W. 47th St.
*Civic Repertory—14th St. & 6th Ave.—See Advertisement.
*Criminal Code—National—W. 41st St.
*Death Takes a Holiday—Barrymore Theatre—47th St., W. of B'dway.
Ruth Draper—Comedy—41st St. E. of B'dway.
Everything's Jake—Assembly—39th St., E. B'way.
*Josef Suss—Erlangers—44th St., W. B'dway.
June Moon—Broadhurst—W. 44th St.
Meteor—Guild—W. 52nd St.
*Red Rust—Beck—302 W. 45th St.
Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45th St.
Sweet Adeline—Hammerstein—Broadway & 53rd St.
Wake Up and Dream—Selwyn—42nd St., W. B'dway.
*Drama. Comedy. Musical.

FILMS

Disraeli—Central Theatre—Broadway and 47th St.
"Wind"—Film Guild—52 W. 8th St.

ART EXHIBITS

"Painting in Paris"—Museum of Modern Art—730 Fifth Ave., Jan. 18 to Feb. 16.
Rodin's Bronzes & Drawings—Balzac Art Galleries—102 E. 57th St.—Through Feb. 8.
New Water Colors by John Marin—An American Place—509 Madison Ave.—Month of January.
Contemporary Belgium Painting, Sculpture & Graphic Art—Brooklyn Museum of Art—Opening Jan. 21.

A BITTER CHARGE AGAINST WAR!

"A FRAGMENT OF AN EMPIRE"

NEWEST SOVIET FILM

BEGINNING
SATURDAY, JANUARY 25th.

Love-stirring story of a man broken by War, who lost his memory and found himself in a new world.

Heart-breaking agonies!

Gripping revelations of the cruelties of War!

CAMEO THEATRE
42nd St. & Broadway
Continuous Performances

HENRY COWELL
Foremost Among America's Modern Composers will give four illustrated lectures on CONTEMPORARY MUSIC
Friday Evenings in February
NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH
465 West 23d St. New York City

☐ DEBATE ☐ LECTURES ☐

A Momentous 3-Cornered DEBATE!!!

Which Offers More to the Workers of the World?

COMMUNISM, or SOCIALISM, or CAPITALISM?

Scott
NEARING says Communism
Noted Sociologist and Lecturer

Fenner
BROCKWAY says Socialism
Brilliant Labor Member of British Parliament

Prof. Edwin R. A.
SELIGMAN says Capitalism
Foremost Economist, Columbia University

Chairmen, SAMUEL UNTERMYER & ROGER N. BALDWIN

SUBJECT

RESOLVED: That Capitalism offers more to the workers of the world than Socialism or Communism.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1930—8:30 P. M.
MECCA TEMPLE—133 W. 55TH STREET

Reserved Seats $1.00, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00 & $2.75
Reservations advisable now for best seat locations

Obtainable by mail or in person at Civic Club, 18 E. 10th Street; Columbia University Bookstore; Rand School Bookstore; 7 E. 15th Street, and New School Bookshop, 465 W. 23rd St.

Also by mail or in person at offices of
LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
11 W. 42nd St. Chickering 5789 or Spring 1716

(N. B. Tickets will be on sale at the Mecca Temple Box Office commencing this Sunday, Jan. 25th. Box Office Telephone Circle 1795.)

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY
in the City of New York
UNIVERSITY EXTENSION
The Institute of Arts and Sciences
announces

Three Free Lectures
on CRIME Its Treatment, Prevention and Cure
by
Dr. ALFRED ADLER
Eminent Viennese Psychologist

McMILLIN ACADEMIC THEATER
N. E. Corner Broadway and 116th Street

Also
A Course of 14 Lectures on
INDIVIDUAL PSYCHOLOGY (Fee $10.00)
Tuesday Afternoons at 4:15 beginning February 4

and

A Course of 7 Lectures on
SELECTED PERSONAL PROBLEMS (Fee $5.00)
Wednesday Mornings at 10:30 beginning February 5

International Relations Section

South Africa's "White" Problem

THIS illuminating account of the present state of affairs in South Africa generally and in Natal in particular was written by a correspondent in South Africa for the New Statesman, from which we reprint it. The "black" election referred to was primarily a fight for the premiership between General Smuts, leader of the South African Party, and General Hertzog of the Nationalist Party. General Hertzog, who won the election, made the race question the main issue in the campaign with his slogan of "a white South Africa." General Smuts contended that the race issue should be kept out of politics.

The "black" election of June last has already begun to bear fruit. Having deliberately appealed to the country's anti-black fears and prejudices, the government had to show that it was as good as its word and take any occasion that offered to uphold the white man's prestige (in the good old Back Veld way) and teach the natives a lesson and a proper respect for the forces of law and order. Recent happenings in Durban, where the new young Minister of Justice, Mr. Pirow, has sought to emulate Mr. Churchill's Sidney Street exploit, have doubtless had some notice in the cables. They are, perhaps, more significant as evidence of the European mental approach to our problems than of deep-seated native discontent—which no doubt exists—and "unrest" at the habitual manifestations of that mentality in policy and in administration.

For a long time past the natives of Natal have had good reason for discontent. In the older, more spacious days large numbers of native families found homes on European-owned farms as share-paying squatters. The 1913 Land Act made the shares system illegal, decreeing that natives should hold farm land only if they gave ninety days of "labor service." In Natal since 1913 there has also been a notable development of European agriculture, with less room for squatter families of any kind, and increased pressure on those remaining as labor tenants. Evictions became common; those evicted, and others, removed to the "Reserves," which in turn have become uncomfortably crowded—the result being a heavy drift, both from farms and from the increasingly crowded "Reserves," to the towns. The Natal natives, being proud but not very advanced or enlightened Zulus, with a common language and a strong Zulu tribal tradition, are likely to stand together in a common emergency better than the very mixed native community, say, of the Rand. The Zulus, moreover, have never taken to mine labor, but habitually prefer to take their chance of urban occupations in general service as store boys or as dock laborers. In spite, therefore, of the shortage of labor in the mines and elsewhere, urban wages in Natal have been even more than usually stagnant—by some reliable accounts showing little or no rise on pre-war standards. Meantime evictions from farms have continued, economic pressure generally has been intensified, and even rural natives have flocked to join the rather bellicose but perhaps inevitably ill-organized and not very effective trade union, the Industrial and Commercial Workers' Union, or the I.C.U.

Now to the small white community of Natal the Zulu War of 1879 is still a very live memory; quiet and peaceable citizens live in real dread of fire and murder on lonely farm homesteads. White Natal, moreover, is politically conservative, and in the worst sense "imperialistic"—readily entertaining a Times or even a Morning Post horror of the world-wide machinations of bolshevism, red, white, and black. For their own part these nervous Natalians have failed on the whole to meet even the urban problem of providing satisfactory living conditions for their hosts of town laborers; and native discontent, and for a time the I.C.U., have grown apace. In defiance of all evidence the I.C.U. is held to stand for sheer bolshevism, the precursor of something like a general Zulu rising. Twice at least I.C.U. offices in remote country dorps have been sacked by a European mob (without the white culprits being brought to book); and in June last a native boycott of municipal beer-shops in Durban led to riots in which (by the finding of a judicial inquiry) the high-handed intervention of white civilians was in large measure responsible for serious loss of life.

Since June nothing at all has been done to allay native discontent, and the well-sustained boycott of the municipal beer-shops has served to keep excitement alive. Meantime, by reason of poverty, of clumsy and defective administration, and to some extent perhaps by native design, collection of the relatively very heavy poll-tax had fallen into arrears. Periodical raids by the local police were none too effective, and, by the official account, on one occasion the natives counter-attacked and released forty of a band of some 150 arrested defaulters. This much, therefore, may be said for Mr. Pirow's exploit, that in face of native discontent the all too normal police method of tax-collecting could not continue unless backed by an overwhelming show of force.

Some time ago, accordingly, while the minister responsible for Native Affairs went off as if unconcerned to his peaceful farm, his colleague of Justice, having first gazetted a stringent Riotous Assemblies bill for the compassing of future "agitators," collected a powerful force of police, himself took aeroplane to the scene of operations, and about three o'clock one morning stood by while the minions of the law routed natives from their beds, exacted salaams of respect, demanded tax receipts, collected a "disappointingly" small number of "lethal weapons" (evidence of "Red" plots), and effected the arrest (not necessarily the conviction) of a few hundred of the 5,000 natives thus "rounded up." About six, as a parting shot, and as an "experiment," the gas squadron (themselves fully armed with gas-masks) dropped among the unoffending spectators thus rudely wakened from their beds apparently as many as three tear-gas bombs—"specially provided," says Mr. Pirow's official statement (to a Nationalist Party meeting), "for it is as harmless as it is effective, and will no doubt be extensively used in future native disturbances." Mr. Pirow himself was soon satisfied with the "complete success" of his demonstration and flew back to Pretoria, followed a few days later by his special police force, which had in the meantime similarly combed and scoured all the rest of Durban and its neighborhood. A few days later again it was announced (as it might well have been many months earlier) that the statutory Native Affairs Commission was being ordered to Durban to investigate and report on native grievances—the commission being a body of three with unlimited "powers" of advising the government, but no assurance of its advice being taken, or even made known for the education of the public.

So the white man's power has been vindicated and a wholesome lesson of respect for the "law" inculcated—by methods of highly dubious legality. Mr. Pirow's is unmistakably the voice of the Back Veld to which the government made its electoral appeal; a young and inexperienced minister, who never in his life has had dealings with any but his own native servants, is as confident as those he represents of his ability to govern the great native peoples of South Africa, as he would his own farm or kitchen, by sheer "benevolent" despotism. Natal is little if any better than Mr. Pirow and the Back Veld; what had a little more excuse in the primitive days of the Zulu War, enforced "respect" and unbending despotism, must alone prevent a recurrence of the events of far-away 1879 in the industrial conditions of 1929.

If a more liberal and enlightened alternative government were in sight our plight were less desperate. But even while Mr. Pirow gallivanted in Durban, General Smuts, our one internationally minded statesman and intellect, was shocking even staunch admirers by his deliverances on African policy at the Sheldonian Theater in Oxford. South Africans perhaps get their share of outside criticism and are always hotly resentful of such partial and ill-informed opinions. An outstanding South African representative like General Smuts might have been expected to be careful to give the whole truth. At Oxford, on the contrary, he was inaccurate in his history—very politely chiding the missionaries and philanthropists for their past failures, when the truth is that South Africans themselves forcibly prevented the carrying out of a "humanitarian" policy which might have saved them from the embarrassments of a native land problem, whose existence General Smuts himself faintly admitted. He was still more inaccurate in his description of present-day conditions. He painted an almost wholly fanciful picture of a native population—really barely half the total—comfortably placed in large "Reserves," sending their male folk out to work (he did not say the conditions are so severe that 50 per cent and more of the adults are perforce absent at any one time, though the Mandates Commission suggests 5 per cent as a maximum compatible with social stability); what time "the children attend the village school" and the "women keep the home fires burning"!

General Smuts did indeed recognize the existence of another class, not quite so small as he and others commonly imagine, of completely detribalized, urbanized, and even educated natives who do not fit into this picture. In spite of them he plumped for a visionary scheme of "segregation," manifestly inclining to the now much-favored plan of separate and "communal" representation of natives, if they are to have any voice at all in the sovereign Parliament. But the Union of South Africa today is the monumental warning of the dangers of just such a class and "communal" representative system. For such purely native areas as remain, the plan may yet be tried; but in fact nearly half of our natives live and work and have their being in immediate dependence on farmers or other white employers, with interests inseparably bound up with those of the European community. The sponsors of a communal franchise for natives make it abundantly clear that the representatives of natives shall be only a handful, thus threatening to perpetuate and intensify the present injustices which arise of necessity from the dependence of any conceivable South African government on what except for a few Cape seats is an exclusively white electorate.

This white electorate is our real problem, since for political ends it is even encouraged in its prejudice of thinking of the natives as a "menace," not as an essential part of a greater whole. Nervous South Africans are as much to be pitied as blamed. Poor whites fear native economic competition and, as in Natal, memories of native wars are still so vivid as to confirm Europeans in Mr. Pirow's misplaced confidence in a "prestige" resting wholly on force. If the country is to be saved from itself it must have a sharp lesson—perhaps even now, in pain and travail, it is laboring under the birth of a new white mentality. Mr. Pirow has had a poor press, and General Smuts has not wanted critics. European concern matches native resentment and discontent, and the state of tension revealed in the daily papers cannot safely continue. The handful of more enlightened natives, acknowledged by General Smuts, are evidence that, in a community avowedly democratic, native policy cannot forever be a matter of dictation to the servants' hall. Hard as the lesson is to learn, the domination of Europeans must give way to the securer bonds of conciliation and consent.

Contributors to This Issue

GARDNER JACKSON is a well-known Boston newspaper man.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

HAROLD KELLOCK was one of the favorite students of Professor Woodberry.

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY is the dramatic critic of the New Leader.

HENRY HAZLITT is literary editor of The Nation.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is dramatic editor of The Nation.

CLAUDE G. BOWERS, of the editorial staff of the New York Evening World, is author of "The Tragic Era."

HERBERT ASBURY is author of "Carry Nation."

WALTER GUTMAN is at work on a book of modern art.

JAMES B. WHARTON is the author of "Squad."

EDA LOU WALTON is assistant professor of English at New York University.

□ LUNCHEON □

SIXTH SATURDAY LUNCHEON
of the New York Chapter
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
at the HOTEL WOODSTOCK
12:45 P. M., Saturday, January 25, 1930

THE PEOPLE'S COURTS—HOW CAN JUSTICE BE ASSURED?

Speakers:
MORRIS L. ERNST, Lawyer
WILLIAM C. DODGE, City Magistrate
NORMAN THOMAS, Socialist Candidate for Mayor 1929

Chairman: BENJAMIN STOLBERG
Make reservations in advance at the office of the L. I. D., 112 East 19th Street, New York City—Algonquin 5865
MEMBERS $1.00 NON-MEMBERS $1.25
Listen in on WEAF 1:45 P. M. Eastern Standard Time

HEALTH FOODS

"Eat for Health"

Health Food Store and Luncheonette
45-n East 34th St.
(Bet. Park & Madison Aves.)
Health Foods Distributors

Appetizing and Nourishing Meals
of Freshest Unprocessed Food-Stuffs
Served at our
Health Food Counter

Phones: Lexington 6926, Ashland 6366

Free Delivery Service
Ask for Catalog

Books on Health, Sex & Psychology; Health Periodicals

☐ FOR RENT ☐

FURNISHED ROOMS

Manhattan Beach Hotel

Manhattan Beach, N. Y. C.

LIVE in a modern fireproof hotel by the seashore for less than in the crowded city—$9.00 per week and up for one; $12.00 per week and up for two. All hotel services included. Tennis and handball courts. 37 minutes from Times Square (B.M.T. Brighton Beach Station). Phone Sheepshead 3000.

BEAUTIFUL room, facing ocean at 2100 Cropsey Ave., Bklyn., for almost half price; available to intelligent person (female) in return for English lessons. For further information call Rose Gostin, at 25 West 37th St., Wisconsin 0666—at home Sunday only.

IN modern elevator building, artistically furnished room; large and sunny with spacious closet; immediately adjoining modern bathroom; has private entrance from elevator; business woman preferred. Apt. 5D, 345 E. 77th St. Butterfield 7107.

STUDIO FOR RENT

STUDIO to rent on 51st St., near Fifth Ave., for daytime use only; good North window light; steam heat; rental $30 a month. Phone Volunteer 7396 evenings.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

SOME congenial young fellow will appreciate sharing my comfortable 3-room apartment; quiet, cheerful atmosphere, located Washington Heights, right off Riverside Drive; ½ hour Times Square. References necessary. Box 2278, % The Nation.

☐ RESORTS ☐

SONAQUA CLUB

Lake Mohegan, N. Y.

The Haven for Sport Lovers. Ideal for recreation and relaxation. Convenient for week-ends. Only 45 miles from New York.

Sports
Skating, Hiking,
Skiing, Tobogganing.

Special programs for Lincoln's & Washington's Birthday Weekends.

For reservations call Peekskill 1276

RUSTIC Beauty for your relaxation and recreation, convenient for week ends. 1½ hours from Grand Central. Skating, Skiing and tobogganing.

HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 858

THE LAKE VIEW

SILVER & CAMEN

Surpassing Accommodations
Atmosphere of Refinement
Excellent Cuisine

Moderate Rates

59 Madison Ave. Phone Lakewood 287
Lakewood - New Jersey

BEAUTIFUL country, hills, pinegroves, wonderful views; home-like atmosphere; finest food; skating and other sports; 1½ hours by Erie R. R. or route 17.

ZINDOREST PARK
Monroe, N. Y. Phone 122 F 3

☐ EDUCATIONAL ☐

SCHOOL

NOAH'S ARK

A year-round home and kindergarten school conducted on modern principles. 56 acres on Croton Lake. Varied activities. Children of all ages accommodated for weekends. Railroad Station: Harmon, N. Y. For information communicate with Erika Feist, R.F.D. 15, Yorktown Heights, N. Y. Telephone Yorktown 46 F-3.

LANGUAGES

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN, ENGLISH

Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 9 to 9 daily. 18th year.

FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

UNIVERSAL INSTITUTE OF
LANGUAGES ITALIAN—GERMAN FRENCH—SPANISH

Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Simplified conversational method. 18 years' experience. Also neglected English education.

1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St

RUSSIAN CLASS
at Master Hotel
310 Riverside Drive, Studio 1703
Jan. 30th (Thursday) from 6:30 to 8 P. M.
Phone Clarkson 1700, Miss Williams

POSITIONS WANTED

YOUNG woman of culture and personality, with concise and practicable knowledge of human nature, wishes part time position; literary ability, versatility, and adaptability dominating traits. Box 2286, % The Nation.

YOUNG woman wants an interesting job; has had teaching and office experience, including semi-executive work in a large law office. Address Box 2283, % The Nation.

SECRETARIAL service—typing manuscripts by dictation or copy. Serena Bari Stone, 47 West 8th St. Stuyvesant 1232.

UNIVERSITY graduate with 2 years' teaching experience, and 2 summers' work in Rhythmics at camp especially devoted to child psychology, wishes teaching position in Rythmics. Box 2284, % The Nation.

YOUNG man, keen minded, well read, graduate of professional school, wishes position with publication, to write; salary not important where there is a chance for experience and advancement; best references furnished. Box 2285, % The Nation.

RHYTHMICS councillor, progressive children's camp, in general vicinity of New York. Apt. 1, 491 3rd St., Bklyn., N. Y. South 6963.

STENOGRAPHER typist, English - German, wishes evening position, publishing house, scientist or writer preferred. Box 2287, % The Nation.

LECTURES

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

PROGRAM—Jan. 24-Feb. 1

AT COOPER UNION

8th Street and Astor Place at 8 o'clock. Admission Free.

Friday, Jan. 24—DR. EVERETT DEAN MARTIN—

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF PROGRESS

Psychological Factors in the Evolution of Religion and the Influence of Belief on Social Behavior."

ETHICS AND SOCIAL SCIENCE

Sunday, Jan. 26—Dr. Kimball Young—"The Future of War."

NATURAL SCIENCE

Tuesday, Jan. 28—Mr. William B. Curry—"The Theory of Light from Newton to Einstein."

MUHLENBERG BRANCH LIBRARY

209 West 23rd St. at 8:30 o'clock.

Monday, Jan. 27—Dr. Mark Van Doren—The Autobiography of America—"Epitaph."

Wednesday, Jan. 28—Dr. Rexford Guy Tugwell—The Industrial Discipline—"Changing Ways of Life."

Thursday, Jan. 30—Dr. E. G. Spaulding—The Development of Fundamental Ideas and Fundamental Problems in Philosophy and Science. "What Is Progress?"

Saturday, Feb. 1—Dr. Richard McKeon—The Old and the New Logic—"Ancient Logic and Scientific Ways of Thinking."

DISCUSSION

THE GROUP

A Clearing House of Opinion

Meets at Auditorium—150 West 85th St.
Tuesday, January 28th, at 8:30 P. M.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
will speak on:
RUSSIA
"Land of Unlimited Paradoxes"

Sunday afternoon at 4 P. M. (Feb. 2nd)
Informal Discussion Group

SEYMOUR A. SELIGSON
will speak on:
THEODORE DREISER
(And his "Gallery of Women")

Admission 50c Organized 1918

THE INTERNATIONAL CLUB

2 West 64th St. New York

Sunday, Jan. 26th, 4:00 P. M. Lecture by NATHANIEL PEFFER, on "CHINA AND THE WESTERN POWERS." (China's Fight for Equality.") TEA. Admission to non-members 50 cents.

Saturday, Feb. 1st, 9:00 P. M. MID-WINTER DANCE and ENTERTAINMENT will be held in The Community Centre, 270 West 89th St., New York. Subscription: In advance $1.00. At door $1.25.

Please Write For Our Complete Program.

A CLEARING HOUSE FOR THE UNUSUAL

The Nation Reader looks through these columns each week for information on the unusual

If you have the unusual to offer—
write us for our rates

THE NATION 20 Vesey Street

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1930 No. 3370

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 139

EDITORIALS:

Economics King at Washington 142
Liquidating the War 143
What Is Man? 143
Einstein on Peace 144
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 145
NAVAL POLITICS AT LONDON. By Norman Angell 146
THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE CENSOR: I. THE MACHINERY OF SUPPRESSION. By Henry Raymond Mussey 147
"CASH AND CARRY" LIFE INSURANCE. By Edwin S. Smith 149
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 151
CORRESPONDENCE 151
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 152

BOOKS, FILMS, DRAMA:

Fulfilment. By Corinna Reiman Marsh 153
The Pioneer Soul. By Henry Hazlitt 153
A Happy Scholar. By Lorine Pruette 153
Whither England and America? By William MacDonald 154
The Confederate President. By J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton 154
Russia Interpreted. By Joshua Kunitz 156
The Great Dissenter. By William Seagle 157
Books in Brief 158
Films: Screen Musical Comedy. By Alexander Bakshy 158
Drama: Direct from Moscow. By Joseph Wood Krutch 160

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Fascist Finance. By Francesco Nitti 162

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor
HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

IF THE NAVAL CONFERENCE in London has gone to work slowly and quietly we see no reason for discouragement therein. Indeed, we count it as a good omen that there has been a great drop in the number of columns of forecasting, gossip, rumor, wild supposition, and anonymous assertion which came over the cables during the first days of the meeting. Our American correspondents over there are reported to be amazed that the conference quickly disappeared from the first pages of the British dailies. The latter are more accustomed than we to the slow give and take of international gatherings. Meanwhile, Ramsay MacDonald has given further proof of England's sincerity by ordering the complete abandonment of the two cruisers the Admiralty had under way, on which he temporarily stopped work last summer. We, on the other hand, despite Mr. Hoover's assertion to the contrary, are continuing to build the cruisers we had laid down. Furthermore, in London the French and Italians have locked horns on the question of parity, and the Americans appear to have won agreement to their demand that cruisers and smaller craft be discussed before the battleship is considered. If this delay is trying to the American public let it utilize the time to send by letter and by telegram to the White House and to London its insistence that something worth while be accomplished.

LOUD IS THE WAILING in automobile circles because the proposed tariff against American motor cars, which, if adopted, will practically exclude our motor products from the market, has reached the French Parliament. The only ray of comfort is that the Temps, the semi-official organ of the government, has come out against the plan on the ground that Tardieu does not care to engage in a tariff row with the United States just now. Whether this bill is in the nature of a bargaining move or not, there is no question of the danger of a pan-European combination against us comprising Germany, France, Italy, Austria, Belgium, and Czecho-Slovakia. The plan is to fix a quota of American cars for each country beyond which none may be imported. As for a higher tariff, Dr. Allmers, head of the German industry, is not in favor of it, because, he says, "we do not want increased prices, we only desire a larger share of the German market." He declares that there are today only seventeen German automobile factories compared with fifty-nine before the war, while the motor-truck manufacturers have dwindled from thirty-nine to ten. If this six-nation combination becomes a reality it will have its political effect in England, where Mr. Snowden faces the united fire of the British manufacturers because he threatens to remove the existing protection against foreign cars.

ON THIS SIDE OF THE OCEAN the Senate continues slowly to mangle what is left of the House bill. It defeated the proposal to levy a duty on hides which Senator Hawes declared would add $100,000,000 to the cost of living of the American people. The National Shoe Retailers Association demands free raw materials and admits that, if the tariff on hides should stay on, it will increase the cost of shoes to the public and to the retailers. No vote has so clearly brought out the clash of interests between West and East as this one which leaves the West without a duty on hides and the East without its desired tariff on boots and shoes. Once more the line-up was wholly non-partisan. Senator Walsh, of Massachusetts, Democrat, who frequently makes low-tariff speeches, did his best to convince the Senate that putting boots and shoes and hides on the free list would ruin these two big industries. If our information is correct, it is not so much foreign competition which has injured the industry but intersectional rivalry within the United States. By contrast Senator Hawes, Republican, of Missouri, declared emphatically that Missouri produces more boots and shoes than any other State and that it is unequivocally for keeping them on the free list. As for the Progressives, even Senator Norris voted for the duty on hides, as did all the others of this group except Senators Blaine and La Follette. Finally, on January 27, the Senate upheld the duties on rayon.

EXTREME BRUTALITY and lawlessness have again blackened the disgraceful record of the New York police. The occasion this time was a meeting which some two hundred Communists undertook to hold in front of the City Hall on Saturday, January 25, in protest against the shooting of a Communist picket by the police on January 17. As usual, the promoters of the meeting ignored the legal requirement of a police permit, and the hour chosen, just before one o'clock, coincided with the rush-hour exit of thousands of employees from nearby offices and shops. A mere handful of police, acting without violence, would almost certainly have sufficed to prevent the meeting and keep the crowd moving. Instead, a hundred patrolmen and twenty-five mounted policemen charged the crowd, clubbing, striking with their fists, and riding down men and women indiscriminately and driving them to refuge in buildings and the elevated-railway station. A reporter of the New York World was clubbed notwithstanding the display of his identification card, and Robert Minor, editor of the Communist Daily Worker, was painfully injured. The responsibility for this outrage rests first upon the police; next upon Grover Whalen, Police Commissioner, under whose sole authority the police of the city act; and next upon Mayor Walker, who appointed Whalen and keeps him in office.

AFTER THE CABINET MEETING on January 21 President Hoover announced, on the basis of information furnished him by the Department of Labor, that there had been a distinct increase of employment all over the country during the ten days just past. According to an Associated Press dispatch, Secretary Davis said that January 1 actually marked the turn, but that it was not entirely evident until January 6, when reports showed a steady gain. On the day following President Hoover's announcement Frances Perkins, State Industrial Commissioner for New York, declared that figures at her disposal showed a steady decline in employment in that State since October. In a careful factual statement, quoting figures from more than 50 out of the 1,700 concerns regularly reporting, Miss Perkins pointed out that seven out of eleven groups of industries showed an actual decline in employment during the first fifteen days of January, while four showed a slight increase. By contrast with her information, based on actual statistical reports, she indicated that the Washington outgiving, purporting to show conditions during the preceding ten days, could not possibly have any adequate statistical basis. On the next day Secretary of Labor Davis, apparently without alleging a single definite fact in support of his previous statement, characterized as "unfortunate" any attempt to make "politics out of the situation." We agree with the secretary, but we do not think that Miss Perkins is the guilty party.

THE EXTRAORDINARY FINANCIAL plight of Chicago has attracted nation-wide attention during the past week. With policemen, firemen, teachers, hospital nurses, and court and other employees all unpaid to the extent of more than $11,000,000, with no money to pay mothers' pensions or to buy coal for the schools and the county poor-farm, with $21,000,000 of unsecured debts, half of it representing unpaid bills and the other half improperly diverted trust and other surplus funds, with a floating debt of $270,000,000 secured by short-term notes, in addition to $6,000,000 in outstanding judgments, and with the bankers finally refusing to buy any more tax-anticipation warrants, the city is in a state of virtual bankruptcy, and a citizens' committee which has finally come forward under the leadership of Silas Strawn with the proposal of a further loan of $20,000,000 has suggested conditions that resemble those of a receivership. Chicago and Cook County have a complicated system of government and taxation, with two dozen different bodies making separate appropriations and tax levies. The three heaviest spenders—the city, the county, and the school board—have for years spent their taxes a year before collecting them, being allowed under the Illinois law to borrow on tax-anticipation warrants up to 75 per cent of the tax levies. But beside that, the city has borrowed from its trust and surplus funds for the other 25 per cent, the county has piled up its outstanding bills till they now come to $7,000,000, and the school board has managed to spend $24,000,000 more than it took in between 1922 and 1928. Three-quarters of all taxes come from real estate, and the State Tax Commission in 1928 ordered a reassessment in Cook County. The work is still in progress, with tentative figures showing a reduction of $400,000,000 in Chicago and an increase of $300,000,000 in the "country towns" of the county. The latter, needless to say, are fighting the city vigorously. Meanwhile, Chicago has collected no real-estate taxes since 1928. Mayor Thompson in the crisis plays for political position, and Alderman Nelson raises a grave question whether acceptance of the Strawn committee's terms might not weaken, if it did not destroy, the confidence of the public in their elected officials. We do not see how anything of that sort could happen in Chicago.

FIVE MEN ARE TO GO ON TRIAL at Charlotte, North Carolina, on February 24 for the killing of Mrs. Ella May Wiggins, textile striker who was shot during the disturbances attendant on the Gastonia strike last fall. The Nation, in its issue of January 8, stated erroneously that a trial for the murder of Mrs. Wiggins had already been held. The charge is second-degree murder, and Solicitor John G. Carpenter of Gaston County, who acted as prosecuting attorney during the trial of seven textile organizers convicted of the murder of Police Chief Aderholt, will prosecute this case also. Mr. Carpenter was outraged when petitions for a change of venue from Gastonia to Charlotte were received favorably by Judge Clement in the Gaston County Superior Court; he could not conceive the possibility of a fair trial not being held in Gastonia. Fortunately his associate in the trial, Attorney General Brummitt—sent by Governor Gardner to assist him—thought otherwise. Threats of violence and intimidation directed at mill workers, printed in the Gastonia Gazette the day before Mrs. Wiggins was killed, were adduced with other testimony to show that a change of venue was necessary. Mr. Carpenter, who displayed the utmost zeal in the trial of the seven mill workers, will have an opportunity to show himself equally zealous in the cause of justice when the new trial commences at Charlotte. Governor Gardner has made it clear that he wishes justice to be done. And there are evidences that North Carolina is wincing under the charges of unfairness in the mill trials leveled at it by the rest of the country.

MISSIONARIES IN CHINA are reported to have been greatly disturbed by the statement of Foreign Minister Henderson in the House of Commons on January 22 that "the special treaty privileges possessed by British missionaries have been or are in the course of being surrendered." As a matter of fact there is nothing new in the statement except a report of progress. The Chamberlain memorandum of December 18, 1926, laying down certain principles regarding the policy of foreign Powers in China to which Great Britain itself was prepared to adhere, clearly foreshadowed the relinquishment of all special legal privileges for foreigners and the recognition of the right of China to complete self-government. Mr. Henderson's statement, which was made in reply to a question, was merely an enumeration of the steps that have been taken in pursuance of a further offer of concessions made by the British Government in a memorandum of January 27-28, 1927. The anxiety of the missionaries is based in part upon their fear that the strong anti-Christian agitation in China, joined to repeated depredations upon missionary property by lawless soldiers, may put an end to missionary work in the interior where the authority of the Nanking Government does not effectively extend.

THE PARAGUAY-BOLIVIA difficulty has broken out again, with each country, as before, accusing the other of invasion of its territory and insult to its sovereignty, and with Bolivia sternly announcing that while it would "never be guilty of disturbing the peace of America" it nevertheless feels "bound to take military measures" to defend its rights. Just what has happened is not clear, the authenticity of certain alleged Bolivian messages which the Paraguayan Government has published having been vigorously denied, but it seems to be agreed that there has been an armed collision in the disputed Chaco Boreal region and that one soldier on each side has been killed. The interesting thing about the row is that the protests and appeals of Paraguay and the denials and counter-charges of Bolivia have been addressed not to their great and good friend at Washington, high priest of pan-American comity and protector of everything south of the Rio Grande, but to the League of Nations; and that the officials of the League, apparently with no fear of Washington before their eyes, are actually exerting themselves in an effort to induce Bolivia and Paraguay to keep the peace. Shades of Monroe!

IF ANYONE UNACQUAINTED with the autograph market were asked to guess which of the later Presidents of the United States stood highest in value he would surely not guess the last one chosen from Ohio. Yet it is a fact that a holograph letter of President Harding recently brought the amazing price of $1,100. The explanation is that, in this day of letters dictated to a stenographer and transcribed on the typewriter, Harding wrote few letters in his own hand. Cynics insist also that as many as possible of his letters were called in and destroyed after the oil scandals began to become public. Whether this is gossip or founded on fact, the truth is that because of the rarity of his letters Harding bids fair in the course of years to pass even George Washington as a prize for autograph hunters. A fine Washington letter of real historic value can be purchased for $2,500; his mere signature to a simple Revolutionary document brings $225. Lincolniana stand very high, while the demand for Benjamin Franklin items has also run up the prices. Yet one still hears of people destroying letters of great value; the latest case is of a Maine woman who cut Lincoln's signature from a dozen unpublished letters of his and threw the letters away!

IT IS WITH GREAT REGRET that The Nation chronicles the retirement from the management of the Columbus, Georgia, Enquirer-Sun of Julian and Julia Harris after ten years at the helm of that newspaper. They made a great paper, for they gave it courage, integrity, and conscience. They knew no class lines and yielded to no prejudices. Their minds were attuned to the needs of a new world and they had a vision which ranged far beyond the shores of their own country. In short, they were devoted patriots in the best sense. Unfortunately, they were not too good to be true but too good to last, and their paper has gone into other hands. Rightly the Pulitzer prize was awarded to their daily in 1925 for most distinguished civic service "in its brave, energetic fight against the Ku Klux Klan, against the enactment of a law banning the teaching of evolution, against dishonest and incompetent public officials, and for justice to the Negro and against lynching." They made great personal and financial sacrifices, but they are responsible for a glorious episode in the history of the modern press of America.

"JOURNEY'S END," the powerful war play that has been playing more than a year to crowded houses in New York, was presented by the New York company the other day for the cadets at West Point. It is reported that the performers scored the hit of their careers; nowhere have they heard such whole-hearted applause as greeted them in the United States Military Academy. And though at first one is encouraged by the spectacle of young men about to be soldiers applauding the picture of the ugliness and futility of modern warfare, one pauses for a second thought and wonders if that was what they really were applauding after all. Those who lived through the last war saw in Mr. Sherriff's play meaningless sacrifice, unrewarded heroism, futile courage under fire. Men played the game, decently, uncomplainingly, quietly, although they did not know what it was all about. But these youngsters at West Point, to whom the war which ended twelve years ago is a faint, boyish memory, watched Captain Stanhope go out from his dugout into the sure death that was splintering around his head and thought—what? Did they, by any chance, think, as young soldiers from time immemorial have thought, how glorious, how sweet it is to die thus strongly and bravely? We who know better say that it is neither glorious nor sweet. But they might make the same answer that a young man of twenty-one made not long ago to one of thirty-five: "It's all very well for you to talk," he said. "You've had your war. And we'll have ours, too. See if we don't." Those who love peace must find an answer to this before they achieve their desire.

WE DEEPLY REGRET that an error was made in our issue of last week in announcing in an editorial, The New Magazines, that the Symposium had been taken over by the Hound & Horn. This was not true; the Symposium will continue to be published as a separate quarterly under its present title. The Nation's statement was based on an advertisement which appeared in several periodicals announcing that the editorial and business affairs of the Symposium had been merged with those of the Hound & Horn. This advertisement, we now learn, was inserted when negotiations for such a merger were in progress.

Economics King in Washington

IF anybody doubts the extent to which economic interests have come to control our political life let him look to Washington. Wherever his glance may fall he will behold economic groups struggling to obtain what they consider fair treatment at the hands of the national legislature, or brazenly seeking to control our public life. Purely political issues have largely disappeared; the difference between the two parties is simply the measure of their varying reactions to agricultural or industrial proposals. There is nowhere a clear-cut cleavage on principles between them, least of all now on the tariff, as to which it is merely a question whether the minority will or will not favor an arbitrarily fixed rate lower than the one proposed by the majority. Opposition has become a matter of degree.

Take the numerous investigations now going on. The outsider at a distance rages at them, especially if he is a business man. He denounces the Senate and the Trade Commission as busybodies meddling in concerns other than their own. "If Congress would only tend to its business and let us alone," he says, "it would get its work done and business would be far better off." What he does not realize is that the Senate investigations are a legitimate and necessary part of its job; that by its inquiries it is fulfilling a function for which we should have to create some other agency if the Senate were not there to play the role of general inquisitor. That Washington seethes with business investigations is not the fault of the Senate; the responsibility rests largely with the business men and organizations which create situations that compel investigation. It was not the Senate that was responsible for the oil-field scandals. The Senators who carried on that inquiry and those who are giving hours and hours to a review of the activities of Big Business in various directions would gladly, we believe, be spared this duty so that they could give more time to their regular law-making functions.

For example, there is the inquiry into the propaganda methods of the electric-light companies and other public utilities. This was no gratuitous fishing excursion. The facts laid before the Senate were such as to compel it to move. On the floor of that body the fight was not as to whether there should or should not be an inquiry, for every Senator voted for it; the only difference was that the Progressives wanted the Senate itself to undertake it, and the majority put it into the hands of the Federal Trade Commission, many of them hoping, it must be admitted, that the thing would be buried there. The facts brought out by the commission related to the acts of the public utilities; it is the character of these facts, not the inquiry into them, which has scandalized the public. The inquiry into the radio situation was in its inception no mere hunting around for some new field for governmental snooping. From the beginning, government control of the radio has been taken for granted as absolutely necessary. What has given particular prominence to the recent testimony has been not merely the question as to how the great broadcasting companies were treating the various currents of opinion in the United States, and how impartially they were administering the great trusts committed to their hands, but whether the United States should or should not deliberately create an industrial monopoly in the field of air and land and under-water telegraphy. That issue was raised by Big Business itself. It cannot complain hereafter if the Senate deals often and loudly with this question.

Again, for the inquiry into the lobby in Washington Big Business has only itself to thank. When it hires a man like Shearer and the various public-relations counsels who have appeared on the witness stand for preposterous financial rewards, it must pay the full price. Nor is it possible to offset this as the public-utilities companies have tried to do by showing how much their business is menaced by the activities of various civic bodies intent either on public ownership or a far more rigid control of public-service corporations. The one represents an open and above-board association of public-spirited persons who have nothing personally to gain by their propaganda; the other represents too often an underhand and corrupting effort to impose the will of a small group upon the country. But the point we wish to stress is the inevitability with which questions like these drift into the arena at Washington. It is impossible to assert now that Congress has no right to spend its time on purely business affairs. Let an industry get into trouble, a canal go bankrupt, like the Cape Cod Canal, or weak railroads begin to lose ground, and the shoe is on the other foot. Then it is Big Business itself which declares that it is the primary function of Congress to take an interest in the particular industry affected and to safeguard it from disaster.

Even more striking is the profound interest awakened in Washington itself by the sparring between Congress and industry. Many there are interested in the naval conference at London, but what the more thoughtful legislators and press commentators upon Washington events are most excited about is the power fight. It is here that the great battle is to be waged; it is on this issue that men will be finally tried out as to whether they are for the old order of private privilege and private exploitation of great natural resources, or whether they wish the government to hold these resources for the people, and if necessary to operate them. The principles which will be established upon this issue will have a widespread effect upon all industry and upon the government's relation to it, and today the belief prevails that probing into the power question has not yet developed the most sensational facts. But whether this is so or not, there are other great questions awaiting the action of Congress. The whole problem of railroad consolidation comes next. Who shall profit by it? The railroads that save millions through consolidation, or the public, particularly the farmers, that so urgently needs lower rates? We have no doubt that if all government control could be removed the railroads themselves would unify the entire system in an extremely short space of time, just as it is obvious that if Congress does not prevent there will soon be one supreme power company in the United States. Economics is king in Washington. Who shall rule the king?

Liquidating the War

PRECISELY what the members of the reparations conference at The Hague agreed to when, on January 20, they signed the protocol approving the Young Plan cannot be fully known until the texts of the twenty-odd documents are published. A curious indefiniteness has hung over the reported proceedings of the conference from the first. Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, president of the Reichsbank, for example, stirred up a great political row in Germany by insisting that the report of the Young committee which he signed was not identical with the Young Plan which Germany was asked to accept, and even threatened to debar the Reichsbank from subscribing to the capital stock of the Bank for International Settlements; but no American correspondent, as far as we have noticed, took the trouble to point out wherein, if at all, his contention was well founded. More curious still, the bank plan, the most novel feature of the Young scheme and a matter of the greatest international importance, has hardly figured in the dispatches to the American press at all.

The main outlines of the great settlement, on the other hand, are clear. Two important modifications have been made in the reparations part of the Young proposals. The schedules of German annuities have been altered by deducting the amounts which Germany will pay directly to the United States under the treaty recently concluded, and sanctions may be imposed upon Germany for default in its payments if the World Court finds that the default has been intentional. Preliminary arrangements are also reported to have been made for the mobilization of a part of the annuities in a $300,000,000 loan, and for the allocation of the loan among the world's financial markets. The United States, it has been intimated, will be looked to for a subscription of about one-fourth of the amount, but the loan itself probably cannot be floated before May. The vexatious question of the non-German reparations, with Hungary stubbornly opposing the claims of the Little Entente states, has been settled in principle only, the actual working out of the details of a complicated compromise being left to a small commission sitting at Paris.

The most important administrative feature of the agreement is, of course, the approval of the Bank for International Settlements, the statute of the bank as drafted by a commission at Baden-Baden having, apparently, been accepted without material change. It will be recalled that the bank, as originally planned by the Young committee, was to enjoy, in addition to most of the usual banking privileges, vast powers of participation in trade and industrial development wherever the directors chose to operate. The volume of adverse criticism which this proposal of a gigantic superbank evoked evidently impressed the Baden-Baden commission, for in drafting the statute they threw all these general provisions overboard and confined the bank strictly to the banking field as an agency for handling reparation payments. The bank, which is to be located at Basle, will have a capital of 500,000,000 Swiss francs (about $96,500,000), one-fourth of which must be paid in; it will be entitled to a commission of one-tenth of one per cent on the payments which it handles; and it will have the use of non-interest-bearing deposits of 125,000,000 marks contributed one-half by Germany and one-half by Germany's creditors. A writer in the Frankfurter Zeitung estimates that the bank should be able to earn 14 per cent on its paid-in capital, but a substantial part of its net profits will eventually go to reduce the amount of the German annuities.

Legally, what was done at The Hague does not put the new scheme fully into effect; first, because the protocol must be ratified by the various governments concerned and, second, because the bank cannot be organized until Switzerland has removed a constitutional obstacle to the grant of a charter for more than fifteen years. The German payments, however, will now be made under the new schedules. To the extent that the Hague settlement puts an end to a controversy which has embittered European politics for ten years, reduces Germany's burden, provides for the commercialization of the German annuities and their administration through a specially organized bank, and removes all justification for the further maintenance of French troops in Germany, there will be profound satisfaction over what has been achieved. The uncertain element in the transaction is the bank, an institution managed by directors most of whom will be chosen with an eye to politics, subject to political pressure if its course is not satisfactory either to Germany or to any of the creditor governments, and so contrived, through its provision for American representation in its directorate, as to keep up, indirectly at least, America's connection with a reparations issue with which the American Government has repeatedly declared it would have nothing to do.

What is Man?

THE appearance of Volume I of the "Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences" (The Macmillan Company, $7.50) is another milestone marking the progress of the sciences that seek an understanding of man, and another achievement of American scholarship. The editor-in-chief, Professor Edwin R. A. Seligman, McVickar Professor of Political Economy at Columbia University, emphasizes in the Preface the international character of the undertaking, and three-eighths of the 163 contributors to this first volume are foreign scholars. Yet the impression remains of a prevailingly American work, as was inevitable in view of the genesis and execution of the undertaking, and the mark of the Columbia group among the Americans is unmistakable.

The project of such an encyclopedia was launched in 1923 after a good deal of previous discussion of the general idea, and the undertaking was definitely organized in the spring of 1927 under the sponsorship of the American Anthropological Association, the American Association of Social Workers, the American Economic Association, the American Historical Association, the American Political Science Association, the American Psychological Association, the American Sociological Society, the American Statistical Association, the Association of American Law Schools, and the National Education Association. The work has been swiftly executed, and it is planned to bring out the fifteen volumes constituting the entire monumental undertaking in regular sequence at the rate of three volumes a year. We have learned to apply the methods of mass production not only to steel but to scholarship. The volume now in hand covers the topics (alphabetically arranged) from Aaronson to Allegiance.

Professor Seligman in the Introduction points out that the social sciences have reached the point where their further development demands a clear recognition of their interrelations. Man after all is one being, not many; his economic activity, for example, is not to be wholly understood aside from a knowledge of his psychological reactions, his political organization, his religious and other institutions, his habits, customs, manners, and morals. There may be reasonable doubt whether there can be such a thing as a genuine social science, but if there is to be such it must certainly be a science of man and not a series of disjointed sciences about man. Half the volume in hand, accordingly, is taken up with a useful survey, written by a dozen scholars, of the development of social institutions and thought in the Western world from the days of ancient Greece to the present, and an account, of more doubtful utility, of the growth of the social sciences as disciplines. It seems strange that in an undertaking of this scope there should be no apparent intention of considering the social thought of that half of the human race that lives east of Suez. After all, every passing day makes it clearer that the West must do its part in adjusting itself to the thought of India and China, instead of expecting the adjustment to be all in the other direction.

The final test of a work of this kind must be its authoritativeness and usefulness, and not simply its general ideas. It is a fair question whether the completely satisfactory execution of a task of such magnitude would not really require the full-time cooperation over a period of years of a considerable group of ripe scholars, rather than the handling of the actual editorial work, in large part, by younger investigators, however competent; yet the names of the editor-in-chief and the associate editor, Alvin Johnson, are a guaranty of the scholarly competence of the work, and the remarkable list of editorial consultants and the names of the contributors to this volume are evidence of a wide catholicity in the choice of collaborators. Probably no student would be wholly satisfied with every item in the book lists that accompany all the articles, but the bibliographical work appears to be generally good. The volume in hand contains many excellent articles by men of the first rank in their respective fields, and such articles cover an extraordinarily wide range of topics. What older encyclopedia, for example, would have contained a discussion like that on academic freedom by Arthur O. Lovejoy? The treatment of advertising, we think, contains business-school ballyhoo as well as social science. Probably no two students would agree on just who was to be included in the biographies that are to occupy a fifth of the entire space, but certainly no one conversant with the difficulties of encyclopedia-making will question lightly the judgment of conscientious editors either in choice of topics, in space assignment, or in the selection of writers. A complete appraisal must await the appearance of future volumes, but it is not too early to praise the boldness of the project, the breadth of the conception of social science that it embodies, and the speed and efficiency with which the work has been executed.

Einstein on Peace

PROFESSOR ALBERT EINSTEIN, who promulgated a theory that turned the world of science upside down, uttered by means of a cable dispatch to the New York Times the other day a theory of practical politics equally revolutionary and world-shaking. Professor Einstein has expressed the essence of the almost limitless discussions on disarmament and limitation of armaments more cogently than many naval conferences could do—or have done. We quote his remarks in full:

> It has now become a general recognized axiom that the giant armaments of all nations are proving highly injurious to them collectively.
>
> I am even inclined to go a step further by the assertion that, under present-day conditions, any one state would incur no appreciable risk by undertaking to disarm—wholly regardless of the attitude of the other states. If such were not the case it would be quite evident that the situation of such states as are unarmed or only partially equipped for defense would be extremely difficult, dangerous, and disadvantageous—a condition which is refuted by the facts.
>
> I am convinced that demonstrative references to armaments are but a weapon in the hands of the factors interested in their production or in the maintenance and development of a military system for financial or political-egotistic reasons.
>
> I am firmly of the opinion that the educational effect of a first and genuine achievement in the realm of disarmament would prove highly efficacious, because the succeeding second and third steps would then be immeasurably simpler than the initial one; this for the obvious reason that the first results of an understanding would considerably weaken the familiar argument for national security with which parliamentarians of all countries now permit themselves to be intimidated.
>
> Armaments can never be viewed as an economic asset to a state. They must ever remain the unproductive exploitation of men and material and an encroachment on the economic reserves of a state through the temporary conscription of men in the active periods of their lives—not to mention the moral impairment resulting from a preoccupation with the profession of war and the moral processes of preparing a nation for it.

This statement makes one or two points worth repeating. First, that the makers of munitions and naval armament and the military and naval bodies which use them are primarily interested in their perpetuation. We may stop and ask ourselves if we are willing to make war for the double purpose of giving a general or an admiral a job and bestowing largess upon the owner of a munitions plant. Put in those simple terms, of course, the answer is a flat negative. The second point of importance in Professor Einstein's statement is that in all probability nothing in the world would happen to a country which announced that, irrespective of similar action in other countries, it proposed to scrap its armaments. We are willing to predict that any such epoch-making move on the part of a great nation would result in similar moves by other great nations. The way to disarm—we have said it times without number—is to disarm. It is refreshing to hear the world's most famous scientist say the same thing.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

NO one outside the ranks gets any thanks for defending Communists. Roger Baldwin, who would have stayed the clubs of the police, was to the little reds a "sanctimonious petty-bourgeois liberal." And they have been equally severe and silly in their criticism of Norman Thomas and of other Socialist leaders who were fighting for human rights at a time when most of the Communist crowd were still too young to wash behind the ears unaided. All this is irritating, and yet none but police would seriously contend that irritation was a proper justification for wholesale clubbing. The validity of Communist philosophy and practice is wholly irrelevant in the matter of the City Hall riot. Life can go on sweetly enough even if the left wing on occasion stoops to folly, but we of the City of New York are in a bad way if our police prove craven brutes disposed to go into a clubbing panic on the slightest provocation.

The issue lies not between the extreme radicals and the uniformed force. This is a matter touching the entire citizenry. Communists may rest assured that I have no intention of trying to make them my special wards. It is not sentiment so much as self-interest which impels me to suggest that there should be loud and insistent popular clamor for the immediate resignation of Grover Whalen. It is rather fortunate that one of the victims of the police delirium turned out to be a respectable business man having no connection whatsoever with the Communist Party. Solid and conservative citizens have been disposed in the past to take police outrages too calmly. If the victims were radicals or gangsters or suspected criminals many have said: "Maybe it wasn't legal, but after all they had it coming to them." It is well to bear in mind that once power gets on a rampage there is no telling just where it will stop.

If conservatives were wise they would be the most passionate defenders of civil liberties. After all, it is the standpatter who has the biggest stake in the preservation of things as they are. It really is up to him to see that matters move smoothly. For instance, the New York Times should ring each day with editorial denunciation of police and mob violence against I.W.W.'s, Communists, and the various sects which are preyed upon by the lawless elements of American communities. The Communist who is clubbed may carry round a painful injury. He may well bear the fierce personal animosity of anyone who is put upon without good reason. But there is a singing in his heart as well as his head. After all he has managed to build up a case for his cause.

The logic of the police seems even weaker than their courage. It has been the Communist custom to refer to the members of the force as "Whalen's Cossacks," and the police seem to feel that they have wiped out that stigma by clubbing women and charging crowds with men on horses. I must admit that the Communists have all the better of the argument. They have gone at least a considerable distance in proving their case as far as New York police are concerned.

And so I do not think that the fight against such outrages should be left in the hands of Socialists or even liberals. After all, the people in these groups have never contended that the United States of Mr. Hoover was practically Utopia. They have admitted that here and there change of one sort or another might be essential in the governmental structure, both federal and local. The ones to do the worrying are the leaders of the groups in power.

I do not quite believe the complaint of the left wingers that incidents such as the recent riot in City Hall Park are all a part of a capitalistic plot. It would amaze me to hear that any Rockefeller or Morgan had 'phoned to police headquarters saying, "There will be red speeches on the steps this noon. Please get rough and club every head in sight." There must be more acumen than that among the captains of industry and finance. And still I must admit that many of them do not seem quite bright. Consider, for instance, the right of free speech. Here in America the defenders of it are almost always tabulated as radicals and enemies of the existing order. The Civil Liberties Union, for instance, has often been attacked by red-baiters and been charged with receiving support from Russia. But, as a matter of fact, the extreme radical has no great interest in free speech. He is apt to class it as a luxury belonging only to the secure and sentimental. The Soviets have never scrupled to suppress the right at times when it interfered with what they felt was a vital program.

Who then should adopt the orphan? Free speech has been largely nourished in this country by the liberals. But it seems to me that the child really ought to find a good home among the conservatives. Men who sweat at night about red and Russian plots surely should have sense enough to desire the fullest possible information about the plans and theories of all who would overthrow the government. I would not walk across a wide street to hear the average run of Communist oratory. I happen to be not specially inimical to the present system though I would much enjoy putting a new girder in here and there. But if the whole thing were to be uprooted I should not suffer much in any material way. Even if confiscation of private property set in the state would take only one of my suits and leave the other. I could afford to be rather apathetic about free speech and the dangers which arise from its suppression. When my millions are made I shall feel much more urge to be up and doing in the protection of those rights assured by the Constitution. If there were in some vault a box of mine filled with gilt-edged securities I would make it my business to pay close attention to every Communist argument so that I might controvert and answer it. Far from chasing reds off the steps of City Hall I'd build them a speaker's platform and say: "Come every morning, friends, and talk your heads off. And come in numbers so that I can watch you."

Most of the agitation for an investigation of the recent police panic rests upon the advice that individual offenders be punished. Is it so soon forgotten that Grover Whalen himself proclaimed the doctrine: "There's a lot of law at the end of a nightstick"? His rash words have come home to roost. He ought to go. Conservatives really can't afford to have such an effective propagandist for communism holding high office.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Naval Politics at London

By NORMAN ANGELL

London, January 14

THE British situation on the eve of the conference is an interesting and unusual one. One might have anticipated cries from the Conservative element of the Opposition to the effect that the defenses of the country were being endangered by the Labor Government. The issue is over the question of the battleship. The public seems to have seized pretty clearly the point that if there is to be any real reduction of armaments at all as the result of this conference, of a kind, that is, which will relieve the taxpayer or achieve a general appeasement of fears, then it can only come about through the virtual abolition of the big fighting ship, either by immediate scrapping, which is rather too much to hope, or by an agreement not to replace ships over 10,000 tons when their normal term of life expires. The support for this campaign comes to an amazing degree from Conservative quarters: the London Times, the Spectator, Mr. Garvin in the Observer, and even in some degree from the Beaverbrook and Rothermere press. The very admirals themselves have in some measure joined in the campaign. Admiral Sir Charles Richmond, admittedly one of the ablest minds of the navy, has been writing a series of cogent and forceful articles, stressing the technical absurdity of these monsters; and making it perfectly clear that they are not a type of ship which has any "police" justification such as can be pleaded for the smaller type of cruiser; and that the only reason for their existence is that other nations possess them.

Thus the Government, with strong pacifist leanings, is assured beforehand of a large amount of Conservative support in a real measure of disarmament. Certainly any general opposition in public opinion could be discounted beforehand. Yet, say the critics, far from moving to the abolition of the battleship, the First Lord of the Admiralty has issued a statement to the effect that battleships will certainly be replaced, and all he will permit himself to hope is that the new type of battleships will be less expensive than the old. The Government, then, is being criticized for not giving a lead to public sentiment. It is even charged that its position is less advanced than that taken by the Conservative Opposition.*

What is the explanation of this situation, so disappointing to friends of the present Government on both sides of the Atlantic? Assuredly "there's a reason," and no criticism is valid which does not take it into account. The reasons may well include those which, for the sake of international good feeling and political propriety, a government cannot state publicly, reasons at which consequently one is obliged to guess.

First, a government would place itself in a bad bargaining position by committing itself beforehand to a step like the abolition of the battleship. It may be that the Government is holding this concession in reserve as a bargaining counter, to be used as a lever with, say, France in the matter of the submarine. The Government may desire to be in a position, that is, to say to France: "Abolish your submarines and we will abolish our battleships." If the British Government were committed beforehand to battleship abolition, it would have surrendered this bargaining power. One may question the wisdom of that line of approach at this time, but the consideration may have weight. Furthermore, to an increasing degree it is becoming recognized that the political situation will be the determining factor of any real progress which is to be made.

There is a point in the statement of the First Lord the significance of which seems to have been overlooked. Very adroitly he has considerably modified, if indeed he has not entirely abandoned, the British doctrine of "absolute requirements." All along, the British Government has taken the line that British naval needs, particularly in cruisers, are absolute, not relative to the strength of other powers; that they are dictated by such constant factors as geographical position, amount of mercantile marine, length of lines of economic communication, and the rest of it. What America or other Powers were doing was, it was argued, of little concern to Britain and did not affect the problem. Such has been the formal thesis heretofore, but Mr. Alexander, the Labor First Lord, had to explain why Britain was demanding seventy cruisers in 1927 and fifty today. The explanation is, he says, that "we have to take account of the new position which has arisen through the signature of the pact of Paris by most of the nations, including all the major naval Powers . . . and improved world-political relationships." In other words, even in cruisers the need is determined by the political situation, by what other nations are doing. And if the political consideration applies to cruisers, it may be employed, as the Times points out, more cogently still "to justify a proposal to abolish battleships."

It is to be hoped that the recognition of the plain truth that the whole problem of disarmament is in large part a political one will cause the Admiralty to play a more subordinate role than it did in 1927. In so far as the problem is political, the admiral has no authority to speak as an expert or specialist. He may speak with authority upon guns, tonnage, armor-plate. But these, after all, are subsidiary problems. What is more important is the real significance and implication of the Paris pact, the League, the Covenant, the various treaties of guaranty, the future relationships of Britain with America and France—problems of political psychology and judgment for which, plainly, admirals as admirals have no more qualification to speak than upon football or Gilbert and Sullivan operas. It is to be hoped that public opinion in Britain will seize this point because, in the past, it has sufficed for a government to explain its reactionary attitude at a conference by saying: "We were guided by expert advice and could not fly in the face of Admiralty opinion."

---

* In cable advices received subsequent to the mailing of this article Mr. Angell points out that the situation has been materially changed by the later pronouncement of Prime Minister MacDonald which indicates a greater readiness to take decided steps toward disarmament than had been suggested by recent Government outgivings.—EDITOR THE NATION.

The French memorandum, which seems to have created more uneasiness in America than in Britain, emphasizes the political side of the problem even more than the British statesmen have done so far. The French politics may be bad politics, but it is all to the good perhaps to have it brought home to us that the problem is first and foremost a political one, and that the technical question cannot be answered save on some political assumption. To answer the question, Are we adequately armed? we must know who the enemy is likely to be, who are our allies. Until we can make some assumption on that point, plainly the technician has nothing to go upon. In the absence of a definite political starting-point he is obliged to assume the political worst and to make his technical recommendations in accordance with that assumption.

The political problem at present is mainly one of Anglo-French relations. Lurking in the minds of so many of the French is the fear of Germany's ultimate challenge to the Versailles settlement. Germany grows; France does not. The present British Government has destroyed the last shreds of the entente cordiale. Does this mean, ask the French in effect, that perfidious Albion is going back on her undertaking to throw her influence against any disturbance by war of the status quo? Are such commitments as the Covenant embodies to fade away and be replaced by the more non-committal Kellogg pact? The Anglo-American rapprochement might give color to such a supposition. Thus the insistence in the French memorandum that France bases her position on the Covenant and not on the pact. It is pretty certain that the conference will be reminded again and again of this interdependence of politics and disarmament. France cannot, in so doing, be accused of inconsistency, since that is the position she has taken in every conference she has entered.

The Christian Science Censor

I. The Machinery of Suppression*

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

THE best-oiled and smoothest-running publicity (and anti-publicity) machine operated in the United States during the twentieth century has been that controlled by the Board of Directors of the Mother Church, the First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Massachusetts. It consists of a head publicity man (called the Committee on Publication) in Boston, a publicity man (likewise called the Committee on Publication) in each State, with two for California, and local publicity men (each called the Assistant Committee on Publication) in all the cities and towns where there are Christian Science churches. Each committee, be it noted, is an individual. No divided responsibility in Christian Science publicity. Back of these committees stands a little Gideon's band of about two hundred thousand loyal, enthusiastic, well-disciplined, and well-to-do Christian Scientists, on whom the committees never call in vain.

Acting through these agencies, the directors have in recent years reduced unfavorable publicity to almost nothing, at the same time that they have secured columns and pages of free space for their lectures and other means of spreading their gospel. They have excluded the advertising of rival groups of Christian Scientists from the press in some sections of the country, and have shut those rivals off from the channels of radio communication. They have prevented the publication of books and articles reflecting unfavorably on Christian Science and its Founder (to follow their own capitalization), and have caused to be withdrawn from circulation or have buried under a mountain of oblivion those whose publication they could not prevent. They have persuaded or forced educational authorities to withdraw from use in the public schools textbooks to which they objected, and by discreet representations they have even brought about changes in the books used in universities. They have driven out of public libraries or have had placed on reserve shelves inaccessible to the public books that they did not like. They have employed against publishers and bookstores that handle such books the method of persuasion, followed, if need be, by intimidation, and then local and nation-wide boycott. They have held over newspaper publishers the danger of advertising and other losses until they have reduced large sections of the press to a state of abject subjection; the Chicago Tribune, for example, did not get up its courage so far even as to publish a review of Dakin's recent life of Mrs. Eddy for months after its publication, and until the publishers' courageous fight had made it impolitic to neglect it longer. They have watched legislation in Congress and in all the States with the eyes of hawks, not only preventing the enactment of measures of health protection which they thought unfavorable to their cult, but pushing for laws that they desired, and in the State of Illinois, for example, securing the passage of the first law against slander by radio, with the avowed purpose of preventing the radio from being used to oppose Christian Science. The Christian Science Board of Directors had discovered and exploited to the full the possibilities of publicity and suppression long before such an animal as a public-relations counsel existed. The success of their publicity machine is another tribute to the genius of the extraordinary woman who planned this as well as all other features of the Christian Science organization, and whose word is still law in that church, though nearly twenty years have passed since her death, if we may be permitted to use that word in connection with her.

I have said that the Christian Scientists have the best publicity machine in the country. Particularly as an engine of suppression, there is nothing to be compared with it for effectiveness, taking everything into account. When

---

* This is the first of a series of four articles. The second article, Obnoxious Books, will appear next week.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Charles Scribner's Sons in August brought out Edwin Franden Dakin's "Mrs. Eddy. The Biography of a Virginal Mind" they ran head on into that machine, and the machine undertook to ride them down, as it had done all too often with others who had challenged it. Happily, the publishers' sturdy fight has aroused public attention in an increasing degree, the press apparently is getting up its courage in some measure, and there is reasonable ground to hope that we may see the lid pried off. A new book dealing with Mrs. Eddy's life and belief, by H. A. L. Fisher, has appeared in England, and three books concerned at least in part with that remarkable woman are announced for early publication here. If the Christian Science publication committees are to smother all these publications, they are likely to have their hands full. But in any case, it is full time for an examination of their methods of controlling public opinion. A little group of men whose direct adherents at their most numerous have counted less than two-tenths of 1 per cent of the people of the country have been able for a quarter of a century to suppress substantially all unfavorable truth regarding Mary Baker Eddy and the religion that she founded. Why? How? Their own answer is simple and, I doubt not, genuine: They have the truth, and their critics have nothing but error. Their answer is at least a partial explanation of their success. Denying the validity of what most of us regard as evidence, they can devote themselves in all good conscience to the suppression of our truth because they honestly believe that it is error. In this particular it may be said of the great body of Christian Scientists that in a very literal sense their strength is as the strength of ten because their heart is pure.

Most people hold absurdly exaggerated ideas of the number of Christian Scientists in the country. Mrs. Eddy herself sometimes spoke, and her followers not infrequently speak, doubtless in entire good faith, of the "millions" of adherents of their religion, and the rest of the world have been inclined to take them at their own valuation—or numeration. Before doing so, however, the rest of us might do well to examine Article VIII, Section 28, of the church by-laws, which reads: "Christian Scientists shall not report for publication the number of members of the Mother Church, nor that of the branch churches. According to the Scriptures they shall turn away from numbering the people." Mrs. Eddy had an incorrigible aversion to uncontrolled publicity, of which the above by-law is but one among many interesting expressions. Uncle Sam, however, perhaps unfortunately, is no respecter of church by-laws, so he counts Christian Science noses just as irreverently as he counts Jewish, Presbyterian, or Roman Catholic ones. The Census of Religious Bodies of 1926 reports a total membership of 202,098 in the 1,913 Christian Science churches of the country. For every Christian Scientist in the United States there are 20 Jews, 9 Presbyterians, 92 Roman Catholics; yet I venture the assertion that in the smothering field the 1 Christian Scientist has done vastly more than all the 121 others put together.

Now for the actual structure of the machine. Mrs. Eddy made of her church itself a completely centralized organization, in which her power was far more absolute than that of the Pope. All power is concentrated in the Mother Church, in Boston, and Christian Science churches all over the country are simply branches of that organization. The business of the Mother Church, according to the by-laws, is to be transacted by a self-perpetuating board of directors of five members, originally appointed by Mrs. Eddy, and during her lifetime removable by her. Since her death in 1910 they have become the ultimate source of power with the right to dismiss all officers (Article XXII, Section 3) and with authority over all the activities of the church, including the work of the committees on publication. Their absolute power is exercised without publicity, for according to Article I, Section 5, of the by-laws "members shall neither report the discussions of the Board, nor those with Mrs. Eddy." In studying church publicity, this centralization must always be remembered.

Article XXXIII of the by-laws deals entirely with the Committee on Publication. The Mother Church (that is, the Board of Directors) appoints a Committee on Publication, "which shall consist of one loyal Christian Scientist who lives in Boston, and he shall be the manager of the Committees on Publication throughout the United States, Canada, Great Britain, and Ireland." During the decade and a half in which he held this responsible and powerful office Judge Clifford P. Smith really made it the most important position in the whole organization, making of the Board of Directors, which is legally the source of authority, actually a body that in large part contents itself with ratifying the proceedings of its more able and active agent. Judge Smith has now resigned to become editor of the Christian Science publications, and has been succeeded by C. Augustus Norwood, a kind and friendly person who also bears the title of general counsel to the church. Judge Smith's grip on the organization, however, is in no way weakened by the new arrangement.

Under the by-laws the Readers of the three largest branch churches in each State annually appoint in turn a Committee on Publication (consisting, it will be remembered, of one individual), California being divided into two parts. There are thus forty-nine State committees, in addition to the committees for the Territories, the District of Columbia, and foreign countries, all working under the direction of the general manager in Boston. The assistant committees (individuals), locally chosen but ratified from above, in turn work under the State committees. The general manager may order no special action not named in the Manual (by-laws) of the church to be taken without consulting the Board of Directors and receiving their written consent. The Board of Directors may remove the Committee on Publication of any branch church and name his successor, and it is the duty of the church to elect the person so named. The absolute centralization of power in the hands of the general manager and the Board of Directors is apparent. With her usual shrewdness, Mrs. Eddy provided that the committees on publication shall generally be men, but that if there is no suitable man, then a woman may be chosen. In fact, there are a number of women acting in this capacity.

It is the duty of the Committee on Publication "to correct in a Christian manner impositions on the public in regard to Christian Science, injustices done Mrs. Eddy or members of this church by the daily press, by periodicals, or circulated literature of any sort." He is to correct any false newspaper article, and if the correction is not promptly published by the offending periodical, then "this Committee shall immediately apply for aid to the Committee on Business," of which more in a moment. Nothing could be more innocent, and indeed laudable, than the purposes of the Committee on Publication; but nothing could be farther from these purposes than much of the actual work done by the central, State, and local committees, and by loyal members of the church working under their direction.

Returning to the Committee on Business, we encounter some of the black magic of the organization. It is a group of "mental workers" whose business it is to make the offending editor think the right thoughts. The Board of Directors have a group of these workers, who were formerly paid $50 a month, whose duty it is to "take up mentally" persons who are obstructing the will of the church. Some four years ago William U. Swan, a member of the church who was threatened with severe discipline, applied to the courts to restrain the directors. In the course of the resulting suit, James A. Neal, one of the directors, testified that this committee was in reality a group of mental workers subject to the Board of Directors and employed to work under their instructions for or against persons. When it became evident that counsel for Swan was going to bring out much evidence about the activities of such workers, and to compel the production of the books showing large payments made to them, the directors secured an adjournment, settled with Swan outside of court, withdrew their charges, and reinstated him as a member in good standing, rather than let these facts become public. The full story of the Committee on Business would make a book in itself.

Our immediate concern, however, is with the committees on publication. Judge Smith has been able, it will be observed, to pick his State committees, and they in turn to secure the appointment of others of their own kind in the cities and towns. The favor of the Board of Directors means prestige and dollars to all those who teach and practice Christian Science; their disfavor, not only loss of standing, but actual inability to make a living. Loyalty to Judge Smith and the directors has therefore been loyalty to oneself and one's pocketbook, and the organization has thus become ironclad. The committees and assistant committees of the country, meeting in Boston in 1921, reverently restated their clear conviction of Mrs. Eddy's divine inspiration and direction, and quoted with approval her words: "Eternity awaits our Church Manual, which will maintain its rank as in the past, amid ministries aggressive and active, and will stand when these have passed to rest." This done, they highly resolved as follows:

> Therefore be it resolved that we do hereby reaffirm our unwavering loyalty to and support of the Mother Church and to the Christian Science Board of Directors, who are specifically instructed by our wise Leader with the task of upholding and enforcing the inviolable rules of the Manual, in which worthy work they are entitled to receive and are receiving the wholehearted support of loyal Christian Scientists.

The inviolable rules of the Manual, which are to last to eternity, require each member to reflect "the sweet amenities of love," to be alert "to defend himself daily against agressive mental suggestion," "not intentionally or knowingly mentally" to "malpractice," not to "haunt Mrs. Eddy's drive when she goes out, continually stroll by her house, or make a summer resort near her for such a purpose," to "strive to promote the welfare of all mankind by demonstrating the rules of divine Love," and finally to "subscribe for the periodicals which are the organs of this Church." I have set down bits of this extraordinary hodge-podge, not for purposes of ridicule, but simply to illustrate the remarkable loyalty and the strange frame of mind that must characterize a body of persons who can accept such a diversity of rules as of equal authority and inspiration. And now I set down in that same category of everlasting rules of absolutely binding character the celebrated Article VIII, Section 12, of the Manual:

> A member of this church shall not patronize a publishing house or bookstore that has for sale obnoxious books.

The publicity organization of the Christian Science church is completely centralized and completely under the control of one man who is in daily contact with its most distant outposts. It is backed by a body of believers who do not discriminate sharply between their religion and their organization. This combination of organization and support, under a body of rules such as I have illustrated, produces a machine of unbelievable effectiveness. In the next article we shall examine its actual working.

"Cash and Carry" Life Insurance

By EDWIN S. SMITH

LIFE INSURANCE in America has passed the hundred-billion mark. This event is receiving the applause which Americans are always ready to give to evidences of their giantism. That it is an achievement and a milestone on the road to economic security, no one would deny, but let us at the same time not forget that commercial life insurance has still a few blots on its escutcheon.

The Nation, in its editorial of October 9, amid the salvos in honor of the insurance companies, took a well-directed shot at the present status of industrial or weekly-payment insurance. This instalment insurance is the only form of insurance protection which our working people, generally speaking, enjoy. It is an extremely cumbersome and expensive device for both the companies and the insured. The number of lapses on policies is terrific. In 1928 it amounted to the equivalent of 60 per cent of the number of policies written that year. Nor does the insured who allows his policy to lapse get any return for what he has expended unless he had paid premiums for at least three years.

In 1908 the status of industrial insurance was even less promising. In that year the Massachusetts Legislature passed a law permitting savings banks to write life-insurance policies and old-age annuities. This plan originated with Louis D. Brandeis, then a practicing lawyer in Boston, who had undergone a baptism of fire on the subject of insurance in the investigation of certain scandalous practices of life-insurance companies, practices now happily abandoned. Since the enormous expense of weekly-payment insurance lies in the cost of soliciting and of collections, Massachusetts provided that no agents should be employed by the banks. If a man wanted insurance, he had to come of his own free will to the savings bank to get it. In other words, this was insurance on the "cash-and-carry" principle, later widely exploited by the chain stores on other kinds of merchandise.

The results of the system in Massachusetts may be briefly told. On September 30, 1929, more than 80,000 policies were in force, totaling $67,000,000. Thanks in large part to the elimination of soliciting by agents, any insurable person who is a resident of Massachusetts can get straight life insurance through a savings bank at a rate about 26 per cent cheaper than the rate charged by commercial companies for ordinary life policies, and at half the cost of "weekly-payment" insurance. There is no elaborate paraphernalia of collection, yet the number of savings-bank insurance policies allowed to lapse amounts to less than 1 per cent of those written! Truly a remarkable figure when placed against the lapse rate of commercial companies. The answer is simple. The insurance costs less, there is a surrender value on every policy after premiums have been paid for six months, and the insured are those who want insurance protection enough to seek it. The over-zealous agent who sweeps the workingman or girl into an insurance policy which he or she cannot afford to carry is happily not in the savings-bank insurance picture.

Not the least interesting feature of savings-bank insurance to the workingman is the reasonable rate at which he can purchase an old-age annuity. The increasing tendency of industry to slough off its older workers in favor of young blood makes the problem of annuities increasingly important. A typical annuity arrangement under savings-bank insurance is as follows:

> Beginning at age 30, a man deposits $10.70 a month, and continues this deposit during thirty-five years, that is, until he reaches age 65, at which time he ceases to make deposits. The banks then begin to pay to him an annuity of $1,000 a year, this payment to continue as long as he shall live. It will be observed that during the thirty-five years his total deposits have aggregated $4,494. It is estimated that he will have received dividends back amounting to about $630, so that his life income of $1,000 a year has cost him net only about $3,864.

For years the growth of savings-bank insurance as measured by the number of banks operating insurance departments was slow. In 1912 four banks had insurance departments and there were no additions until 1923, when two more came in. In 1928 the number was ten. During 1929 there have been three further additions. One of these is the Boston Five Cents Savings Bank, the largest savings bank in the State. Another Boston bank joined the ranks in October, making a total of three banks in Boston and ten scattered through the State. In addition to the banks writing insurance there are over a hundred banks which act as agents to receive applications for insurance, which is placed with banks that operate insurance departments.

The probable reason why the banks are becoming more enthusiastic about insurance is an interesting footnote to economic history. Economic systems, like other things, progress by accident as well as design. The last few years have given the trustees of savings banks some cause for worry. Deposits have been growing slowly. Increased spending by workers and the lure of the speculative market are perhaps the causes. During the nine months ending July 31, 1929, the percentage of withdrawals of deposits in the 196 Massachusetts savings banks was very much larger than for the year ended October 31, 1928. The amount on deposit (including interest credited) increased during these months only 2.99 per cent. Deposits made between November 1, 1927, and October 31, 1928, aggregated $417,615,555; but at the end of twelve months the net increase in the amount due depositors was only $135,342,767, equivalent to 32.4 per cent of the new money deposited during that period. Although savings banks are not organized for profit and the motives which prompt individuals to become trustees of these institutions are largely social, naturally the trustees take pride in having the banks move forward. On looking up the record of the banks which have operated insurance departments, they find life-insurance money tells quite a different story from ordinary savings deposits.

The insurance department of the North End Savings Bank received during three years premiums amounting to $166,867.47. At the end of the third year, with all expenses paid, all death claims settled, and a substantial sum set aside for dividends to policy-holders, it held in the insurance reserve and surplus $139,704. In other words, it retained in its possession for the purpose of investment a sum equal to 83.7 per cent of the premiums received during the entire period. Similar figures for the Lynn Institute for Savings after six years writing of life insurance show a total of premiums paid in of $584,154. The insurance reserve and surplus at the end of six years was $410,219 or 70.2 per cent of the premiums paid in. Savings banks enjoy a vastly greater stability from their funds received through insurance writing than from deposits.

As yet the dollars-and-cents accomplishments of savings-bank insurance need cause the commercial companies no great alarm. In 1928 the amount of savings-bank insurance written in Massachusetts was 1.56 per cent of the total amount written in the State in that year. Of the total premiums paid for insurance by Massachusetts people in 1928 the insurance departments of the savings banks received 1.27 per cent. A system which can write ordinary life insurance 26 per cent more cheaply is competition worth thinking about. Even if the companies themselves were inclined to discount the importance of savings-bank insurance, the insurance agents are unlikely to do so. Life insurance agents constitute a powerful economic group quite capable of making itself politically effective. Opponents of savings-bank insurance introduced a bill in the legislature during 1929 providing that the total amount of such insurance which an individual could carry should be $5,000. The bill was defeated, but it took work to do it.

The roster of savings-bank trusteeships always embraces important men in the community. Among their number are directors of insurance companies and also of commercial banks, between which and insurance companies there is, for various reasons, bound to be a friendly feeling. How far this influence will tend to slow up the growth of savings-bank insurance is hard to say. There is certainly encouragement in the fact that the Boston Five Cents Savings Bank, which has a board of trustees particularly well endowed with bank and insurance company directors, has entered the ranks.

Modestly but effectively, savings-bank insurance goes marching on. It is not in the least daunted because commercial life insurance is entering upon its second hundred billion.

In the Driftway

As his readers know, the Drifter is a great believer in color. He is devoted to neckties which conservative dressers class as "loud," and the last comment which he wants anybody to make when he indulges in a new suit of clothes is that it is "genteel." The Drifter does not wish to dress genteelly; he wishes to encourage if not compel people to turn and look back at him. Otherwise why bother to dress at all? Though, come to think of it, a failure to dress in any way might lead to most attention of all. The Drifter is on record as approving of the dyeing of one's hair when another tint than that granted by nature appeals to one as more becoming or beautiful. Nor should one be limited to the shades supplied in the not too-generous or imaginative original plan. The Drifter thinks that hair of emerald, heliotrope, or carnation would be an excellent innovation. So, of course, he is all in favor of the colored sidewalks recently laid in New Orleans—provided that the colors and designs are harmonious and beautiful. The colored sidewalks, so one gathers from newspaper accounts, were lately introduced on a couple of streets at the suggestion of a neighborhood improvement association, the president of which argued, reasonably enough, that since gay colors were in vogue for roofs they might also be used with benefit in sidewalks. Red and green were the colors selected, but even these old and conservative hues failed to win the approbation of all the citizenry. A local attorney, for instance, was moved to write to the president of the neighborhood improvement association as follows:

> I not only concede but proclaim the good work of yourself and your associates in beautifying the city. However, I think even you, who appear to revel in red, pink, blue, and lavender roofs, will come to realize the ugliness, incongruity, and bizarrerie of green and red as applied to sidewalks, and I predict you will some day regret the price you have paid for your advertising.
>
> You and your associates could have got your street talked about quite as much had you placed well-trained monkeys at strategic intervals along the thoroughfares—with the added advantage that the monkeys would sooner or later die.

* * * * *

But generally speaking the tendency toward using more color to brighten up and make gayer this drab old world is spreading so rapidly that it no longer needs champions. Rainy days have been much less gloomy since women took to carrying cheerfully colored umbrellas, and it seems impossible to put out any shades in women's dresses too vivid to be popular. The brilliant scarlet confections of the present winter make even the most pessimistic of us want to live through to another spring. Decidedly the Scarlet Woman is the success of the season. In architecture color has been seeping in for a number of years. Though no American town has yet adopted to any large extent the gaily calcimined walls and brilliant roofs of various oriental, tropical, and Latin cities, the use of bright-colored brick and tiling—sometimes in good and sometimes in execrable taste—has grown so common that no one should object when New Orleans goes a step further and lays red and green sidewalks.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Degrees and Wealth

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: General Jan Christiaan Smuts made many interesting observations in accepting the LL.D. conferred on him by Johns Hopkins University on January 16. But perhaps the most trenchant remark uttered on this occasion came from a mere undergraduate observer of the ceremonies. Amid hosts of trustees, faculty, and other persons generally supposed to inspire awe in youthful imbibers at our founts of knowledge, this unawed youth, apparently deeming explanation of his presence necessary, remarked: "What we students are here for is to see a man without money get an honorary degree."

Baltimore, January 20 EDGAR WILLIAMS

The Archbishop's Automobile

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I know that it is your custom to select from letters sent to you for publication such as seem to you the most important or interesting. I cannot understand therefore your selection of the letter headed And There You Are! in your issue of January 15. I hold no brief for Archbishop Mundelein or the Catholic church, and I thoroughly disagree with that church's position on birth control as well as on some other matters, but I nevertheless fail to see the justification for personal flings at the archbishop or why a letter of that kind should be given preference over all that went into the wastebasket unless these were even worse. It goes to show that not even The Nation may be trusted to take on the functions of a censor.

If the worst that can be said about Archbishop Mundelein is that he owns a $14,000 automobile, then I question the propriety of any Nation reader throwing stones at him. Whenever any prelate takes a stand on public matters that calls for a reply, let his statements be treated as those of any other man without bringing in irrelevant matters such as his ecclesiastical position. This seems to be a very hard thing for some who call themselves liberals to grasp.

Baltimore, January 13 SAMUEL DANZIGER

Idealistic Perversity

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The idealistic perversity of your editorial on the League of Nations fills me with despair. The League, we are told, has "permitted" this, and "been silent and complaisant" in the face of that. One might suppose that the League was a body quite separate from the nations of the world rather than a piece of machinery for facilitating such cooperation as their isolationist prejudices permit them to undertake. But for the evil influence of the League, one might judge from the tone of your article, such pacifists as Sir Austen Chamberlain, M. Poincaré, and other leading statesmen would have realized long ago their dream of a united world at peace and disarmed.

As for the Treaty of Versailles, Article XIX of the Covenant is the only international instrument specifically suggesting and providing machinery for the revision of treaties which need revision. How else do you propose to revise treaties? This is a practical question, and The Nation does not presumably advocate the traditional method of war. Or is it peace, but peace with honor, which you now espouse? After all, the League, as such, does nothing to discourage revision except revision by force.

Surely clear-headed opposition to the League must take the form of saying either (1) that international machinery (as distinct from pacts and other pious gestures) is undesirable per se, or (2) that this particular machinery is radically defective. And it would only be reasonable to indict the machinery if good results could not be achieved even when those using it sincerely desired to achieve them. The so-called failures of the League are failures of governments which would have been no less surely in office if there had been no League, and of peoples who have failed to learn the plain lessons of the war. Its successes are largely pieces of international cooperation which could hardly have been initiated and carried through but for the organization and machinery which have been created in Geneva. It is a piece of machinery whose effectiveness is very greatly impaired by the absence of the United States, but, as your last paragraph so delightfully suggests, no doubt the time will come when the good little American boys will be able to say to the naughty little European boys, "Now that you have learnt to play nicely, we will come and play with you."

Oak Lane, Pa., January 11 W. B. CURRY

Nation Dinner

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The second annual dinner of the Nation Club of San Francisco will be held on Tuesday evening, February 11, at the Fior d' Italia Restaurant, 492 Broadway, San Francisco. Dr. Stanley Rypins will preside.

Those wishing reservations will kindly get in touch with Sophie Greenburg, 775 Guerrero Street, San Francisco.

San Francisco, January 20 SOPHIE GREENBURG

Contributors to This Issue

NORMAN ANGELL, author of "The Great Illusion" and editor of Foreign Affairs, is a Labor member of Parliament.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY is managing editor of The Nation.

EDWIN S. SMITH is a Boston business executive who has given special attention to the working of savings-bank insurance.

CORINNA REIMAN MARSH has contributed verse to various periodicals.

HENRY HAZLITT is literary editor of The Nation.

LORINE PRUETTE is the author of "Women and Leisure: A Study in Social Waste."

WILLIAM MACDONALD is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

J. G. DE ROULHAC HAMILTON is Kenan Professor of History and Government at the University of North Carolina.

JOSHUA KUNITZ is author of "Russian Literature and the Jew."

WILLIAM SEAGLE is an assistant editor of the Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY, author of several books on the theater, writes on motion pictures for The Nation.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is dramatic editor of The Nation.

AFTER MOTHER INDIA

Harry H. Field

MR. FIELD, MISS MAYO—and MR. GANDHI

"Mr. Field keeps his heavy guns for those who have tried to controvert Miss Mayo's facts," says Lord Meston in the London Spectator. "Mr. Gandhi heads the list. He questioned the accuracy of Miss Mayo's account of her interview with him. Mr. Field produces the summary of the interview recorded on the spot, typed immediately, edited and passed by Mr. Gandhi himself."

"Out of their own mouths," says the Melbourne Herald, "he condemns them. Mr. Gandhi is a case in point."

$3.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

Do You . . . Remember his wit, his candor, his eloquence, his generous sympathy, his good humor, his courage, his devotion? All the sweetness and clarity of the man live again in

AN EAST SIDE EPIC

THE LIFE AND WORK OF MEYER LONDON

by Harry Rogoff

$2.50 . . . . . . Bookstores

VANGUARD

Books, Films, Drama

Fulfilment

By CORINNA REIMAN MARSH

Racked, the ample-bosomed hill
Bears a lusty tree,
Wearing, like a crown of peace,
Her maternity.

Wonder-bound, she cradles him
On her velvet lap,
Rich with dreams of springing boughs
And of leaping sap.

At her womb, her breast, he pulls
With insatiate roots;
Hers the honey and the wine
Mellowing his fruits.

The Pioneer Soul

Australia Felix. By Henry Handel Richardson. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

As a small edition was published here in 1917 under the title of "The Fortunes of Richard Mahony," "Australia Felix" is not, strictly speaking, a new book. But it can be discussed as a new book, for on its appearance a dozen years ago it was almost completely ignored, in England as well as here, both by critical opinion and by the reading public. It was not until the publication last fall of "Ultima Thule," the final volume of the trilogy of which "Australia Felix" is the first, that Henry Handel Richardson came into genuine prominence.

"Australia Felix" opens at the time of the gold rush of the fifties, and we meet Richard Mahony at twenty-seven as the keeper of a general store at Ballarat. It is a more normal Richard than we find in "Ultima Thule," but with the germs of all the qualities that are later to become more pronounced—serious, with little exuberance or play in his make-up, sensitive, stand-offish, restless, impractical, almost fanatically honest and candid, and though fundamentally generous and tender in his instincts, subject to fits of unreasoning irritability; he is blunt, often tactless, and quick to resent fancied slights. He marries his Mary when she is only sixteen. Partly because of a general slackness in his part of the town, partly because of the resentment he has aroused for his outspoken opposition to the diggers' rebellion, trade at his little store begins to fall off. He is finally forced to abandon the store and try a resumption of medical practice. He moves to the west part of the town, where his practice grows. Induced by his lawyer to speculate in some mining shares, he wins an amount that immediately puts him into comfortable circumstances. But his betrayal by his friend Purdy, his quarrel with his most important patient, and a series of his own illnesses combine to unsettle him; his practice dwindles; and over Mary's protests he tears up his Australian roots and takes her with him back to England.

In so brief a summary the story seems flat and colorless. Yet even more than in "Ultima Thule," one is impressed by the richness and sweep of this novel. The many-sidedness of a man's life is presented with great skill. Surprisingly little attention is given either to romantic love or to the "sexual problem." This is surely not the result of any squeamishness; it springs partly from the character of the protagonist, but perhaps more from the fact that the woman who writes under the name of Henry Handel Richardson recognizes the absurd extent to which the overwhelming bulk of fiction overemphasizes the role that sex—in the average novelist's sense—plays in the totality of our lives. She has an uncanny capacity, too, for dramatizing those day-to-day events which most novelists instinctively dismiss as too prosaic for detailed discussion; she enlists our interest powerfully, for example, not merely in Richard's recurrent financial difficulties considered as a whole, but in the most detailed elements of them. Not least of the novel's merits, considering "Australia Felix" and "Ultima Thule" together, is the subtlety with which it portrays the development of the characters of Richard and Mary and the change in their relationship.

Yet I confess that "Australia Felix" interests me mainly as a portrait of the pioneer—of his courage, hardihood, enterprise, his generosity and gambling instinct, his easy camaraderie and democracy, his restlessness, his tendency to regard his present location, way of life, and living quarters as temporary, and hence his insensibility to the ugliness and makeshift character of his surroundings; above all, of the dominant materialism of his ambitions, with nearly all cultural interests squeezed out by the pursuit of sudden wealth.

The book was undoubtedly to a large extent intended as precisely such a study. It is no accident that Richard, sensitive, reserved, cultured, impractical, and idealistic, forms so sharp a contrast to the typical pioneer, and that so much of early Australia is revealed through his eyes. Though this picture happens to be of the Australian gold rush of the fifties, it would serve almost as well as a picture of the fifties in California, or of all the early oil and mining towns of the Southwest. More than that: it helps us to see with renewed insight how deeply the outlook of the pioneer still colors our own national life. It is reflected still in our mere physical aspect, so that to the cultured European eye our architectural landscape wears a provisional, jerry-built, and impermanent air; and it remains, of course, in full flower in our glorification of business and material progress.

HENRY HAZLITT

A Happy Scholar

Memories of My Life. By Edward Westermarck. The Macaulay Company. $5.

Few autobiographies are introduced more mildly than these recollections of the famous anthropologist, who while suggesting that it may seem presumptuous to offer to the public such memories, takes comfort in the thought that he himself has always had a predilection for autobiographical sketches, even when of only slight significance in themselves. But memories which show the genesis and development of such important works as "The History of Human Marriage" and "The Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas" cannot be insignificant. In "Memories of My Life" Westermarck gives a clear and charming picture of the simple, joyful life open to the true scholar today. He has devoted a long life to research into the folkways and mores of mankind, and it appears certain that he finds no cause to regret this early dedication. The quiet note of happiness struck in his autobiography makes a heartening sound in the midst of contemporary turbulence.

A sickly child, cut off from many of the pleasures of his age, Edward Westermarck grew up to triumph over mountains and to stand on snowy glaciers where no one had been known to stand before. This encouraged him to think he might undertake the hardships of research among more primitive peoples, and for twenty-eight years he has been going back and forth to Morocco, gathering great store of material on the beliefs and customs of the people. As a young man his memory was poor, and once he heard that a professor had called him stupid; this disturbed him for a long time until he finally concluded that the professor's statement was exaggerated. It was Darwin who set him off on his early studies, and England has long shared him with his native Finland. Eighteen years were devoted to his second important work, and all his life shows a unity of purpose and performance almost quaint in a modern age. Here is almost a cloistered quiet and joy; it is well to be reminded that this may still be the lot of men who work with due humility and steadfastness at the tasks they love, and that the life of the scholar may still be, verily, a good one.

LORINE PRUETTE

Whither England and America?

America and England? By Nicholas Roosevelt. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S book appears to have been written with the London conference particularly in mind, and it may certainly be read with profit by any one who desires to understand the background of the British or American approaches to the question of naval reduction and limitation. Primarily, however, it is a comparison of the positions of Great Britain and the United States today as world Powers, and while what is said carries with it some obvious implications, it is not, in the usual sense, a work of propaganda for either country or for any cause.

A comparison, well buttressed with statistics, of the natural resources, industrial development, and commercial and financial expansion of the two countries, especially since the beginning of the present century, shows Great Britain holding on the whole, either actually or in prospect, second place. Ignorance and prejudice, as marked in the one country as in the other, have clouded an understanding of the situation, but the leadership which London still maintains over New York as the world's financial center is being offset by a steady increase in the American share of foreign financing; America's natural resources are better distributed and more readily accessible than those of Great Britain, and domestic production and foreign trade will unquestionably continue to grow. A fivefold increase in the past thirty years in the total volume of American production, and hence of trade, marks the United States as destined to "take the place of Great Britain as the leading commercial power of the world."

Weighing the advantages and disadvantages of a merchant marine, Mr. Roosevelt finds no special gain in carrying national products in national ships, and he sees no likelihood that American merchant shipping will menace British superiority "so long as the government remains in the shipping business," quite aside from the greater cost of building and operating American ships. A state of war, on the other hand, at once creates different problems. The World War afforded striking illustrations of the changed status of merchant vessels in the remarkable development of the convoy system, the use of fast British liners to defend the northern trade routes, and the notable performances of some of the German raiders. Neither laws nor treaties, however, seem to Mr. Roosevelt likely to avail to protect neutral commerce from interference by belligerents, and he even foresees a possibility that the United States, by insisting upon the freedom of the seas to a point where it became a party to a treaty intended to guarantee such freedom, might actually be placed in the position of a "moral outlaw" if it interfered with neutral British commerce. The Washington conference did not prevent Great Britain from getting the better of the bargain in the retention of effective naval tonnage, and Mr. Roosevelt is severe in his criticism of Secretary Hughes for failing to realize "how anxious the British and Japanese were to see America's 1916 building program stopped," and for "laying his entire hand on the table at the very first move" at the cost of losing "the only lever that might have helped him force through the entire program of limitation in all categories of ships."

In a chapter in which he ably contrasts British and American character and habits Mr. Roosevelt leaves distinctly the impression that the British people is losing its grip. "There are indications today," he writes, "of a mortal disease of the soul which, if sufficiently far advanced, may at last corrode the character—a combination of sloth, resistance to change, blindness, defeatism, and excessive temporizing which suggests a sick or exhausted civilization." He is hopeful, however, that better understanding may ultimately pave the way to "an enduring pax Anglo-Americana." On the soundness of that hope the London conference will, perhaps, shed some light.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

The Confederate President

Jefferson Davis: His Rise and Fall. A Biographical Narrative. By Allen Tate. Minton, Balch and Company. $3.50.

THIS latest study of the Confederate President is a singularly interesting piece of work. Based upon secondary material, chiefly the works of Dodd, Fleming, and Eckenrode, it makes no new contribution to our knowledge of Davis except what is to be found in the author's interpretation of him, but the story is presented with a freshness not hitherto associated with discussions of Davis. The work can scarcely be said to be a defense of Davis nor even to display a friendly attitude toward him, for it is on the whole sharply critical, but at the same time it attributes to him a larger measure of ability and, perhaps, more essential greatness than the majority of even his friendly critics have ever seen fit to put into print. Quite the most readable of the books about Davis, it gives the most vivid picture of the man that has yet appeared.

Along with the easy lightness of the author's style go a certain coldness and hardness, easier to feel than to define. The author does not fail to show for his subject the judicial appreciation that every biographer should possess, but he manifestly does not like him and apparently conceals irritation under a sort of frigidity. This impression may be due to the character of the interpretation. Mr. Tate is not hesitant about stating his conclusions—so little so, in fact, that one gathers that he was not hesitant in reaching them—and he writes with a sureness that only narrowly escapes being cocksure.

Mr. Tate's assertions that "Jefferson Davis was a great statesman, perhaps the most disinterested statesman in American history," and that his "character, his honor, his integrity were almost saintly" constitute a fairly complete description of his attitude toward Davis the man, but of Davis the President he is much more critical. His contention that Davis's election is an "unsolved mystery" provokes the thought that perhaps Mr. Tate is not good at puzzles, or that he is not so familiar with the background of that election as a biographer of Davis should be. He feels that either Toombs, Yancey, or Rhett had a better title, since they were typical of those who precipitated secession and desired to make of it a revolution. Davis, in contrast, represented the conservative elements in the South

THEATRE WITH SOUND
GROCERIES
PROFITS BEFORE ART ROBOT BRAND
APPLE SAUCE
PENNY MOOSIC
VERDI
LISZT
CORN PUCCINI
BEETHOVEN
BEETS
PRUNES MOZART
BEANS
PEAS
SCHUBERT
BACH RAZZBERRIES
CANNED OPERA
OUT OF ORDER
Helguera

"—I went to the Canned Goods Fair,
The prunes and the tunes were there"

Have you, too, heard the Cannery racket--the tin-clad "Sound" opera and jazz numbers, so affably welcomed here by the delicatessen set.

TO some theatre interests this is a heart-warming clamor. It means economy for them, hence greater profits.

To persons of sound musical taste, it is ludicrous and impudent —an affront to the intelligence and taste of the theatre-going public. They see in the talkies no excuse for resort to Canned Music.

If you, dear reader, are one of those who recognize that machine-made sound cannot take the place of living orchestras and organists in the theatre . . . if you deplore corruption of musical appreciation and discouragement of musical talent . . . if you see no reason why you should forego the pleasure of real music in the theatre to enable an economy whose benefits you do not share, TREAT YOURSELF TO A SIGH OF RELIEF. SIGN THE COUPON BELOW. Then mail it!

American Federation of Musicians N-2
1440 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Without further obligation on my part, please enroll my name in the Music Defense League as one who is opposed to the elimination of Living Music from the Theatre.

Name ....
Address ....
City.............................. State................

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF MUSICIANS

(Comprising 140,000 professional musicians in the United States and Canada)

JOSEPH N. WEBER, President, 1440 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

which organized the Confederate government while eagerly anxious for reconciliation and reunion with the other States, and which never entirely escaped the thralls of that point of view. Revolution was not in their thinking. The Confederacy was to be merely a purified Union, one brought back to first principles.

Mr. Tate is of course correct in his implied thesis that Davis was not the best President the Confederacy might have had, but he is weak in proving that anyone else specifically would have been better. And he overlooks the fact that since there is little likelihood that any of those mentioned for the post would have given Lee his opportunity, the days of the Confederacy might conceivably have been fewer.

In his analysis of the defects of Davis as President Mr. Tate is on surer ground. He brings out clearly Davis's aloofness, his lack of contact with men, his inability to comprehend their motives. "He could not manage men and he was too great a character to let men manage him; that is the tragedy of his career." "He was a born compromiser of ideas; . . . he was incapable of compromise with men. He was too proud, too sensitive to reproof, he rose in crises to great heights of disinterested feeling and responsibility, but being a chronic neurotic, the price he paid was continuous headache." "He was a giant ridden by dyspepsia and neurasthenia, morbidly sensitive and emotionally undisciplined; his emotional instability bulwarked behind a boundless intellectual pride. He lacked emotional resilience, and he could not read the meaning of events; he could cap the hour with a formula, he could analyze the theoretical significance of the passing moment, . . . he could shatter the arguments of his shrewdest opponents, but he could not fathom the opponent's political cunning, or forestall its success. Davis's powerful will could not make up for the lack of emotional conviction, and he was doomed to the obstinate support of half-measures and, in his lack of vision, to the mere hope that it would all work out well in the end." "A constitutional pedant," he had little capacity as a practical politician, and pride of intellect, pride of conviction (his chief weakness), kept him from possessing any great capacity for popular leadership, particularly in the South which, in Mr. Tate's opinion, at the middle of the last century had "the best-informed political life this country has ever seen or is likely to see again."

From the author's conclusion, based upon Dr. Eckenrode's work, that the military policy adopted by Davis was responsible for the defeat of the Confederacy, I must dissent. It is easy, of course, to point out numerous occasions when victory seemed almost within grasp, but the historian who ventures into the misty realm of what might have happened under a different set of circumstances or conditions is on dangerous ground. There were, too, other factors involved which were quite as decisive as military policy. It is undoubted that the insistence of Davis upon purely defensive war seems now a blunder, but the South then was quite solidly convinced that it was a wise and right policy. The division of the South into departments seems positively stupid in the light of today, but it was, I believe, but a part of a system adopted by the United States as well as by the Confederacy. Davis blundered in ignoring the importance of the West, but only the tremendous superiority of the North in men and resources prevented a similar blunder there. However reprehensible was Davis's prejudice against Joseph E. Johnston, it is not certain that he blundered in his conviction that Johnston could not win a campaign. And while thus disagreeing with Mr. Tate, I may disagree also with his contention that Davis's unshakable belief in Braxton Bragg was his only major blunder as President, and agree most fervently that "it was a blunder of such magnitude that poor humanity must leave it to God alone to forgive."

The cocksure quality of the book and its disregard of the fact that hindsight is so much more common than foresight appear to justify a criticism of detail and even of major conclusions which should not, however, obscure commendation of the book as readable, interesting, and thought-provoking. It is, as well, a real contribution to the literature of Jefferson Davis.

J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton

Russia Interpreted

Humanity Uprooted. By Maurice Hindus. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.50.

MR. HINDUS'S new book, though not quite so well written or so revealing as his "Broken Earth," is a fine attempt to describe and interpret practically every phase of Soviet life—"institutions, people, quests." A mere glance at the comprehensive table of contents and the pithy chapter headings—Religion, Property, Man, Sex, Love, Family, Peasant, Proletarian, Communist, Youth, etc.—suggests the unusually wide range of the author's interests and observations. Obviously, in view of the difficulty and magnitude of Mr. Hindus's undertaking (and we must always bear in mind the great complexity of the subject and the frequent and kaleidoscopic changes in the Soviet scene), occasional inaccuracies, contradictions, platitudes, and unwarranted assertions are almost inevitable, particularly since the author seems to excel in immediate sensation and artistic emotion rather than in scientific analysis.

So fresh, so keen are Mr. Hindus's sensory perceptions that to him the mere process of seeing, hearing, touching things is in itself a glowing experience, a thrill. Hence, his naively hyperbolic style; hence, his rhythmic verbosity, his breathless repetitiveness, his chronic raptures. The Russian's atheism is always "riotous" or "defiant" or "hilarious"; the Russian's eyes invariably "sparkling" or "glowing" or "burning." History "bristles," contrasts "shriek." Yet through it all, and perhaps because of it all—for the Russian scene does invite hyperbole—the reader is made conscious of the terrific flux, the dynamics, the conflicts of the transition stage of the revolution. Old morals, decayed religions, tottering institutions, obsolete habits and attitudes and prejudices—everything is breaking, crashing, disappearing, and giving place to the new, the vigorous, the daring. There are savagery here and beastliness, self-sacrifice and heroism, drama and pathos and beauty. Where the author depicts, he wields his pen with authority. He knows his Soviet Russia; and one accepts his pictures, though heightened in color and lacking in the subtler shadings, unreservedly.

When, however, Mr. Hindus attacks ideas, philosophies, intellectual currents, when he becomes an expositor rather than a narrator, he is less convincing and slips at times into the trite, the false, or the absurd. Here is a typical illustration: "I have often thought," he says gravely, "that fundamentally what distinguishes a Communist from other revolutionaries is his readiness to kill and to be killed." Surely this tidbit is not the result of repeated cogitation. In his historical data and his references to the Russian classics, again, Mr. Hindus is not always sufficiently vigilant. For instance, his entire discussion of the absence of the chivalric tradition in Russia and the effect of such absence on the present development of sexual and marital relations is based on a somewhat inadequate mastery of historical antecedents. His references to the Russians of the tenth and eleventh centuries as "savage" and to Kiev as the place where the first printing-press was set up are wrong, while his branding of Lermontov and Pushkin, particularly Pushkin, as "tearful" poets is utterly absurd.

But there is no need of multiplying examples. After all, these are details which may lessen the value of the book for the pedant, but they do not at all need to affect the average reader. On the whole the book is sound, worth while, and a genuine contribution to the growing literature about the Soviet Union. It fully deserves a prominent place on the shelves of anyone interested in the subject.

JOSHUA KUNITZ

The Great Dissenter

The Dissenting Opinions of Mr. Justice Holmes. Arranged with Introductory Notes by Alfred Lief. Foreword by Dr. George W. Kirchwey. The Vanguard Press. $4.50.

THIS book is a unique tribute of a kind that has never been paid, as far as I know, to any judge of the United States, not even to John Marshall. In one volume there have been collected here the dissenting opinions of Mr. Justice Holmes, with enough of his majority opinions to make clear his position. The value of such a compilation should lie far beyond considerations of convenience. It must be not only a recognition of the great role which Justice Holmes has filled but also a means of continuing and increasing his influence. Thus in medieval times were collected the consilia of the great jurists—of an Azo, an Irnerius, a Bartolus.

The reader will find here, however, touches of the twentieth century to disturb the analogy. Mr. Lief, who has arranged the cases, has unfortunately been unable to restrain his wit. He has seen fit to prefix to the opinions titles of his own invention which can hardly be said to accord with the great issues they raise. I need only mention such inspirations as "What Price Water?", "Taxis and the Common Law," or "Uncle Sam as Tenant." He has also arranged the cases in groups which are not always happy, since they lead to arbitrary emphasis upon single aspects of the opinions. Such categories as "On Hampering Social Experiments" or "On Infringing upon Freedom" do express characteristic preoccupations of Justice Holmes, but they have made it necessary to assemble the opinions that remain under such novel constitutional divisions as "On Usurping Power" and "On Escaping Taxes." This is not merely captious criticism. The arrangement adopted fails to show the element of growth in the constitutional doctrines of Justice Holmes. In 1906 he upheld punishment for constructive contempt even as against a defense that the charges were true; in 1923 he went so far as to ask the pointed and embarrassing question, "How can it be pretended that the charge obstructed the administration of justice when the judge seemingly was willing to condone it if the petitioner would retract?" Yet the latter case precedes the former. Only a simple chronological marshaling of the opinions could exhibit the achievement of that noble skepticism of Justice Holmes which is of even greater moment than any of his attitudes toward particular constitutional problems—a skepticism which has come to consist of constitutionally believing everything.

It is this which makes him the great dissenter. Yet in this respect, too, he has not been appreciated in the all too brief foreword of four pages contributed by Dean Kirchwey. The latter, indeed, denies Justice Holmes the claim and the title. He points out that, after all, he has dissented in only one out of every eight or ten cases. I pass over the fact that obviously the average case involves only ordinary legal matters, not great issues. Dissent is not to be interpreted statistically. It recalls to me the method introduced some years ago by Charles Warren in defending the Supreme Court; after all, he said, it had held only fifty-three acts of Congress void. Is this a way to measure crises? It may, indeed, be that in a better constitutional world Justice Holmes would not be dissenting. The most

An Important New Book

THE LABOR INJUNCTION

By

Felix Frankfurter and Nathan Greene

This is a comprehensive study of the labor injunction in all of its phases. The legislative efforts to define and limit the use of the injunction in labor disputes are traced in detail, and the judicial application of the injunction, in Federal and State jurisdictions, is analyzed. The authors then give their views on the appropriate direction of future legislation. The labor injunction has never been a more vital subject than it is today. No other book has treated of it so adequately as this. Price, $5.00

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
60 Fifth Avenue New York, N. Y.

The Training School for Jewish Social Work

invites social workers without professional preparation and others, holders and prospective holders of a bachelor's degree, to whom a career of intrinsic interest and social usefulness is a primary consideration, to examine carefully its course of study in preparation for

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

The School prepares its students for every variety of social work in American Jewish Communities and Institutions.

Scholarships and Fellowships ranging from $150 to $1,000 for each school year are available for especially qualified students.

For full information write to
M. J. KARPF, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

A graduate school

67-71 W. 47th Street, New York

damaging remark on constitutionalism ever made is contained in the opening sentence of one of his opinions which really should be quoted more often than it has been: "I also think that the statute is constitutional, and but for the decision of my brethren I should have felt pretty clear about it." But it is another matter to say that it is practically involuntary dissent to be compelled to point out that a steel laborer is not on an equality for purposes of bargaining with the United States Steel Corporation, or that the Nineteenth Amendment has not abolished all differences between men and women. For the vindication of these truths we need not, as Dean Kirchwey concludes, look to "the years to come." They have long been vindicated in public opinion, and even Justice Holmes's brethren have changed their minds and departed from the ideas once enunciated for the court by the naive Justice Peckham. Justice Holmes (and, of course, Justice Brandeis) dissenting, have not done so in vain. WILLIAM SEAGLE

Books in Brief

Cyrano. By Cameron Rogers. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

For the biofiction that enables these earnest days to enjoy the old excitement beneath culture's cloak, few figures are more providentially equipped than Cyrano de Bergerac. Bearing a bought coat-of-arms, this long-nosed libertine, best swordsman of swift dueling days, most savage satirist of a bitter age, stood always at the door of triumph as it closed, and died—his greatest work unpublished—struck by a falling beam. Perhaps, indeed, the legend Rostand has helped create has grown more real than the man; for Cameron Rogers, whose picture of Paris brings its streets to us in all their noisy jostling and crawly dirt, has not given life to the man who struts them. The swordsman seems drawn for Douglas Fairbanks; the man of letters lives the later years of a bolder Ichabod Crane. The bibliography, off-handedly including Sainte-Beuve's "Lundis" (eleven volumes), is content, for the greatest authority on Cyrano and the other libertine writers—F. Lachèvre—with a reference to a magazine article. Those, however, to whom the presence of the booklist gives countenance will enjoy the romance that precedes it.

The Iron Man and the Tin Woman. By Stephen Leacock. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

Apart from his college work Mr. Leacock has written eighteen books, he says in a letter quoted on the jacket of this one. He goes on to say that he would sooner have written "Alice in Wonderland" than the whole of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Well, here is number eighteen, and while it is far from being another "Alice in Wonderland" or even another "Nonsense Novel," it contains forty pieces of nonsense combined with satire which one wishes the right people might be forced to read. Some of the pieces are better than others; no humorist can be always at his best, but Mr. Leacock is one of those who is never at his worst.

Instinct and Intelligence. By R. W. G. Hingston. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

If we knew better what either of them were we might draw sharper lines between instinct and intelligence, though if the behaviorists should succeed in making of all human action a mere chain of reflexes to external stimuli the distinction would be lost. Major Hingston writes as a prebehaviorist, but the result is the same. Documenting his every statement with a series of observations on insect life in the tropical East, he concludes that some insects at least have memory and the ability to learn from experience—"intelligence." "Regarded from a psychological point of view," he says, "the brain of man and the brain of the insect possess the same fundamental qualities." Some of his evidences of intelligence might be defined as complicated instinct, but the old religious insistence upon a sharp line between intelligent man and instinctive beast is being whittled away from both ends. Any amateur philosopher is free to draw his own inferences and conclusions from the rich data here presented.

The Picture Book of Sculpture. By Harold and Mary Fowler. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This book is intended to interest children in sculpture and give them some understanding of it. There are illustrations representative of the work of different countries and periods, accompanied by clear, interesting, and undogmatic descriptions of the pieces and schools. The only fault is an inadequate representation of modern work.

Tu Fu: The Autobiography of a Chinese Poet. Arranged from his Poems, and Translated by Florence Ayscough. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

By arranging his verse in a sequence which records and comments upon his own development and piecing out the gaps with her notes, Mrs. Ayscough contrives to give us an autobiography of the Tang poet whom the Chinese regard as "the Master." The book is additionally valuable for its coincidental treatment of Chinese poetry and history, but Mrs. Ayscough's translations are somewhat too literal to give pleasure. There is to be a second and completing volume.

A Short History of Chinese Civilization. By Richard Wilhelm. The Viking Press. $4.

Compact, scholarly, and understanding, this rather short book contains the matter of a political history, a social history, a history of the arts, the literature, and the religions of China, and in three of these fields can displace the best previous book on the subject. All that may be said in objection is that at times the author is too reverential. The book is handsomely bound and superbly illustrated.

Films

Screen Musical Comedy

A GREAT deal can be said for as well as against the exact reproduction of a stage performance by means of the motion picture. But to stress this problem today would be to overlook the fact that the technical powers of the motion picture are still wholly inadequate for creating the illusion of a performance that is enacted within the walls of a theater. Nothing less than such an illusion can justify the use of the stage technique on the screen, and the penalty for ignoring this truth is a painful incongruity that often borders on the inept. Screen adaptations of musical comedies are particularly open to criticism on this score. This season the Hollywood workshops have been turning them out by the dozen, with the majority of them patterned faithfully after the stage model. In the few cases where music and dancing were incidental and woven more or less intelligently into the story, the pictures were at least bearable, and occasionally, as for instance "Sunny Side Up," even quite entertaining. It is, however, the attempt to adapt to the screen the conventional genre of the stage musical comedy that deserves greater consideration, in spite of the poverty of artistic thought which it represents.

□ THEATRES □ LUNCHEON □ LECTURES □

LEO BULGAKOV
THEATRE ASSOCIATES, INC., presents
AT THE BOTTOM
by MAXIM GORKY
New version by William L. Laurence
POPULAR PRICES $2.50 to 75c
Phone reservations accepted—Circle 1407
"Really worth seeing."—Brown, Post.
"A fine play" —Mantle, News.
WALDORF THEATRE—50th St., Bet. 6th & 7th Aves. Eve., 8:50
MATINEES Thursday and Saturday, 2:30

Kenneth Macgowan and J. V. Reed present
BASIL SYDNEY and MARY ELLIS
in CHILDREN of DARKNESS
A Rich Satire on Exploiters of All Ages
by Edwin Justus Mayer, author of "The Firebrand"
BILTMORE THEATRE—47th Street, West of Broadway
Evenings, 8:50—Mats., Wed. and Sat., 2:40.

City Haul By ELIZABETH MIELE
with HERBERT RAWLINSON
A COMEDY ON MUNICIPAL POLITICS
HUDSON THEATRE—44th St., E. of B'dway
Evenings 8:50. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday 2:40.

CIVIC REPERTORY 14th St.—6th Ave. Evenings, 8:30.
50c, $1, $1.50. Matinees Thursdays and Saturdays, 2:30.
EVA LE GALLIENNE, Director
Fri.Eve.,Jan.31, "A Sunny Morning" & "L'Invitation au Voyage"; Mon.Eve.,Feb.3, "The Sea Gull"; Tues.Eve., Feb.4 & Thurs.Mat.,Feb.6, "The Open Door" & "Women Have Their Way"; Wed.Eve.,Feb.5, "The Living Corpse"; Thurs.Eve.,Feb.6, "Hedda Gabler." Seats four weeks in advance at Box Office and Town Hall, 113 West 43rd Street.

WILLIAM HARRIS, JR., PRESENTS
"THE FIRST PLAY OF THE SEASON WITH TEETH IN IT."
ROBERT LITTELL, WORLD.
CRIMINAL CODE
By MARTIN FLAVIN with ARTHUR BYRON
NATIONAL THEATRE 41st St., West of 7th Ave. Evenings 8:50
Matinees Wednesdays & Saturdays, 2:30

ETHEL BARRYMORE Theatre, 47th St., West of Broadway
Evenings 8:50; Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:30
LEE SHUBERT Presents
PHILIP MERIVALE
IN
DEATH TAKES A HOLIDAY
A COMEDY ABOUT LIFE
"BRAVE, AUDACIOUS, PROVOCATIVE"—Robert Garland, Telegram

The Actor-Managers, Inc., has the honor to present
RUTH DRAPER in her ORIGINAL CHARACTER SKETCHES
Every Eve. including Sunday (except Mon. & Thurs. nights) at 8:50
COMEDY THEATRE, 41st East of Broadway. Mats., Thurs. and Sat., 2:30. VERY GOOD SEATS at $1.00.

The Theatre Guild Presents
METEOR
By S. N. BEHRMAN
Guild THEA., 52nd St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

The Theatre Guild Presents
RED RUST
By KIRCHON & OUSPENSKY
Martin Beck THEA., 45th St. W. of 8th Ave.
Evgs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs & Sat. 2:40

SEVENTH SATURDAY LUNCHEON
of the New York Chapter
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
at the HOTEL WOODSTOCK
12:45 P.M., Saturday, Feb. 8, 1930
The Prisoner in Revolt—A Challenge to the Nation
Speakers:
JOHN BLACK, Ex-prisoner
HASTINGS HART, Former President, American Prison Association
Chairman: BENJAMIN STOLBERG
Make reservations in advance at the office of the L.I.D., 112 East 19th Street, New York City—Algonquin 5865.
MEMBERS $1.00 NON-MEMBERS $1.25
Listen in on WEAF, 1:45 P. M., Eastern Standard Time.

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 East 15th St. Alg. 3094
NORMAN THOMAS Tues., Feb. 4
"PROBLEMS OF AMERICAN SOCIALISM" 8:30
DOUGLAS HASKELL Wed., Feb. 5
"THE STRUGGLE OF ROMANTIC ART" 8:30
MARK STARR Wed., Feb. 5
"BRITISH LABOR PARTY" 7-10
DOMINIC d'EUSTACHIO Thurs., Jan. 30
"SCIENCE AND CIVILIZATION 8:30
ABEN KANDEL Tues., Jan. 28
"CENSORS AS CRITICS" 7:00

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY
in the City of New York
UNIVERSITY EXTENSION
The Institute of Arts and Sciences
announces
Three Free Lectures
on CRIME Its Treatment, Prevention and Cure
by
Dr. ALFRED ADLER
Eminent Viennese Psychologist
McMILLIN ACADEMIC THEATER
N. E. Corner Broadway and 116th Street
Friday evenings, Feb. 7, 14, 21.
Also
A Course of 14 Lectures on
INDIVIDUAL PSYCHOLOGY (Fee $10.00)
Tuesday Afternoons at 4:15 beginning February 4
and
A Course of 7 Lectures on
SELECTED PERSONAL PROBLEMS (Fee $5.00)
Wednesday Mornings at 10:30 beginning February 5

Films, lectures, etc., continued on next page

It scarcely needs pointing out that the conventions of musical comedy derive whatever meaning they have from being a frank entertainment on a stage that is physically connected with the audience. The characters suddenly breaking into song or forming themselves into dancing columns are never anything more than mere actors whose only concern is to entertain those who are watching their performance. For its part the audience expects from them nothing more. It disregards the absurdities of the plot or the antics of the characters, because it never associates them with real life.

The screen imitators of musical comedy seem to be ignorant of this essential relationship between the actor and the spectator. They place their characters in perfectly natural surroundings, introduce them as perfectly normal people, and then make them behave as if they were escaped lunatics. Far be it from me to suggest that highly conventionalized acting is impossible on the screen. On the contrary, it is one of the things that the motion picture needs most, but the convention used must spring from the peculiar properties of the latter and not from those of the stage. Today the screen, in the strict sense of the term, is merely a neutral surface for carrying images, and only helps to emphasize the gap which divides the picture from the audience. But it is the only possible link between the two, and to make this link perform its liaison service the visual images must be hitched to the screen. In other words the screen must become a physical reality in the eyes of the audience, a part of the theater building which provides the graphic frame of reference for the very being of characters in space, as well as for the form in which they are presented to view. By this means a motion picture will not merely be demonstrated, but will actually be performed before the spectator, and a basis will be supplied for conventionalized acting of every kind, including that of musical comedy.

The absence of such cinematic approach in "The Love Parade" (Criterion) is particularly regrettable, for apart from its treatment of singing this picture is a very remarkable achievement in cinematic comedy. The surprising thing about "The Love Parade" is that its most telling comic effects are produced not by Mr. Chevalier's acting, which in this picture is only moderately good, but by the deft juxtaposition and contrast of scenes provided by Mr. Lubitsch's direction. In the field of light comedy Hollywood has no greater master than Mr. Lubitsch.

One wishes there were the same avoidance of the obvious in "Sally" (Winter Garden). The picture shows the charming personality of Miss Marilyn Miller to some advantage but is a routine piece of work in all other respects.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Drama

Direct from Moscow

SOME weeks ago the junior members of the Theater Guild were permitted to have their fling, and chose for the occasion the Soviet drama "Red Rust." The production has achieved a greater popularity than perhaps even the parties concerned had hoped for, and those who would like to know what the contemporary Russian theater is like can get a very accurate idea by paying a visit to the Martin Beck. Certainly the essentially realistic spirit of the piece is far more typical of the Moscow drama as I saw it some eighteen months ago than are any of the futuristic extravaganzas more often talked of here; and certainly its precise, rather literal-minded earnestness is as far from the vague pretentiousness of the communistic plays written by American experimenters as it is characteristic of the contemporary Russian playwright. Even the unconventional devices used in staging the piece are not employed in the interest of eccentric aesthetic theories, but solely in order to make possible the introduction of significant representations of every-day scenes, and that, as I have always maintained, is the key to all that is most vital in the Soviet theater, for it is, essentially, a theater closer and more literally faithful to the contemporary life of its audience than any other theater in the world.

"Red Rust" concerns itself with the story of the downfall of a hypocrite—a hero of the revolution who is using his reputation and his gift for employing the catchwords of the new order for the purpose of furthering his selfish love of power. Moving against a background of tumultuous student life, it manages in the course of its action both to refer in some way or other to all the chief conflicts of opinion current in Soviet life and to offer a more stinging criticism of certain aspects of that life than those who have an exaggerated idea of the stringency of the communist censorship would believe possible. Its purpose is largely didactic, at least to the extent that it concerns itself with nothing which does not have an immediate social significance, and in that respect it certainly belongs to a type of drama pretty well played out in Western Europe and America, but, as no one who exposes himself to the tension and excitement of "Red Rust" can longer doubt, the Russians have revitalized the form. About their writing is a passion and an enthusiasm which inevitably take hold of even the spectator who has, in the abstract, no great interest in social experiment, and they indubitably make drama out of sociological material. Moreover, to say that is to say that they succeed where no other school of dramatists has succeeded in ten years past.

I suspect that the reason behind this fact lies less in the appearance of any outstanding genius than in the atmosphere in which the contemporary Russian lives, for that atmosphere is one generated by an intense and hopeful preoccupation with social questions. The thesis drama of Europe was, or at least soon became, a weary and hopeless thing. Its authors had scant faith that anything would be accomplished, and they tended almost inevitably to write plays which ended, not triumphantly or even tragically, but simply on a note of depression. In Russia, on the other hand, the form into which such plays naturally fall is the form of melodrama—with the villain foiled and the hero on top. Change, at least, as they know from experience, can come. The old order can pass, and even those who are farthest from believing that the millennium is about to arrive know that revolution is possible, and feel that where things can be different there is room to hope that they may be better. Hence revolutionary drama is real to them, and abstract questions of social justice seem immediately significant.

In many respects "Red Rust" is characteristically naive. Its most theatrically effective scene—the scene in which the villain practices his speech while eating his lunch and at its climax proclaims, "Arise, ye children of starvation," with a full mouth, and a sandwich and a bottle of beer in either outstretched hand—is elementary in its irony. Moreover, the happy end is brought about with an almost childish simplicity, and the final curtain descends upon one of those orgies of flag-waving which are almost inevitable in any Soviet play, even if only, as was perhaps here the case, in order to convince the censor that the author is at bottom soundly communistic. But naivete is permissible when it can justify itself by an effectiveness as great as this play achieves, and when it can interest, as "Red Rust" does, an audience so remote from its passions as an American audience must be. Incidentally, the junior members of the Guild have every reason to congratulate themselves on excellent acting and direction.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

□ FILMS □ LECTURES □ DEBATE □

A BITTER CHARGE AGAINST WAR!

"A FRAGMENT OF AN EMPIRE"

NEWEST SOVIET FILM

NOW

SECOND SENSATIONAL WEEK

Love-stirring story of a man broken by War, who lost his memory and found himself in a new world.

Heart-breaking agonies!

Gripping revelations of the cruelties of War!

R. K. O.
CAMEO THEATRE
42nd St. & Broadway
Wisconsin 1789

Continuous Performances

First American Showing beginning Sat., Feb. 1st.

The World Tours of the Prince of Wales

The engrossing and highly interesting official travel film of the tours of the Prince of Wales between 1920 and 1929.

55th St. Playhouse 55th St., East of 7th Ave. Continuous from noon to Midnight.

MATINEES: GOOD SEATS, ALL PRICES, AT BOX OFFICE

WARNER BROS. Present

GEORGE ARLISS

in

"DISRAELI"

(A Vitaphone All-Talking Picture)

CENTRAL THEATRE Daily 2:45—8:45
Broadway and 47th St. Sunday 3—6—8:45

FORUM ON CURRENT EVENTS

Saturday 2 P.M. Admission 25 cents

DR. IRA S. WILE February 1
Eminent Specialist in Child Psychology
"THE DELINQUENT CHILD AND THE DELINQUENT COMMUNITY"

SAILENDRA NATH GOSE February 8
American Representative Indian National Council
"THE INDEPENDENCE OF INDIA"

WM. H. BRIDGE February 12
Creative Psychology

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 E. 15th St. Algonquin 3094

A Momentous 3-Cornered DEBATE!!!

Which Offers More to the Workers of the World?

COMMUNISM, or SOCIALISM, or CAPITALISM?

Scott NEARING says Communism
Noted Sociologist and Lecturer

Fenner BROCKWAY says Socialism
Brilliant Labor Member of British Parliament

Prof. Edwin R. A. SELIGMAN says Capitalism
Foremost Economist, Columbia University

Chairmen, SAMUEL UNTERMYER & ROGER N. BALDWIN

SUBJECT

RESOLVED: That Capitalism offers more to the workers of the world than Socialism or Communism.

THIS SUNDAY, FEB. 2, 1930—8:30 P. M.
MECCA TEMPLE—133 W. 55TH STREET

Reserved Seats $1.00, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00 & $2.75

Obtainable at Civic Club, 18 E. 10th Street; Columbia University Bookstore; Rand School Bookstore; 7 E. 15th Street, and New School Bookshop, 465 W. 23rd Street.

Also at offices of
LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION
11 W. 42nd St. Chickering 5789 or Spring 1716

Tickets on sale at Mecca Temple Box Office—Phone Circle 1795

Starting this Sat., Feb. 1st

ANNIVERSARY PROGRAM

EXTRAORDINARY TRIPLE-FEATURE PROGRAM!!!

VICTOR HUGO'S
Immortal Drama

"LES MISERABLES"

a powerful film-version of the French Revolution enacted in the actual locale of the story by a cast of 10,000.

—and on the same program—

EVOLUTION

a comprehensive cinema-exposition of the theory of man's derivation, by the producers of the "EINSTEIN THEORY" film.

Added Attraction

—

(American Premiere)

H. G. WELLS'

"DAY-DREAMS"

—a screen, fantasy by the famous English Utopian—

FILM GUILD CINEMA

Direction: Symon Gould
52 West 8th St., bet. 5th and 6th Aves.

Popular Prices Spring 5095-5090

Continuous Daily Noon to Midnight
Special Forenoon Prices: Sat.-Sun., 12-2—50c.
Weekdays, 12-2—35c.

Last 2 Days—Thurs., Fri., Jan. 30-31st—LILLIAN GISH in "THE WIND" and "THE KAISER IN WAR AND PEACE."

International Relations Section

Fascist Finance

By FRANCESCO NITTI

THE following article on the present economic situation in Italy is reprinted from the Manchester Guardian Weekly of January 3. Its author, Francesco Nitti, is an eminent economist and was Prime Minister and Minister of Finance of Italy prior to the Fascist regime. He is now in exile.

It is very difficult to procure exact information as to the finance of countries under a dictatorship. There is no check; parliamentary documents are valueless; the censored press inspires no confidence. What can be said, however, is that dictatorship finance is always bad. . . .

There are very alarming symptoms in Italy. The real conditions of credit and industry are evidenced by the bills of exchange protested and the drafts not honored at due date: the number was 306,703 in 1922, just before the arrival of Fascism, and 743,972 in 1928. Declarations of bankruptcy are being avoided as far as possible; the courts are very tolerant. But the number of bankruptcies has increased in the same period from 3,828 to 12,103. A large number of banks have failed, and the most important industries are in difficulties. According to the Bulletin Statistique of the League of Nations, last August Italy had 1,204 bankruptcies, Germany 845, France 811, the United Kingdom 357 and 286 windings-up of companies, and so on. Bearing in mind that Italian industry is only a small fraction of the industry of Britain, Germany, or France, the extreme gravity of the situation which has been produced through the suppression of all economic liberty is clear. The New York Wall Street Journal has examined the situation of the security market in Italy. Everything is controlled. Sales are not free, and quotations are purely artificial. Stockbrokers are compelled to send in returns of sellers. Stockbrokers in Rome have been imprisoned simply for having said that the quotations for certain securities ought to be lower. In spite of this, government stocks are falling every day; and even this is paradoxical. The result of every stabilization has been to raise the prices of government securities. In France and Belgium there were rapid increases in price after stabilization. In Italy no one believes in the stabilization of the lira, and ,government stocks are falling daily although the existing prices are artificial.

	3½ per cent stock	5 per cent consolidated
1924	83.55	97.28
1925	76.29	94.49
1926	68.50	90.00
1927	66.49	79.08
1928	73.32	84.16
1929 (present price)	67.50	80.45

(The present prices include the December coupons, 1.75 for the 3½ per cent and 2.50 for consols.)

It is well known that the word of the Fascist Government is of very restricted value. In November, 1926, it did not pay the treasury bonds which fell due, and compulsorily converted 23,504,000 of treasury bonds into a consolidated loan which had to be accepted at a very high price that is constantly falling. In 1931, 7,000,000 more treasury bonds will fall due, and it is known already that they will not be able to be redeemed.

The thing which has especially upset economic conditions in Italy has been the stabilization of the lira.... Stabilization was effected at an absurd level on December 21, 1927. In the decree of stabilization the pound sterling was fixed at 92.46 lire and the dollar at 19.10. In round figures Italy stabilized at about 1 to 3½ of gold parity, while France stabilized at 1 to 5 and Belgium at 1 to 7. Italy is much poorer than France and Belgium and her economic resources are very limited. This stabilization was a Bartholomew's Night for the national wealth. Its result was to render the taxation insupportable, the public debt excessively burdensome, and production very difficult. Expressed in gold, the central and local government expenditure in Italy is little less than that of France, which is at least three times richer.

In order to maintain the artificial level of the lira (which cannot be kept up indefinitely), loans have been contracted in America, and the industrialists have also been compelled to contract loans, the aggregate exceeding $500,000,000. Nearly 9,000,000,000 lire have been lost in the operations of the treasury. Debts have been piled up, piled up continually. In order still to keep the lira steady, recourse is now being had to the reserves of the Banca d'Italia, the only bank of issue. The bank's reserves of gold and of first-class foreign securities fell from 12,516,000,000 lire in March, 1927, to 10,240,000,000 at the end of September, 1929. It is not to be supposed that this reserve actually exists in gold and securities. The figure is calculated in "paper gold," that is, by multiplying the actual quantity of gold or securities by the stabilization quota. The real reserve was equivalent eighteen months ago to £623,000,000, and has since dropped to the equivalent of £510,000,000.[*] It is falling daily, and it is almost impossible to get credits abroad.

The trade balance has continually gone from bad to worse; the balance of foreign payments is menacing and is making it impossible to sustain the existing rate of the lira.

	Imports	Exports	Deficit
		(In millions of lire)
1924	19,381	16,529	2,852
1925	26,200	21,015	5,184
1927	20,375	15,632	4,743
1928	21,920	14,559	7,361
1929 (first 8 months)	14,675	9,593	5,082

(Gazzetta Ufficiale, February 21 and October 21, 1929.)

The present year shows virtually the same deficit as 1928. Thus in five years the deficit has grown in round figures from £140,000,000 to £250,000,000. Italy is no longer a creditor but a debtor country.

The merchant marine is passing through a severe crisis. Its revenues are only of limited importance. In the past the balance of payments was made good from two big sources of revenue. The more important of these was the money sent home by Italian emigrants. The other source was the expenditure of tourists; it has fallen nearly 40 per cent. . . .

Italian emigrants are almost all anti-Fascist workers, and have no sympathy with the government and no confidence in the stability of the lira. The export of money is not free. But the rich Italians are convinced that the stabilization is only transitory, and that the lira will fall. They are secretly sending abroad all that they can dispose of.

What is the cause of this situation? It lies primarily in the heavy expenditure of the dictatorship. In order to maintain itself in power it has had to increase the public expenditure, undertake useless works, and appease a large number of discontented people. The state budget is an insoluble puzzle. There is no real budget, since the government can do what it will by decree. Since the decree of June 5, 1926, a series of tricks have been resorted to to dissemble the expenditure. There are a large number of special accounts outside the budget. The current budget, which showed a small deficit, has in reality a deficit of nearly 2,000,000,000 lire.

---

[*] At 92.46 lire to the pound sterling, these figures would work out at £135,000,000 and £111,000,000.—EDITOR THE NATION.

The waste is so serious that even under the Fascist regime an interesting document, the Report of the General Commission of the Budget, presented to the Chamber on June 11 last, was compelled to admit them. This document admitted (page 30) that the real military expenditure had more than doubled between 1922-23 and 1927-28. Alongside the army, navy, and air service, there are six special militias for the defense of Fascism, with an enormous personnel. The police expenditure is three times as heavy as in France. According to the budget commission, the interest on the public debt increased from 4,134,000,000 lire in 1922-23 to 4,674,000,000 in 1927-28; the expenditure on the state employees and functionaries from 3,558,000,000 to 4,376,000,000; the expenditure on pensions (Fascism has dismissed the best officials in order to make room for its faithful supporters) from 359,000,000 to 753,000,000; on the civil services (including personnel) from 3,257,000,000 to 4,745,000,000, and so on. Expenditure in the colonies has gone to so absurd a length that it amounts now to the equivalent of nearly £50 per head of the native population. . . .

Fascism has to spend lavishly; not only for its heavy military requirements, its swollen police, its six special militias, but hundreds of millions of lire on continual and very active propaganda abroad. The discussion in the American Senate on the subject of the publications of Harper's Magazine is very interesting in this connection. Expenditure is incurred for purely political purposes in Austria, Hungary, and the Balkans. Albania has been armed, and in this poor and ill-endowed country more than £60,000,000 have been spent. . . .

VISIT RUSSIA
Short, low rate Winter trips from $280 Up
Including round trip passage and a five day complete service and sightseeing in Leningrad and Moscow.
AMALGAMATED BANK
Travel Dept.
11-15 Union Square, N. Y. C. or
Amalgamated Trust & Savings Bank
111 West Jackson Blvd.
Chicago, Ill.
For information on Spring and Summer trips, write for booklet "N."

ATHEISM
Book catalogue FREE. Set of tracts, 10c.
American Association for Advancement of Atheism, Inc.
119 E. 14th St. New York, N. Y.

The Luxury of Leisure
LLOYD CABIN QUARTET
BERLIN
STUTTGART
MUENCHEN
DRESDEN
To England, Ireland, France, Bremen
The Gaiety of Speed
LLOYD EXPRESS
*BREMEN
EUROPA
COLUMBUS
To England, France, Bremen
* World's fastest Liner
Every Lloyd Liner Carries Tourist Third
NORTH GERMAN LLOYD
57 Broadway New York, or your local agent

Visits to Soviet Russia
FOURTH SEASON

EXPLORATIVE itineraries worked out with reference to social, economic, historic, artistic and scenic features.
Visits to factories, schools, children's communities, collective farms and villages . . . art treasures, palaces and workers' rest homes . . . for the adventurous . . . camping in the Caucasus and study of primitive tribes.
Small groups, each accompanied by a qualified American leader and Russian interpreter. From $395 including express steamship passage. Literature available.
Individual itineraries also executed ▲ Independent year-round representation in Russia
20-30 WEST 43rd STREET ▲ NEW YORK
THE OPEN ROAD

FOR THOSE WHO SEEK THE THRILL OF DISCOVERY IN GOOD BOOKS

A MAGIC PASS TO HOURS OF DELIGHTFUL ENTERTAINMENT, THRILLING ADVENTURE AND years of appreciative ownership

On January 30th

We Announce for Publication—A Limited Edition of the New Dutton Spring Catalog in de luxe illustrated form

You can obtain your copy, with our compliments, at no expense to yourself (THAT IS; as long as they last)

IN ORDER TO AVOID THE DULLNESS OF MOST CATALOGS, WE PRESENT A RADICAL DEPARTURE FROM THE CONVENTIONAL FORM

Cover Design by Henriette Price

E. P. DUTTON & CO., Inc., 300 Fourth Avenue, NEW YORK

☐ FOR RENT ☐

FURNISHED ROOMS

Manhattan Beach Hotel

Manhattan Beach, N. Y. C.

LIVE in a modern fireproof hotel by the seashore for less than in the crowded city—$9.00 per week and up for one; $12.00 per week and up for two. All hotel services included. Tennis and handball courts. 37 minutes from Times Square (B.M.T. Brighton Beach Station). Phone Sheepshead 3000.

TEN minutes Wall Street, all subways, sunny front and bed room, attractive, redecorated, continuous hot water in room; also large rear hall room, facing garden. Moderate. 289 Dean St., Brooklyn. Triangle 7743.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

SITUATED midtown, young woman (Semitic) desires to share her interesting studio apartment (two rooms and kitchenette) with one or two congenial persons; pleasant atmosphere; extremely reasonable rental. Evenings Cathedral 9414.

RESTAURANT

CAFE INTRO

249 EAST 13th St.—Close to 2nd Ave.

An eating place of distinction

—And a lot of it—

A quiet place for a rendezvous

Chess Conversation

OPEN SHELF

THAT BOOK YOU WANT! We hold 2,000,000 of the best books—new, second-hand, out-of-print, rare—all subjects. Also Sets of Authors. Catalogues free (25 issued). Outline requirements and interests. Books sent on approval. FOYLES, Charing Cross Rd., London, Eng.

BOOK MANUSCRIPTS

Wanted—Let us publish your book. The best service at lowest cost. MEADOR PUBLISHING CO., 27 Beach St., Boston, Mass.

DEMOCRATIC YOUTH

To help and encourage democratic youth to take its proper part in practical politics, to assist in making our government more intelligently progressive, is the purpose of Democratic Youth. Published monthly at West Liberty, Ky., for young idealists who still believe in democracy. Edited by Rosco Brong. Dime brings sample copy. Four months' trial subscription for 25c.

POSITIONS WANTED

RHYTHMICS councillor, progressive children's camp, in general vicinity of New York. Apt. 1, 491 3rd St., Bklyn., N. Y. South 6963.

HARVARD law student desires job for summer; experienced chauffeur, lifeguard, swimming instructor, hotel clerk, waiter, and tutor. Anything will do. What have you? Box 2287, % The Nation.

CULTURED German lady, 36 years, trained registered nurse, college graduate, experienced traveler, good housekeeper, unencumbered, wishes position. Box 2288, % The Nation.

INSTRUCTOR of French, woman, open to engagement 1930-1931. Address Box 2289, % The Nation.

"TOO honest," comments one employer. With this handicap can you use and compensate experienced, capable, intelligent sales representative or branch manager who can assume responsibility. Box 2290, % The Nation.

YOUNG MAN, 23, cultured and refined, desires to associate with gentleman as his assistant in a capacity where MUSIC shall be the chief interest. Extensive musical and literary background. Box 2291, % The Nation.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS:
Mail your classified ads so they reach us Friday, to insure their appearance in the issue of THE NATION on the stands the following Thursday.
THE NATION 20 VESEY ST., N. Y.

☐ EDUCATIONAL ☐

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

PROGRAM—Jan. 31-Feb. 8

AT COOPER UNION

8th Street and Astor Place at 8 o'clock.
Admission Free.

Friday, Jan. 31—DR. EVERETT DEAN MARTIN—

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF PROGRESS

"Psychological Factors in the Evolution of Morals, Taboo, Intuition, Reason and the Idea of the 'Good.'"

ETHICS AND SOCIAL SCIENCE

Sunday, Feb. 2—Dr. Scott Buchanan—"Toward a Religion of Science."

NATURAL SCIENCE

Tuesday, Feb. 4—Dr. Gardner Murphy—"Psychology as the Science of Biography."

MUHLENBERG BRANCH LIBRARY

209 West 23rd St. at 8:30 o'clock.

Monday, Feb. 3—Mr. Nathaniel Peffer—"China: A Civilization in Disintegration." "The Real Problem of the Far East: Break-up of a Social Order."

Wednesday, Feb. 5—Dr. John Bartlett Brebner—Literature as Social History—"Where Literature Fails: The Half Told Tale."

Thursday, Feb. 6—Dr. E. G. Spaulding—The Ways and Means of Reasoning—"Reasoning in Aristotelian Logic: Terms, Propositions, Syllogisms."

Saturday, Feb. 8—Dr. Richard McKeon—The Old and the New Logic—"Experience and Self-Evident Truths."

Learn How To THINK

You Can Do Nothing More Important.
A RECENT DISCOVERY BY President L. W. RAPEER, Ph.D., LL.D.
How to Solve Life Problems
Write RESEARCH UNIVERSITY,
Washington, D. C.

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN, ENGLISH

Conversational method. Native teachers. Private lessons, 75c, short course, 9 to 9 daily. 18th year.

FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
1264 Lexington Avenue, N. W. Cor. 85th Street

UNIVERSAL INSTITUTE OF LANGUAGES ITALIAN—GERMAN FRENCH—SPANISH

Private lessons 75c (Daily 9-9). Native teachers. Simplified conversational method. 18 years' experience. Also neglected English education. 1265 Lexington Ave., Northeast Cor. 85th St.

FRENCH INSTRUCTION

FRENCH—modern instruction suited individual needs, or small group, by professional young native. Evenings. Rates fair—depending on kind and length lessons. Box 2268, % The Nation.

DISCUSSION

THE GROUP
A Clearing House of Opinion
meets at Auditorium—150 West 85th St.
Tuesday, February 4th, at 8:30 P.M.
DR. FRITZ WITTELS
(Distinguished Psycho-Analyst)
will speak on:
"THE HYSTERICAL CHARACTER"

Sunday afternoon at 4 P.M. (Feb. 9th)
Informal Discussion Group
SEYMOUR A. SELIGSON
will speak on:
"WILL THE SUPERMAN OR THE MORON SURVIVE?"
Tea will be served.
Admission 50c Organized 1918

The Nation
FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1930 No. 3371

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 165
EDITORIALS:
  "Destructive and Never Constructive" 168
  Spanish Dictatorship 169
  Investigate Mr. Garvan! 169
  Rats and Profs 170
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 171
DIVORCE—AND AFTER: I. CHILDREN AND PROPERTY. By Morris Ernst 172
BOULDER DAM DYNAMITE. By Paul Y. Anderson 173
THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE CENSOR: II. "OBNOXIOUS BOOKS." By Henry Raymond Mussey 175
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 178
CORRESPONDENCE 178
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
  Aristocracy Declines in Hungary 180

MIDWINTER BOOK SECTION

ALL TOO HUMANISM. By Henry Hazlitt 181
THE TWENTIES IN AMERICAN LITERATURE. By Granville Hicks 183
REVIEWS AND POEMS:
  Lincoln and His Fate. By Allen Tate 185
  A Man's Book. By Florence Codman 186
  More Farewells to War. By Clifton P. Fadiman 186
  To One Under a Mountain Cloud. By Witter Bynner 187
  Sanctuary. By Babette Deutsch 187
  Salt in the Sauce. By Carl Van Doren 188
  Herbert Read, Critic. By C. Hartley Grattan 188
  As If a Skeleton Were Singing. By Mark Van Doren 190
  Martin Luther. By Karl F. Geiser 191
  A Comedy of Errors. By Alexander Goldenweiser 192
  The Testament of Beauty. By Eda Lou Walton 193
  History and Warning. By Henry G. Alsberg 196
  A Modern Don Quixote. By H. Sheehy Skeffington 197
  Books in Brief 199
  Music: Opera in English? By Hubbard Hutchinson 201
  Drama: Retrospect. By Joseph Wood Krutch 202
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 204

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
DRAMATIC EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE SERIOUS ILLNESS of Chief Justice Taft, which has led him to resign his high office, will be the occasion of universal regret among his countrymen, who in spite of all differences of judgment have yet held him in high honor and esteem. In nominating Charles Evans Hughes as his successor, President Hoover has missed one of his greatest opportunities for public service. The entire career of Mr. Hughes since his first term as governor of New York has been a perpetual disappointment to thoughtful liberals. An able lawyer indeed, he yet has a narrowness of understanding, an unteachable stubbornness, and an arid self-righteousness that disqualify him for high judicial service, as his record in the Supreme Court and during subsequent years indicates. When he left the supreme bench to grasp at the bauble of the Presidency, he dragged in the dust the court's proud tradition of aloofness from political ambition. He sat in the Harding Cabinet with his lips sealed during all those years when the Ohio gang and Albert B. Fall were dragging down that Administration to a well-nigh unprecedented level of infamy and disgrace. His conduct of our foreign affairs was marked by a narrow and uncomprehending insistence at all costs on the most extreme interpretation of American property rights, notably in our oil diplomacy and our relations with Mexico and Russia. His appointment to the Supreme Court at this time when a learned, intelligent, and liberal-minded jurist is so sorely needed is little less than a public disaster.

RUMOR AND COUNTER-RUMOR go out from London, where the delegates to the naval conference are now buckling down to work. It seems to be agreed, however, that the chances are excellent at least for postponement until 1936 of battleship replacements provided under the Washington treaty, and the immediate reduction of British, American, and Japanese capital ships to numbers which, under that agreement, would not have been reached before 1936. The welcome news also comes that Great Britain proposes to drop from its building program two more cruisers in addition to the Northumberland and the Surrey, making four in all. This is encouraging evidence that the MacDonald Government has faith in the outcome of the negotiations. Such evidence is perhaps more informing than the jockeying of the delegates for position, for, as John L. Balderston points out in a special cable to the World, "when it comes to figures, our delegation, like every other, must take a nationalistic position, and thereby will incur sharp criticism." The demands of the technical experts in the various delegations should not be allowed to override the judgment of the statesmen in the conference, who see that security is not to be attained simply by the process of building more ships or of persuading other nations to build fewer. The task of the conference is at bottom political and not purely naval.

FREEDOM FOR THE FILIPINOS has now become the football of purely selfish interests. The American sugar barons and others affected by the competition of the islands are pressing hard for their release from American control in order to put on tariffs against their products. On the other hand the Hawaiian planters are making the most urgent representations that if the Filipinos are to be excluded in the future under our immigration laws Hawaii will be ruined by lack of adequate labor. California has for the moment transferred its dislike of the Japanese to the Filipinos, of whom no fewer than 13,000 are now residing in that State and menacing the lives and the happiness of the 4,400,000 white Americans who reside there. Filipino homes have been bombed and riots have occurred; in addition, Filipinos have been barred from all boxing-rings in California and are being ruled out of dance halls to which white women resort. Senator Johnson of that State has, by the way, distinguished himself by refusing to advocate the release of the islands on any other ground than justice to them. Representatives of three large agricultural organizations have come out for Philippine independence to help the American farmer, and the American Federation of Labor has swung into line. Senator Vandenburg, Republican, of Michigan, has just introduced a bill proposing the establishment of a "Commonwealth of the Philippines," with a scheme of progressive autonomy which will result in complete American withdrawal within ten years. This bill was referred to the Senate Committee on Insular Affairs, which is also considering the King bill for immediate independence. It really begins to look as if freedom for the islands might be in sight.

AS FOR HAITI, the Senate has refused the President his commission to investigate affairs there but has voted him $50,000 for any sort of analysis he chooses to make—at that price—of the island. It is doubtful if Mr. Hoover can get a good commission with all the necessary trimmings for the modest sum he may now spend. But as Senator Blaine of Wisconsin has pointed out more than once, with increasing bitterness each time, the facts with regard to Haiti are already at the President's disposal if he wishes to make use of them. The signs multiply that the Administration is more and more favorable to the withdrawal of our military power from the island as soon as possible. It would undoubtedly be a great step forward if General Russell were recalled. His panic at the time of the last bloodshed when he called for 500 additional marines has served at last to awaken Washington to the fact that he is not the man for the place. But Senator Blaine does little good to his cause by quoting, in his remarks on the Haitian commission, from a speech by the newly appointed Senator Grundy—made before he entered the Senate—in which he disparaged Mr. Hoover's legislative experience. More to the point is Senator Blaine's remark that the only achievement to which the American officials in Haiti can point with pride is the fine system of roads, "built so that Americans can speed through the country in high-powered cars." There is no doubt that we have been in Haiti too long. A commission could only tell us to get out.

ANOTHER POWER GRAB threatens to be consummated shortly unless Assistant Commissioner Scattergood of the Indian Bureau succeeds in his stalwart effort to defeat it. Last August the Federal Power Commission indicated its readiness to turn over to the Montana Power Company five sites on the Flathead River, in northwestern Montana, acquired by the Indians by treaty in 1859 and reserved to the tribe when the rest of the reservation was opened to settlement. Later statutes and executive orders guaranteed to the Indians the full amount of rentals from licenses under the Federal Power Act. In 1927 the Indian Bureau or some of its members, under the previous commissioner, instigated an agreement, to which the Federal Power Commission and the Montana Power Company were parties, under which the rentals were to be divided and the Indians allotted a minority share, but this high-handed and illegal transaction was upset by Congress, partly in 1928 and finally in 1929. The Federal Commission is now considering the award to the Montana Power Company of the power rights for an annual rental of about $100,000, a sum which Mr. Scattergood, in an able cross-examination of the power-company representatives at recent hearings, showed should be at least twice as great. The spectacle of an official of the Indian Bureau actually trying to obtain for the Indians the rights of which the Bureau sought to deprive them has been so unusual as to raise hopes that Mr. Scattergood, who has no fear of corporations before his eyes, may be able to prevent the gross injustice that is apparently planned.

THE MOST SHAMELESS piece of repudiation we have seen in a long time was committed the other day by President Green of the American Federation of Labor. In an address at Richmond, on January 26, Mr. Green said:

> We were not in Marion, North Carolina, when six lives were lost, nor in Gastonia when Communists appeared and an officer of the law was killed. Had the A. F. of L. been operating in those communities, these tragedies would not have occurred.

This statement is quoted from the Richmond Times-Dispatch of January 27, and has been confirmed by responsible persons in Richmond. It is impossible to think that Mr. Green did not believe what he said; accordingly it can only be that he was grievously misinformed. For the sake of his own reputation and that of the American labor movement, it is a pity that someone did not point out to Mr. Green the following facts with regard to Marion, North Carolina: Workers in Marion started organizing in the spring of 1929, called in an organizer of the United Textile Workers, the A. F. of L. organization in the textile industry, and were granted a charter by the U. T. W. The strike begun on July 11, 1929, was conducted under the supervision of the national office of the U. T. W. Shortly before the settlement of the strike an A. F. of L. organizer, Edward F. McGrady, was in Marion and discussed the terms of settlement with the employers and representatives of the governor of the State. The settlement made by Alfred Hoffmann, the U. T. W. representative, was along the lines indicated by McGrady. When this settlement was ignored by the head of the Marion Manufacturing Company, two vice-presidents of the North Carolina State Federation of Labor, also an A. F. of L. organization, helped with further negotiations. The U. T. W. has been taking part in the defense of the strikers under charges in connection with the strike and in the prosecution of deputy sheriffs who shot and killed various strikers. These are not all the facts that Mr. Green would do well to study, but they are enough. The A. F. of L. was at Marion, as it should have been. To deny it is to deny the federation the reason for its existence.

A YEAR AGO February 10 John Barkoski, coal miner, died of injuries sustained following his arrest by three coal-and-iron policemen employed by the Pittsburgh Coal Company. When Barkoski was brought to the hospital in which he died, Dr. Herbert M. Fleming examined him. This is his report:

> He was in a very critical condition, pulseless and unconscious. His left lung was perforated, several ribs were fractured, and he had a possible skull fracture. He was covered with bruises and bleeding from numerous cuts. He was bleeding at the mouth, his eyes were glassy, there was a depression in his head, and the left side of his chest was crushed in. His left lung had evidently collapsed. He was suffering from extreme shock and was on the verge of death, with heart action failing. There was also an injury to the abdomen, accompanied by paralysis of the intestinal tract.

A few months later the company "settled" with Mrs. Barkoski for $13,500. Last fall the three policemen were acquitted of second-degree murder in connection with Barkoski's death at a trial which was described in our issue of October 16. Two of these men, Walter J. Lyster and Harold P. Watts, have now been convicted of involuntary manslaughter, though Watts admitted that he had struck Barkoski "more than twenty times" on the head. The third policeman, Frank Slapikis, was acquitted on the same charge. "Involuntary manslaughter!" One hesitates to think what might, in Pennsylvania, constitute murder in the first degree.

THE PRESS LORDS, as they are jovially known in Great Britain, stubbed their toe sharply in putting forward once more the plan for a protective ring fence around the empire with free trade inside. The proponents of similar measures have been beaten so often and so disastrously that it takes courage to bring forward the ill-fated proposal again. None the less, the empire must be saved by the method of reserving the empire market for the British manufacturer, so Beaverbrook, to the accompaniment of applause from Rothermere, once more trotted out the old scheme in the form of a motion that the "opinion of the House of Commons is that the empire should be developed as a single economic unit with internal free trade as the ideal, and that His Majesty's Government be urged to open negotiations with other governments of the empire with a view to the formulation of a policy designed to secure that the purchasing power of the empire shall be directed primarily to the full employment of the inhabitants of the empire." In the debate in the Commons the proposal got support of a kind from half a dozen Conservative backbenchers, but Stanley Baldwin was absent and Winston Churchill, the only important Conservative leader present, said not a word. In the debate Lloyd George declared that there were only two objections to the scheme. The dominions will have nothing to do with it because they want to protect their own manufacturers against the mother country, and England will not touch it because it involves putting a tax on food and materials coming from outside the empire, and she cannot afford that luxury. Mr. Snowden, for the Government, rejected the whole plan. The debate was so annihilating that no one even ventured to call for a vote.

ON JANUARY 30 (two weeks too late) Arthur L. Endicott, Controller of Harvard University, gave out a press statement explaining the discharge of the cleaning women from Widener Library described by Gardner Jackson in our issue of January 29. It had nothing to do with wages, but was in pursuance of a policy adopted last April of replacing women by men. At that time the Minimum Wage Commission was notified of the proposed change. Just why it was thought necessary to notify the commission, unless that body had been objecting to the employment of women at less than the prescribed minimum, Mr. Endicott does not explain. He does specifically state that the discharge of some of the women was hastened by the receipt on December 18 of a peremptory notice from the commission threatening to publish the name of the university as a non-complying employer if on December 26 any of the women were still being employed at less than the prescribed minimum of thirty-seven cents an hour. Nor does Mr. Endicott deny that up to December 18 last the university had been paying its cleaning women less than the thirty-seven-cent rate fixed as the minimum by commission decree as far back as February 1, 1921. While Mr. Endicott's statement, then, perhaps rubs off some of the sharp corners, it does not, so far as we can see, put the university's employment policy or its legal position in any more favorable light. What it does do is to indicate that the controller's office is run with more brains and finesse than were displayed in the blundering statement of facts with which President Lowell spilled the beans in his letter of December 30.

GREAT EVENTS MAY FOLLOW upon a little-noticed decision of Judge Norman L. Jones of Illinois refusing to dissolve a court order under which the officials of the Illinois district of the United Mine Workers' Union were protected from summary discharge by the International President, John L. Lewis. Into the details of the bitter quarrel between President Lewis and the State organization we have not space to go. It is enough to say that the trouble arose out of Mr. Lewis's inability to control the Illinois miners' organization as he wished and from his settled policy of crushing all potential rivals in his union by fair means or foul. The controversy has brought to light the tragic breakdown, under President Lewis's leadership, of a once mighty union. Oscar Ameringer's vigorous pen in the Illinois Miner has exposed a shocking debacle. A union that in 1921 had 515,243 members had in 1928 only 269,425. It still holds the anthracite field in Pennsylvania, but its strength is almost completely broken in all the bituminous fields except Illinois. If the powerful Illinois organization wins its fight it is probable that Lewis will have to go or that the union will be split. If the Illinois miners will now adopt progressive policies there is a very good chance that first in the United Mine Workers' Union and afterward in the whole A. F. of L. they may be the successful pioneers for a new and more adequate labor program.

A SAD SPECTACLE was enacted the other day at the Bronx Zoo in New York City. The date was February 2; the principal actors were one ground-hog in a state of captivity, one Head Keeper, and six assorted boy scouts, newspaper photographers, and mildly interested bystanders. The performance, of course, was to illustrate the old legend that on February 2 if the ground-hog, emerging from his hole, sees his own shadow, he at once digs himself under again and the inhabitants of this hemisphere are plagued with six weeks more of winter. But the New York ground-hog was so completely enervated by the refinements of captivity as to be incapable of digging his own hole. The Head Keeper performed this office for him. Then, with cameras trained on him, he (the ground-hog) was released in the vicinity of the artificial hole. He observed his shadow well enough, but the hole he would have none of. When he was forcibly thrust into it he emerged several fractions of a second ahead of the fastest-clicking camera shutter on record. Thus the advent of spring remained unannounced and the photographers went home without a picture. To our mind the ground-hog was the only member of the party who acted like a sensible human being. We commend the whole matter to the attention of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

"Destructive and Never Constructive"

THIS is the reason just given by a reader for failing to renew his subscription to The Nation. It is a criticism familiar enough to every editor who ventures to exercise his critical faculty, and it is usually welcome as proof that the editor's criticisms are making themselves felt sufficiently to disturb the equanimity of some persons. Indeed, the phrase has become a shallow slogan, a canting bit of superficial thinking, an easy bromidic formula for those who neither ponder deeply nor rise above the banalities. It has never been long absent from our mail despite the most ardent championship of numerous reforms, of many new points of view, of much worth-while legislation, of a whole group of policies many of which, such as woman suffrage, have long ago become the law of the land. In this last case we welcome the recurrence of the charge because it gives us the opportunity, not of defending ourselves, nor of pointing out that to be constructive one must, like the builder who replaces one structure with another, first tear down the old one, but of restating our position with a special view to the present political situation and the coming Congressional elections.

We pointed out last week the complete dominance of economics in the activities of Congress, and the prospect that this tendency will not decrease but increase; that more and more the public and its representatives must deal with questions of business and the control thereof by the government. The greater the growth of our colossal capitalistic structure, the greater the need of protecting the people and their birthright from the aggressions of Big Business, the greater will become the preponderance of purely business issues in our legislation and the necessity of pressing for economic reforms. Among these we list first a radical and far-reaching lowering of the tariff and the ending of the tariff graft as the most constructive method of aiding the farmers and the manufacturers, not to mention the creditor nations which must repay us the huge sums they owe for loans and, in the case of Germany, reparations. Nothing, we believe, would do more to aid the country to dispose of that surplus production which begins to threaten the progress of industry and agriculture because it can not be marketed abroad at adequate prices. Closely coupled with this is the question of the unemployed, now numbering, according to the American Federation of Labor, not fewer than 3,000,000 souls. In 1921 President Harding's Conference on Unemployment brought in a most admirable analysis of the subject. Nothing was done about it. Once more we urge the necessity of a comprehensive unemployment program, embodying the findings of the past ten years, to meet this growing menace.

Next in importance comes inevitably the question of power. Our attitude on this needs no restatement, but every hour renders more vital the saving of what is left of the country's resources. It is almost too late; but he who would do constructive service can ask for no more useful field for patriotic activity—that is, if he favors, as we do, public control of the generation, transmission, and distribution of power. Each day brings proof that this is the greatest pending issue of the winter in Washington. It jumps out of every corner; it lurks behind several of the investigations, and it has been the source of the most dangerous propaganda of recent years. The rise of the power industries makes more parlous the plight of the coal mines. Hence we renew our suggestion that steps be taken, as in England, to reorganize the whole industry, to cut out the colossal waste, the foolish competition, the uneconomic delivery of coal to distant points instead of to nearby markets. As for our railways, for years past we have advocated government ownership and, if necessary, operation of railoads and pipe lines. The recent consolidation proposals have merely strengthened us in our conviction that no half-way measures will suffice; we are certain that if there were no anti-trust laws and no Interstate Commerce Commission the railroads themselves would before this have been in the hands of one gigantic holding company, as the steel companies would be in another.

We need not rehearse here the many measures for the benefit of the workers in industry which we have put forward. We agree that labor should be protected by social insurance from the hazards of accident, ill-health, unemployment, and old age, and be safeguarded in its right to collective bargaining; we are for militant, honest, and far-sighted leadership of the workers, in contrast with much of their present-day organization, and we favor their use of the political machinery to advance themselves. The Nation was founded in 1865 primarily to champion the rights of the then lately freed men and women of color, and has never ceased to do so in the field of either economics or politics. It is opposed to caste of any kind. It continues to seek equal rights for women, to uphold their right to their children and to economic and social independence. Finally, The Nation has demanded, as a measure of the highest value looking to the safety of America and the peace of the world, the immediate demilitarization of the United States. Here a destructive measure is in the highest degree constructive, if only because it would muster out those military and naval minds which menace personal liberty and freedom of thought, which have kept the country in a state of alarm as to war from the day when we acquired a great navy and enormously increased our army. We are, like all humane and thoughtful persons, for the substitution of conciliation, arbitration, and court processes for the utter folly, futility, and wickedness of war.

Why go on? Today we merely wish to urge again that the American people cease from being bamboozled any longer by the party Dromios of our politicial life. No real progress can come out of either of them; neither has a program in keeping with the changing conditions in our capitalistic life; both are alike in their present policies, the difference being, as we have said so often, merely one of degree. We trust that under the leadership of the League for Independent Political Action and similar bodies there will be a determined effort to put some true Progressives into the field next fall. There is Senator Norris seeking reelection in Nebraska; for him there should be a nation-wide rally, for his disappearance from the Senate would be a national calamity. But above all there are standards to be raised to which all men may repair.

Spanish Dictatorship

THE resignation of Primo de Rivera, dictator of Spain, and the installation of the Berenguer cabinet pledged to a return to constitutional government, very naturally encourage liberal hopes both in Europe and in America. But it would be a mistake to argue from this event that the era of dictatorship in Europe is passing, or that democracy is soon to come again into repute there. Most particularly it would be a mistake to found upon the de Rivera resignation any hope of the speedy dissolution of the Mussolini regime in Italy.

What has happened is merely this: General Primo de Rivera, who came into power as a result of a deal with other officers of the Spanish army, has not been clever enough, despite his control of government patronage, to keep his fellow-generals loyal. They have accordingly designated another general, as a result of another deal, and persuaded King Alfonso to accept him as premier. The new premier, seeking popular slogans as politicians do, talks about constitutionalism where his predecessor talked about "efficiency" and "the emergency."

Doubtless the change of regime means a relaxation of censorship over press and public assemblage. Doubtless some thousands of Spaniards engaged in politics will breathe more freely from now on. But essentially what has happened is that one military man has succeeded another. If any revolution has taken place in Spanish politics, it has been a revolution in the barracks, not in the plaza. The public demonstrations of university students and republican sympathizers appear to have been little more than casual parades easily broken up by the police. Labor has nowhere been in evidence during the crisis.

Barrack revolutions have always been common in Europe, especially since the war. In Spain, as in Poland, Bulgaria, and—until lately—Greece, the army rules the government. It rules for the simple reason that the government is perpetually bankrupt, cannot pay its army, and therefore cannot control it. The army—which, politically speaking, means the higher officers—lives off occupied territory through multitudinous forms of graft and exactions. Accordingly the army in Spain is an autonomous political force—the only one which can hold up its head and dictate to the King in a crisis. Now the reason why, in these backward European countries, the civil authorities cannot control the military is that they cannot control their own revenue. Generally taking big bribes themselves, they must permit their petty servants to take petty bribes. In a country where you must tip the postman in order to secure delivery of a registered letter, where your tax assessment depends on your family relationship with the assessor, there can be no such thing as a civil service in the sense in which the term is understood, for example, in Germany.

The personal dictatorships which have been plaguing the backward nations of Europe are but an expression of the lack of any real civil authority in those nations, expressed through a competent and self-respecting civil service. And nowhere has civil authority been more corrupt and demoralized than in Spain. There a physically vigorous and morally self-respecting people has inherited the evil usages of centuries of autocracy, and has accepted them as the natural order of things. Thus, with no lack of material wealth or moral stamina, the Spanish people has permitted itself, for more than a century, to be ruled by the military juntas.

In one sense, liberals are inclined to take these European dictatorships too seriously. They assume that a dictatorship is a vicious extraneous tyranny, arbitrarily suppressing the wholesome established customs of a nation. But the fact is that where such barrack dictatorships are possible it is because tyranny—whether that of the local postman or the local tax assessor or the provincial governor—is an accepted part of political life. The fundamental tyranny is that of corrupt civil government. The dictatorship is only the big noise.

But in another sense, liberals do not take these dictatorships seriously enough. They assume that when one dictator, like the late unlamented Primo, has "abdicated," the nation over which he ruled has suddenly become liberated. The present rejoicings over the departure of de Rivera tend to take for granted that all Spain's ills have been due to him alone. But in fact he did not cause them; he only profited by them. He goes, but they remain. The big man will continue to collect the money. The little man will continue to pay it. And when the members of the officers' club begin again to quarrel over the allotment of graft, the common soldiers of one regiment will again be sent against the machine-guns of another regiment as they have been sent three times in the past seven years.

Investigate Mr. Garvan!

FRANCIS P. GARVAN, president of the Chemical Foundation, and before that Alien Property Custodian in the good old days of A. Mitchell Palmer and the Harding gang, appears to have worked himself into a great state of mind over a German menace as terrible in its way as was the other German horror that passed into history a decade and more ago. His latest exhibition of nerves takes the form of a violent attack, first in a deposition solemnly laid before the United States District Court at Boston, then in a heated interview for the special benefit of the press and the public, and finally in a formal complaint to the Bureau of Securities of the New York Attorney General's office, upon a number of American citizens, among them the editor of The Nation, whom he accuses either of carrying on German propaganda in this country or of aiding an alleged plot of the German dye interests to throttle the American dye industry and bind American industrial chemistry hand and foot to the conquering chariot of the Hun.

This is pretty fearsome, but Mr. Garvan is out to save the nation from disaster, and he lays about him with no regard for whom he hits. The immediate occasion of his outburst was the action of Attorney General Mitchell, highly questionable, as it seems to us, in ordering a discontinuance of the suit of the United States against A. Mitchell Palmer and others for alleged fraud in misrepresenting the assets of the Bosch Magneto Company to the amount of rather more than half their value, thereby depriving the United States of some five and one-half million dollars which it should have had when it plundered the German-owned corporation of its property by way of making the world safer for democracy. In directing a dismissal of the suit, which was begun in 1926, Mr. Mitchell explained that in view of the act for the settlement of war claims and the action taken thereunder the financial interest of the United States in the property now amounted to not more than $44,000, and that since the prosecution of the case had been very expensive it seemed better to drop it. Moreover, three of the four special assistants employed by the government were agreed that there was no evidence to sustain the charge of collusion and fraudulent representation.

This let out Mr. Garvan, as the Supreme Court let him out when it declined to disturb the transaction by which the valuable patents of the German corporation were turned over to Mr. Garvan's Chemical Foundation for a song. Mr. Garvan, however, is not satisfied. He wants the scalps of Senator Moses of New Hampshire, Otto Kahn, Paul Warburg, and others for their complicity in some kind of collusive scheme to "throttle the American dye and chemical industries through the establishment of a tariff based on foreign valuation of the necessary chemicals rather than the American valuation." He sees Senator Moses picking Mr. Kahn as a campaign treasurer because Mr. Kahn "would furnish the money for the election of Senators who would vote upon the question of valuation," presumably in the German interest. "German propaganda," he shrieks, "is again eating into the vital problem of the life or death of the second great industry in the country." Undeterred by the flat denials or dignified silence of the men whom he accuses, he has gone on to bespeak the aid of the New York Bureau of Securities in an investigation of a recent flotation of $30,000,000 of debentures of the American Interessen Gemeinschaft Chemical Corporation by the National City Company, in support, of course, of the same abominable Germanization of his pet industries—an invitation which was promptly declined on the ground that no evidence of fraud or misrepresentation in the issuance of the debentures appeared.

We are not disposed to dismiss Mr. Garvan's diatribes as only another instance of hang-over from war hysteria. We are all for a rigorous investigation of the whole business, but not, we suspect, exactly of the kind that Mr. Garvan desires. The investigation that we want to see is one directed straight at Mr. Garvan and his Chemical Foundation. It is time that the Senate, now that the integrity of one of its most prominent members has been assailed, should investigate down to the ground the whole matter of the German patents and the use that has been made of them. The Chemical Foundation paid $250,000 for some 4,500 patents widely believed to have been worth many times that sum. It has given away since its organization millions of dollars. How much were the patents worth when the foundation got them at about fifty dollars apiece? How much does it receive from its licenses, what are its assets and liabilities, how much of the stock do Mr. Garvan and his family own, and to what extent are they interested as stockholders in other corporations? In view of the part that the government took in starting this rolling ball of wealth, the government is entitled to know what has been done with it and whether or not the financial record is clear. The Nation calls for an immediate investigation by the Senate of Mr. Garvan and his patriotic enterprises.

Rats and Profs

THE "feed-the-prof" movement, which gained considerable impetus in the years just following the war, has lately enrolled a recruit in the person of Robert Maynard Hutchins, the hustling young president of Chicago University. After declaring flatly in his inaugural that we cannot now get the kind of men we want to go into education, President Hutchins went on to say: "The only method by which we shall approach our goal is by paying salaries that will enable the universities to compete with the business world for the best men." In his address at the trustees' dinner this upstanding young captain of education gave greater definiteness to his thought by commending to the imagination of his hearers "the picture of a faculty of one hundred men and women, all getting, and deserving, $50,000 a year." We have looked on this picture, as requested, and it gives us furiously to think—which, it must be confessed, the addresses of university presidents all too rarely do. Years ago a great scientist was telling us about his studies of the intelligence of rats. His experiments had not proceeded very far at the time, but he had reached one tentative conclusion, namely, that his rats learned faster if he kept them a little hungry. We certainly believe that professors ought to be able to live in reasonable material comfort. Certainly they ought not to be obliged to spend their time doing hack work in order to keep the wolf from the door. The suggestion of President Hutchins, however, even though we do not take his illustrative figures too seriously, seems to us to raise a distinctly different issue.

Frankly and seriously, we are confident that one cannot raise the real quality of the teaching and investigating profession by the device of putting the professor on the same level of economic privilege with the bank president and the successful insurance salesman. Lest we be misunderstood, we hasten to add that we are heartily in favor of adequate pay for college and university teachers and that we do not consider existing salary schedules in general adequate. As far as we can learn, the pay of professors never was satisfactory, and—again at peril of being misunderstood—we hope it never will be. Fifty-thousand-dollar salaries, or even much lower salaries, are possible for only a few people; there is not wealth enough produced to provide them for more.

Boost the professors as a group into the high-salaried class, which would seem to be the idea of President Hutchins and those who think with him, and you do two bad things. First, you multiply further, as the university business schools are already doing, the number of hustling business men in our faculties. Second, and vastly more important, you create a strongly intrenched university vested interest in the status quo. That is bad enough at best; rich professors are all too frequently social bourbons. Make all professors rich, and as professors are human beings, you almost inevitably set the universities as a whole to defending things as they are, instead of formulating the intelligent criticism that is an essential part of the process of orderly social change—a process never more essential than today. By all means pay the professors a decent living wage; no man "deserves" more. But as you value their indispensable services, do not give them economic privilege, or they will turn again and rend you.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

PRACTICALLY all the parsons are worried about the American home. It seems that it is being destroyed. Of course it was saved by prohibition, but other monsters have arisen to threaten its existence. Wrenched out of the grasp of the saloon, it is now endangered, I hear, by the radio, canned vegetables, apartment houses, and modern dancing. If I were a home I rather think I should resent the over-eagerness of my champions. They act as if the thing they undertake to preserve were so weak and pitiful that it must go down before the gust of any new enthusiasm. After all, the home is much older than these dragons which are said to be capable of devouring it.

I never could understand why dancing should be listed among the dangers. The so-called modern steps are twenty years old by now and life has gone on much the same. When first the grizzly-bear and the bunny-hug were sprung upon an affrighted world I was a youth just turning from my teens. My parents, aunts, and uncles—in fact everybody's aunts and uncles—said that this was the end. Rome fell, I was informed, to precisely such barbaric strains. If young men and young women could get upon a public dance floor and lope about in close embrace, what became of marriage, honor, and long engagements?

My own cherubic countenance was closely scanned for stray vine leaves. Unfortunately none was found. I say unfortunately, for in spite of earnest efforts it was impossible for me to be ruined by the new dance steps. I could not even learn them. Just what relation they bear to the accepted capers of the day I am not sufficiently expert to say. However, it seems that neither the waltz nor the polka has come back entirely. At least that is my impression based upon a few casual visits to cabarets. And it does not seem to me that moral fiber has altered much within the generation. Like the dance steps it has become fairly stabilized.

I can't pretend that my failure to become a gilded, prancing butterfly should be set down to my credit as a virtue. I was saved from this fate worse than death through lack of character. As a boy I painstakingly learned the two-step. For this I deserve no praise. It was not a very good two-step and it was also compulsory. Only a vigorous application of parental influence carried me through. Possibly "through" is not a fitting word to be applied to one who always found it necessary to say to his partner, "Watch out now, I think I'm going to reverse." After breaking away from home ties I began to backslide. Those were the nascent days of new dancing and the steps changed almost daily. I lacked the hardihood to keep pace. Cravenly I quit and slumped into a job.

Learning to dance seems to me much like learning how to run an automobile. "Think of the fun you'd have if you could drive your own car, provided you had a car," say my motoring friends. But my mind dwells instead upon the agony which must be experienced by all who seize the wheel for the first time. A preliminary experimental bout with New York traffic would take fifteen years off my life. That would leave such a brief remainder that it is hardly worth while speculating upon the joys which might be mine once I became an expert chauffeur. And something of this fearful apprenticeship must enter into the life of even the most proficient dancer. As he whirls madly and gloriously across the brilliant ballroom his triumph must be modified by the still present memory of the day when he had to say: "Will you tango with me and please excuse the fact that this is the first time I ever tried it?" Nor did he succeed, then, in building up any great self-assurance by adding quickly: "Of course I've studied the steps at home and taken sixteen lessons through the mail."

Rarely does one see a dancer who has reached complete and easy joy in his pastime. However carefree the feet may be, something of the old strained look around the eyes persists. Every close observer must have noted the set expression upon the faces of all participants. There is hardly one who might not serve as a model for General Grant exclaiming: "I propose to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer."

No form of national activity is half so conscientious as dancing. Up-to-date physicians, I understand, prescribe it as a tonic and a penance for patients growing slack in their attitude toward life. At a cabaret recently a man pointed out a dancer in the middle of the floor and said: "That woman in the bright red dress with the sea-green bows is sixty-six years old." I was properly impressed and he continued his narrative.

"Her story is very interesting," he told me. "Two years ago she went to a neurologist because of a general physical and nervous breakdown. The physician said to her, 'Madam, your trouble is not so much that you are growing old as that you are ready to admit it. You must fight against it. Think of Texas Guinan. Think of Fanny Ward. You must hold on to youth as if it were a horizontal bar and chin yourself upon it.' "

I looked at the woman more closely and observed that she was obeying the doctor's orders literally. Her fight was a gallant one. Dancing had served to keep down her weight and improve her blood pressure. But there was not the slightest suggestion that she was enjoying herself. Quite obviously it would have pleased her very much to let go of the horizontal bar, thumb her nose at the jazz band, and behave in every respect as an ancient and dignified gentlewoman should behave. Character had her stymied off from comfort. Having bought advice she was intent upon using it. And as I looked over the entire assemblage I could see no one who seemed to be dancing for the fun of it. A few took a pardonable pride in the perfection of their fancy steps, but that emotion was not quite akin to joy. They were dancing for exercise, or for prestige, or to fulfil social obligations.

All this is admirable in its way but I have not sufficient faith in the persistence of human gallantry to believe that it can last forever. The home will get every last one of the dancers yet because it is so much easier to loaf in an armchair than to keep up the good fight against indolence, age, and the selfishness of comfort.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Divorce—and After

I. Children and Property*

By MORRIS ERNST

AT least one out of every eight married or formerly married adults in the United States is living separate from a spouse. Statistical information on this matter is entirely inadequate. It is highly probable, however, that the federal census now being taken will record more than four million divorced adults. The number of persons living separate by agreement without divorce is nowhere recorded, but may well exceed four million. Legal separations by annulment and separations indicated by prosecution for desertion total tens of thousands. The courts separate by divorce or other proceedings more than 500,000 persons a year. The legal machinery of divorce and separation operates, and has been operating for years, in every State except South Carolina. Yet we have learned practically nothing about the situation created by divorce. The adjustment of the custody of children, payment or non-payment of alimony—of these and many other problems that confront each applicant for divorce or separation we know little or nothing.

Much has been written about the causes of divorce, but little attention has been paid to divorce in action. In the United States our hypocrisy has delayed honest consideration of the problem. Our older attitude toward divorce is indicated in the caption of Article I, Section 9, of the New York State Constitution, which runs in part as follows: Divorce, Lotteries, Pool Selling, and Gambling, Laws to Prevent. This attitude has made its impress on our entire treatment of the problem of marital collapse and prevented us from making any real attempt to find the best methods of procuring emotional adjustment for the millions of persons en route from one adventure to another in the universal search for a monogamous life—for, say what we will about the shortcomings of monogamy, practically every person, and particularly the one involved in divorce proceedings, yearns for one mate to cleave to for ever and a day.

In our great national domestic turnover the State-rights dogma has resulted in one real benefit—the establishment of forty-seven different experiment stations as to grounds for divorce. Yet in not one State have we collated data which might serve as a basis for changes in the laws or advice as to methods of later adjustment. Society has rejected the courts in this sphere of life as in others. Most couples prefer to work out their own private arrangements rather than submit the problem to the jurist, who, because he sits at the reviewing stand, should really be better informed than others in the community. We need consideration of the detailed difficulties growing out of separations. Too easily do men and women approach divorce without contemplation of their new relations to property and children. After the couple have permitted themselves to become emotionally committed to the idea of divorce, then for the first time usually is there calm consideration of the meaning of division of furniture, separation from children, and payment of alimony.

How are these distressed adults, intellectually cloudy in this period of emotional strain, to work out the solution for the children? They are likely to believe honestly that the welfare of the children is the most important consideration. But the difficulties of dividing offspring and wealth cannot be disposed of by Solomon's gesture at bisection. Moreover, how is the news to be broken to the children? Shall there be a family conference or should each parent buttonhole each child separately, or should the teacher or doctor do the explaining? Let us examine a hypothetical couple bent on divorce.

John and Mary have been married for some years. They have two children, and they have some money saved; both may have potential earning power. The separation may be accompanied by an emotional disturbance involving another man or woman. At any rate, the day comes for working out the details of the new lives. All their friends "and their sisters and their cousins and their aunts" have proffered suggestions, each with that great inward joy which arises from a feeling of emotional superiority. John and Mary, exhausted, go to lawyer, doctor, or priest in search of a working formula.

Shall Mary have custody of the children? Shall they be divided by sexes? John is likely to proclaim that he cannot live without his male heir, but aren't most men bored even with their own children if they have to spend more than an hour a day with them? Then the suggestion is made that the mother shall bring up the children, with provision for the father's right to visit them. Is this to be determined upon respective sexual or other alleged tokens of guilt? What a melee of complications this right of visitation creates! Visit where? Visit when? At the mother's home? What if she remarries? Many a father will feel that he cannot enter the home where the former wife is living with another man. And if the children are allowed to visit John, Mary agrees—unless John is to marry that particular fiendish woman who has wrecked her home.

Shall the children be shifted between the two new homes? If so, shall it be by years, by seasons, by school periods? If the children live with the mother, does the father have prior rights as to vacation periods? How these adults can battle to be with the children for Christmas Eve! What a mad race to buy the affections of the children by all sorts of bribery! Will the adults learn that the one sure way for either of them to lose the affections of their offspring is to "knock" the other spouse? Who shall select the schools? Would it be better to send the children to boarding-school than have them run the risk of feeling the loss of security so often experienced by a child of separated parents? The mother goes Freudian and the father reverts to ancestral homeopathy. Who shall have the power to call in the doctor? All these aspects of the agreement which sooner or later must be recorded in legal form, complicated though they be, are relatively simple until the distressed couple copes with the problem complicated by the remarriage of either party. Then jealousy and pride strut into the conference.

---

* This is the first of a series of articles. The second will appear next week.—EDITOR THE NATION.

And what of alimony or the children's support? What share of the man's wealth should be set up in trust as a guaranty for the children's upbringing and education? Must Mary agree to make a new will? What if some of the parents-in-law have large wealth and are suffering from old age? Surely Mary and John cannot avoid contemplating the possibilities of outside revenues and the diminution of alimony. Many couples can approach money problems with civilized attitudes. Sometimes they are civilized by the influence of consciousness of guilt. If the man has been the cause of the split, how generous he becomes in the matter of alimony! But this mood wears off as negotiations proceed. Should the support continue after the wife remarries? The question is perplexing. John wants Mary to marry—it will make him feel at ease when he goes off with Heloise. Still, it does arouse bitterness to think of another man living off his money. At times the cash adjustments are simplified by absence of progeny, but then other factors intervene with greater prominence. What if Mary gave up her job when she married John? Does the adventure with him, or the length of it, create intangible obligations?

Concerning this situation, which is fairly typical, we have no usable information. Twenty-two thousand persons were legally divorced in 1870; 110,000 in 1900, nearly a quarter of a million in 1916, and approximately half a million in 1929. Were the second marriages of these groups more successful than the maiden adventures? What testimony can the children of divorcees present? Do our doctors, lawyers, clergymen know anything at all about the adjustments to be made by separated spouses? How do Catholics—permitting separation though banning divorce—work out the problems discussed in this article? We know that Texas has 17,000 divorces to 85,000 marriages; Ohio and California have about 15,000 divorces to 60,000 marriages, while good old licentious New York has 5,000 divorces to 118,000 marriages; if you add all of Nevada's annual crop of 3,000 divorces to the New York figures, it still leaves New York more than three times as monogamous as Texas. What does this mean, and of what use is such information when what we really want to know is how much, if at all, divorce helps toward the making of better marital adjustment?

A national stock-taking would require, among other things, checking up the arrangements made by divorced or separated couples, an analysis of the results on the adults and the children, and the correlation, if possible, of these results with the grounds for divorce. At present each person unhappily mated must learn everything for himself as if he were the first to break away from the family hearth. Somehow, for the benefit of those who have become involved and will continue to become involved in marital difficulties, we must find a way of collecting and organizing for use the enormous accumulating body of experience.

Boulder Dam Dynamite

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, February 1

LET us suppose that a number of States and municipalities seeking cheap electric power have succeeded, over the prolonged and bitter opposition of certain private power interests, in inducing the government to build a large hydro-electric plant with public funds; let us suppose that the private power interests, having lost the fight, have the incredible nerve to ask that the power be given to them instead of to the States and municipalities which made it possible—is it reasonable to suppose that any administration would even momentarily consider granting such a request? Obviously it is not. Yet that is exactly the situation with regard to Boulder Dam as this is written. It is monstrous, shocking, incredible—and true. The facts about that long struggle are well known. Arrayed on one side were the States and cities which wanted Boulder Dam built in order that they might have flood protection and cheap power. Arrayed on the other side were the Southern California Edison and associated companies which opposed the project because it would either deprive them of business or compel them to reduce rates, or both. Notwithstanding the strenuous and sometimes unscrupulous tactics employed by the power companies, the States and municipalities won. Congress not only voted to build the dam, but it expressly directed the Secretary of the Interior, in disposing of the power, to give preference to the States, municipalities, and other political subdivisions. These latter very promptly applied for every kilowatt of power that could be generated at the dam. Then, to the undisguised amazement of those States and cities—and of Congress—Secretary Wilbur announced a tentative plan under which one-fourth of the power, and two-fifths of the control of the plant, would be allotted to the Southern California Edison and other companies associated with it in the anti-Boulder Dam campaign. The scheme violated the spirit of the law and divided control between hostile elements.

* * * * *

ON its face the plan seemed indefensible on any rational or respectable ground, and no attempt was made to conceal the disappointment of the States and municipalities, or the resentment in Congress. But something more ominous was in store. Within the past few days Secretary Wilbur has propounded to Solicitor Finney of his department a series of questions, the purport of which was this: Would I be legally warranted in ignoring the preference rights of the States and cities and giving the power to "other applicants," if I decided that the "other applicants" offered better financial security and greater contractual responsibility? It seems impossible to mistake the purpose which inspired the questions. And nobody familiar with Solicitor Finney's record could doubt what his answer would be. Solicitor Finney, who advises Secretaries of the Interior as to their legal authority for doing the things they wish to do, furnished the celebrated opinion that the then Secretary, Albert B. Fall, was legally authorized to lease the Teapot Dome and Elk Hills naval oil reserves—which the Supreme Court, in an even more celebrated opinion, rather drastically overruled. He did not fail Secretary Wilbur any more than he had failed Secretary Fall. After sweating manfully for several days and nights he produced a document which declared that "the public interest" was the Secretary's paramount concern, and that the paramount element in "the public interest" was financial security and contractual responsibility on the part of the recipients of the power. The preference rights guaranteed the States and municipalities by Congress, he stated, would be amply conserved by providing that they could make subsequent applications for power to the parties receiving it from the Secretary. In other words, the will of Congress would be fulfilled if Secretary Wilbur awarded all the power to the Southern California Edison and its associates, on condition that the States and cities might afterward try to get some of it away from them! One could almost hear the companies adding under their breath: "Try and get it!"

* * * * *

UNLESS this writer is mistaken, the Administration in this instance is monkeying with the largest stick of dynamite it has handled thus far. Congress does not relish having its acts flouted by any Cabinet member, and California is reported to be in a fair frenzy over the prospect of being tricked again by the power interests. Hiram Johnson's present temper on the course of events can only be descrbed as homicidal, and as a political "killer" Hiram is almost without a peer. Of course Mr. Hoover knows all about these maneuvers. A good many discerning people knew, or felt they knew, what the most important issue was in the last Presidential election. Events are vindicating their judgment. The issue was whether the natural power resources of the government would be turned over to private exploitation. But wouldn't it be an interesting situation if President Hoover were compelled to go before the Republican National Convention in 1932 without the votes of the California delegation?

* * * * *

IT grieves me profoundly to relate that the Young plan for a merger of radio, cable, and telegraph communications is quite dead. Conceived—as Owen D. Young himself has confessed—in patriotism, and born—as the world knows—to the plaudits of the press, it has perished at the hands of a lamentably unimaginative Senate committee, ably assisted by a number of witnesses who knew exactly what Mr. Young's Radio Corporation had done to them, and why. The official obsequies may occur any day. Notable among those who had a recent part in the frustration of this magnificent conception was Walter S. Gifford, president of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. Dignified, as befits the head of the world's largest corporation, and suave beyond description, Mr. Gifford neatly pointed out that a monopoly in international communications would require the acquisition of his own company, which is preparing to lay a huge talking cable from Newfoundland to Ireland. As for the threat of British competition, which so agitated Mr. Young, Mr. Gifford did not rudely characterize it as a "bogy"; he merely indulged in a slight smile and said: "I am not impressed by it." Oddly enough, however, the most grievous thrust was delivered not by the four-billion-dollar Mr. Gifford, but by the twenty-nine-year-old Detroit policeman who told in simple language what happened to Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, St. Louis, and other cities when they sought to instal police radio systems for use in capturing criminals. Mr. Young's messianic Radio Corporation promptly confronted them with two alternatives: the first, that of being sued for patent infringement if they built their own equipment; the second, that of purchasing the equipment from the Radio Corporation at prices ranging from two to four times what it would cost to build it. The city of Detroit, ignoring all threats, proceeded to build its own system, whereupon the Radio Corporation refused to sell it the transmitting tubes which are vital to its operation, and of which the R. C. A. has a monopoly. The Detroit police department is compelled to get along with tubes bootlegged to it by local broadcasting stations! Nevertheless, the results have been astounding. The witness, Lieutenant Kenneth R. Cox, and Police Commissioner Rutledge told of an immediate reduction of 54 per cent in the number of burglaries, and an increase of 45 per cent in the number of captures and convictions. Murderers were surprised at the scene of their crimes. Bank bandits were surrounded and killed or captured before they could leave the banks they were robbing. Burglars were caught in the act. The police radio system, which Cox perfected while serving as a patrolman in the daytime and amusing himself with radio experiments at night, was pronounced by Commissioner Rutledge to be "the most effective aid devised for the apprehension of criminals during this century." It largely nullifies the advantages of quick getaway afforded by the automobile.

* * * * *

WAS the attitude of the Radio Corporation affected by these salutary results? It was not. When Cox was summoned to crime-ridden Chicago to instal a similar system, that unhappy city was immediately faced with the R. C. A. ultimatum: "Buy from us, or be sued." God knows Chicago needed anything that would reduce crime, and the world knows it couldn't afford to be sued. "The result," Lieutenant Cox testified, "is that Chicago is paying $117,000 for equipment, when it could have built a far superior system for $48,000." "And this," exclaimed Senator Wheeler, "is the corporation that was organized for patriotic reasons!" All of which, obviously, prompts the old question: When does the Department of Justice intend to act?

* * * * *

THE Senate Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to American Consumers, sometimes known as the Progressive-Democratic coalition, is wobbling badly these days. The strain of defeating the sugar steal apparently was too much for it, and during the ensuing relapse it failed to repel one of the most daring and mysterious forays yet carried out —that of the rayon interests. Because of the desertion of fifteen Democrats, the duty on rayon was increased to forty-five cents a pound, notwithstanding the demonstrated fact that the rayon industry in this country is largely controlled by German and British capital, and has been showing profits of as much as 300 per cent. There was a strange aspect to the whole affair. Virtually no attempt was made to defend the increase when Senators Wheeler and Norris exposed its significance. Its supporters simply sat mute with an air that seemed to say: "Talk your heads off—we have the votes." They did have them, and a lot of us are wondering how they got them.

The Christian Science Censor
II. "Obnoxious Books"*

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

MARY BAKER EDDY was a tragic figure. Proclaiming the omnipotence of all-embracing Divine Love, she was perpetually tormented by the "claim" of physical disease and the fear of "malicious animal magnetism," and her last years were passed within the deep shadows. Building her whole system on publicity, she was obliged to conceal from the public and from her own followers many of the facts of her own life. Her enforced retirement from the prying eyes of a curious public and even of her reverent adherents became necessary to the spread of her gospel, and systematic suppression of a whole body of facts was an essential means of spreading the Truth. From the every-day point of view, it was plain fraud; from that of the devout believer, it was the service of Divine Mind. If any misstatement or misrepresentation appeared, it could not be countered by a presentation of all the facts; the only weapon available was suppression.

In the spring of 1904 Mrs. Eddy learned that Fleming H. Revell and Company, who in 1903 had published a volume of Christian Science poems, were issuing a virulent attack on Mrs. Eddy and her distinctive doctrine written by one of her most implacable enemies, and that an inquirer for the poems had been sold the hostile book. Thereupon she penned the celebrated by-law forbidding church members to patronize booksellers or publishers who have obnoxious books for sale. The rule has been invoked occasionally, I am informed, against members, but its chief use has been in clubbing the book trade.

During the year 1906, following the dedication of the enlarged Mother Church and the enormous attendant publicity, the New York World began a sensational campaign to learn and make public the facts about the physical condition of Mrs. Eddy, then eighty-five and living in retirement at Concord. All sorts of wild rumors were afloat. McClure's Magazine was announcing a startling series of articles by Georgine Milmine on Mrs. Eddy's life. On December 28, 1906, Mrs. Eddy wrote to her church officers:

> Please watch the movements of the last Literary Digest that has called the attention of its readers to McClure's articles on me and after McClure's next article appears or even before it does request in our periodicals that every Christian Scientist who has subscribed for the Literary Digest or for McClure's Magazine discontinue his subscription.

Fortunately the officers were wiser than their venerable Leader. They had no wish to tempt legal action by publishing a boycott, so the matter was handled in the usual way through Alfred Farlow, Committee on Publication. He communicated with his State committees; they passed the word on; and soon hundreds of letters from the faithful were pouring in on McClure's and any other magazines that mentioned the biography. Nevertheless the story proceeded. Mrs. Eddy at first attempted to reply, but succeeding chapters, abundantly fortified by detailed evidence with supporting affidavits, were too much for her, and she gave it up.

The McClure's articles and other material were published by Doubleday, Page and Company in 1909, as "The Life of Mary Baker G. Eddy and the History of Christian Science," by Georgine Milmine. Despite all denials by the church, Miss Milmine's story stands today substantially unshaken. What was to be done? The directors induced a wealthy Christian Scientist to buy from the publishers the copyright and the plates, which latter were promptly destroyed. Copies of the book are now so rare that they bring from $25 to $100.

Something had to be done to offset the devastation wrought by Miss Milmine's work. A friendly newspaper woman, Mrs. Sybil Wilbur O'Brien, prepared a series of articles on Mrs. Eddy which appeared in an obscure Boston publication called Human Life. Alfred Farlow, Committee on Publication, arranged with two loyal Christian Scientists to finance Mrs. O'Brien for further research and to publish her book, which in addition to her articles was to contain other material, some of which Mr. Farlow had already gathered. The proposal, he said, had Mrs. Eddy's sanction, and would have the full support of the Mother Church. By a contract of April 22, 1908, Mr. Farlow was appointed "arbitrator of all differences, if any, which shall arise hereunder, and his decision shall be final and binding concerning such differences." The Committee on Publication thus had absolute final control. If ever there was an official biography, it is this one.

When the book was ready for publication, Mr. Farlow received word from Mrs. Eddy that it must be suppressed, because, as it later appeared, she feared even such publicity as it gave to her earlier life, notably, her debt to P. P. Quimby, the mental healer. For months she remained adamant, and on September 23, 1908, Calvin Frye, her factotum, received from Archibald McLellan, chairman of the Board of Directors, a letter notifying him of the danger of a lawsuit to compel publication. I quote in part:

> Mr. Elder [Mrs. O'Brien's attorney] states that Mrs. O'Brien has a contract with the publishers by which, if she so elects, she can compel them to publish the book or pay her substantial damages. He does not think she is in the frame of mind to do this now, but should she change her attitude to one of unfriendliness such a suit would be troublesome because it would allege a conspiracy to stop the sale of the book and to kill her literary reputation. . . .
>
> The position of Streeter and Elder is friendly, and they have given me this information as a warning of possible danger.

Next day the ban was lifted, the Leader having decided that the possible dangers of publication were less than those of a suit, with its attendant publicity. Thus "The Life of Mary Baker Eddy," by Sybil Wilbur, official biography of the

---

* This is the second of a series of four articles. The third, on Freedom of the Press, will appear in the issue of February 26.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Founder, since circulated by the directors in thousands of copies all over the world, saw the light. It is the one source to which inquirers are always officially referred for information about Mrs. Eddy. In an advertising campaign designed to offset the Dakin book, the officials describe it thus:

> The Authentic Biography. The Life of Mary Baker Eddy, Discoverer and Founder of Christian Science.
>
> A highly interesting chronicle based on exhaustive and unprejudiced research. It is devoid of invention but is abounding with facts. . . .
>
> This life of Mary Baker Eddy was printed in a magazine of popular circulation before it was acquired by the Christian Science Publishing Society. It was written prior to the author's interest in Christian Science.

Of the work itself it is hard to speak with restraint. It is absolutely without documentation or authentication, and in fact resembles nothing else so much as the most pious lives of the medieval saints. Indeed, I should just as soon go to one as to the other in search of facts. I give one crucial instance. In a chapter added after Mrs. Eddy's death occurs this passage: "She retired to her bed that night not to rise again in this world. . . . She was conscious that her students were opening their minds to the realization of life; this conscious thought was, as it had been for fifty years, her great and only physician" [italics mine]. On December 29, 1928, a well-known man who is a former member of the Board of Directors and of the Board of Trustees under Mrs. Eddy's will, wrote to the latter: "As you well know, Mrs. Eddy employed physicians professionally, and took drugs on numerous occasions during the last ten years of her life." He accordingly protested against the use of trust funds to circulate a book containing the statement quoted above, and demanded a reply by January 15. On January 9 the trustees replied: "The sentence partly quoted in your letter is to be revised so that there can be no question as to its being in accord with the facts. It can be and probably would be correctly construed as it is."

Note the outcome. In the Christian Science Sentinel of January 26, 1929, and in the Christian Science Journal of March, 1929, there appeared the following statement by the Board of Directors:

> As we are informed, Mrs. Eddy did not, at any time after 1866, believe in the use of any drug as a curative agent in connection with the practice of Christian Science. Nor did she, at any time after she became a Christian Scientist, either use a drug or allow one to be used for her, except as she employed, in a few instances, an anaesthetic for the purpose of temporary relief from extreme pain.

This would seem to be a precise admission of exactly the charge made. Nevertheless, the Wilbur biography, now being officially advertised to the public as above, contains the original passage word for word, and the interests of truth are safeguarded by an asterisk and this footnote: "See the Christian Science Journal, March, 1929, page 669." Needless to say, it is a rare reader who will have convenient access to a file of the Journal, and an almost non-existent one who will look up the reference. One of the favorite texts in Christian Science is: "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

I return to the troublous days of 1906-8. My older readers will recall the celebrated "next friends" suit of 1907, in which an unsuccessful effort was made to prove Mrs. Eddy, then eighty-six years old, mentally incompetent to manage her property. Michael Meehan, then editor of the Concord Patriot, thought to turn an honest penny by publishing the essentials of the record. His book, "Mrs. Eddy and the Late Suit in Equity," 1908, is extremely friendly to Mrs. Eddy; nevertheless the Leader said, "Thumbs down." The entire edition was bought up and shipped to Boston, where it was stored in the basement of the Christian Science Publishing Society's building.

Following the outburst of 1906 and 1907, the church, despite the efforts of its enemies, apparently enjoyed a period of relative immunity from "persecution" by publicity, notwithstanding the death of Mrs. Eddy in 1910, the consequent fierce struggles in the church itself, and the long series of resulting lawsuits. Certain records evidently went quietly and safely to rest in the archives of the Mother Church, where they could not trouble the memory of the Founder. In 1921, however, there appeared in Volume IV of the Cambridge History of American Literature, published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, a chapter entitled Popular Bibles: The Book of Mormon and Science and Health, by Woodbridge Riley. It was a critical and hostile account of the origins of the book by Mrs. Eddy, whom the author in his opening sentence described as "the thrice-married female Trismegistus." The church artillery was at once unlimbered, and the publishers precipitately withdrew the work, getting out another edition containing a new chapter under the same title, written by Lyman P. Powell.

I have tried in this brief list of instances to show something of what may be publicly known of actual book suppression by official church agencies. What, if anything, lies unknown in the records of the publication committee I have no means of telling. My last example is both the most recent and the most revealing, though entirely consistent with what went before. It is the suppression in 1927 of Adam H. Dickey's "Memoirs of Mary Baker Eddy."

Mr. Dickey, one of the most devout disciples of the Founder, lived in her family during the last three years of her life, and one of her last official acts was to make him a member of the Board of Directors of the Mother Church, in which capacity he served up to the time of his death in 1925. Shortly before his death he wrote out of his records the little book above mentioned, in fulfilment of a solemn promise made to Mrs. Eddy in 1908. As he relates the incident:

> "If I should ever leave here," she repeated, "will you promise me that you will write a history of what has transpired in your experiences with me, and say that I was mentally murdered?" I answered, "Yes, Mother, I will." ". . . Will you swear before God that you will not fail to carry out my wish?" . . . "Mother, I swear before God that I will do what you request of me."

The book is an astonishing first-hand document, setting forth various intimate details of the life and conversation of this extraordinary woman during her last three years, all reverently set down by one who saw her as without human weakness. However incredible the story may appear to others, it contains no word that could offend the most orthodox Christian Scientist, being written in a spirit of unquestioning loyalty and obedience to Mrs Eddy, and of absolute faith in her teachings. It is in fact a picture of a pain-racked old woman, full of human weaknesses and foibles, but carrying on majestically against a host of enemies within, and ruling her household with a rod of iron. It deserves lengthy quotation, but the exigencies of the copyright law and strict space limits forbid more than a few brief samples.

On his second interview Mr. Dickey learned, to his astonishment, that as Leader of a great Movement Mrs. Eddy had many enemies, and that she had much to combat in the way of "aggressive mental suggestion, intended to injure or affect her physically." He learned that her house was filled with mental workers, who divided the night into two-hour watches. During the worker's watch it was his duty "to counteract the malicious evil influence of mortal mind directed against our Leader and her establishment." When a watch was kept, that is, "when the mental worker was successful in freeing our Leader from attacks during that time," he was commended next morning; but when a watch was not kept, "and they were far more frequently not kept than kept," then he was rebuked. The workers were urged that they must "handle animal magnetism and defeat the mental murderer and mental assassin who are working to defeat this Cause." It is a pitiful tale of a vain fight against death.

Mr. Dickey learned that while the Leader often gave what seemed bad reasons for her actions, yet "in following the direction of Divine Wisdom, she never made a mistake. Often I heard her say with great impressiveness that in over forty years of church leadership, she had never made a mistake, a record that is most truly remarkable." Most truly so! Says Mr. Dickey:

> She told me that every government, every organization, every institution of whatever kind or nature, to be successful, must have one responsible head. That is why she placed herself at the head of her own church, because mortal mind could not be trusted to conduct it. . . . Indeed, she told me, with pathos and earnestness, that if she could find one individual who was spiritually equipped she would immediately place him at the head of her church government.

Mr. Dickey saw Mrs. Eddy bring Calvin Frye out of a cataleptic seizure, and we read that "Calvin Frye had passed through what mortal mind calls 'death,' and the grave had been cheated of its victim by our Leader's quick and effective work." One of the orders issued to the mental workers early in Mr. Dickey's experience was to "make a law that there shall be no more snow this season," and he found that "Mrs. Sargent was the one to whom was especially assigned the work of watching the weather and bringing it into accord with normal conditions." Enough of excerpt and quotation. The whole record breathes the most absolute faith in Mrs. Eddy and the most pious devotion to her memory. And now what happened?

After Mr. Dickey's death his widow, likewise a devout Scientist, proceeded to print the little book and distribute it among Mr. Dickey's former students—apparently a most natural and fitting course of action. When word of this reached the directors, they called Mrs. Dickey before them and required her to recall every copy, so that only three are now certainly known in this country, the two copyright copies in the Library of Congress and a photostat in the New York Public Library. Under date of December 16, 1927, the directors addressed to Mr. Dickey's pupils an illuminating letter, from which I quote:

> ...We have only words of praise for Mr. Dickey's teaching and admiration for his staunch and fearless stand in defense of our Leader and her teachings. . . .
>
> Our astonishment then was great beyond expression when we read the book, "Memoirs of Mary Baker Eddy," and found it contained so much that would be harmful to make public....
>
> We found too that a grave mistake was made by Mrs. Dickey in publishing the book without direct instructions from our Leader, for even Mr. Dickey himself does not claim that he was authorized to publish, but merely to write, a "history.". . .
>
> It was imperative that the book should be recalled, if possible, before it might fall into the hands of those who were hostile or reach minds too immature to absorb it unscathed....
>
> Mr. Dickey's observance of our Leader's wishes for seclusion...makes it difficult to see how, after the lapse of so many years, he could be led to assent to such things as this book contains being broadcast to an unsympathetic public....
>
> ...it [the book] is unjust and therefore contrary to the Manual...in that it claims to be a history and yet gives a large place to trivialities and subordinates the grandeur of our Leader's life-purpose. It is also unjust because it accentuates her human characteristics and touches but slightly upon her spiritual nature.... It is also unjust because comparatively little is said about Mrs. Eddy's transcendent wisdom, her steadfast reliance upon God, and her enduring love for her fellow-men....
>
> The enemies of our Cause would gloat over the misleading picture the book presents, and even the unbiased public are drawing conclusions that are unjust and injurious....
>
> It has been maintained that Mrs. Eddy's request that Mr. Dickey write a "history of his experiences" would have been fully complied with had he deposited his writings relating to her for preservation in the files of the Mother Church, as others of her household have considerately done....
>
> It is well to keep in mind our Leader's words... "If spiritual conclusions are separated from their premises, their nexus is lost, and the argument, with its rightful conclusions, becomes correspondingly obscure. The human history needs to be revised, the material record expunged."

On the face of the record the Board of Directors convict themselves of determination to conceal the full facts of Mrs. Eddy's life and thought, even as recorded and interpreted by one of the most trusted of their own number, from the public and indeed from the ordinary members of their own church. The incident shows with shocking clearness their conception of the "truth" to which they profess unswerving devotion, and of the "injustices" which, it will be recalled, it is the duty of the Committee on Publication to correct. The "truth" is that which shows Mrs. Eddy's "transcendent wisdom, her steadfast reliance upon God, and her enduring love for her fellow-men"; the "injustice" is anything which shows her "human characteristics." It is a hard job creating new incarnations of God in these days of documents and full information, and the directors are perhaps entitled to some sympathy in their task, but no one need rate too highly their professions of devotion to truth as that term is understood among every-day men.

The other illuminating aspect of the incident is Mrs. Dickey's part in it. "To that end" [the recall of the book], say the directors, "Mrs. Dickey obligingly complied with our suggestion to write each known holder of the book, requesting its return." And she not only requested its return, but got it returned. Such discipline was known in medieval monastic orders, but is rare in modern times. When it is recalled, however, that the very livelihood of a Christian Science practitioner is held at pleasure of the directors, who may remove his card from the advertising columns of the church periodicals, or even put him out of the church, such obedience is more readily understood. The machine grinds on.

In the Driftway

THE modern version of Little Lord Fauntleroy has been synthetically assembled by certain professors at Teachers College, Columbia University. The 1930 Cedric, aged two to five years, is qualified as follows: He is cooperative, friendly, prompt, and generous, and he exercises self-control when it is necessary. He says "thank you" and "please" without adult suggestion, turns his head when he sneezes, and covers his mouth when he yawns. He does not try to boss, pinch, or tease his companions, particularly those younger and smaller than himself. He does not write improper epithets on brick walls, talk with his mouth full, lick his plate, carry tales to his teacher, or bite anybody.

* * * * *

THE DRIFTER is always interested in rare fauna and flora, and he hereby offers a prize of three waistcoat buttons and a folding buttonhook to the teacher, parent, or professor who will bring before him in the flesh this Paragon of Polite Perfection. Speaking of buttons, the modern polite infant can also button his clothes even in the back and can himself without aid put on his galoshes. But this is to digress. For, after all, we are at present concerned not with motor efficiency, which in a motor age is probably developing with great rapidity, but with Character. The modern perfect boy is full of it. And if there is even a modicum of truth in the reports about him, he will cause to disappear in a cloud of smoke the popular notion of the male child which has been prevalent for hundreds of years. Until Mrs. Burnett created her velvet-frocked young lad, nobody even thought that boys ought to be polite and nice. Since Lord Fauntleroy appeared to plague his contemporaries, these contemporaries have been trying their best to prove him a figment of a sentimental imagination. If this time-honored state of affairs is to be changed about, the Drifter does not know whether to applaud or to weep.

* * * * *

TWO items in the Teachers College prerequisite for perfection interest the Drifter particularly. One is that the modern young gentleman likes to go to school. Now the Drifter, who spends some of his time in the company of young children for purposes of scientific observation only, has remarked that this phenomenon is in fact true. There are actually schools today to which children like to go. Children are fidgety on Saturdays when they are obliged to remain at home. They hop on one foot for joy mornings when the hour for school approaches and they come home, snail-fashion and abstractedly, when school is let out. This is surely one of the marvels of our present age, and modern educators who have wrought this miracle should receive the thanks of a grateful public. If the Paragon likes school, therefore, he is not necessarily a freak. One more encouraging item occurs in the list of his qualifications. If a young person of the opposite sex should chance in a playful moment to snatch his hat he will—place his hand on his heart, bow low, and remark softly: "You are welcome, madam, to such of my attire as you may, for any purpose, desire." Will he? He will not. He will knock her down like a man! This makes everything all right. Boys are still boys, in spite of a tendency to say "please." The Drifter is inclined to suspect, moreover, that in private they lick their pudding dishes. After all, teachers are not ubiquitous or omniscient. And their pupils are probably still not above guile.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Watch and Ward Objects

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Since I have another occupation in life it is impossible for me even to attempt to answer the many uninformed, misleading, and unfounded statements which have appeared in the press during the past weeks concerning the nature and purpose of the Watch and Ward Society of which I have the honor to be president. I cannot allow, however, the article in The Nation of January 15 with the telling title, My Brother's Peeper, to pass without comment.

I am passing over some of the details connected with the Dunster House Book Shop case, which we are not discussing so long as this case is still pending in the courts. I might remark parenthetically that the book for which Mr. Jackson offers a quasi-apology was declared by counsel for the defense to be an "utter abomination." And I might add that the statement that when our agent was told that the book was not at hand, he "was persistent and persuasive and suggested that there might be ways of getting one," which Mr. Jackson states as a fact, is a point on which the evidence was in decided conflict. Or take the case of Joseph Farrell. When employed by us in 1922, he had a clean record. He was an agent in only a few cases and his connection with this society ceased in 1922. It was years later that he went wrong.

My special interest, however, was centered in the description which Mr. Jackson gave of our activities. It would appear from what he has written that we focused our efforts on inducing crime. No one who understands our work could make such a suggestion. For years our organization conducted an arduous campaign to correct the abuses in burlesque houses when obscenity was rampant. As a result, a set of regulations was adopted by the city of Boston and approved by the Theater Managers Association which placed productions of this particular type far above the level to be found elsewhere.

Again, in response to many complaints from the head masters of the most prominent schools in New England, a determined effort was made by our society to mitigate the nuisance of the cheap story magazines. This culminated in a conference with the publishers of this type of story magazine, as the result of which they improved the reading matter to such an extent that the complaints ceased. Compared with our work in other directions, the recent Book Shop case was the merest incident.

Boston, January 13 RAYMOND CALKINS

Public and Private Interest at Boulder Dam

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Will you permit me to correct a few of the many misleading statements made in the article written by Miss Ruth Finney in The Nation of December 11, entitled, Secretary Wilbur at Boulder Dam? It is not true, as stated by Miss Finney, that "there has been no dispute as to the equal acceptability" of the plans of the municipalities for using power from Boulder Dam. The fact that the monopolizing of Boulder Dam power by a small minority of eight of the cities of southern California is contrary to the "public interest" of the 950,000 inhabitants of the eighty-three cities and the 700,000 people who live on the 50,000 farms only served by power-company lines, would appear to be so clear as not to involve dispute.

Miss Finney argues principally on behalf of the "smaller cities" and what she says gives the distinct impression, no doubt unintentionally, that the smaller cities are all joining hands with the city of Los Angeles and clamoring for Boulder Dam power in an attempt to keep it away from the power companies. The fact is that 228,000 inhabitants of seven smaller cities secure their power through unregulated, non-tax-paying municipal distributing systems, whereas 950,000 inhabitants of eighty-three other smaller cities secure their power from the power companies and are applicants for Boulder power only through these publicly regulated, tax-paying electric utilities. If Boulder Dam power is to be distributed in the "public interest" shall we ignore these eighty-three smaller cities and their 950,000 people?

Miss Finney says that in the twelve years the city of Los Angeles has operated its distributing system it has forced reductions in power rates which have saved the people $25,000,000. Such a claim is not only untrue; it is ludicrous. This figure is no doubt arrived at by taking the total of all rate reductions in southern California within the last twelve years and crediting it to the municipal system of Los Angeles. It credits no reduction to voluntary action of the companies, induced by lowering costs and greater efficiencies—an inevitable reduction—no reduction to regulation, but credits it all to the fact that a municipal system was in operation in a fraction of the territory involved. The municipal system of Los Angeles had the same effect, and no more effect, in reducing rates in this territory that it had in reducing rates in Salt Lake City and Washington, D. C. where rates have been reduced over the same period in comparable amounts.

Miss Finney says that if the city of Glendale is allowed to buy Boulder Dam power from the government "it will have to pay only 4 or 5 mills per kilowatt hour." In fact the cost of Boulder Dam power, if the city itself is to undertake to deliver it into its distributing system, would be not less than 6½ to 7 mills. To compare this with power purchased from the Southern California Edison Company, there must be added 1.55 mills, which is the amount per kilowatt hour which the company returns to the public in the form of taxes. The city now pays the Edison Company 9 mills. Its possible, though improbable, saving by securing Boulder Dam power would be from ½ to 1 mill per kilowatt hour. And this allows nothing for stand-by service, which means that the inhabitants of the city would be under the peril of interrupted service because of sole dependence upon hydro-electric power supply with its source 250 miles away.

Finally, Miss Finney finds approval of the claims of her municipal-ownership friends in the fact that their claims were loudly voiced by a dozen of their representatives, while the utilities and their 2,000,000 customers were heard from only by a single, lone, and weak voice—that of myself. If this issue is to be decided on the basis of loud clamor, if mere vociferousness is to be mistaken for argument—in short, if the Secretary of the Interior should be "taken in," as Miss Finney has been, by a demonstration staged for that purpose under the direction of a small coterie of municipal-ownership enthusiasts, then the interest of the great majority of the public in this project is doomed.

Los Angeles, December 21 W. C. Mullendore

Ruth Finney Replies

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: To discuss with Mr. Mullendore the meaning of "public interest" is a difficult thing since his conception of it, shared only, so far as can be learned, by E. C. Finney, solicitor of the Department of the Interior, is foreign to the conception of members of Congress who framed the federal water-power act and officials who have administered it in the past.

What he fails to take into account is this: The only persons to whom Boulder Dam power will be valuable are those who can purchase it direct from the government. It will be valuable to them because they will not have to pay a price which includes profit to a private corporation. The "public interest" of 950,000 customers of the Southern California Edison Company will not be served in any way by giving that company all the power generated at the dam. The Edison Company does not deny that these customers will have all the power they need in any case. It does not promise that the price will be lower if the company gets Boulder Dam power.

The seven cities asking for power ask for it because they own municipal distributing systems and can save their residents money if they buy power wholesale from the government at less than they would pay buying it wholesale from the Edison Company. Under Mr. Mullendore's interpretation of "public interest" the only thing accomplished would be denial to these cities of the right to buy power from the government instead of from Mr. Mullendore's company.

The claim to a $25,000,000 saving in rates through municipal ownership in Los Angeles which Mr. Mullendore finds ridiculous has been augmented since he wrote his letter. The most spectacular example of what municipal power has meant in rates to southern California is found in the city of Pasadena. When the city first put its street-lighting system into operation the Edison Company dropped its power rate from 15 to 11½ cents per kilowatt hour. The company undercut municipal rates until it reached a low level of 4 cents per kilowatt hour and the State legislature prohibited the furnishing of electricity at discriminatory rates which made it necessary to recoup losses by higher rates in other communities.

Mr. Mullendore's arithmetic, in his next paragraph, seems decidedly questionable. In the first place, no accurate figures are available as to what it will cost southern California cities to deliver Boulder Dam power into their distributing systems. Even the government's announcement of a 1.63 mills per kilowatt hour price at the dam is only tentative. Officials of Burbank and Glendale testified at the hearing of the Department of the Interior that they estimate the total cost of bringing power to their cities at 4 or 5 cents a kilowatt hour. They now pay the Edison Company 9 cents a kilowatt hour. Mr. Mullendore's figure of 6½ to 7 cents is likewise an estimate, and an outsider's estimate. As for the "demonstration under the direction of a small coterie of municipal ownership advocates," the gentlemen who appeared before the Secretary of the Interior last November and in unspectacular manner asked a larger allocation of Boulder Dam power were the duly elected or appointed mayors, city attorneys, and city engineers of duly incorporated cities which years ago adopted municipal ownership as desirable.

Washington, January 28 Ruth Finney

International Relations Section

Aristocracy Declines in Hungary

THE aristocracy of Hungary, that last stronghold of feudalism to be found in Europe, is crumbling to pieces, according to the writer of the following article, which we reprint from the Manchester Guardian Weekly. It is interesting to note that the decline in power and in wealth of the aristocratic class in Hungary, while due in part to political upheavals, is to a much greater extent the result of the machine age and the industrial revolution, which came late but inevitably to Hungary as to the rest of Europe.

Speaking at a recent meeting of the Hungarian United Government Party, Count Bethlen foreshadowed the possibility of the abolition of the institution of entail in Hungary. The kings of Hungary had the right to declare the huge estates of some of the prominent noblemen as inalienable, the eldest son inheriting the entire entailed fortune. A commission is now investigating whether this privilege should be maintained or abolished. This is a very remarkable development, because Hungary has often and accurately been called the last bulwark of feudalism.

In Rumania the land reform deprived the nobility of the greater part of their estates, and though some of the rich bojars managed to save some of their domains and power for a time, the Maniu regime has pushed them into the background. The Junkers of Germany are no longer a privileged class of hereditary rulers. In Jugoslavia the land reform has broken up the big estates of the former Magyar and Croatian owners. The Hungarian counter-revolution of August, 1919, enabled the Magyar aristocrats and feudal nobles to regain their lost political position, and a superficial study of the situation would indicate that they had also reestablished their economic predominance; but the frequent complaints of the Budapesti Hirlap, the newspaper of the Magyar upper classes, indicate that the nobility are faced with many difficult and anxious economic problems.

Before the war no class in any European country held such power as the Magyar aristocrats. Their political and economic influence was comparable only to that of the English nobility at the end of the eighteenth century, and as a class they were even more exclusive than the English peerage.

In those days the aristocrats possessed fortunes as well as pride. The estates of Count Michael Karolyi, which subsequently were confiscated by the counter-revolutionary regime, amounted to 500,000 acres of rich arable land. The estates of other aristocrats, such as the Eszterhazys and Count Schoenborn, were about the same size. One-third of pre-war Hungary's agricultural land—and before the war this was a country of 22,000,000 people—was owned by less than 3,000 magnates.

These large domains were, as a rule, badly mismanaged. They were not intensively cultivated, and a great part of the yield disappeared through the machinations of the agents. Yet even with this poor administration they yielded their owners enormous revenues, which were spent in extravagant and riotous living. A century and a half ago one of the mighty Prince Eszterhazys used a painting by Titian for the lining of his gorgeous fur coat; another of the same family decorated his "diszmagyar," the national costume of the Hungarian nobility, with thousands of pounds' worth of diamonds, rubies, and emeralds. One of the uncles of Count Michael Karolyi sent a bottle of ancient and delicious Tokay wine by special train to an English lady whom he admired. Count Laszlo Szapary, who a few years ago was Hungarian Minister in London, brought before the war a famous gipsy band by special train to Marienbad for the entertainment of King Edward VII, who greatly admired the gipsy music.

The great incomes which made possible this sybarite life were first threatened in the eighties of the last century. In 1883 the competition of Russian and American wheat began to be felt in Hungary. Wheat prices fell, and agrarian protection through high tariffs gave only a partial relief. The choice lay between starting a more intensive cultivation of the extremely rich soil or curtailing the old extravagance. The Hungarian aristocrats followed neither course. The riotous living was continued; at parties which often lasted two to three days (and nights) the wine and champagne flowed as amply as ever before, and the gipsy bands had to play unceasingly for ten to fifteen hours, often playing the very same tune, the favorite melody of the aristocrat or his lady, for half a day. Their lordships continued to gamble, and while some, like the lucky Nicholas Szemere de genere Huba, who won 1,000,000 crowns, or £40,000, from Count Potocky, the Polish nobleman, in one night of card play, increased their fortunes at cards, more lost their incomes and estates. The end of the century saw the impoverishment of the aristocracy, especially of those who owned medium-sized estates of from 500 to 1,000 acres. These lost lands passed into the hands of Jewish financiers or of foreign princes like Prince, later King, Louis III of Bavaria or Prince Hohenlohe.

The passing of the gentry was almost simultaneous with the rise of industry and commerce in Hungary. Sugar refineries, ironworks, and textile mills were established, but the owners of these factories were either Jews who had got rich in commerce, or foreigners, especially Germans. Had the Hungarian aristocrats gone over to industry as the English noblemen did during the industrial revolution, they might have saved themselves. But work was considered beneath a gentleman's dignity in Hungary at the end of the last century. And this attitude was encouraged by the Premier, Coloman Tisza (the father of Count Stephen Tisza). To save the small gentry he created a new bureaucracy, and put the ruined aristocrats and noblemen in governmental positions.

Another crisis came at the end of the World War. Two-thirds of Hungary's territories were taken away and given to the new Succession States. The new regimes confiscated the estates of the Magyar nobility in these territories, and dismissed the Hungarian gentry from the government posts which they held. The new regime established by the counter-revolution of 1919 tried to place these aristocrats in positions in industry and commerce which had formerly been left to foreigners and to Jews.

The lists of the boards of directors of large banks and industrial enterprises are resplendent with ancient aristocratic names. Their incomes from these sources, however, are not large enough to support the aristocrats in the life to which they have been accustomed. And the low prices of agricultural products give the landowners little return, so that though Hungary is the only agrarian country in southeastern Europe in which land reform, at least on a sweeping scale, has not been carried through, the aristocrats, in face of the very low return from their estates, are slowly being forced to sell their lands to the thrifty peasants.

MIDWINTER BOOK SECTION

The Nation

Vol. CXXX, No. 3371 Wednesday, February 12, 1930

"He apprehends what is behind the masks human beings wear"*

TAMARA

"There is something mysterious, taciturn, and criminal in her unhurried speech, in the evasive glance of her deep and dark-gold eyes from under the long, lowered eyelashes, in her manners, her sly smiles and intonations of a modest but wanton would-be saint...."

PLATONOV

"I am a vagabond and am passionately in love with life. I have been a turner, a compositor; I have sailed as a stoker on the Azov Sea, have been a fisherman on the Black; I have loaded watermelons and bricks on the Dnieper, have ridden with a circus, have been an actor. And never did need drive me. No, only an immeasurable thirst for life and an insupportable curiosity. By God, I would like for a few days to become a horse, a plant, or a fish, or to be a woman and experience childbirth; I would like to live with the inner life, and to look upon the universe with the eyes of every human being I meet. . . ."

JENNIE

"He distinguished her from the rest of the girls and almost respected her for her abrupt, refractory, and impudently mocking character. And now by her flaming, splendid eyes, by the vividly and unevenly glowing unhealthy red of her cheeks, by the much bitten parched lips he felt that her great, long ripening rancour was heavily surging within the girl and suffocating her. . . ."

HORIZON

"All the shady world—the proprietresses of brothels, cocottes solitaires, go-betweens, madams of houses of assignation, souteneurs, touring actresses and chorus girls — was as familiar to him as the starry sky to an astronomer. His amazing memory, which permitted him prudently to avoid notebooks, held in mind thousands of names, family names, nicknames, addresses, characteristics. . . ."

YAMA
THE PIT
By ALEXANDRE KUPRIN
At all bookshops $3.00

*"Kuprin is a realist with no squeamishness at depicting the more sordid phases of existence... His powers of characterization are remarkable. He apprehends what is behind the masks human beings wear and portrays them with merciless truth."
—Harry Hansen in the N. Y. World

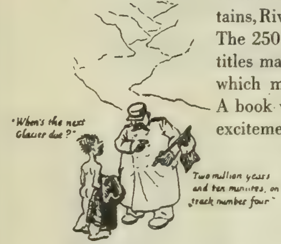
BERNARD GUILBERT GUERNEY, PUBLISHER, 136 W. 23rd St., N. Y.

THE EARTH FOR SAM

W. Maxwell Reed

From the beginning of life to the beginning of history, the story of Mountains, Rivers, Dinosaurs and Men. The 250 photographs with their titles make a connected account which may be read separately. A book which will be read with excitement by everyone between 8 and 80.

$3.50.



"When's the next Glacier due?"
Two million years and ten minutes, on track number four"

A ROOM OF ONE'S OWN

Virginia Woolf

"While it glances in a spirited and good-tempered way over conflicts old and new," says the London Times, "it is really always bent on more intrinsic matters... A love of life, a love of freedom and of letters." "At long last," says Walter Yust, "a woman of rare sensibility writes calmly and frankly and humorously, in defense of women."

$2.00

THE WOMEN OF CAIRO

Gerard de Nerval

"Beneath the magic pen of de Nerval that now-extinct life lives as the life of ancient Bagdad and Bassora palpitates in the Arabian Nights."—London Sunday Times. This is the only available translation of one of the masterworks on the Old East. 2 vols. $7.50

THE FOREIGNER IN THE FAMILY by Wilfrid Benson

"An excellent bit of inter-racial satire," says the N. Y. Times of this novel about a Frenchman visiting his English in-laws. "It has the life of comedy and the charm of wit."

$2.50

WALTHER RATHENAU

Count Harry Kessler

"The absorbing biography of an extraordinary man," says James W. Gerard, former Ambassador to Germany, in the N. Y. Sun. The European Henry Ford. $3.75

FREE

a novel by

BLAIR NILES

author of CONDEMNED TO DEVIL'S ISLAND

ELLEN GLASGOW writes enthusiastically — "I finished 'Free' late last night, and I am still stirred by its beauty and pathos. The book is quiveringly alive. Every person, object, sight, sound, smell seems to spring out from the pages. I feel as if I had lived in that scene of despair; and your touch on the heartstrings is unerring in its precision and tenderness." $2.50

AFTER MOTHER INDIA by Harry H. Field

A necessary companion volume to your copy of Mother India. $3.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY, 383 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK

Midwinter Book Section

All Too Humanism

By HENRY HAZLITT

Of all the strange crazes that sweep semiannually over American criticism, surely none will seem odder to the future literary historian than the present attempt to pump life into that particular rationalization of reaction and gentility that passes at present under the name of humanism. Before we examine the logical credentials of this doctrine, we may profitably ask ourselves what it is that is impelling young writers at the moment to announce their conversion and to take the humanist vows.

We find a number of motives, some of them more creditable than others. There is, to begin with, a reaction from the cult of unintelligibility and incoherence, and from the new barbarism and the tough-guy school of literature; and this reaction is to a large extent sound. Further, the younger generation is impressed by the fact that the humanists seem to have a wider knowledge of the literature of the remote past than most of their opponents. And again, in so far as humanism may be thought of as a form of classicism, it was bound to follow upon an era of romanticism. Just as a period of traditionalism is succeeded by one of revolt, so revolt in turn is succeeded by revolt from revolt, i.e., by another wave of traditionalism. Historic perspective should enable us to hazard the prediction that the wave of traditionalism just beginning will probably go farther; but it should also enable us to predict that it in turn will not be permanent.

Behind this endless see-saw are two main causes. Either traditionalism or revolt, when it reaches a high point, tends to discredit itself by its own excesses. And even if it does not, critics tire of the old theories and the old gods, and want new theories and new gods, if only for the sake of something fresh to talk about. Hence the present shouts of down with Mencken, down with Dreiser, down with Lewis, down with Cabell; hurrah for the youngsters under thirty and the critics over sixty! It is the same motive, at bottom, that periodically leads a bored and restless voting public to turn the Republicans out and put the Democrats in. This phenomenon is recurrent and immemorial, both in politics and literature. It deserves a special name. We might call it, after its most famous victim among the Greeks, the aristidization of old heroes.

Perhaps an even deeper appeal of humanism is an appeal that authority has always made, and now makes with particular force. Amid the blooming, buzzing confusion of new discoveries, doctrines, theories, isms, opinions, it is peaceful, it saves a great deal of anxiety and mental effort, to bow one's head to a traditional authority. Further, many of the conclusions of science, particularly when one does not understand them, and imagines that they imply a purely mechanistic view of the world, seem depressing, and the "new humanism," and even better the old-time religion, appeal as quiet and comforting sanctuaries. It is this that lies behind T. S. Eliot's adoption of Anglo-Catholicism, and the humanist's dislike of what he calls "naturalism." Of course, if you decide to let an authority give you cut-and-dried answers to your problems, there is still the problem, hardly less difficult, of deciding which authority shall do it. In practice, however, that problem has not troubled the religious branch of the humanists at all. There is not the slightest possibility that any one of them will emerge as a Buddhist or a Zoroastrian; they allow the problem to be decided for them by geography and social considerations: Mr. Eliot is an Anglo-Catholic because he is a British citizen.

The humanists, as I have already implied, are not very well acquainted with science. And this, I think, as well as the uncomfortable conclusions to which they imagine science leads, accounts to a large extent for the fact that they seldom refer to science except to depreciate or to patronize it. In brief, they rationalize their scientific ignorance. They wish to convince themselves that knowledge they do not possess is not knowledge of the first importance. If one knows Greek, but not physiology, then it is well to dismiss physiological knowledge as merely "utilitarian," first being careful to imply subtly that utilitarianism is identical with philistinism. At all events, a good humanist knows how to emerge with the conclusion, or at least the innuendo, that literary studies, particularly if they are of literature far enough in the past, are the only kind with a genuine cultural, or as he would put it, a genuinely "human," value.

Not least among the causes for the present vogue of humanism is the desire of the critic to have a theory, a "philosophy," a "point of view." If he does not give clear evidence of such a philosophy, or if it is merely implicit in his criticism, he is likely to be accused of being devoid of "ideas." It is convenient for him to have a philosophy that he can state explicitly, and that has already been neatly labeled. He yields to the temptation to take someone else's philosophy, ready made, and to take all of it, coat, vest, shoes, socks, trousers, without too curious a scrutiny. If, finally, we include those youngsters who are going in for humanism for no better reason than to be on the bandwagon, we have listed virtually all the main motives behind the new movement.

When we come to examine the meaning and validity of humanism as a doctrine, we are confronted by the initial difficulty of deciding (as space limitations forbid dealing with all of them) just whose humanism we are going to examine. There are apparently grave differences among the humanists themselves. There is, first, the schism between the religious and non-religious humanists. The most important recent criticisms have been made from the religious standpoint. Mr. Eliot, criticizing Mr. Babbitt, has maintained that the humanist point of view is at bottom "auxiliary to and dependent upon the religious point of view." And Allen Tate has insisted that "religion is the sole technique for the validating of values." Further, the European humanists do not seem to have too much respect for their American brethren. Ramon Fernandez, translated by Mr. Eliot in the January Criterion, goes so far as to say that the American humanists "do not seem to have tested their notions by a rigorous critique, and are easily entrapped in their own pretensions."

It is the doctrines of the American humanists that now concern us, so we shall turn to their acknowledged leader, Irving Babbitt. It is probably fairest to begin with his latest encyclical, which appears in the February Forum. What first strikes the reader who has had any acquaintance with exact reasoning is the amazing looseness with which Mr. Babbitt, as well as all the other humanists, employs crucial terms. Around each of these terms hangs a heavy fog. There is first the word "humanism" itself, which Mr. Babbitt confesses he has not been able to make clear in a series of volumes. Then there is "standards." Then there is "humanitarianism." Finally there is "nature," with its derivatives "natural" and "naturalism"; and these are used more loosely than any of the others. Stuart Mill once devoted a long essay entirely to the confusions and fallacies inherent in various uses of the word "nature," but he might just as well never have written so far as Mr. Babbitt is concerned. Mr. Babbitt falls into the same fallacy as his arch-enemy and mighty bugaboo Rousseau; the only difference being that Rousseau was all for freeing and glorifying something that he thought of as "the natural man," and Mr. Babbitt is all for suppressing something that he calls "the natural man." At one time the reader of humanist propaganda will find the word "naturalism" applied to Rousseau's naive doctrine of "back to nature," and at another time the word will refer to the scientific investigation of natural processes; and the ill repute that attaches to the term in its first sense will somehow be carried over to the second.

But Mr. Babbitt commits this sin of ambiguity and vague extension on a far greater scale when he comes to the word "Rousseauism." Now Rousseau was an extremist, and in many ways an ass, and it is very easy to discredit some of his more important views. But Mr. Babbitt takes advantage of this fact to attempt to discredit every view, no matter how well established, that is either superficially similar to one of Rousseau's, or may be made to seem so; and he attempts further to strengthen his case by pretending that the views he is attacking have their historic origin in Rousseau. The trick is an ancient one; indeed, it is accurately described in that ironic little masterpiece, "The Art of Controversy," in which Schopenhauer lists, numbers, and names the various shady stratagems for getting the better of an opponent in a dispute. Mr. Babbitt's two main controversial devices fall under Stratagems I and XXXII. The first "consists in carrying your opponent's proposition beyond its natural limits . . . so as to exaggerate it." Stratagem XXXII consists in putting your opponent's assertion "into some odious category; even though the connection is only apparent, or else of a loose character. You can say, for instance, 'That is Manichaeism, . . . or Spinozism, . . . or Naturalism,' . . . and so on. In making an objection of this kind, you take it for granted (1) that the assertion in question is identical with, or is at least contained in, the category cited—that is to say, you cry out, 'Oh, I have heard that before'; and (2) that the system referred to has been entirely refuted, and does not contain a word of truth."

Substitute the word "Rousseauism" above, for any of the isms listed, and you have almost the entire Forum argument of Mr. Babbitt uncannily anticipated and summed up.

Yet it is probably unjust to Mr. Babbitt to imply that he has employed this dialectical device as a conscious trick. The man is too sincere for that, and he has been arguing this way for too many years. Rousseau and his doctrines have become an obsession with him—one might almost say a monomania—and they play for him the role that the devil and his temptations did for the medieval saint. That is why Mr. Babbitt can accuse any one who does not agree with him of "Rousseauistic emotionalism" with the same facility as the late Mayor Hylan could accuse all his critics of being tools of the traction trust. But all this means that it is impossible to take Mr. Babbitt seriously as a thinker. His antagonism to Rousseau distorts all his views, if it does not actually dictate most of them: it drives him to an opposite extreme; he is clearly a victim of "the subservience of contradiction."

No reader can go very far with him, moreover, unless he is willing to take over a shallow and jerry-built metaphysics and an antiquated psychology that insist first on a dualism between man and nature and then on another dualism between what Mr. Babbitt calls our "expansive desires" (the existence of which we are obviously meant to deplore) and what he calls "the higher will." Nearly all of his writing comes down to a mere shuffling of these terms, neatly set off against each other in pairs—"humanism" against "naturalism" or "Rousseauism," "emotionalism" against "reason" (the latter, of course, being identified with humanist doctrine), "expansive desires" against "higher will," and so on, until the reader has had enough. Mr. Babbitt does not use these terms for simple reference, but emotively—that is, they are mere signals for certain hoped-for attitudes on the part of the reader.

It is not necessary to spend much time over the "constructive" side of Mr. Babbitt's doctrine. "Decorum is supreme for the humanist." "The humanist exercises the will to refrain." The insistence, you will notice, is always on the purely negative virtues. Apply them to literary criticism. We are above all to judge a writer, not by his originality or force, not by his talent or genius, but by his decorum! That is, we are to praise him for a virtue within the reach of any learned blockhead. And we are presumably to denounce him if he lacks the virtue of decorum—i.e., we are to denounce Villon, Rabelais, Marlowe, Shakespeare, Carlyle, Nietzsche, Dostoevski, Melville, and Whitman. As for "the will to refrain," it is the outstanding merit of the cartoonist Webster's hero—the Timid Soul, Mr. Caspar Milquetoast.

Enough of Mr. Babbitt's humanism. Paul Elmer More's, or Norman Foerster's is no better. A small clique of the self-anointed have arrogated to themselves a name that stood, in the fifteenth century, for a genuinely liberating attitude, and degraded it to a synonym for a hide-bound academicism. The whole doctrine has become little more than a rationalization of neophobia and a piece of special pleading for the genteel tradition. At its best, it is a mere revival of a singularly dogmatic and narrow classicism. There are, of course, sound criteria in the classic tradition, unduly neglected in the criticism of the last decade. But the critics who wish to apply these criteria will be well advised if they do not load themselves down with the millstone of dogma that the humanists are so eager to hang on their necks.

The Twenties in American Literature

By GRANVILLE HICKS

A SURVEY of the twenties is rather sad business. Ten years ago the chorus of rejoicing was loud and hearty; today we listen patiently to wails of despair and outbursts of denunciation. Ten years ago the sour notes of dissension were drowned out by blissful prophecies of a renaissance; today the surviving dissenters find their triumphant "I told you so" blending with the lamentations of the younger critics.

Short as a decade is, it is not altogether easy to remember how promisingly the twenties began. Nineteen hundred and twenty was the year of "Main Street," "Poor White," "Miss Lulu Bett," "The Age of Innocence," and "The American Credo." It was the year of "Smoke and Steel," "A Few Figs from Thistles," "The Three Taverns," and "Beyond the Horizon." It is little wonder that two comparatively restrained critics, writing in 1924, stated that 1920 began a new age in American literature.

We all know what critics today are saying about the authors who looked so impressive a decade ago. We are told that Cabell is essentially naive, that Lewis is only one short step ahead of George F. Babbitt, that Anderson is diffuse and befuddled, that Dreiser has neither insight nor capacity for clarification, and that Mencken is merely a noisy disseminator of quarter-truths and boob-catching platitudes. It is pointed out to us that Masters is still a man of one book, that Sandburg's violent affirmations have ended in chilly gloom, that Imagism and Amy Lowell are buried in the same unremembered grave, and that O'Neill looks as futilely as ever beyond the horizon.

With more than one of these judgments I find myself forced to agree; and yet I doubt if any fair survey of the twenties can be content with so curt a summary. We need a vigorous analysis of the defects of the middle generation, but there is a place also for a careful weighing of its accomplishments. Second thought reveals, I believe, that the critics who in 1920 hailed the beginnings of an American renaissance were not altogether asinine. We may grant that they should have seen more clearly certain distressing weaknesses in the novels and poems of that year; but that the virtues they applauded were either trivial or non-existent is not so certain.

Let us take the case of James Branch Cabell, whose reputation, judging from the reviews of his latest work, has been as thoroughly deflated as that of any writer of the period. If we can forget for a moment the diminution of Cabell's resourcefulness and the monotony of his slight variations of a single theme, if we can bring ourselves to look at "Jurgen" through the eyes of 1920, we may be able to see why the book was legitimate ground for hope. Here was a work that disregarded the pale proprieties of Victorian reticence and poked fun at sacred conventions, written in a style that, though it was artificial and derivative, was at least evidence of self-conscious craftsmanship. The book could scarcely be said to represent the pinnacle of sophistication, but in 1920 it was reasonable to think that the man who had written "Jurgen" would write better books and would inspire others to the achievement of a wise and mature irony.

By a similar readjustment of perspective we may perceive values—and rather more important values—in the Main Street school. Of course Lewis's picture of Gopher Prairie was distorted; how could he be unaffected by fifty years of a fiction that sentimentalized the village? Undoubtedly his treatment of his characters and his implied criticisms of American values were superficial; in what school might he have acquired the deep insight that could find meaning in the trivialities of small-town life and give form to the chaos of post-war America? But in "Main Street," with its mass of photographic detail and its veracious reproduction of the native speech, there appeared the possibility that something of the real United States might find its way into literature.

"Main Street," moreover, did not stand alone. When we survey the years from 1890 to 1920 we see a little group of writers, usually neglected and frequently damned as indecent, trying to come to some sort of terms with the America they knew. We find their work blemished by survivals of Victorian dogmas and Victorian fears, and sometimes marred by the irrelevant zeal of the muckraker. When we come to 1920 we see a dozen men and women essaying the same task, and approaching it with fewer false assumptions and greater resolution. It may be said that their superiority lay in a better sociological rather than a better literary equipment, but the superiority was there.

Anderson's short stories, for example, portray the frustrations of rural life, the occasional moments of beauty in commonplace existences, the struggles and defeats of the inarticulate; and "Poor White" reflects, in however distorted a fashion, the human consequences of America's industrial progress. More subtly, more tenderly, and more comprehensively, the stories and novels of Willa Cather deal with the frontier. In such works, and in "Moon-Calf," "Miss Lulu Bett," and other novels of the early twenties, the critic saw evidences that American writers had the will to utilize American themes and were fumbling their way toward a form and method that would serve their purpose. There is no particular merit, someone may object, in the utilization of national themes. That is true, and yet those are the themes which American writers most naturally adopt and which most fully challenge their powers. When we have a great literature those themes will not be neglected, and any step toward their utilization has its value.

It should be unnecessary to show how American poetry, shaking off at last the paralyzing hand of Victorian diction, found new vigor in the treatment of indigenous subjects; or how criticism, seeking to defend and interpret the new literature, brushed aside the timidities and stereotypes of the academicians. And it is also unnecessary, I fear, to dwell at length on the disappointment of the hopes which the early twenties raised. The precise nature of that disappointment may be summarized in a single sentence: What was a promising beginning remained only a beginning. As a result, the middle generation is important only in so far as it may have succeeded in clearing the path for something better to come.

Why the writers of the twenties did not develop, why hatred for shams did not grow into a demand for realities, why a desire to treat the untouched aspects of American life did not become a desire to treat the whole of American life, why the quest for unvarnished truth did not lead to a quest for unblemished clarity, it is not easy to explain. Perhaps it was simply a case of the absence of genius; perhaps it was because popularity was too easily won; perhaps it was because our national life is as yet too chaotic to lend itself readily to the purposes of the artistic imagination; perhaps it was because the critics themselves mistook means for ends and substituted enthusiasm for discrimination. But whatever the explanation, the tragedy of the twenties is apparent.

The burst of activity with which the twenties began and the subsequent downfall of the middle generation are, however, only half the story of the decade that has just passed. We must also examine the newer movement, which is at least partly a definite reaction to the earlier developments. Since we are today part of that movement it is not easy for us to describe it, but we cannot leave it out of the reckoning.

The reaction is most apparent in the sphere of criticism. Ten years ago impressionism dominated the field. It was baldly stated in Mencken's cackling-hen theory; it was refined and somewhat systematized in Lewisohn's romantic individualism; it was subtilized and given philosophic standing by Spingarn and the Croceans. Today the swing is toward standards. In its extreme form the demand for standards has led to the adoption of the program of Babbitt and More. If we must have standards, some of the critics seem to be saying, let us get them ready made. Humanism, emboldened by the acquisition of these converts and encouraged by the debacle of the early twenties, is transferring its pulpit from the academic halls to the pages of the popular magazines, and its evangelistic campaign is getting results.

But Babbittean humanism, though it assumes the contrary, has no monopoly in this matter of standards, nor does it find the impressionists its only enemies. A most cursory examination of contemporary criticism calls attention to Clifton Fadiman's pleas for more emphasis on technique and more study of European products, to Irwin Edman's labors of mediation in philosophy and literature, to Edmund Wilson's careful, appreciative, and discriminating studies of contemporary authors, and to Yvor Winters's emphatic and original essays on poetry. The school of Van Wyck Brooks has clarified its principles so that its critical dicta rest upon a firmer and broader foundation than that of ten years ago, and it has given us such creditable works as Lewis Mumford's "The Golden Age" and "Herman Melville," Newton Arvin's "Hawthorne," and T. K. Whipple's "Spokesmen." These critics have not found it necessary to promulgate the fourteen points of their literary credos, but it is a mistake to assume that they are without their guiding stars. Quite as strongly as the humanists, they repudiate the theories of impressionism.

In poetry the reaction has centered in T. S. Eliot. There are unmistakably romantic elements in Eliot's work, but his rejection of the expansiveness of Sandburg and Lindsay, his substitution of compression for diffuseness, and his choice of subjects—all distinguish him from the poets of Louis Untermeyer's renascence. Moreover, many of the poets whose early work Eliot influenced have moved even farther from the position of the middle generation. At the same time there have been many capable poets quite unaffected by Eliot's work. As a result, the diversity of modern poetry is its most obvious quality, and—which is as it should be—it is impossible to include even any considerable portion of contemporary verse within a single generalization.

It is clear, however, that some of our poets are consciously opposed to middle-generation ideals, and that almost all of them have found new aims and new methods. If one thinks of Yvor Winters and Hart Crane, of Allen Tate and John Crowe Ransom, of Léonie Adams and Louise Bogan, and of Archibald MacLeish and Phelps Putnam, one sees the change that has taken place in American poetry since the days of Sandburg, Masters, and Lindsay, of Amy Lowell, H.D., and John Gould Fletcher. Even Robinson and Frost we admire for different reasons than those offered in 1920.

We are wise to avoid extravagant encomiums, but we have little reason for complaint about the present state of poetry. The novelists, however, are less impressive. The influence of the older school continues, and too often its faults have been more persistent than its virtues. Where newer methods are apparent their merits are not entirely clear. The new barbarism, as it has been called, is frequently an exaggeration of some of the less admirable qualities of the middle-generation novelists. The preoccupation with form displayed by Thornton Wilder and one or two others has as yet yielded nothing extraordinary. The shadow of Joyce hangs over many of the younger writers, and so far it has seemed to blight their talents. One watches with interest—but not without perturbation—the careers of Elizabeth Roberts, Glenway Wescott, and Ernest Hemingway. One must approve the increase of objectivity and the growing concern with technique, and one can sympathize with the determination of the new generation to have nothing to do with the easy satire of Lewis, the autobiographical methods of the Moon-Calf school, and the amorphous grotesqueness of Dreiser; but so far there is little enough to which we can point with pride.

If we try to estimate in a semi-statistical fashion the literary progress of the twenties, as Stuart Chase has recently sought to calculate the economic progress, we arrive at results as mixed as his and quite as conducive to only a greatly restrained optimism. We record that the decade began with the production of works that actually raised the level of American literature and that gave promise of a healthy and fruitful development. But we must place over against that the fact that the promise was never kept. We find that in the second half of the decade a different kind of activity began, and we may enter on one side of the ledger the improved state of criticism and the satisfactory condition of poetry. On the other side, however, must be mentioned the dubious situation of the novel and the danger that the reaction in criticism may lead to stultifying excesses.

One more entry we may make on the credit side: we may legitimately note the popular interest in books. The enthusiasms of 1920 stimulated the general reading of poetry, drama, and the more serious novels, and this interest has not diminished with the deflation of enthusiasm. We cannot at present determine the value of the book clubs, the cheap books, the large sales. We can see the evils of the various forms of literary racketeering, the teas and other circus stunts, the log-rolling, the canned reviews, and the culture-over-night advertising. But a lively and widespread interest in books is intrinsically no evil and potentially a good.

One result of the popular concern with books is a greater interest in criticism. Now that the most academic of all critical theories has become a subject of popular discussion, it should be possible for any competent critic to win a hearing. I think—perhaps because I hope—that the interest in humanism is only a fad; if so, the very fact that it has become a fad may prevent it from having any deep or lasting effect upon literary taste. But it will be lamentable if the vogue of humanism does not provide an opportunity for the formulation and presentation of truly humane and philosophic views of literature. We have critics, as I have indicated, capable of accomplishing such a task, and they can do much to provide for the writers of the future a well-informed, alert, discriminating group of readers.

Perhaps a survey of the twenties is not so melancholy an affair as one might think. Repressive taboos and conventions have been cleared out of the way; sad experience has at least indicated the nature of one or two tempting blind alleys; popular interest has been aroused. Professor Perry's salmon may not be running, but I have no intention of throwing away my fishing tackle.

Lincoln and His Fate

Lincoln. By Emil Ludwig. Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

HERR LUDWIG has, I believe, visited the United States, but this book is his first invasion of us that succeeds, in both senses, in living off the country; his strategy, therefore, like General Sherman's, is perfect. As one scans the long list of this author's publications in English, and pauses at the number of copies of each that have been sold, one cannot doubt that he is the most popular biographer of our time. Even a cursory inspection of the books themselves yields up the reason why. He is our sole master, among the many falsely so acclaimed, of the art of making history out of fiction and of reversing the process and making fiction out of history; it is the art of conjuring up the intimate historical background, of re-creating, or of simply making up out of whole cloth, the total setting of an event. The method strongly resembles the Gestalt theory of psychology, or would resemble it if that theory were a metaphor and not a laboratory technique; if the Gestalt psychologist should lose the distinction between observation and invention.

Herr Ludwig was aware of the difficulties besetting the path of all Lincoln biographers. He was properly sensitive at the outset to the implications of the task for a foreigner. And he warns us that the American pioneer background, being specially difficult for a modern European to understand, may have betrayed him into mistakes of detail and of historical evaluation. He has consulted all the leading authorities, and yet, says he, "The art of portraying human characters cannot be achieved by merely studying historical documents; it is practiced and learned in a never-ending study of living men and women." This theory of biography is not unlike a certain lady's theory of masculinity, which was so complete and perfect that in the end she could not tell one man from another and decided that she might as well have affairs with them all. One can easily imagine that, wishing to write about Henry, she would indifferently use her recollections of James and John; all of them being male and human, the same destiny and fate pursues them all. The sole prerequisite to writing about Henry would be an immediate, intuitive, a priori insight into the workings of his "soul," a method of procedure serenely beyond evidence and dispute. I quote Herr Ludwig:

> In those days, however [twenty years ago], I wrote poetry and no biographies, but in my way I studied Lincoln's life portrait as one of the most human heads ever created. When I began work, his figure was familiar to me, without my knowing much of the external history of his life.

Again:

> . . . I can only beg them [the readers] to consider the portrait as a whole and not to be too critical of the minute parts. Lincoln's career, more than that of any other man in history, is so grandly conceived by Fate that the first act is illuminated by the last, and every scene is bound together by dramatic destiny.

The miraculous formula, therefore, is this: Add together three pieces of invention, two pieces of misunderstood evidence, sixteen purple metaphors (mixed), and a great historical figure, and you get exactly nothing until you invoke Fate, who can add two oranges, three apples, and one prune, and get six bananas.

The first scene is a log cabin in Kentucky where the boy Lincoln is developing a mother-fixation. One expects a speedy return to the womb and the information that after all there will not be a story to tell. Fortunately, however, this theme, like a theme in a Russian symphony, gets lost, in a growing consciousness of class struggle and hatred of slavery. From here on the story moves rapidly, even breathlessly and affectingly. For Herr Ludwig is not only a master of invention and of fate; he is a master of narration. You may find a score of inaccuracies in as many pages, but they do not keep you from reading on to the end. Borne on the tide of narrative there is a character called Lincoln, enough like the Lincoln we have come to know to make him recognizable; the tide sweeps over a social and political background that is vaguely familiar. We are willing to pass over the slight but cumulative distortion of background and character in order to hear the perfectly self-confident story-teller to the end.

The author makes little pretension of dealing in full with the political background of Lincoln's early life, or with the complicated political and military situation of the Civil War. Yet he achieves a remarkable effect of completeness because he succeeds in relating all the cross-purposes of that era to a single libertarian idea, which need not be described here, and because this idea is focused almost entirely upon Lincoln. This is the "dramatic destiny" that Herr Ludwig speaks of; its chief principle of action, we begin to suspect, is main force. For the simple facts will not sustain such a view of the first half of our nineteenth century, and Lincoln's early life will not bear it for a moment.

Fate is capable of much, but it cannot make Lincoln an abolitionist ab ovo. One cannot believe that the remote origin of the Lincoln family in New England suffused the Lincoln germ-plasm with anti-slavery doctrine: slaves were still held in New England long after the Lincolns had settled in Virginia. Nor can one wholly believe that the Southern members of the Constitutional Convention were alone unwilling to send their slaves back to Africa; they were as unwilling as the New England members, who sold theirs to the Southern members. Fate is to blame for such Procrustean evidence: fate must have a clean-cut issue, with the opposition homogeneous on each side—the one all good, the other all bad. Nor can one believe that Lincoln's anti-slavery attitude, which was the attitude of a majority of the slaveholders, rose out of a feeling of class hatred, that his sympathy for the under-dog was the other side of his hatred for the rich. Nor, in this connection, can one believe that his hatred of the rich was a phase of his resentment against the mythical Virginia gentleman who was supposed to have been his grandfather; Ludwig admits the mythical character of this story, yet he continues to use it as one of the chief motivating forces in Lincoln's career! No one but a blind partisan of freedom, as this was conceived in 1850, could explain the great compromise of that year as a concession to the South: Herr Ludwig, of course, is not such a partisan, but it does sound better to have the noble cause making concessions to the ignoble adversary, whom, in spite of everything, it would have to chasten in the end. This is fate again.

The most beautiful example of Herr Ludwig's use of the Weird Sisters is his account of the Booth conspiracy. This conspiracy was not isolated; it was part of a greater one undertaken by accredited Confederate agents which nearly resulted in the burning of New York and in various uprisings everywhere in the North. Booth was thus not an obscure maniac, but the instrument of a larger fate—a fate, incidentally, that was to degrade one of the greatest of men to a mob martyr. The conspiracy succeeds, but just retribution overtakes the conspirators. Instead of mentioning Mrs. Surratt by name and telling us that she was never proved to be an accessory to the crime, Herr Ludwig only alludes to her as a "Maryland lady," and lumps the so-called conspirators together as "Southerners all." Ah, those Southerners! They must have been a bad lot.

It is a fascinating book, as about one hundred thousand readers will see for themselves. Allen Tate

A Man's Book

Coronet. By Manuel Komroff. Coward-McCann. $3.

NEITHER Coleridge nor Mrs. Woolf would, I believe, call this book the product of an androgynous mind. It is stamped with an unmistakable masculinity, a quality in no way to be confused with that which goes by the same name for the contemporary novelists who strive so desperately merely to establish the degree of their hero's virility or resistance to alcohol. Mr. Komroff's attitude is far more subtle, sophisticated, and traditional. It is evident in his delineation of women, and especially in his treatment of episodes. The description of Napoleon's retreat from Moscow is purely factual; the temptation to permit an emotional interpretation—a woman's temptation—or the necessity to bestow the embellishment of wit upon the incident—the necessity of the androgynous mind such as shows itself in Stendhal's account of Waterloo—is absent. Mr. Komroff deals with war as a warrior would, as a surgeon deals with an operation, as a fact, something which is and which must be gone through. He also deals with women in the same way, with the result that, to a woman, his heroines are lifeless creatures. Fortunately, women are secondary to his theme. Primogeniture being strictly a masculine affair, the crown never graces a woman's head, and adventure, in fiction at least, being masculine too, the ladies are unimportant.

"Coronet" is a romance in the best and most spirited meaning. It has adventure and extravagance together with that greatest of all virtues of its kind—plausibility. It relates the history of a crown from the time it is wrought by a Florentine goldsmith during the Renaissance, through a century's sojourn in Russia, to the day it is listed among the assets of a titled husband for a Chicago packer's daughter. There is the suggestion that the title offers, beside the subject for a plot, the idea of a symbol, that it signifies rank, power, and vainglory, and that the intention of the book is to show that these are evil things, mutable but persistent. The suspense and interest of the story, however, arise from the author's talent. The prestidigitation of truth and fiction is flawless—Napoleon, Mademoiselle Georges, the Burins and the Jobeys, Chopin, Balzac, and the Mallets, each is as convincing as the other. The racial and individual stamp is placed on the characters with fine accuracy. Always there is movement and change, a coherent stride in the narration. Florence in the seventeenth century, avaricious, pompous, colorful; Paris under the first Napoleon, nouveau riche, ambitious, vulgar; Moscow and the retreat through Russia, grim, heroic, useless; pre-war Germany and its universities, theoretic, beery, militant; Chicago in the twenties, acquisitive, shrewd, naive—these are the circumstances and interpretations, the contrast and variety, the broad range of the setting. Among these scenes is traced the record of five civilizations in a simple, direct language which by its very plainness, like the language of a chronicle, lends worth to the deed. "Coronet" should be a particular solace to those discomfited by the more effeminate literature of the day.

Florence Codman

More Farewells to War

Good-bye to All That. By Robert Graves. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.

All Our Yesterdays. By H. M. Tomlinson. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

AS was to be expected, the law of diminishing returns has set in. The first shock of horror caused by "All Quiet" has subsided; and the reading public has settled down to get what it can from the war-book avalanche in the way of morbid thrills and sadistic enjoyments. The propaganda value of volumes such as these by Captain Graves and Mr. Tomlinson is consequently very slight; and so it is pointless to discuss them as "revelations" or as "searing documents." They are, of course, written by civilized and intelligent men (Graves, at any rate, was intelligent by the time the war got through with him, and Tomlinson has never been anything else), which is to say that they bring against war the bitter and inexorable indictment which we should expect from sensitive human beings. I would not even think it worth while to mention this fact were it not that some critics are already beginning purposely to misinterpret these books; the inevitable counter-reaction of the arm-chair militarists has begun. One English critic (it was Bonamy Dobrée) in the course of a review of a number of war books (among them, I believe, Mr. Graves's) spoke solemnly of "the almost mystic need of man to test himself against horror," and went on to affirm that "war is still the supreme experience to multitudes of men, and the assurance that they can master fear [is] an overwhelming necessity." It is against this sort of nauseous balderdash that we must guard ourselves; it is from such heroic tosh that honest men and writers such as Graves and Tomlinson will suffer. Because they cultivate a sort of gentlemanly reticence and press their indictments more subtly than the Germans, it may be difficult for some unconscious jingoes to realize that they are as bitter, as disillusioned, as even the most ardent pacifist could wish.

It is the quality of that disillusionment and the manner in which it seeks to find its expression in art that are interesting in these two writers, rather than the specific revelations of brutality and stupidity (particularly in the case of "Good-bye to All That") which appear to have engrossed English readers. (Why presumably intelligent people should be shocked to learn that their military leaders were bull-headed and inefficient or that there was little patriotism in the trenches is beyond the power of conjecture.)

The interesting thing about Graves's autobiography is not that he tells the truth about the war but that it took him so long to discover it. When 1914 broke he swallowed the horror whole. He was only nineteen, of course; but, more importantly, he was a public-school product. It is fascinating to trace the slow transformation in his character. He was brought up to be a member of the English governing class but, even as a child, he persisted in thinking for himself. He was a poet and a rebel—but not quite enough of either. Though he did not know it, by the time he had reached the age of nineteen he had been carefully stuffed with the English brand of athletic idealism. He never questioned the reasons for England's entry into the war; and though he was not at any time a patriot (in the sense of an imbecile), the public-school hangover lasted quite a while. One of the dullest—but most revealing—sections of the book describes—not ironically but with a casual, objective pride—the "glorious history" of the Royal Welch Fusiliers, Graves's regiment.

The mental immaturity so carefully fostered by the British bureaucracy is beautifully exemplified by the frank contrast Graves draws between his own war attitude and that of his brother-poet Siegfried Sassoon, who refused to continue fighting. Even after Graves was badly wounded and was in line for a discharge, the old poison of his public-school training—plus his disgust with wartime England—made him reply to the examining officer: "No, sir, I should be much obliged if you would pass me fit for service overseas." It is the "gentleman" in him speaking—the ideal which Sassoon threw overboard in short order. "It was suicidal stupidity and credulity, he [Sassoon] said, to identify yourself in any way with good form or gentlemanliness." How Graves gradually lost his childish Kiplingesque pride in his regiment, how under the stress of actuality he began to throw off the educational fetters his country had so carefully forged around him, how when the war was over he realized that he had attained his mental growth (at the expense of four years of horror and the partial maiming of an excellent poetic faculty)—there is the story of "Good-bye to All That." It is a typically British-upper-class document—except that here the man was forced by his intelligence to turn his back on his own class.

Mr. Tomlinson's book is a much more ambitious piece of work, maturer, deeper-toned. It is not a personal confession disguised as a novel, but a serious attempt to penetrate back of the causes, not merely of this war, but of all modern strife. His story begins in the days of Mafeking and Bloemfontein and aims to show the unbroken continuity of the war psychology of which each separate conflict is merely a manifestation. The attempt has been made, and I think successfully, to rise above simple indignation and horror into those serener and more contemplative heights to which the author of "The Dynasts" attained. The war is strained through that fine and brooding spirit which is uniquely Tomlinson's, and its essence distilled in a prose which is scrupulous to the last degree. It is impossible to find fault with Tomlinson's point of view, despite its occasional abstractness and a slight tendency to a sort of sad and cosmic tolerance, modified, however, by a consistent irony.

As the work of a reflective, beautifully tempered spirit, "All Our Yesterdays" cannot be too highly praised; but as a novel it leaves much to be desired. In his domain, which stretches from the journalistic commentary to the philosophical essay, Tomlinson is supreme; but neither "Gallions Reach" nor "All Our Yesterdays" convinces me that he is a novelist. I find the structure of this book confusing and disproportionate. I cannot understand the necessity for the long Conradian Novabambia section which, while it is beautifully written, is a pretty complicated mechanism to set in motion merely to show us how the colonial ambitions of rival governments produce the germs of war and confound the beneficent morality of science. But the main difficulty lies, I believe, in the wanness of Tomlinson's characterization. He has too acute and original a mind to produce a rubber-stamp character; but he thinks about and around his people so much and he is so careful to relate them to the mood and the ideology of his narrative that they become, in the end, the efficient tools of a brilliantly gifted essayist rather than the urgent, four-dimensional creations of the born novelist. This is true of his men, particularly Jim Maynard and Charley; but even truer of his women.

If one may be permitted to view "All Our Yesterdays" as a long essay on the roots of war, an essay both reflective and dramatic, which utilizes a half-dozen characters somewhat in the manner of an old morality play, one must place it very high. But it was intended to be a novel; and, as a novel, it does not seem to me quite to deserve all the rhetoric that has been showered upon it by the professional critics.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

To One Under a Mountain Cloud

By WITTER BYNNER

Why, when I know how steadfast nature is
And human love how fickle, how untrue,
Why in the openness of daytime blue,
Or why when the mountain-cloud vanishes,
Leaving the peaks miraculous like this
With frozen snow and all the trees made new Like veins in flesh with the warm blood flushing through
From blood of sunset, why do I count on you
Above the quiet of the setting sun,
Above the immortal earth that no man wills,
Above the night's moonlit oblivion,
And spend my thrift upon these passing thrills
Of touch, soon to be mortally undone
Within the glory of the darkening hills!

Sanctuary

By BABETTE DEUTSCH

Paint—sullen blues, low muted reds, and hot
Yellows that blaze, netting the South alive;
Hills, houses, body's grace, three fruits, a pot:
Shapes whose sheer poise throbs like a secret hive. . . .
Sound—climbing out of time and over time,
The issue and the womb; sweet sound, the pit
Dissolving bone and marrow as in lime,
While the fugitive spirit's laughter floats over it. . . .

Though the strong minds that patterned sound and paint
Are quenched, though all our joy in them attend
The sure humiliation of our end,
These are the tabernacle beyond taint,
Even as those holy doors that anciently
Women stricken clutched, to prop a bold infirmity.

Salt in the Sauce

Not on the Screen. By Henry B. Fuller. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THOSE bad sociologists who are sometimes thought good literary critics must have a hard time explaining Henry B. Fuller in terms of his environment. All his life he lived in Chicago, and all his life he spoke in the quietest voice to be heard from any man of letters in America. Nor did he, as the bad sociologists might hasten to suggest that he did, lower his voice out of any sense of inferiority in the presence of Chicago. One of the most informed and most intelligent of the novelists of his day, he had a courage to match his mind. He cut off heads (as in "Under the Skylights") no less thoroughly because he did it politely, and ventured upon perilous themes (as in "Bertram Cope's Year") no less firmly because he did it delicately. If he spoke quietly it meant only that he had by nature a quiet voice. In any other age, though he might have used a different form or idiom, he would have spoken in the same pitch. And in any other age, though he might have been heard more easily, he would not have been heard much more widely than he was. Human ears are not sensitive enough.

Mr. Fuller's posthumous "Not on the Screen" was plainly suggested to him by the contrast which suggested Elmer Rice's "Voyage to Purilia"—lately a serial and a bore in the New Yorker. Life on the motion-picture screen, it occurred to both of these writers, is remarkably unlike life anywhere else. Mr. Rice proved his point by laying his action in the imagined universe of the movies, and then, as it happened, blunted it by multiplying his evidence till ingenuity became monotony. Mr. Fuller laid his action in a more substantial universe, only now and then pointing to the contrast between what does take place and what might, in the movies, have taken place. In the end Mr. Rice had made a picture puzzle too full of tricks, and Mr. Fuller had made a novel almost full of flesh and blood. To that extent the quiet voice has been justified.

Still, the novel is not quite full of flesh and blood, or at least the blood never hurries and the flesh never demands. There is, for example, a love story which brings a young man and a young woman to an engagement five chapters before the end, but there is not a kiss between them anywhere in the book. The only approach to any such carnal gesture is a mere attempt on the part of the villain. The absence of a kiss, surely lawful in these circumstances, is a symptom of the general absence of salt in the characters, wherever else it may be in the story. The novelist has chosen to follow a strictly classical pattern in an account of a young man who comes to the city, slowly makes his way, meets and courts a girl, distances rivals and overcomes the opposition of her family, and wins her and a reasonable prosperity at about the same time. The movies have taught the readers of fiction to expect a great deal of thunder and lightning in such a plot. It is Mr. Fuller's point that, on the whole, nothing more need be expected than a few rainy days and a little discomfort. To press the point he leans backward, guarding against outward excitements and incidentally suppressing most of the natural inner excitements as well.

This formal pattern, this respectable decorum, however, turn out to be far from fatal to the book. Though Mr. Fuller left the salt out of his meat he put plenty of it in his sauce. He disappoints romantic expectations with a contagious delight. Holding his narrative tight in a classic mold, he permits himself the freedom of an unceasing classic irony which plays over the action in every sentence. That irony, being fully conscious, somehow warms the story as by reflected light. Even where it is prim it is bright and shrewd. Even where it is most reticent it always pierces in its quiet way. It demands that the reader meet the writer on the common ground of a critical intelligence which can smile over the drama here presented, but it can be counted on to please any reader who occupies that ground, slyly beguiling him from page to page, through episodes that are humorous because they are so actual, to a conclusion that is convincing because it is so unemphatic.

CARL VAN DOREN

Herbert Read, Critic

The Sense of Glory. By Herbert Read. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

HERBERT READ appeals to the writer as one of the most important of living English critics. Though he is not yet well known in this country, it is my conviction that "The Sense of Glory" will bring him a wide audience among intelligent readers. From my point of view he is a more worth-while critic than T. S. Eliot, and there is every reason to hope that his influence will become as great as Eliot's. For Read accomplishes the difficult task of combining four elements that are necessary to a complete criticism in this generation. He bases his critical methodology on science. He has a remarkable capacity for defining terms. He can live into the minds of diverse writers and clearly and sympathetically explain them. And he offers an ideal for the literary life which, while one may regard it with dubiety, still does not offend one.

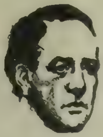
The first requirement for a truly modern literary criticism is that it incorporate into its methodology the relevant contributions of the ancillary sciences. Read meets this requirement excellently. In his "Reason and Romanticism," a somewhat fragmentary and inadequate book in many ways but indispensable to an understanding of Read, he states emphatically this necessity. For instance, to illustrate his method of incorporating science into his procedure, he devotes considerable space to elaborating his conception of the possible contribution of psycho-analysis, particularly that of Jung, to literary criticism. Read takes up Jung's conception of the two major types of mentality, the extrovert and the introvert, and makes excellent use of it. He uses Jung's definitions of the peculiarities of these types to show that so-called romantic and classical literatures are but the logical literary expressions of the two types of minds. In this way he leads up naturally to that eclecticism which allows him to write sympathetically of Sterne, Swift, the Brontës, and Smollett.

His ability to define terms also emerges in "Reason and Romanticism," particularly in his brilliant essays on metaphysical poetry and on comedy. This passion for the exact use of terms, this ability to dissociate ideas and arrive at an exact meaning for loosely used terms, is necessary today when literature is being rescued from the hands of careless thinkers. Though this sort of thing can quickly run into idle pedantry (witness the exercises of Irving Babbitt), at its best it is immensely fruitful. And in Read you have it at its best. Observe it at work in "Phases of English Poetry."

Read's literary ideal has been implicit in all of his books, but it emerges most clearly in "The Sense of Glory." T. S. Eliot did Read a distinct disservice when he asserted that Read was a sort of neo-Thomist. He is not, if I understand him; and his only admiration for St. Thomas is for the latter's immense ability to define terms. The truth is that Eliot has reached the stage where he must perforce find Him under the bed of everyone he happens for some reason to admire. Read, with his scientific bias, could not be a neo-Thomist. (Incidentally, he remarks that there is no scientific tradition in Eng-

Nation Readers Will Find These Seven Books Worthwhile

More than Biography—the Human Story of the Great American



LINCOLN

By EMIL LUDWIG

Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul

A full-length life of the martyred President from his obscure beginnings to his tragic end—told in the same penetrating manner as this eminent German biographer's lives of Napoleon and Bismarck. It is an extremely vital and sympathetic portrait of Lincoln that Ludwig has given us in this new biography — one that will be widely read and warmly appreciated. With 15 illustrations, principally portraits, from the Frederick H. Meserve collection. A large octavo of 505 pages. Cloth. $5.00

THE SUNKEN FLEET

By Helmut Lorenz

One of Germany's naval heroes, writing often of his own exploits, tells a moving and unusually vivid story, revealing, for the first time, many German naval operations during the World War. Translated by S.H. Cross. $2.50

THREE WOMEN:

St. Teresa, Madame de Choiseul, Mrs. Eddy

By H. E. Wortham

Intimate, graphic and witty prose portraits of three women whose qualities made them a power in their own day and beyond. With 3 illustrations. An Atlantic Book. $3.50

A LANDLUBBER'S LOG: Around the World as Sailor and Tramp

By ARTHUR WARNER

"Mr. Warner's book seems to me one of the truest I have ever read. He turns out to be one of those travelers—like Richard Henry Dana, John Muir and Jack London—who know how to make the literal truth more charming than any set of symbols or any system of ideas we might be disposed to dress it in. Mr. Warner is one of those valuable persons who take a quiet pleasure in everything they see or do. Everything has its point for him, everything rests comfortably in its natural setting. The result is that we once more are reminded that the earth is a good wide place chiefly remarkable for its reality."—Mark Van Doren in The New York Herald Tribune. $3.00

THE WRIGHT BROTHERS:

Fathers of Flight

By John R. McMahon

The first complete account, based on unpublished letters, diaries and data obtained from the family, of the great inventors and their achievements. With 24 illustrations. $2.50

THE DECISIVE WARS OF HISTORY:

A Study in Strategy

By Capt. B. H. Liddell Hart

A challenging analysis of campaigns from the Persian invasion of Greece in 490 B.C. to the end of the World War, by a famous military critic. 8 maps. An Atlantic Book. $4.00

COLUMBUS: Don Quixote of the Seas

By JACOB WASSERMANN

Translated by Eric Sutton

This biography by a famous novelist, with whom the history of Columbus has been a life study, aims at discovering the real man behind the legend and romance. And there emerges a strange, dark, entrancing figure, a dreamer with little sense of reality, a man full of weakness and even failure, when not inspired by his mighty idea. Wassermann pictures Columbus with urbanity, humor and detachment. He is unsparing, but never unsympathetic, and his novelist's insight and his research into the sources have enabled him to re-create this tremendous human being—no longer a figure on a pedestal—but heroic in his achievement. With 8 illustrations. $3.50

These books are for sale at all Booksellers

Boston LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY Publishers

lish criticism, which makes his task extremely difficult.) His literary ideal is quite other and is expressed in the title of the book under review. Unfortunately, he nowhere states exactly what "the sense of glory" means, though he insists that we should recover it. But from a close reading of this book I hazard the opinion that his argument runs something like this: Admitting that the world at present is immensely depressing to sensitive mentalities, as depressing as Aldous Huxley at his worst would have it, we must nevertheless live and work as if life were important—at the top of our bent, bring all our faculties to the service of the search for truth and to the creation of a sustaining philosophy for living.

The difficulty comes with the as if. It is an assumption difficult to make. Most of us do assume some such position, whether consciously or unconsciously, but when we are called upon to live with a deliberately assumed sense of glory, we balk. It seems a futile exercise in raising ourselves by our bootstraps, and we cannot but point out that Read's examples do not help us much. We feel more sympathetic with subjects like Swift than with Froissart, Malory, or Hawthorne, though he analyzes and presents them all with equal brilliance. It is not that we do not admit the value of the literature these writers produced, but that we cannot assume the attitude toward life which they unconsciously assumed. Unless the sense of glory grows out of our life naturally and inevitably, it will simply be another ideal offered to us, and rejected—a more sensible ideal than Anglo-Catholicism or the Sense of the Whole, but in the end just as useless.

To close this review on a note of praise, I call to the reader's attention the essay on Henry James and especially the eloquent closing pages. C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

As If a Skeleton Were Singing

Circumference. Varieties of Metaphysical Verse, 1456-1928. Edited with a Preface by Genevieve Taggard. Covici-Friede. $6.

IN the preface to her bold and far from commonplace anthology Miss Taggard has attempted one of the most difficult of critical tasks—the definition, namely, of that kind of poetry which Dr. Johnson none too wisely called "metaphysical." The poetry to which Johnson applied this word had been written the century before by Donne and Cowley and a hundred other ingenious men. The poetry which Miss Taggard has in mind, and of which she gives us many examples, was written not only in that century but in the century of Johnson himself and in the two centuries following him—is written, indeed, with particular success today. Johnson was not in his own opinion paying this poetry a compliment when he gave it such a name; he was pointing, rather, to a species of poetic error. Miss Taggard bestows the term in all reverence upon that kind of poetry which she considers best. Another difficult critical task would seem to be the reconciliation of Dr. Johnson and Miss Taggard.

They agree rather nicely, as a matter of fact, when it comes to describing metaphysical poetry. Johnson employed a different language, but his emphasis, like Miss Taggard's in part, is upon the ingenuity of the stuff—that ingenuity which once went under the name of wit and in the seventeenth century went often under the name of fancy. "Wit," William Davenant had said, "is the laborious and the lucky resultances of thought. It is a web consisting of the subtlest threads; and like that of the spider is considerately woven out of ourselves. Wit is not only the luck and labor, but also the dexterity of thought, rounding the world, like the sun, with unimaginable motion, and bringing swiftly home to the memory universal

HARPER BOOKS
DISCUSSED THIS SPRING

PURE GOLD
By O. E. Rolvaag, Author of "Giants in the Earth" and "Peder Victorious" . . . The story of the grim power with which the gold of itself and in its symbolism as money, fastens its claws into the souls of two human beings. An immensely powerful picture, standing as if hewn in granite."—The Book Review $2.50

THE 42ND PARALLEL
By John Dos Passos . . . The first novel in five years by the man of whom Sinclair Lewis said, "Dos Passos may be, more than Dreiser, Cather, Hergesheimer, Cabell or Anderson, the father of humanized and living fiction — not merely for America, but for the world!" $2.50

THE MISSING MASTERPIECE
By Hilaire Belloc, with inimitable drawings by G. K. Chesterton . . . A new Chesterton-Belloc mystery exposing the art world. A scintillating burlesque. $2.50

THE CIVILIZATION OF THE RENAISSANCE IN ITALY
By Jacob Burckhardt . . . The standard work on the Italian Renaissance. "Most English lovers know the text alone; now over 240 plates and insets double the old pleasure and understanding."—London Observer $12.50

THE MISSING MUSE
By Philip Guedalla . . . "Graceful jestures in prose by a writer who can hold his own at once with the most modish wits and the gravest chroniclers deserves well of his generation, and should leave his mark on it."—John Drinkwater $2.50

ART IN AMERICA
By Susanne LaFollette . . . "The vigorous relentless search for purely native elements and rationally national factors of painting, sculpture and architecture imbues this history with a virile spirit . . . lucid and clear."—N. Y. Eve. Post $5.00

A DAUGHTER OF THE MEDICI
By Jean H. Mariejol . . . The romantic story of Marguerite de Valois. "An excellent, carefully written and thoroughly adequate biography."
—N. Y. Eve. Post Illus. $4.00

A DIARY OF ST. HELENA
Containing the conversations of Napoleon with Sir Pulteney Malcolm 1816-17. $2.50 surveys." A metaphysical prose-poem in itself, this definition; and it speaks in praise of processes which Johnson on the whole condemned—processes resulting in conceits, tortured images, and overelaborate originality. Miss Taggard praises them once again. They produce for her "the concrete word," "the dazzling concept"; they are the sign of a poet "born with a salty sanity in his bones," and "with a coldness that makes it possible for the mind to probe itself, as it writes of itself, lavishly and unmercifully." They are the processes through which, if we are good poets, we learn "to give an idea no form but itself, to show it as organic by an inner music, as if the bones of a skeleton were singing in their own rhythm."

People write well when they write about metaphysical poetry. Miss Taggard does; Dr. Johnson did, and Dryden, and Davenant. And no wonder, since the thing in itself is so wonderful. But they all seem to be writing about different things. Miss Taggard has her own special moral, which is, finally, that "for the metaphysical poet Science is the freedom of the universe, liberating a vast unused mentality; the excitement of enormous sweeps, the dizziness of looking in all directions at the surrounding fact." This is interesting and fine, but I should say something quite different, since difference is in order. I suspect that the metaphysical poet is never so uncomfortable as when he is free; that he abhors vastnesses of mentality; that he wants no enormous sweeps. He inhabits instead a precious and terrible little world of his own making—one he has made, perhaps, in defense against these open spaces, and one in which he plays with nothing more momentous than combinations—sometimes lucky, sometimes laborious—of curious ideas. His world is his own intellect, his personal mind, and it is no bigger than a nutshell; but fuller, for it has an infinite number of cavities, and much sweet meat, and many worms. Miss Taggard's own favorites, Donne and Emily Dickinson, were personal in this fashion. My notion is that science has nothing to do with the case. Yet I could never prove Miss Taggard wrong, and at any rate she is to be thanked for having brought up the whole subject again in a few highly suggestive pages.

Her collection of poems, from William Dunbar to T. S. Eliot and many another modern, is of course a rich one. In some instances I could not fathom the principle of inclusion—as when, after a demonstration in the preface that Milton and Keats are not metaphysical poets, I found poems by Milton and Keats. It would have been better to be strict and leave them entirely out. Donne is the hero of the collection, naturally, but Herbert and Vaughan are fully represented, and Emily Dickinson only somewhat less fully. Among the American contemporaries of Miss Taggard the note seems to be struck best by Léonie Adams, Louise Bogan, E. E. Cummings, T. S. Eliot, Robert Frost, Phelps Putnam, Allen Tate, and Wallace Stevens.

MARK VAN DOREN

Martin Luther

Martin Luther: A Destiny. By Lucien Febvre. Translated from the French by Roberts Tapley. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.75.

HERE is an excellent book that deserves, but does not require, a long review, for it may be commended unqualifiedly as one of the best written and most interesting biographies of recent years, and it seems to have lost nothing through the translation. The author tells us in his preface, however, that it is not a biography, "nor yet an estimate. The plan has been rather to plot the curve of a destiny which was simple but tragic; to establish accurately the few genuinely important points through which it passed . . . and

New Books Worth Owning

The TESTAMENT of BEAUTY

By ROBERT BRIDGES, Poet Laureate

"Places him with the Masters."—Lola Ridges in the N. Y. Eve. Post.

"A noble experiment."—Percy Hutchison in the N. Y. Times.

Best selling non-fiction in England. 1000 copies sold on publication day in United States. Recommended by Book-of-the-Month Club and Literary Guild.
$3.50

TRADITION and EXPERIMENT in Present-Day Literature

T. S. Eliot, Rebecca West, Edmund Blunden, Ashley Dukes, Edith Sitwell and others chart the currents of the modern novel, poetry, drama, biography and criticism. $2.50

MODERN COSMOLOGIES
By Hector Macpherson

The story of man's expanding vision of the proportions and size of the universe from the sun-worshippers and astrologists of Nineveh and the homocentric philosophers of 300 years ago to modern scientists, who place our solar system as a small spiral among two million systems. A book of solid facts that will fire the imagination. $2.50

WAR AND PEACE
(1 volume edition)
By Leo Tolstoy

Tolstoy's greatest novel in one volume, on Oxford India paper, 1,584 pages, 1¼ in. thick. It is the unexpurgated translation by Louise and Aylmer Maude, authorized by Tolstoy himself. $3.00

POEMS OF JOHN DONNE
Edited by H. J. C. Grierson

The extravagance and revolt of his early poems have made Donne popular in our rampant age. Collectors will welcome this edition as the most authentic and inexpensive to be had. $2.50

TEN GREEK PLAYS
Of Sophocles, Euripides, Aeschylus and Aristophanes

The cream of Greek Literature, translated by Gilbert Murray, and others, have been hitherto available only at 90c each. The most popular of these famous translations, in one volume, is an obvious bargain at $3.50

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Avenue, New York

thus finally to open up, with respect to this singularly forceful character, the basic question of history, the question, namely, of the relationship between the individual and the mass, between personal initiative and public necessity." The central thought of the book could not be better stated. M. Febvre portrays in a fascinating style the dramatic struggle between the complex soul of Luther and the social forces of his time; he has also succeeded in giving his subject an excellent historical setting, through his intimate knowledge of the period, without encumbering it with too many details. Though popularized, this is a biography not lacking in keen psychological analysis or scholarship. In the opinion of the reviewer, the book is not inferior in quality or interest to the writings of such interpreters of character as Lytton Strachey or André Maurois.

KARL F. GEISER

A Comedy of Errors

The Man a Woman Marries. By Victor Cox Pedersen. Minton, Balch and Company. $2.50.

As a subject for literary discourse matrimony is gaining steadily. Last season brought us an elaborate statistical survey by Macgowan and Hamilton and another by Groves and Ogburn, and there were scores of minor studies and hosts of articles. To this list must now be added Dr. Pedersen's "The Man a Woman Marries."

Without losing time on loose talk the physician plunges in medias res. The first section of his book is devoted to a matter-of-fact discussion of the mechanics and physiology of sex, a discussion that would do justice to a book on biology. The reader is encouraged: perhaps, at last, an objective analysis of the entire subject without sentimentalities! He is, however, doomed to disappointment. The very next section introduces a prehistoric retrospect bristling with inaccuracies. We are told that the "social standing of early races is indicated by the weight and complexity of their brains" (page 36). One is not quite sure just what this means, but no matter—it is wrong anyway. Then an oft-buried ghost arises: "The earliest organization of society was matriarchy" (page 39). The author has read Lowie's "Primitive Society" but he has not read it well enough. Again: "Capture of women of a neighboring tribe is exogamous activity rudely securing a mate outside the territorial, social, and political relations of the group of the man" (page 40). But where does the author find evidence of such "capture"? As to "exogamous activity," it always refers to intermarriages between clans or other groups of assumed relatives belonging to the same political and, usually, territorial unit. Next comes Morgan's old list of the stages of the family (page 41). The stages, we are told, "are theoretical but probably final" (meanwhile Lowie's book, disproving the stages, lies by unopened). The list, as given, would not mean much to the lay reader; does it to the author?

Nor is there relief when the author returns to history and modernity. The confusion here encountered is truly amazing. This is what we read on page 61:

> Other attributes toward the loved one which sex underlies are: 1. Jealousy or resistance to interference; 2. Desire to share all burdens; 3. General obligation; 4. Patriotism and humanitarianism or extension of the obligation to community, country, and race; 5. Modesty and prudery strangely lead to needless strain and combat contradictory to parental impulses; 6. Indecency and immodesty affect both sexes and spring from mental defects and lead to moral excesses. They are abnormal reversions to the ancestral type of mind.

The rest is an alloy of evolutionary orthodoxy—in the classical manner—and puritanical morality. Monogamy may "Brimming with Human Interest"

FOR THE DEFENCE

The Life of Sir Edward Marshall Hall

By EDWARD MARJORIBANKS

◆

Unflagging Interest

"A vast mine of criminal literature. The reviewer, to whatever pitch of interest he may have been aroused, and to what unflagging attention he may have been held, cannot in any wise reproduce the book . . . Brimming with what is commonly called 'human interest.'" —New York Times.

Thrilling Biography

"It is by all odds the most inspiring and thrilling biography now available . . . A book that sparkles with keen logic matched against the tricks and the devices and best brains of criminal detection." — Brooklyn Eagle.

A Nudge to Connoisseurs

"Well worth buying, if only for the large, generous portions the author supplies of accounts of his subject's most celebrated cases. And most of the best ones in England these forty years are set out again in these pages. Once more a nudge to connoisseurs." — William Bolitho in the New York World.

FOR THE DEFENCE
Fifth Large Printing

At all Bookstores $5.00

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY NEW YORK

be all right, but may we assume, just like that, that it is, or that it is superior to polygamy? With reference to women the author has good intentions; he fights valiantly against all assumptions of sex inferiority, yet we read with reference to school work (page 214): "The girls are the more faithful in effort. The boys have a deeper grasp of any subject"; and a little farther on: "All general characteristics of the sexes are mutually helpful." Birth control is rejected, and as a recipe for "sexual balance" we get this: "Regular exercise—indoors where outdoors cannot be had—simple not stimulating diet, inspiring, cultural, not suggestive, salacious reading, actual accomplishments not idleness." We fear for sexual balance!

In a book on the man a woman marries, one might expect an analysis of physical traits likely to affect sexual selection, something of the compatibility of types (Goethe's "affinities"), some comments on respect for personality, on personal freedom, on the shift of attitudes ushered in with the arrival of the "modern woman." Of all this not a word; instead, numerous and often highly veiled uses of the word "consideration": a man (the one a woman marries) must have consideration. With this assured, the woman may go ahead.

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER

The Testament of Beauty

The Testament of Beauty. By Robert Bridges. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

ROBERT BRIDGES, Poet Laureate of England, was born in 1844; he has lived, therefore, through three literary periods and has seen three well-defined shifts of scene. As a young man he must have been influenced by all that concerned Alfred Tennyson in his poetical epitomizing of the Victorian Age: its religious doubt and insecure faith, its attempt at fortification against the scientific revolution, its moral primness and ugly industrialism. Later he endured the nineties, fin de siècle, a period of pessimism and sensualism whose main dogmas were Impressionism and Art for Art's Sake; and at last he came upon the contemporary scene: he saw Science conquer, and a new Psychology begin to question even the integrity of the thinking mind; he saw Industrialism in complete command of human lives, and, worst of all, he lived to watch a war blot out all evidence of spiritual progress. He has continued after that war to observe a disillusioned group of men who have never known youth or idealism. Now, in the face of all this evidence against faith and hope, he has had the courage to publish, in his eighty-sixth year, his Testament of Beauty, a long poem comparable in its purpose of teaching and prophesying to Wordsworth's Prelude and Excursion.

In this poem Mr. Bridges rededicates himself to the creed announced in 1876 in his "Growth of Love":

> I will be what God made me, nor protest
> Against the bent of genius in my time,
> That science of my friends robs all the best,
> While I love beauty and was born to rhyme.

"The Testament of Beauty" is not a protest; it is an argument and, to Mr. Bridges, a proof that Beauty will prevail, that all forces work toward a greater spirituality in men and toward a consequent greater Art; it is indeed a survey of the past with intent to force the conclusion that man's moral and aesthetic progress is one and the same, and that this progress points necessarily toward a conventional morality and religion. The compulsion toward religion remains important to his argument, but the religious emotion is lost through the author's attempt to use such modern abstractions as Force, Mind, Law, when he means God. If Mr. Bridges's argument remains unconvincing in view of the discoveries of history, science, an-

INTELLIGENT BOOKS

Mrs. Eddy: The Biography of a Virginal Mind

by Edwin Franden Dakin

A new popular edition of the biography booksellers are boycotted for selling, which contains new material as well as every word in the five-dollar edition, of which three large printings have been completely sold.

Heywood Broun declared: "This amazing woman looms three-dimensional, credible, and engrossing from his pages." At the amazing price of $2.00

Look Homeward, Angel

by Thomas Wolfe

"Lifts contemporary fiction into the realm of passionate and penetrating poetry."—IRWIN EDMAN.

Third large printing. $2.50

Essays by James G. Huneker

Selected with an introduction by H. L. MENCKEN

"The essays glow with imperishable fire."—HARRY HANSEN, New York World.

$3.50

A Farewell to Arms

by Ernest Hemingway

"A remarkably beautiful book." —The Nation.

"Here is genius." —Fanny Butcher, Chicago Tribune.

"The best novel by any living American." —Heywood Broun.

"Modern writing at its finest." —The New Yorker.

$2.50

Selected Poems of Conrad Aiken

"He is America's outstanding maker of brilliant verse."—PERCY HUTCHISON in the New York Times.

$3.00

Poets, Farewell!

by Edmund Wilson

Poems from a pen that is gay, satirical, beautiful, sophisticated.

$2.00

At all bookstores

Charles Scribner's Sons , New York

thropology, and psychology, if the proof is based upon an ephemeral idealism with which we today have little patience, this may not necessarily condemn the poem as poetry. Many a poet has gone badly astray in manipulating argument. But since, with the exception of the gracefully medieval tone of the Introduction, poetry here is freighted much too heavily with argument and philosophical jargon; since, indeed, most of "The Testament of Beauty" cannot be called poetry at all—even in its ineptly applied literary echoes of earlier poets, its pallid allegory, archaisms, inversions, and rhetoric—but is rather a prose tract cast into verse, we may consider its logic and its argument rather than its poetic quality. Doubtless Mr. Bridges himself realizes something of the difference between the technique of this, his latest work, and the quality of those delicate and charming lyrics by which he is most likely to be remembered; doubtless he would lead his readers to a consideration of his thought, for he has, in his Testament, taken the tone of an instructor.

"The Testament of Beauty" is divided into an Introduction announcing that the poem is to be a Vision, and then into three parts, Selfhood, Breed, and Ethick. The Vision becomes in the second part much less allegorical and much more argumentative than the Introduction leads us to expect. The symbols are the two horses and their charioteer as employed in the apocalyptic imagery:

> The Vision of the Seer is Truth's Apocalypse, > yet needeth for our aid a true interpreter.
> The names of the two horses are Selfhood and Breed,
> the charioteer is Reason.

Selfhood, the first horse, is the Ego, the selfishness in human beings, but this force may and does grow more altruistic:

> Selfhood is fundamental > and universal in all individual Being, > and that thru Motherhood it came in animals > to altruistic feeling and thence after in men > rose to spiritual affection.

Breed, on the other hand, is the instinct to propagate and is defined as follows:

> Now Breed
> is to the race as Selfhood to the individual; > and these two prime Instincts as they differ in purpose > are independent each from other, and separate > as are organic tracts in animal body > whereby they function; and tho' Breed is needful alike > to plants and animals, yet its apparatus > is found in animals of more special kind;
> and since race-propagation might have been assured > without differentiation of sex, we are elect to guess > nature's intention from its full effect in man:

Breed, too, develops toward a higher spirituality:

> Breed then together with Selfhood steppeth in pair, > for as Self grew thru' Reason from animal rage > to vice of war and gluttony, but meanwhile uprose > thru' motherly yearning to profounder affection,
> So Breed, from like degrading brutality at heart, > distilleth in the altruism of spiritual love > to be the sublimest passion of humanity, > with parallel corruption;

The evolution of both Selfhood and Breed toward higher spirituality may be brought about through Reason, which, in turn, develops its special science of individual and social Ethick. But before this satisfactory sublimation may be reached, the poet is put to some difficulties of argument and proof which should detain us.

The chief difficulty in proving the growth of Selfhood toward altruism is war. How can war be considered as a step toward progress? How is Mr. Bridges to explain this latest catastrophe, if we have progressed very far toward spiritual evaluation?

VICTOR HUGO

by Raymond Escholier

For the first time the real romance of this greatest of French poets and novelists is revealed. "Escholier is acquainted better than anyone else with the correspondence and the archives of the poet. He has written a book that is thoroughly accurate and that could not fail to be interesting, for Hugo's life is quite beautiful."—Andre Maurois $5.00

FIREHEAD

by Lola Ridge

"The exquisite understanding of this poem combined with the music of its verse makes it inevitably the most important writing in its field."—New York Post $2.50

FROLIC WIND

by Richard Oke

"A staunchly built tale of four sisters who lived with their peacocks on the estate at Pagnell Bois. Has a malicious sparkle."-N. Y. Telegram. "Delicately funny, tender and wise." F. F. Van de Water $2.50

OREGON DETOUR

by Nard Jones

"A tough-fibred epic of love and death in the Oregon wheat country."—New York Post $2.50

IDOLS BEHIND ALTARS

by Anita Brenner

A book not about Mexico, but of it. "A noble book and a gallant intellectual achievement."—William Soskin . . $5.00

THE OMNIBUS OF CRIME

by Dorothy L. Sayers

A volume that will in years to come clearly stand as the classic anthology of stories of mystery and detection. . $3.00

JOHN BROWN

The Making of a Martyr

by Robert Penn Warren

An intensely vivid portrait of the blackbrowed zealot of Pottawatomie and Harper's Ferry. Illustrated . . $5.00

BREWER & WARREN, Inc. 6 E. 53rd St.
NEW YORK

And of War she (Reason) would say: it ranketh with those things that are like unto virtue, but not virtue itself:
rather, in the conscience of spiritual beauty, a vice that needeth expert horsemanship to curb, yet being nativ in the sinew of selfhood, the life of things, the pride of animals, and virtue of savagery,
so long as men be savage such it remaineth.

A statement meaning, I take it, that man is still savage.

Under Breed Mr. Bridges is forced into a discussion uncongenial to him concerning sex and marriage and the changing attitudes toward these. After a brief history of nations who have been ruined through immorality, and a brief history of marriage from its lower forms of polygamy and polyandry, he makes this statement:

> Now 'tis a backsliding and treason against nature > when women will unsex their own ideal of Love, > and ignorantly aiming to be in all things as man, > would make love as men make it—tho' Sappho did thatt,
> who rare among women for manly mastery of art,
> A Nonsuch of her kind, exceeded by default, > nondescript, and for lack of the true femine > borrow'd effeminacy of men, the incontinents, > who, ranking with gluttons in Aristotle's book,
> made a lascivious pleasure of their Lesbian loves;

Women, the poet concludes, are made not to be artists but rather to be mothers; as artists they can only ape men or ape Sappho, but as mothers they are unique and unexcelled. As for the history of marriage it proves the supremacy of monogamy, and he clinches his argument with this final analogy:

> Refusal of christian marriage is, as 'twer in art > to impugn the credit of the most beautiful things > because there are so few of them, and hold it folly > to aim at excellence where so few can succeed.

With these problems decided upon, Mr. Bridges can conclude that the boundary between Matter and Mind will became fixed, that terrestrial life will evolve toward conscience, and finally, that through personal prayer:

> Reason (say I) wil rise to awareness of its rank > in the Ring of Existence, where man looketh up > to the first cause of all; and wil itself decree > and order discreetly the attitude of the soul > seeking self-realization in the vision of God

and

> The attraction of this motion (this evolution) is our > consience of it,
> our love of wisdom and of beauty; and the attitude > of those attracted wil be joyful obedience > with reverence to'rd the omnificent Creator > and First Cause, whose Being is thatt beauty and wisdom > which is apprehended only and only approach'd > by right understanding of his creation, and found > in that habit of faith which some thinkers have styled
> The Life of Reason.

And it is to this Life of Reason the poet would persuade us. This heavily documented argument is offered as proof of the evolution of all baser instincts toward a higher spirituality. If he persuades us more directly through the one or two more exalted lyrical passages in the Introduction and in the closing Vision of a Sunset throughout the world, then this is nothing more than a statement that Poetry is not a vehicle, save indirectly, for teachings or philosophy, but may persuade only by the stirring of the emotions, a truth which Mr. Bridges regretfully acknowledges in closing:

> Verily by Beauty it is that we come at Wisdom, > yet not by Reason at Beauty: and now with many words > pleasing myself betimes I am fearing lest in the end

Everywhere
A Best Seller

"A romance on the grand scale. Grand writing."—New York Sun. "The sensation of the moment in book circles."—Chicago Tribune. "Runs at breakneck speed from the Italian Renaissance to 1919. For sheer story telling it would be hard to match."—N. Y. Herald-Tribune. $3.00

CORONET
By MANUEL KOMROFF

OUR SINGING STRENGTH
An Outline of American Poetry (1620-1930)
By ALFRED KREYMBORG

"A glorious book—the richest survey of American poetry that has ever been written."
—John Haynes Holmes $5.00

KING SPIDER
Some Aspects of the Life of Louis XI of France
By D. B. WYNDHAM LEWIS
Author of "FRANCOIS VILLON"

With this book in your hands you can "spend an evening altogether delightful and profitable, in the company of Louis XI and his contemporaries."
—Saturday Review Illustrated $5.00

THE TWO FRONTIERS
By JOHN GOULD FLETCHER

Russia and America compared and differentiated. "Profound and fascinating"—Lewis Mumford. "A powerful and stimulating conception of human history."—John Carter $3.00

DISARMAMENT
By SALVADOR de MADARIAGA

Selected by the American Peace Foundation as one of the fifty best books on the subject of International cooperation for world peace. $5.00

COWARD-McCANN
425 Fourth Ave., New York

I play the tedious orator who maundereth on for lack of heart to make an end of his nothings.
Wherefor as when a runner who hath run his round handeth his staff away, and is glad of his rest, here break I off, knowing the goal was not for me the while I ran on telling of what cannot be told.

EDA LOU WALTON

History and Warning

The Dissolution of the Hapsburg Monarchy. By Oscar Jászi. University of Chicago Press. $3.

DR. JASZI must be accounted one of that rare band which was wise and courageous before the cataclysm of 1914, and whose members, before that time, protested against policies leading inevitably to disaster. Of post-war seers there have been plenty, but this other species is less frequently encountered. Dr. Jászi wrote, long before the war, warning Hapsburg bureaucrats and Magyar super-patriots against a stupid policy of oppressing the subject nationalities of the Dual Monarchy—a policy which would inevitably precipitate a conflict in the Balkans and involve the whole of Europe. In vain he pleaded for concessions to the Slav elements—the Czechs, the Croats and Serbs, and the Rumanians of Transylvania. His own countrymen, the Hungarians, were more obstinate even than the Germans of Austria, and proved relentless in their determination to make of Hungary, in which they themselves constituted only a doubtful majority, a "unitary state" with one nationality and one language. As a reaction against this ruthless oppression, there developed Rumanian and Serbian irredentism. Dr. Jászi is of the opinion that, even if the Archduke had not been assassinated at Sarajevo, some other incident would undoubtedly have precipitated the clash between Austria and Serbia.

Unfortunately for humanity, this small band of honest prophets to which Dr. Jászi belongs proved to be voices crying in the wilderness. The great army of eager conformists, led by patrioteers, marched gaily over the precipice. In most countries the Cassandras of pre-war days, the Russells, the MacDonalds, the Rollands, have been reinstated in public opinion and in many cases have become leaders of thought and action. But Dr. Jászi still has the distinction, one might almost say the honor, of being an outlaw. Hungary, stupidly truncated and mutilated by the peace treaties, writhes under a Magyar-megalomaniac dictatorship, obsessed by hope of recovering its lost provinces, and therefore insanely intolerant of such men as Jászi, who refuse to sacrifice historic truth to chauvinist convenience. Dr. Jászi may count himself happy in his professorship in a peaceful Ohio college. Could the Horthy government lay hands on him inside Hungary, he would probably soon find himself in a Budapest prison, for in his latest volume he has repeated in more detail and more convincingly his indictment of Hungarian misrule before the war and even up to the moment of the breakdown in 1918.

In masterly fashion he sums up the causes of the fall of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. For one thousand years the Hapsburgs had been trying to weld a real state out of a conglomeration of races and nationalities possessing various languages and religions and economic necessities. A number of circumstances aided them in their task, and had they taken advantage of their opportunities they might have created gradually, by a process of wise evolution, a federal state something like the Swiss Federation, but, of course, on a much greater scale. In that event the Dual Monarchy would have become the leader of the Slavs and would have attracted into its orbit all the Balkan peoples. The experiment failed largely because

What Manner of Man Was He?

"Before he lost consciousness he requested that no charge be brought against the driver of the car that had struck him."

The life story of this man is told in

AN EAST SIDE EPIC

THE LIFE AND WORK OF MEYER LONDON

by Harry Rogoff

$2.50 . . . . . . Bookstores

VANGUARD

An Important New Book

THE LABOR INJUNCTION

By

Felix Frankfurter and Nathan Greene

This is a comprehensive study of the labor injunction in all of its phases. The legislative efforts to define and limit the use of the injunction in labor disputes are traced in detail, and the judicial application of the injunction, in Federal and State jurisdictions, is analyzed. The authors then give their views on the appropriate direction of future legislation. The labor injunction has never been a more vital subject than it is today. No other book has treated of it so adequately as this. Price, $5.00 the Magyars in the Hungarian half of the empire refused to lend themselves to a policy of conciliation. For, in spite of many mistakes and stupidities, Austria and her dependent crown lands, through years of clash, gradually developed a system under which the subject nationalities and the racial minorities received pretty complete local autonomy, and, in the national parliament, representation by deputies democratically elected by universal suffrage. Dr. Jászi believes that the Austrian part of the Dual Monarchy was well on the way to a solution of its racial and nationalist conflicts before the war. But the Magyars, who in 1848 had themselves been obliged to fight for freedom, would permit freedom to none of the other races in Hungary, and suppressed all aspirations in that direction with clubs of the gendarmerie, bayonets of the army, and every variety of legal chicanery, browbeating, and corruption. It was Budapest that finally forced Vienna into the conflict with Serbia. Hungary dared not permit a strong Serbia to grow up at her southern frontiers, a Serbia whose independence would inspire the Serbs and Croats in Hungarian bondage to demand liberation.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
60 Fifth Avenue New York, N. Y.

This is not the place to enter into details regarding Dr. Jászi's masterly work. For students it must serve almost as a textbook of Middle European evolution before and during the war. But the work has also a very deep significance for all who are interested in the future of Europe and the prevention of another world conflict. Procrustean peace treaties have scattered the same explosives that blew up the Hapsburg monarchy throughout Middle Europe, from the Baltic to the Aegean. There are now a number of Austria-Hungaries in petto—Czecho-Slovakia, Rumania, Poland, Jugoslavia. And there are, to say the least, two very definite irredentist areas, Hungary and Bulgaria. All of the first category, Czecho-Slovakia perhaps excepted, are committing exactly the same blunders, but with exaggerated brutality and stupidity, that Hungary committed before the war, and Hungary is behaving in much the same manner as did the old Serbia. Unless the outside world takes a hand, we are likely to see history repeated. Dr. Jászi's book, through its profound analysis of the causes of the Austro-Hungarian failure, warns us of the dangers of the present situation and shows European statesmen a way out through conciliation and federalism. The work is a liberal education in Central European politics, not only of the ante-war period, but of today as well.

HENRY G. ALSBERG

A Modern Don Quixote

Agin' the Governments: Memories and Adventures of Sir Francis Fletcher Vane. London: Sampson, Low. 16s.

SIR FRANCIS VANE is a modern Don Quixote, the windmills he tilts at being powers and principalities in their British and Italian manifestations. His book of memories and adventures is a vivid record of his rebellions, major and minor, including youthful revolts against fagging in English public schools and ragging in the army; passing on to protests against the British burning of Boer farms and the shooting of the wounded Boer commandant Scheepers, and culminating in his struggles against the "Brass Hats" in Ireland and his encounters with Mussolini in Italy. Sometimes he is successful in his knight-errantry, sometimes defeated, yet even in failure he comes off with glory.

Owing to his mixed ancestry (English Puritan and Irish Catholic rebel in equal parts) Sir Francis has curious and at times baffling reactions. A soldier by choice and by profession, yet a pacifist, an imperialist yet a rebel, an aristocrat through and through with the outlook and prejudices of his caste, yet Labor in sympathy—he stood as a Labor candidate in

THE GROWTH AND DECADENCE OF CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT
By J. ALLEN SMITH
An incisive and critical study of constitutional government

"In the volume now appearing he has carried further his exposition of the gentle art of thwarting the majority will by legal and constitutional means. A democrat grown old in the cause, a confirmed and unrepentant liberal, he was too strongly saturated with Jeffersonian ideals to approve the ways of our triumphant plutocracy."—From the Introduction by the late Professor Farrington. $3.00

A HISTORY OF MODERN CULTURE
Volume One—The Great Renewal: 1543-1687
By PRESERVED SMITH

An accurate and variegated survey of the intellectual progress of Western culture as a whole. Deals with the emergence of the modern sciences; with the manifestations of theoretical and speculative thought; with the various aspects of social control; and with the spirit of the times as indicated in current morals and manners, literature, and art. The magnum opus of one of our most eminent historians. $5.00

AN INTRODUCTION TO SOCIAL ANTHROPOLOGY
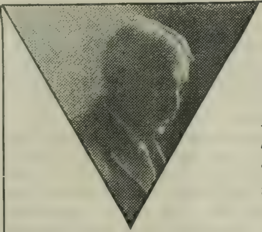
By CLARK WISSLER

An excellent study of primitive society by a prominent anthropologist. While emphasis is naturally placed on the social aspects of primitive life, attention is paid to all phases of this many-sided subject. A guide to an orientation in human society as a whole. $3.50

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY
One Park Avenue New York



Have you read this great book—the crowning work of America's foremost philosopher?

JOHN DEWEY

"The Quest for Certainty reinforces Dewey's position as the most original and important American thinker of our time."—Henry Hazlitt in The Nation. "This book was written to open a road to freedom for men in a world of science and machines—to provide an instrument for the use of intelligent people in the solution of practical affairs."—The New Republic.

Third large printing. $4.00

THE QUEST FOR CERTAINTY

MINTON, BALCH, 205 E. 42nd St., New York City

the khaki election of 1918—his salient characteristics are moral courage and humor, qualities rare among militarists. Yet, though he hates war he goes, as Heywood Broun would put it, yodeling into every fray and foray. In that "mixed pack" he calls his ancestry Sir Francis has a forbear, he tells us, who "went out in '98 with Lord Edward Fitzgerald, escaped to America, and fought the English at Baltimore," and he is a lineal descendant of the irrepressible Sir Harry about whom Cromwell used to wail: "Harry Vane, Harry Vane, will no one rid me of Sir Harry Vane?" The query is one that many a "Brass Hat" must have repeated at various points in his descendant's career.

In a foreword to the work George Russell (Æ) pays Sir Francis this deserved and happily worded tribute:

> I first met Sir Francis Vane in Dublin in 1916. . . . He was with the British army, and there is nothing more difficult than to be part of a military organization, excited by warfare, and at the same time never to forget those more ancient loyalties of the soul to justice and our common humanity, from which so many divest themselves in war. I remember Sir Francis, Nevinson, Hammond, and some others, who made it possible for us not to cast another people entirely out of our hearts.

His allusion is to the valiant part played by the author during the war in Ireland, when he set himself the gigantic task of exposing certain atrocities committed by the military machine and condoned by the higher authorities in Dublin Castle and at Westminster, notably the Portobello Barracks murder of three Irish editors, Sheehy Skeffington, Dickson, and MacIntyre. Finding that the murderer of these men, Captain Bowen-Colthurst (who put the prisoners against a wall and shot them out of hand) was promoted some days afterwards, Sir Francis (then Major Vane) crossed to London in order to bring the matter personally before Lord Kitchener and Prime Minister Asquith, only to learn that Kitchener's telegram ordering the instant arrest of the guilty officer had been suppressed by Sir John Maxwell. Later Captain Colthurst, brought up before a court martial (forced upon the authorities by the publicity given the affair), pleaded insanity and was put into Broadmoor asylum during the King's pleasure, whence he was released after a brief period. Major Sir Francis Vane, however, was deprived of his rank and military title and relegated to unemployment as a result of his efforts to bring those responsible to book. Sir Francis publishes the correspondence that passed between him and ex-President Roosevelt about the affair; this too was suppressed by the military censor, and the author was refused passports during the war to America and, later, to Italy when the illness of Lady Vane caused him to apply. Afterwards, when he did get to Italy, he came up sharply against Mussolini's military machine, as he was bound to do, in connection with the formation of the Boy Scouts organization, and before long had to leave the country. Il Duce had no more liking for types like Sir Francis than the British Government had at home.

In addition to his earlier works, "Pax Britannica," on the Boer war, and "The Other Illusions of War," Sir Francis wrote "The Easter Rising" and a volume of war stories. These latter were suppressed. "Both," he adds, "were from the imperial point of view, but had too much truth to suit the digestion of the authorities." It is to be hoped that he may now go ahead and print them. Considering his many mutinies it is surprising that Sir Francis has managed to escape alive, more astounding still that, in spite of all, he should remain faithful to his imperialist creed. To this last he appears to be unaccountably and incurably attached. This modern Aristides has many of the characteristics of his Greek prototype who did not survive.

H. SHEEHY SKEFFINGTON

LENIN

Collected writings of V. I. Lenin, including documents, explanatory and biographical notes.

THE IMPERIALIST WAR $3.00 and $4.00
THE REVOLUTION OF 1917
2 Vols., Ea. $3.00 and $4.00
THE ISKRA PERIOD (1900-1902)
2 Vols., Ea. $3.00 and $4.00
MATERIALISM AND EMPIRIO-CRITICISM
$3.00 and $4.00
The Fight for a Program, Organization and Tactics (1893-1904) $1.25
The Bolshevik Party In Action (1904-1914) $1.50

$1.50 Each THE MARXIST LIBRARY $1.50 Each

Beginning a library of classics of Marxist literature.

FUNDAMENTAL PROBLEMS OF MARXISM
by G. V. Plekhanov
IMPERIALISM AND WORLD ECONOMY
by N. I. Bukharin
THE ECONOMIC THEORY OF THE LEISURE CLASS
by N. I. Bukharin
KARL MARX AND FRIEDRICH ENGELS
by D. Ryazanov
THE 18th BRUMAIRE OF LOUIS BONAPARTE
by Karl Marx
THE PEASANT WAR IN GERMANY
by Friedrich Engels

THE SOVIET UNION AND PEACE
Official documents $2.25
AN OUTLINE OF POLITICAL ECONOMY
I. Lapidus & K. Ostrovityanov.............. $3.25
ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION ......Vol. I, $2.75 Vol. II, $4.00

AT ALL BOOKSTORES

Write for Catalog

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS CO.
INCORPORATED
381 FOURTH AVENUE NEW YORK

Best for Home, School, and Office

The Best Abridged Dictionary because it is based upon the "Supreme Authority," WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY.

Webster's Collegiate

Contains 106,000 entries, including many New Words; a dictionary of Biography; a Gazetteer; rules of punctuation, use of capitals, abbreviations, etc.; foreign words and phrases; 1,256 pages; 1,700 illustrations.

Thin-paper edition: Special Merriam Cloth, $5.00; Fabrikoid, $6.00; Leather, $7.50.

Look for the Circular Trade-Mark

Purchase of your bookseller; or send order and remittance direct to us; or write for information. Free specimen pages if you mention this magazine.

G. & C. MERRIAM COMPANY
Springfield, Mass.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Books in Brief

A Guide to the Principal Sources for Early American History (1600-1800) in the City of New York. By Evarts B. Greene and Richard B. Morris. Columbia University Press. $7.50.

This is the most important contribution to the bibliography of American historical material in the city of New York since the late Herbert L. Osgood prepared for the Public Archives Commission of the American Historical Association, in 1900, his guide to the records in the city departments. Both printed and manuscript sources are included under general topical classifications, and the locations of the documents are indicated; certain notable collections, however, are listed under the institutions in which they are found. The guide is incomplete only in that it does not as a rule include secondary works and single-volume titles among printed books, and pays no special attention to genealogy, but with these exceptions the listing is all that could be desired. The editors cannot be too highly praised for the intelligence and thoroughness with which they have carried through their laborious task.

The Sword of the Soul. By Roger Chauviré. Translated from the French by Ernest Boyd. Preface by James Stephens. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

This Frenchman's version of the events in Ireland during the early days of the war is far superior to the usual novel written by foreigners about other people and their crises. Mr. Stephens unwittingly reveals the author's chief defect in his preface: "If we are imperturbably just to the personae engaged we are, by that fact, bound to be unjust to the drama that involves them. And from the point of view of a story-teller the action that is under narration is of infinitely greater importance than are the characters which it engages." The drama which M. Chauviré unfolds is social and political—a detached document of revolutionary Ireland. Not one of the characters has any real existence; and one closes the book with the feeling that he has been reading a discursive exposition of the seething forces behind the Irish outbreak, not a rounded and developed story. From the standpoint of analysis, on the other hand, the book is sound, and it shows without partisanship the various elements caught up in the struggle during its most critical and moving moments. That propaganda can join hands with poetry is shown in the long excerpts from Kathleen ni Houlihan which the author presents, but M. Chauviré has no place for poetry or partisanship. The book may be recommended to those who prefer their history in the palatable form of a novel.

A Stranger in Paradise. By J. Anker Larsen. Translated from the Danish by Ruth Castberg Jordan. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This is the story of Hans Larsen, a Danish peasant boy whose dreamy, religious nature so impressed itself on his comrades and elders that when he died, still in his youth, he had planted the seeds whose growth was to transform his village into a little paradise. For those who like Mr. Larsen's other religious novels or find in themselves a kinship with the mystic mind, "A Stranger in Paradise" should prove inspiring. To others it has little to offer except sincerity and vagueness.

Windlestraws. By Phyllis Bottome. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

When Jean Arbuthnot goes to Windlestraws to become Sir Reginald Falconer's secretary, she becomes involved in one of the most unusual love triangles in recent fiction. The story of modern furniture reflect the true spirit of modern art as applied to useful things.

A Modernage piece becomes an integral part of the room in which it stands.

• • •

The largest and most unusual collection of beautiful modern furniture in America.

OPEN MONDAYS UNTIL 8:00 P.M.
SATURDAYS UNTIL 5:00 P. M.

SEND FOR BOOKLET N

MODERNAGE
FURNITURE CO.
541 East 17th Street
Stuyvesant 7478

MANUFACTURERS OF FINE MODERN FURNITURE—EXCLUSIVELY

tells how her presence further complicates the situation, how she extricates herself, and what becomes of the three aristocratic and tortured souls. As a novel "Windlestraws" is more than a mere thriller, for it is well written and contains passages that show more than superficial knowledge of character and human emotion, but the male reader would be inclined to criticize the book as a thoroughly feminine one—one in which the masculine characters, though sympathetically dealt with, are seen as in a glass darkly.

How We Lived Then—1914-1918. By Mrs. C. S. Peel. Dodd, Mead and Company. $4.

A valuable record of what people—particularly English people—wore, ate, and even thought during the most desperate years of the present century. Women war workers, V. A. D.'s, the Red Cross, the nursing homes run by rich women who had never worked before in their lives, the lonely boys home on leave, the shops of German grocers and drapers stoned by irate Londoners—Mrs. Peel has forgotten none of them. She has set down itemized lists of rations for noncombatants and soldiers; she has tabulated prices of food and clothing and shelter; she includes pictures of the food demonstrations when rations were scarce, of great municipal kitchens, of Queen's meat cards. One remembers how dreadfully important the question of food was in those days. Those who lived through the war will recall many other things as they turn over Mrs. Peel's pages. For the most part she has set down her facts and let them speak for themselves; and they speak eloquently of courage and despair, of privation and plunder, of hunger and disease and sacrifice—all happening to quite ordinary persons hitherto strange to these more primitive emotions. Nor will the record be less valuable to a generation to whom the war is nothing more than hearsay that reached them in the nursery. They, too, can read with profit and learn that war is less adventure than drudgery, less glory than plain hunger and cold.

The Big American Parade. By E. Haldeman-Julius. The Stratford Company. $3.

Through more than 400 pages Mr. Haldeman-Julius pours out facts regarding American civilization and his not very cogent comments upon them. He touches upon materialism, jazz, morality and immorality, automobiles, the World War, democracy, prohibition, culture, and many other matters without any apparent logical procedure, until the reader is tempted to ask him the question which forms the title of one of his chapters—where are we headed? Occasionally he becomes stern in his supposedly critical survey, but not for long; his bubbling optimism soon bathes the offending item in a liquid rainbow. This cheerfully superficial temper may be illustrated by his remark that "the only thing which can be alleged against" American materialism is that it is not fully or justly enjoyed by all. Its effect upon our attitude toward life, its influence upon our ideals in education, politics, and other activities—these considerations are evidently unimportant. Mr. Haldeman-Julius is capable of even this spread-eagleism: "In art, in literature, and in thought generally America is far ahead of any previous time." We do beat all creation in modesty and sense of humor.

THE DIVORCE AND SEPARATION OF ALIENS IN FRANCE. By Lindell T. Bates.
Grounds and defences, power and jurisdiction of courts, procedure, rules of evidence, alimony, separation agreements, division of property, etc.
COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS. Price $7.00

GERMANY
LAND OF BEAUTY

The exciting present and the golden past form one harmonious pattern in Germany. Music festivals echo with golden thunder. Deep forests and emerald lakes lure the hunter and angler. Lake and sea resorts sparkle with gaiety, golf, tennis and swimming. Horse and motor races give thrilling panoramas. Everyone dances in vivid cabarets; while walled towns retain a legendary splendor. Old-world hospitality, moderate prices, no visé charge. Every form of sport and culture invite the traveler to Germany for a holiday of ever-changing delight.

"Going to Europe" means going to Germany

GERMAN TOURIST
INFORMATION OFFICE
665 FIFTH AVE. NEW YORK, N. Y.

Please send me Illustrated Travel Brochures on Beautiful Germany. 18
Name..........
Address..........

Visits to Soviet Russia
FOURTH SEASON

Explorative itineraries worked out with reference to social, economic, historic, artistic and scenic features. Visits to factories, schools, children's communities, collective farms and villages . . . art treasures, palaces and workers' rest homes . . . for the adventurous . . . camping in the Caucasus and study of primitive tribes.

Small groups, each accompanied by a qualified American leader and Russian interpreter. From $395 including express steamship passage. Literature available.

Individual itineraries also executed ▲ Independent year-'round representation in Russia

20-30 WEST 43rd STREET ▲ NEW YORK

THE OPEN ROAD

Music

Opera in English?

THE recent and excellent performances of the American Opera Company again raise the vexed question, and seem to answer it by their success. At the cost of time and research they have secured new translations. Is this effort to present music-drama in a language in which it was not conceived justifiable?

The clamor of American audiences for foreign opera presented in our tongue is caused, I think, by a sly duplicity in the character of opera. People who would never brave a symphonic concert flock to its doors because it offers them a "story," that most immediate appeal to the imagination. It cunningly persuades them in with the promise of a tale to be told and then, quite aware of its inability to make that tale clear, traitorously hands them the sop of a plot synopsis and goes about its chief business—the unfolding of a structure of sonority. Obviously its trick succeeds, for the opera-goer does not—at least in large numbers—walk out. He applauds. Stirred by the more subtle, more potent draft of music, he would be quite content did not the initial promise linger in his mind, haunting him, if he is faced by a foreign libretto, with the sense of having been cheated. When the spell of the music is dissipated he voices his suspicion loudly. The attempt to answer him is opera translated into English.

Hence the argument is advanced that it is more important for an audience to understand the text of an opera than to hear it in its native language; that the gain in clarity secured by following the plot more than compensates for the inevitable distortion caused by a translation. This deformation no one can deny. Either the note values are changed and the shape of the phrase consequently is altered to accommodate the accent and cadence of the new words, or the musical pattern remains intact while the new text is warped to fit it.

This attempt to force a linguistic stepmother upon the musical line in place of the parent-language which gave it birth inevitably produces, like other artificial domestic makeshifts, results which vary from the comic to the disastrous. And since that dual entity, music and text, forms an essential part of the orchestral score, and the score itself is an element far more vital to lyric drama than plot or dialogue, the whole attempt to give foreign opera in English reveals itself as a mistake in emphasis. Structure is sacrificed to circumstance.

As if this were not enough, the solid fact confronts us that at least half the text of most opera in any language is unintelligible under the best conditions. One has seldom heard clearer diction than that of the American Opera Company. Yet despite this, entire flocks of words vanished in a forest of other sounds—in the crescendi of orchestral voices, in the prolongation of syllables upon a florid phrase, in short, in the inherent organism of lyric drama. An opera text is not capable of conveying clear information as to whither the hero is bound or why the heroine finds herself being married to the wrong man. Nor are these data of primary concern to production or auditor. The latter thumbs his synopsis studiously for a time, then, toward the end of the first act, relinquishes the brain-splitting task of attending to two things at once and settles back to enjoy the music as the wily Dame Opera had all along intended that he should. Certainly his concern for the "story" is not valid enough to warrant tampering with text and music in an impossible attempt to achieve the revelation of the entire text.

There remains, then, native American opera. In its dedication to the production of a new work of this kind each year, the American Opera Company answers a demand and sets an

THIRTEEN YEARS OF LIVING FAME

"—&Co."

By JEAN-RICHARD BLOCH

THIRTEEN years of living fame preceded the publication of "—And Company" in America—thirteen years of continental acclaim, which began with a salute to it by ROMAIN ROLLAND, ARNOLD BENNETT, PAUL CLAUDEL, ISRAEL ZANGWILL, and ANDRE GIDE as a masterpiece comparable to Balzac's Human Comedy, and which continued with an increasing awareness of its magnificent strength and essence through the literary circles of Europe.

Today, American critics spontaneously re-echo this impressive concert of appreciation, and hail "—And Company" in its distinguished translation by C. K. Scott-Moncrieff, as a saga of the first magnitude.

VAN WYCK BROOKS —Built on the scale of the masterpieces of French literature.

WALDO FRANK — A monumental work of far horizons.

HERALD-TRIBUNE — A vast epic — one of the richest achievements in the history of literature.

NEW YORK TIMES — Has all the earmarks of a major work.

from the INNER SANCTUM of SIMON and SCHUSTER

. . . at all bookshops $3.00

FEBRUARY CHOICE of BOOK LEAGUE of AMERICA

DELIVERED TO YOUR DOOR!
NEWEST FICTION and NON-FICTION by messenger anywhere in Manhattan

OUT-OF-TOWN
PARCEL POST SERVICE
(Postage Additional)
Transit time allowed

25¢
RENTAL PER WEEK
$1 Life Membership

20% Membership Discount on all purchases.
Some of the 300 titles on our current list:

All Our Yesterdays—H. M. Tomlinson
Coronet—Manual Komroff
The Maurizius Case—Wassermann
Look Homeward, Angel—Wolfe
Good-Bye to All That—Graves
The Voyage Home—Storm Jameson
Bitter Waters—Heinrich Hauser
Farewell to Arms—Hemingway
Pearl Diver—Victor Berge
Daughters of Eve—Bradford
Million Pound Deposit—Oppenheim
Shepherds in Sackcloth—Kaye-Smith
Australia Felix—H. H. Richardson
The Hidden City—Philip Gibbs
Iron Man—W. R. Burnett
Young Man of Manhattan—Brush
Shadows of Men—Jim Tully
"& Co."—Jean-Richard Bloch
I'm Lucky At That—David Betts
Gallery of Women—Dreiser
Diana—Emil Ludwig
It's a Great War—Mary Lee
God Have Mercy on Us—Scanlon
Man with Squeaky Voice—Walling
Dr. Krasinski's Secret—Shiel
Four Square—John R. Oliver
Casanova—Guy E. Endore
King Spider—Wyndham Lewis
Franklin—Bernard Fay
Twelve Against the Gods—Bolitho
Autobiography of America—Van Doren
New Worlds to Conquer—Halliburton
Marriage & Morals—Bertrand Russell
The Meaning of Culture—Powys
Up to Now—Alfred E. Smith
Mrs. Eddy—Edwin Franden Dakin
Beethoven—Romain Rolland
Stretchers—Frederick A. Pottle
July '14—Emil Ludwig
Tragic Era—Claude G. Bowers
Free—Blair Niles
Pure Gold—O. E. Rolvaag
42nd Parallel—John Dos Passos
Yama—Alexandre Kuprin
Card 13—Lee & Ford
Testament of Beauty—Robt. Bridges
Lincoln—Emil Ludwig
Rise of Amer. Civilization—Beard
The Human Mind—Karl Menninger
Escape—Francesco Nitti

Check 5 titles above and one of your selections will be sent with complete list. Mail $1 with your name and address. Books may be taken weekly or semi-monthly. Start and stop when you choose. Rental bill rendered monthly.

THE BOOK-A-WEEK SERVICE
Dept. 34, 45 West 45th Street, New York City example which cannot be highly enough praised. It provides a vehicle for American composers and librettists who might be otherwise unheard. This season's offering, "Yolanda of Cyprus," under Mr. W. Rosing's direction, was buoyant, unified, truly dramatic, and beautiful to look at. If it lacked the golden voices of older organizations, it was also refreshingly free from the familiar vanity of singers who out-yell their colleagues and turn drama into a series of recitals. The text, adapted by Cale Young Rice from his play, was set by Clarence E. Loomis (who has also produced, with Mr. Rice, another opera, "A Night in Avignon"). This music has been dismissed as merely imitative of Debussy and Puccini. While it certainly did not "enlarge the boundaries of musical art," it balanced the lack of strongly original elements by dramatic power, certain passages of high poetic quality, and the well-knit development of its substance. As the composer's task was to furnish music that would keep house with a sixteenth-century romance, he should not be too severely censured if his score in no way reflected contemporary America or utilized its material, but on the contrary sought an idiom compatible with the illusion of a legendary past. The resultant unity of impression unquestionably gained by a poetic text written in the language of the listener—whenever the exigencies of opera permitted it to be heard. But this double aesthetic value was achieved, it must not be forgotten, without malforming the musical line as conceived. On these grounds—and on these only—opera in English may be justified and welcomed.

HUBBARD HUTCHINSON

Drama

Retrospect

ABOUT the middle of the season theatrical production usually pauses for a week or more and thus affords to the chronicler an opportunity for retrospect. This year, however, the number of failures was so unusually high that managers who had playhouses on their hands were not disposed to relax, even for a week, in their efforts to keep them open, and the usual opportunity did not present itself. Accordingly, and at this late date, I must make it for myself.

Last year I prophesied that the popularity of the "hard-boiled" melodrama would not survive into the present season, and in that, at least, I was right. There have been no successful plays in the manner of "The Front Page" et al., and this type of entertainment, which was, a year ago, all but sure fire, seems to have disappeared from the theater together with the various examples of the back-stage school founded with the production of "Broadway." And though the critic need not much lament the passing of either, the manager is unfortunate in having found no new formula to serve him in place of the two just worked to death. Even the more or less perennial detective play has scored only one conspicuous success—"Subway Express"—and accordingly the laments always heard on Broadway have been this year a little more distressing than usual, though the plain truth of the matter is that, whatever the magnates may say, there is still no difficulty in competing with the movies and the radio when the public is well enough pleased with any particular play. "Street Scene" has entered on its second year and there is no reason to suppose that "Strictly Dishonorable" will not last out at least the present season. The theater may be in a bad way from the standpoint of the business man, but it is hard to maintain that the public no longer cares for the spoken drama as long as there is even one play to which it is almost impossible to secure tickets.

□ THEATRES □

LEO BULGAKOV
THEATRE ASSOCIATES, INC., presents
AT THE BOTTOM
by MAXIM GORKY
New version by William L. Laurence
PRICES $2.50 to 75c
Phone reservations accepted—Circle 1407
"Really worth seeing."—Brown, Post.
"A fine play" —Mantle, News.
WALDORF THEATRE—50th St., Bet. 6th & 7th Aves. Eve., 8:50
MATINEES Thursday and Saturday, 2:30

Kenneth Macgowan and J. V. Reed present
BASIL SYDNEY and MARY ELLIS
in CHILDREN of DARKNESS
by Edwin Justus Mayer, author of "The Firebrand"
BILTMORE THEATRE—47th Street, West of Broadway
Evenings, 8:50—Mats., Wed. and Sat., 2:40.

City Haul By ELIZABETH MIELE
with HERBERT RAWLINSON
A COMEDY ON MUNICIPAL POLITICS
HUDSON THEATRE—44th St., E. of B'dway
Evenings 8:50. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday 2:40.

CIVIC REPERTORY 14th St.—6th Ave. Evenings, 8:30.
50c, $1, $1.50. Matinees Thursdays and Saturdays, 2:30.
EVA LE GALLIENNE, Director
Fri.Eve.,Feb.7, "The Open Door" & "The Women Have Their Way"; Sat.Mat.,Feb.8, "Peter Pan"; Sat.Eve.,Feb.8, "The Sea Gull"; Mon.Eve.,Feb.10, "The Sea Gull"; Tues. Eve.,Feb.11, "The Living Corpse"; Wed.Mat.,Feb.12, "Peter Pan"; Wed.Eve.,Feb.12, "The Open Door" & "The Women Have Their Way"; Thurs.Eve.,Feb.13, "The Sea Gull."
Seats 4 weeks in advance at Box Office & Town Hall, 113 W. 43rd St.

WILLIAM HARRIS, JR., PRESENTS
"THE FIRST PLAY OF THE SEASON WITH TEETH IN IT."
ROBERT LITTELL, WORLD.
CRIMINAL CODE
By MARTIN FLAVIN with ARTHUR BYRON
NATIONAL THEATRE 41st St., West of 7th Ave. Evenings 8:50
Matinees Wednesdays & Saturdays, 2:30

ETHEL BARRYMORE Theatre, 47th St., West of Broadway
Evenings 8:50; Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:30
LEE SHUBERT Presents
PHILIP MERIVALE
IN
DEATH TAKES A HOLIDAY
A COMEDY ABOUT LIFE
"BRAVE, AUDACIOUS, PROVOCATIVE"—Robert Garland, Telegram

IS LIQUOR A MYTH?
THE ONLY WAY TO REALLY KNOW IS TO SEE
EVERYTHING'S JAKE!
THE RIP-ROARING ALCOHOLIC COMEDY
by DON MARQUIS
"GOOD, ROBUST FUN"—N. Y. Times—"A RIOT"—Benchley, New Yorker
ASSEMBLY Theater, 39th St., E. of Bway. Eves. at 9. Mats. Tues.&Sat. 3

The Theatre Guild Presents
METEOR
By S. N. BEHRMAN
Guild THEA., 52nd St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

The Theatre Guild Presents
RED RUST
By KIRCHON & OUSPENSKY
LAST WEEK
Martin Beck THEA., 45th St. W. of 8th Ave.
Evgs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs & Sat. 2:40

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

Plays to See

*At the Bottom—Waldorf—116 W. 50th St.
Children of Darkness—Biltmore—W. 47th St.
City Haul—Hudson—44th St., E. of B'dway.
*Civic Repertory—14th St. & 6th Ave.—See Advertisement.
*Criminal Code—National—W. 41st St.
*Death Takes a Holiday—Barrymore Theatre—47th St., W. of B'dway.
Ruth Draper—Comedy—41st St., E. of B'dway.
Everything's Jake—Assembly—39th St., E. B'dway.
*Josef Suss—Erlangers—44th St., W. B'dway.
June Moon—Broadhurst—W. 44th St.
Meteor—Guild—W. 52nd St.
*Red Rust—Beck—302 W. 45th St.
Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45th St.
Sweet Adeline—Hammerstein—Broadway & 53rd St.
Wake Up and Dream—Selwyn—42nd St., W. B'dway.

*Drama. Comedy.

First Nights

Dishonored Lady—Empire—40th St. & B'dway.
Out of a Blue Sky—Booth—44th St. W. of B'way.
Rebound—Plymouth—45th St. W. of B'dway.
The Boundary Line—Forty-eighth—48th St. E. of B'dway.

Films

Across the World—Cohan—43rd St. & B'dway.
Disraeli—Central Theatre—Broadway and 47th St.
Paris Bound—Little Picture House—151 E. 50th St.
Sunrise—Film Guild—52 W. 8th St.
The Rogue Song—Astor—B'dway & 45th St.

Concerts and Recitals

Paul Althouse—Barbizon Concert—Sun. Eve., Feb. 12.
Harold Bauer—Town Hall—Sat. Aft., Feb. 15.
Copeland Sessions Concert—Steinway—Sun. Eve., Feb. 9.
Mischa Elman—Carnegie—Sun. Eve., Feb. 16.
Heifetz—Carnegie—Wed. Eve. Feb. 19.
Frieda Hempel—Carnegie—Fri. Eve., Feb. 14.
Friends of Music—Mecca Temple—133 W. 55th St.—Sun. Aft., Feb. 9—Bach Program.
Manhattan Symphony—Mecca Temple—Sun. Eve., Feb. 9.
Martinelli—Carnegie—Tues. Eve., Feb. 18.
Orchestral Concerts for Children—Philharmonic Symphony—Carnegie—Sat. Morn., Feb. 8.
Philharmonic Symphony—Carnegie—Thurs. Eve., Feb. 13; Fri. Aft., Feb. 14; Sun. Aft., Feb. 9.
Students Concerts—Philharmonic—Carnegie—Sat. Eve., Feb. 8, 15.
Tales of Hoffman—Grand Opera for Children—Town Hall—Sat. Morn., Feb. 22.
Tito Schipa—Carnegie—Mon. Eve., Feb. 10.

Art Exhibits

Contemporary Belgium Painting, Sculpture & Graphic Art—Brooklyn Museum of Art—To Feb. 23.
"Painting in Paris"—Museum of Modern Art—730 Fifth Ave., Jan. 18 to Feb. 16.
Painting by Picasso & Derain—Reinhardt Galleries, 730 Fifth Ave.—To Feb. 21.

Events Abroad

Bayreuth Festival Plays—Muck, Toscanini, Elmendorff, Siegfried Wagner Conductors—July 22 to Aug. 21.
Oberammergau Passion Play—Munich—May through Sept.

□ FILMS □ RECITAL □

Week commencing Sat., Feb. 8

INAUGURAL SOUND PROGRAM

F. W. MURNAU's director of
"THE LAST LAUGH"

"The most important picture in the history of the screen."
—Robert E. Sherwood.

"SUNRISE"

a dynamic drama of the city's lure and clash built of power, beauty, pathos with synchronized score by the Roxy Orchestra

—and on the same program—

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW
on
"G.B.S. and my screen-personality"
— also —
The inimitable Robert Benchley
"IS SEX NECESSARY?" or, The Sex Life of the Polyp.

Added Attraction
—
"THE EINSTEIN THEORY OF RELATIVITY"

FILM GUILD CINEMA
Direction: Symon Gould
52 West 8th St., bet. 5th and 6th Aves.
Popular Prices Spring 5095-5090
Continuous Daily Noon to Midnight
Special Forenoon Prices: Sat.-Sun., 12-2—50c.
Weekdays, 12-2—35c.

Last 2 days—Thurs., Fri., Feb. 6th-7th—VICTOR HUGO'S "LES MISERABLES"—and on the same program—"EVOLUTION" and H. G. WELLS' first screen effort "DAY-DREAMS."

The Actor-Managers, Inc., has the honor to present

RUTH DRAPER in her ORIGINAL CHARACTER SKETCHES

Every Eve. including Sunday (except Mon. & Thurs. nights) at 8:50
COMEDY THEATRE, 41st East of Broadway. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:30. VERY GOOD SEATS at $1.00

CARNEGIE HALL, Mon. Eve., Feb. 10
RECITAL BY TITO
Schipa
CELEBRATED TENOR
MGT. EVANS & SALTER (Mason & Hamlin Piano)

MATINEES: GOOD SEATS, ALL PRICES, AT BOX OFFICE

WARNER BROS. Present

GEORGE ARLISS
in
"DISRAELI"
(A Vitaphone All-Talking Picture)

CENTRAL THEATRE
Broadway and 47th St.
Daily 2:45—8:45
Sunday 3—6—8:45

At least six pieces indubitably worth making the effort to see have been produced since September, but they are too varied in manner and intention to suggest a development in any particular direction, unless I may permit a wish to father a thought and maintain that in "Strictly Dishonorable" and "Children of Darkness" we have a sign that we are at last beginning to write the kind of pure comedy which seems to me so definitely indicated by our civilization and our mood. On the other hand, the admirable fantastic comedy called "The Commodore Marries" was a prompt failure, and it is difficult to find any unity in a group of worthy successes which includes pieces so diverse as "Meteor," "Berkeley Square," "Rope's End," and "The Criminal Code." I am reduced to the necessity of bestowing a few blue ribbons as follows:

For the best individual performances: to Walter Huston in "The Commodore Marries," to Alfred Lunt in "Meteor," and to Mary Ellis in "Children of Darkness."

For the best production of a standard play: to Eva Le Gallienne for "The Sea Gull."

For the best revue: to the authors of "Fifty Million Frenchmen."

For the wittiest line: to Preston Sturges for the remark of the tenor in "Strictly Dishonorable"—"The only thing which can sing and keep its shape is a bird."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Contributors to This Issue

MORRIS ERNST is a New York attorney with wide experience in divorce proceedings.

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY is managing editor of The Nation.

HENRY HAZLITT is literary editor of The Nation.

GRANVILLE HICKS is assistant professor of English at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute.

ALLEN TATE is the author of "Jefferson Davis: His Rise and Fall."

FLORENCE CODMAN is a regular contributor of reviews to The Nation.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

WITTER BYNNER is co-author with Kiang Kang-Hu of "'The Jade Mountain: A Chinese Anthology."

BABETTE DEUTSCH will publish in February a book of verse, "Fire for the Night."

CARL VAN DOREN, a contributing editor of The Nation, is editor-in-chief of the Literary Guild.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN is the author of "Bitter Bierce."

MARK VAN DOREN is editor of "An Autobiography of America."

KARL F. GEISER is professor of political science at Oberlin College.

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER is a well-known anthropologist.

EDA LOU WALTON is assistant professor of English at New York University.

HENRY G. ALSBERG was for four years traveling European correspondent of The Nation.

H. SHEEHY SKEFFINGTON is well known for her connection with the movement for independence in Ireland.

HUBBARD HUTCHINSON has contributed articles on music to various periodicals.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is dramatic editor of The Nation.

□ COURSES □ LECTURES □

Building for Happiness

The common impression that social work is primarily concerned with salvaging unfortunates is only partly correct. Social work is concerned not only with normalizing the socially maladjusted individual but also with building up a happier and culturally richer community life. In Jewish social work the opportunities for constructive work are especially numerous and promising.

Have you chosen your career? If not, you should examine carefully the advantages, both tangible and intangible, of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

A number of scholarships and fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each school year are available for especially qualified candidates.

For full information write to
M. J. KARPF, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

A Graduate School

67-71 W. 47th St., New York City

THE NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH
"A workshop of new ideas"
COURSES BEGINNING FEBRUARY 7

by Henry Cowell—
A WORLD SURVEY OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC
A study of the current musical trends in Europe, the Orient and America by an outstanding modern composer. Four lectures, illustrated at piano. Fridays, 8:20-9:50 P.M. Fee for entire series, $5.

by Harry Elmer Barnes
MODERN PROBLEMS IN THE LIGHT OF SOCIOLOGY
A consideration of the more important contemporary social problems from the psychiatric point of view. Twelve lectures Fridays, 5:20-6:50 P.M. Fee for course, $15.

THE HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN INTELLECTUAL LIFE
The genesis of prevailing mental attitudes in contemporary society and the transformations of outlook on the part of the intellectual classes in western civilization. Twelve lectures, Fridays, 8:20-9:50 P.M. Fee for course, $15.
Write for catalogue
465 WEST 23RD STREET NEW YORK, N. Y.

DR. G. S. BECK
will speak on
Oswald Spengler's "The Decline of the West"
at Temple Emanu-El 65th St. and 5th Ave.
on Saturday evening, February 15th, at 8:15
under the auspices of American Women's Ort. Admission free

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1930 No. 3372

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 205

EDITORIALS:

The New Chief Justice.................................... 208

Unions with Brains.................................... 209

Star Spangled Banner.................................... 209

IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN.................................... 210

DIVORCE—AND AFTER: II. SEPARATION WITHOUT DIVORCE. A Personal Narrative.................................... 211

HARVARD "EXPLAINS." By Gardner Jackson.................................... 212

SECRETARY WILBUR AND BOULDER DAM. By Ruth Finney.. 214

MEXICO INSTALS A PRESIDENT. By Lyle C. Wilson.......... 216

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.................................... 217

CORRESPONDENCE 218

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.................................... 218

BOOKS, FILMS, DRAMA:

Cocoon. By Ruth Lechlitner.................................... 219

Tradition and Experiment. By Henry Hazlitt.................. 219

Chain-Store Civilization. By Norman Thomas.................. 219

Spring-Rice's Career. By Royal J. Davis.................... 220

Sir Francis Bacon. By Donald A. Roberts.................... 222

"—Lasst Uns zu Grunde Gehen!" By Fred T. Marsh.......... 222

The Case of Ambrose Bierce. By Granville Hicks.............. 223

Books in Brief.................................... 224

Films: A Soviet Fantasy. By Alexander Bakshy................ 226

Drama: Gopher Prairie, Spain.................................... 226

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Security and "Sanctions".................................... 229

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE LONDON NAVAL CONFERENCE made marked progress in the week ending February 8, and, as we go to press, is tackling the submarine question in a plenary session. Both our own delegation and the British submitted concrete proposals on successive days, the latter far more to our liking than our own. The MacDonald proposal is for eventual abolition of all battleships, a construction holiday until 1935, with the number of capital ships reduced by 1931 to the number proposed for 1936 by the Washington treaty, and the limitation of their size to 25,000 tons each. Destroyers would be limited to 200,000 tons, aircraft carriers to 100,000 tons with a maximum size of 25,000; the abolition of submarines is urged and failing that their limitation in size and number to make them a purely defensive force. The American proposals would equalize the British and American fleets by 1931 instead of waiting until 1942 and effect the immediate reduction of the battleships to fifteen vessels apiece. Why these fifteen should not be abolished now is beyond our comprehension. The cruiser deadlock between the two countries is to be broken by giving eighteen large cruisers to the United States to fifteen for England and a larger number of small cruisers for the British, each country to have the option exactly to duplicate the cruiser fleet of the other. The Americans are for the abolition of the submarine but weaken their case by conceding that it is unobtainable. Altogether there is far too much splitting of hairs, but at least it now appears certain that the conference will end without the favorite jingo charge since the Washington treaty that the British are ahead of the game.

THE TARIFF DEBATE has dragged along for another week with the usual voting up of some schedules and down of others and with the honors going to Senator La Follette. But his attack upon the American valuation plan, as a basis for levying duties on imports of coal-tar dyes and other chemical products, failed to induce the Senate to amend the bill. Mr. La Follette boldly stated that the American chemical industry was being favored because of contributions made by its representatives to the two political parties in the last campaign. He showed that the Republican National Committee had received $117,000 from the leading men of the chemical industry, while $335,000 went to the Democratic National Committee. The latter amount was contributed by three men, John J. Raskob, $260,000, P. S. Du Pont, $50,000, and the familiar Francis Garvan, $25,000. Fortunately the coalition was able to win six roll-calls, reducing the proposed rates on various chemicals. Cement was continued on the free list by a vote of 40 to 35, with Senator Copeland, of New York, appealing vainly on behalf of the poor cement workers of his State who are, he asserts, suffering grievously from the low-wage competition of our former Belgian allies. The other Senator from New York took the opposite viewpoint. In every vote now party lines are totally abandoned and sectional differences appear. In the main, however, the coalition of insurgent Republicans and Democrats is accomplishing a good deal in whittling down the proposed committee rates.

THE HAITIAN COMMISSION appointed by President Hoover has at least two excellent members: William Allen White of the Emporia Gazette and James Kerney of the Trenton Times. We confidently believe that they will undertake their important mission with open minds and a determination to find a way for us to withdraw from the island at the earliest possible moment. Of the other appointees, W. Cameron Forbes, the chairman, is of the utterly conservative, Leonard Wood school of imperialism. It is only fair to say that his administration of the Philippines was well above the average, but it was not marked by any zeal to fit the Filipinos for early independence. As for Henry P. Fletcher, his discouraging record as Ambassador to Mexico, where he stood with the interventionists, is clearly on record. The fifth member, Elie Vezina, is an unknown quantity. For the rest, not one of the many persons who have especially studied the situation has been appointed, nor has an American colored man. It is, as a whole, so discouraging a commission that we prefer to dwell at this moment upon President Hoover's recent statement that "the primary question which is to be investigated is when and how we are to withdraw from Haiti." This is the first time an American President has recognized that our primary problem is how to get out, not how to stay in. Other portions of his statement had the usual political flavor, especially the formal and undeserved compliments to General Russell and his administration of the island. But at least our Chief Executive has taken the first definite step on the right road.

LIFE IMPRISONMENT after four convictions for shoplifting was the sentence received the other day by Ruth St. Clair, confessed drug addict, in New York City. The first woman to receive a life sentence under the Baumes laws had committed four thefts from department stores over a period of ten years. She had served a year in Auburn for her first offense, the theft of a coat, which seems in itself harsh enough. Now, after three other thefts, Mrs. St. Clair receives a mandatory life sentence after pleading guilty. We have therefore the spectacle of a woman for whom prison did nothing in the way of reform being sentenced to prison for the rest of her life—she is now twenty-nine years old—not to make her over into a better citizen but evidently to protect society against her. In return, the taxpayers of New York will pay her board and lodging and furnish her with clothing of a sort for a possible thirty-five years and perhaps longer. It is encouraging to record that after appeals by Judge Levine, who pronounced sentence, Chief Magistrate McAdoo, and District Attorney Crain, Governor Roosevelt has announced that he will at once begin a study of the case with a view to shortening the sentence if possible. As it stands, the case is certainly one of the most striking examples of the complete brainlessness of our prison system, not to mention its brutality. The latter is also clearly evidenced by the release from Sing Sing, after serving twenty years of a thirty-nine-year sentence, of Frank Singer for the theft in 1909 of $51. Singer came out of jail unable to fasten his own collar or to tie his necktie. A benevolent State had bestowed on him $10, he had $45 of his own, and he had earned, at the rate of 1½ cents a day, $35.98 in prison. Thus endowed and, one trusts, completely "reformed," he reentered a waiting world.

THE RESIGNATION of William A. Prendergast as chairman of the New York Public Service Commission brings into sharp relief the critical situation that exists in public-utility regulation the country over. As the climax of months of criticism, the Community Councils of New York City on January 27 sent Governor Roosevelt a letter demanding the removal of Mr. Prendergast on the ground of corporation bias. His resignation was due to a sharp difference of opinion between him and the Governor. Mr. Prendergast holds that the commission has "quasi-judicial functions"; that its job is to hold the scales even between the utilities and the consuming public. The Governor maintains that its task is to protect the consumer against the utilities. The World in a bewildered editorial confesses that it cannot tell which is right. Meanwhile, the telephone company, acting under the decision of a federal court, on its own responsibility puts into effect an intrastate schedule of advanced rates, with 20 per cent of the increase temporarily shaved off by the feeble last-minute order of the commission. Some fifty-nine cities of the State are reported to be preparing to fight the increases. Every one can see today that in New York as elsewhere regulation unhappily does not regulate.

A DECENT RESPECT FOR LAW and public opinion animated the police of New York City on Tuesday, January 28, in their handling of a Communist parade in connection with the funeral of a Communist worker. On the previous Saturday the police had charged a crowd of Communists and others about the City Hall and brutally clubbed and beaten whoever came in their way. On Tuesday they "courteously but firmly" kept the funeral procession in line and guarded the route to the cemetery. Even the open-air speeches denouncing capitalism were not interfered with. For this peaceable outcome of what it was feared might be another riotous performance the police are to be commended. It all goes to show that the police can handle a crowd without resort to clubbing and punching, and that they react handsomely to the right sort of orders from their superiors. Police Commissioner Whalen has emitted some fine remarks about courtesy and self-restraint on the part of the police, but it is time he waked up to a realization that what happened on January 28 should be the rule not the exception.

DISCRETION AND VALOR are the means which Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald has used to disarm the opposition of the House of Lords to the unemployment-insurance bill. The government bill as sent to the Lords contained no time-limit, but the Lords amended the bill by limiting its operation to one year. The Government was thus confronted, as Mr. MacDonald explained at a meeting of the Labor Party, with three possibilities. Either the amendment must be accepted, in which case the Lords would win; or it must be rejected, in which case the bill would automatically fail; or the amendment itself must be amended. The last course was approved by the House of Commons, the principle of a time-limit being accepted but with the limit placed at three years. As the Lords are not thought to care much what the time-limit is so long as there is one, the approval of the bill by the upper house is regarded as assured. Thus has another "crisis" been discreetly averted. If Mr. MacDonald had insisted upon the constitutional claim of the Commons to have its bills accepted by the Lords without change in principle or essential substance, he would probably have had to go to the country on that issue. The important thing, after all, is to get the unemployment scheme into operation as soon as possible.

THE SHOOTING OF PRESIDENT RUBIO of Mexico just after his inauguration will not precipitate another revolution in that country or make it necessary for Washington to get the United States Army and Navy ready for "developments." The assault, fortunately without too serious consequences for President Rubio and the others who were injured, appears to have been one of those acts of political foolishness to which every head of a government is always more or less exposed. Miguel Flores, the young man who did the shooting, is reported to have been a follower of Vasconcelos, the defeated candidate of the Anti-Reelectionist Party in the recent presidential election and the political rival of President Rubio. The story that the attack was part of a plot to exterminate the entire Cabinet, throw the affairs of the country into confusion, and enable the Vasconcelistas to seize the government is, however, to be taken with all reserve pending further investigation. The fact that the retiring President, Portes Gil, is Minister of the Interior in the Rubio Cabinet and the ranking Cabinet officer carries an assurance of firm and competent executive direction of affairs until President Rubio is able to assume his duties.

WHILE COMPTROLLER BERRY of New York issues a report giving six reasons why that happy city can never "go broke," New York's sister metropolis on the shores of Lake Michigan continues its celebrated plan of payless pay days. On February 2 Chicago argued before the Supreme Court of the United States for seven additional years' diversion of Lake Michigan water after 1938 because it has no money to build sewage-disposal plants. On February 3 Silas Strawn issued a new ultimatum on the terms of financial salvation laid down by his "Citizens' Rescue Committee." On February 4 the city council promised complete cooperation with the Strawn committee and at the same time pledged friendly relations with H. Wallace Caldwell, president of the Board of Education, who was attacking Mr. Strawn and urging the independent marketing of tax-anticipation warrants. On February 5 Mr. Caldwell left for New York to sell such warrants, if possible, in the purlieus of Wall Street. On the same day Chicago reported its seventh murder within a week, with the police hunting vainly for clues. On February 6 the city administration headed by Mayor Thompson was reported to have decided on its own plan of meeting the financial situation and to have determined, if that plan failed, to make war on the "reformers," the Strawn committee, and the bankers, with Mr. Caldwell flooding the homes of the city with propaganda through the school children. Life in these simple country villages of ours does not lack interest!

NELSON T. JOHNSON, our new Minister to China, set an admirable example to other newly appointed diplomats on his recent arrival at Shanghai. He declined to discuss political affairs, saying, "I have arrived with an open mind and will strive to keep my mind open, for nothing gets into or comes from a closed mind." Mr. Johnson, whose instructions are to reside near the seat of the Chinese Government, is a "career man" who has come to his present position by promotion from within the service, after having enjoyed the advantage of a considerable period of residence in China. Knowing the Chinese language and people, appreciating at once the richness and value of the Chinese culture and its fundamental differences from our own, viewing sympathetically the profound movements of social advance now under way in the Orient, and understanding that great historic movements require time and patience for their consummation, he would seem almost ideally fitted for the difficult role of international interpreter at this critical stage of the relations between East and West.

SOME OF BROADWAY'S PRETTIEST actresses stormed the capitol at Albany the other day and persuaded an Assembly committee to report in favor of the Langdon Post amendment to the Wales act, which will prohibit the arrest of actors playing in a show prosecuted under the obscenity act. The deference of the legislators is a tribute not only to the charm of their fair assailants, but to the logic of the demand made. It is outrageous that when a play is alleged to be obscene the players in it should be assumed to be guilty. In any case, the actors are professional persons working under contract. It is not their function, but the function of the courts, to decide whether a given play is obscene. They are only too happy to dissociate themselves from a vicious play, as their trade union, the Actors' Equity Association, has consistently stated. But learned judges themselves are often puzzled to decide what is obscene and what is not, and it is unreasonable to demand that actors shall constitute themselves individual courts of justice, and suffer a night in jail if the police allege that they have guessed wrong. The wholesale arrest of actors, which is one of the more manifest absurdities of the Wales padlocking law, has occurred several times in the past two seasons. The Langdon Post amendment should be only the prelude to the repeal of the Wales law.

A THOUSAND PERSONS in Marion, North Carolina, are dependent on the Federal Council of Churches and the American Friends' Service Committee for food and medical care. These are the strikers and their families out of jobs and dispossessed from company houses after their protest against the twelve-hour day and a weekly wage averaging only $13. The relief agencies want $1,000 a week to care for them and any clothing they can get besides. It is obvious that a dollar a week per person will not maintain these workers in a state far removed from starvation. But such a state must be familiar enough to them, in addition to cold and disease. In case the point is of interest to any person desirous of giving contributions, these strikers are not "foreigners" but American-born citizens, as native as the soil they live on. They are the victims of the advance of industrialization in the South. They have done nothing but object to a standard of living and a working day far below the requirements of health and decency. No demands for help at present seem more logical, more pressing, or more worthy to be answered. Checks may be sent to the Federal Council of Churches, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City.

THE PROMOTION MANAGER of The Nation on January 27 sent to the Christian Science Monitor for insertion in its Eastern Region edition of January 31 an advertisement of our issue of February 5 containing the first article in the series now running, The Christian Science Censor, together with advance proofs of that article. On February 7 he made inquiry by mail concerning the placing of the advertisement and asked for a copy of the issue containing it. On February 10 he received, in an envelope postmarked Boston, February 8, 2:30 p. m., a letter dated January 31 from the advertising manager of the Monitor, reading as follows:

> We acknowledge with thanks the advertisement which you sent us, headed "The Christian Science Censor."
>
> Consideration has been given to this advertisement, also to advance proof of one of the series of articles which is to appear in The Nation, and we must respectfully decline to accept this advertising.

Naturally, the authorities of the Mother Church prefer not to have the attention of their followers and other readers called to the methods described in these articles, and they can perhaps scarcely be blamed for refusing our advertisement. The third article in the series, dealing with freedom of the press, will appear in our next issue.

The New Chief Justice

WE consider President Hoover's choice of Charles E. Hughes to be Chief Justice of the United States a bad appointment. We are well aware that nearly every newspaper has praised the selection, even the New York World—shades of its great editor, Frank Cobb! —while the Baltimore Sun has kept an amusing silence. To the average man it will doubtless seem an admirable choice. Is Mr. Hughes not the recognized leader of the American bar? Was he not a member of the Supreme Court for six years? Is he not also a member of the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague? What could be more fitting?

To these questions we reply that we admit without qualification Mr. Hughes's technical fitness. As to his ability there can be no doubt. Though nearly sixty-eight years of age he is in perfect health, alert, and vigorous. If these things alone constituted a great chief justice there would be nothing more to be said. But these are all in all minor qualities, some not even essential. There is the case of Justice Holmes who at eighty-nine years shows no evidence of failing mental power—how happy a gesture it would have been had Mr. Hoover promoted this great American if only for a brief span! It is not age or youth which counts, but the point of view, the flexibility of a mind, its openness to new ideas, new trends, new social developments. What makes Mr. Hughes's appointment so regrettable is that here is a fixed, set, intolerant mentality, closed on various issues, and deadly conservative. During the six years he served in the Supreme Court he ranked as neither a liberal nor a progressive. He was in the main with the majority and he took his positions with a puritanic belief in his own righteousness and the supreme wisdom of his own opinions. A more dangerous type of mind in this hour of the world's development it would be hard to find. Let those who doubt recall some of his acts as Secretary of State—his attitude toward Mexico, toward Russia, his exclusion of the Karolyis and others whose opinions for one reason or another Mr. Hughes disliked, his worship of property rights, and, afterwards, his readiness to take retainers from any great corporation, any master of privilege. We have said before, and we repeat now, that there is something profoundly alarming in this type of mind when it reaches high office deeply inoculated with the poison of a self-righteousness which identifies one's country and its needs with one's own opinions.

It is bad enough when a man of this type is in an office like that of Secretary of State, but there at least he can be checked by public protest, by the opinions of the Congress. As Chief Justice he is in a sense beyond the control of public opinion. He cannot be overruled; his is the last word if the majority is with him. The court is now so constituted that it will defend the status quo with him to the uttermost—unless Congress itself overrules its decisions by new legislation. Then we would remind our readers of the damage which six years on this same court did to Mr. Hughes. He went on the bench the respected and admired Governor of New York, who had been a consistent and determined advocate of the people's rights—not merely the policyholders in insurance companies, but the plain people in whose behalf he created the Public Service Commission to regulate the public utilities, by appealing over the heads of party bosses to the people of the State. He came off the bench—to wage his weak and futile and intellectually pitiful campaign for the Presidency in 1912. Few contrasts could be greater than that between the Hughes of 1906 and the Hughes of 1912.

This man the best choice to head the Supreme Court, this Charles E. Hughes who only recently was fighting before that court the case of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company in order to weaken the force of the public-service regulation he himself as Governor championed? This lawyer who took a brief for the insurance companies in a vain effort to aid them in avoiding payment on their policies to all Russian citizens? This man who was part and parcel of Mr. Harding's rotten administration and to this day has never found the opportunity to characterize the unparalleled record of graft and corruption and criminal carelessness which marked the Cabinet of which both he and Mr. Hoover were unscathed but silent parts? No; there was Harlan Stone to be had right on the Supreme Court—official circles were so certain of Justice Stone's appointment that it is obvious there was a sudden change of mind by Mr. Hoover. But there were other judges here in New York State, to speak of no other, who would have brought fresher and freer minds to the supreme judicial office in the land. These next few years may well be epoch-making. The overwhelming growth of great capitalist organizations, the extraordinary combinations of great companies going on under our eyes—encouraged by the Congress in the case of the railroads—these and other events reveal in part what is ahead. And what is needed at the head of the supreme tribunal is not a closed mind but one aware that the world and the old order change and must change; that to progress at all we must grow away from the narrow, nationalistic, and outworn individualistic kind of life to which Mr. Hughes is so completely and intolerantly devoted. Moreover, the Chief Justice is the administrative head of all the United States courts—courts that are carrying on, through their administration of endless receiverships of every sort of business, a bigger business than the United States Steel Corporation. These same courts are swamped by the vast multitude of prohibition cases. At sixty-eight the span of administrative ability is short, however long one may still be capable of legal opinions. But this, though important, is less important by far than the question of the mental attitude of the judge, and there, as we said last week, Mr. Hughes's appointment seems little less than a public disaster.

That Mr. Taft is a conservative, that he has had little knowledge and understanding of the problems of the underdog, is true. Life for him has been from the beginning smooth, easy, successful. Yet for all his failure to take the progressive side he has shown evidences of pliability and he never has thought himself of the anointed and the infallible. We consider the change in the chief justiceship grave indeed, particularly if it is a portent of what Mr. Hoover's future appointments to the Supreme Court will be.

Unions with Brains

THE two most interesting trade unions in the United States today are in the garment trades. The Amalgamated Clothing Workers in the men's clothing industry and the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union in the field of women's wear have consistently applied brains to the solution of the practical problems facing them and have at the same time kept untarnished the social idealism of their Jewish socialist theories. As a result they have managed to give fresh hope to those who believe that labor organization is essential to a modern democratic society.

The older union technique consisted in organizing the workers by hook or crook, and then taking the employer by the throat and compelling him to give up the most that he could be made to yield in the way of wages and hours. That technique worked fairly well until the employers learned the trick of organizing themselves into groups to fight the unions or until industries became organized into great trusts under unified management. Then the old union leadership was bankrupt. It had no tactics to meet the new conditions and no ideas by which to live. Consequently, despite the great growth in numbers that came with the war, American unionism has gone through a long period of intellectual sterility and practical impotence. A powerful organization like the United Mine Workers, failing to adjust itself to the new conditions, has been broken to pieces on the rock of stubborn economic facts; while the building trades, the heart of the American Federation of Labor, though managing by various devices to maintain a high wage scale for their limited membership, have yet lost all significance for the great body of workers whom they can see no way of organizing.

Among the clothing workers we behold a different scene. The International Ladies' Garment Workers have just called a great strike in New York to bring about the organization of the dressmaking industry, having successfully accomplished that result for the cloak and suit industry by the strike of last summer. Faced with the fact that their earlier success in forcing union standards on the big factories by the older methods was simply hastening the process of driving the industry out of those factories into the little sub-contracting shops and sweatshops, they broadened their conception to the actual organization of the whole industry, so that no one should be able to take advantage of sub-standard labor conditions. Further, they succeeded in having impartial machinery set up for the protection of employer and employee alike against unreasonable demands, thus obtaining for themselves a position of power and partnership in the industry.

To those who fear the destructive effect of "radical" ideas, we commend a consideration of the activities of the International Ladies' Garment Workers. Without surrendering their socialist principles these hard-headed unionists, who have consistently remained in good and regular standing with the American Federation of Labor, have come forward with a series of constructive plans for the stabilization and upbuilding of the industry in which they make their living. What "conservative" organization can show an equally good record?

Star Spangled Banner

THE Linthicum Bill, making the Star Spangled Banner officially the American national anthem, has been reported out of House committee and appears well on its way to being enacted into law. The five million Americans who, at the instance of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and other patriotic societies, are alleged to have petitioned Congress to this end did not, of course, realize what they were doing. For the Linthicum Bill would make hatred of a great, friendly nation an official sentiment of the United States.

Opponents of the Linthicum Bill are at a disadvantage because the impression is about that in criticizing the Star Spangled Banner they are somehow committing an unpatriotic act. It is generally believed, and recklessly asserted by the proponents of the bill, that the song is already our national anthem and that Congress is merely being asked to ratify an existent fact. This is not true. President Wilson in 1916 designated the song not as the national anthem but merely as the tune to be played—rather than sung—at certain official ceremonies. There happened to be at the time a departmental demand for such designation, and this song was the one named since it already had quasi-official recognition by the Navy Department—probably because it was the one which the naval bands were most accustomed to play. Not wishing to stir up controversy just then, President Wilson followed such precedent as existed and designated the same tune for the army and other departments.

This hasty official act does not prevent us from saying what is admitted by all objective critics: that the tune is mediocre, awkward, and unsingable by the ordinary voice; that the verses are stilted, obscure, and entirely without poetic merit; and that the origins of the music and words do not befit the dignity of a national anthem—if we must have one. The tune, as disclosed in an official report to the Library of Congress in 1909, was originally the "constitutional song" of the Anacreontic Society, which met at the Crown and Anchor Tavern in the Strand, London, and was given to generous libations and to "songs not exactly calculated for the entertainment of the ladies." This "constitutional" doxology urged the members not only to drink heartily, but also to "entwine the myrtle of Venus with Bacchus's vine." Taken at twice the tempo now commonly used, it was a raucous and rollicking air.

The poet of the Star Spangled Banner was a Baltimore lawyer. His verses, written for vaudeville performance, celebrated an episode in the War of 1812. They are in the bombastic style of music-hall ballads of the time and are unintelligible without a gloss. But if they mean anything, they mean hatred of the foreigner and contempt for the British nation; they rejoice that the blood of the "hireling band" has "washed out their vile footsteps' pollution." This was all very well for a momentary jubilation after a threatened invasion. But it is an entirely different matter to make the passion of such a moment the consecrated credo of the United States. At a time when we are seeking, for the sake of the world's peace, an honorable understanding with Great Britain, it is not seemly or sportsmanlike to enshrine official insults at her in third-rate verse.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

MAXWELL BODENHEIM wants to ask a question. "Do you believe," he inquires, "that personal attacks, false or true, should be included in articles which purport to be reviews of an author's book? Do you believe that a critic should confine himself to an opinion of the literary values and the importance and originality of a book without intruding his emotional reactions toward the author as a man in daily life?"

Fortunately these are not questions which can be answered with a simple "Yes" or "No." There is also need of definition. Although Mr. Bodenheim proceeds to cite his own particular grievance against a reviewer his question is couched in more general terms. The subject is debatable. I believe I am against Mr. Bodenheim. For instance, let us assume that a new war novel comes out. I may happen to have information, personal or otherwise, that the author is a pronounced pacifist and that his book was written with the desire to arouse sentiment against war. I think it is my privilege to note this fact in my review.

It is not necessary that I should confine myself wholly to palpable and printed evidence. After all, the critic's function is to explain and interpret the thing he criticizes. Something of the author himself remains upon the page even after he has completed his job and the book is bound and sold. In explaining the author, one may well make the quality of the book more understandable. I do not see how it is possible to draw a sharp line between the individual and his performance. To be sure, there are certain facts about an author which I would not care to drag into a review even though I might be perfectly sure of my ground. But even here I must set up the rather feeble excuse of a partial devotion to good taste. It would embarrass me to say in reviewing a novel, "The author happens to be a notorious drunkard." Yet an argument can be made for even such an intimate revelation of an artist's private life. Surely such a fact, if true, is not irrelevant. If the book concerned modern American life, its tone and its emotion might very well be colored by the creator's violent revolt against Volsteadism both in theory and in practice.

Some years ago there was great commotion because a literary critic indicted a love story by remarking that the author was a spinster. I hasten to add that it was not my review which brought this severe accusation. I think I would have hesitated to go into the delicate problem of an author's sex experience or lack of it. And yet I cannot maintain that the critic was wholly beyond the domain of legitimate reviewing. The book quite possibly could have been vastly influenced by the author's lack of sophistication.

As it happens, I would not think of contending that no one can write about Du Barry unless she has been Du Barry. I myself intend some day to write a story based on the life of Casanova. When it is published I shall freely grant any critic the right to mention the fact that I have had no share in such interesting romances as brightened the life of the hero. If the critics stress this point it might well be termed an attack upon my ego and my reputation. But any man who writes for publication must accept the fact that he has made himself, by his own act, fair game for friend and foe.

Once upon a time, it might have been sufficient to say that the critic should confine himself wholly to the matter set before him within cloth covers and leave the author and his life and habits quite alone. It becomes increasingly difficult to maintain such a position. I happen to belong to the school which firmly believes that every novel is autobiographical. Even though the writer takes the characters of his story to an unknown city situated on the other side of the moon, still he travels with them. He is writing himself down on paper. How, then, is it possible to leave him out of any comprehensive report upon his poem or play or story? Since he has not left himself out of the story why should the critic leave him out of the review? If Texas Guinan were to write a novel of life in an English parsonage I think any account of the tale would be wholly inadequate if it contained no mention of the fact that Miss Guinan is a night-club hostess.

There was produced during the present theatrical season a poor play by a dramatist of undoubted power. It dealt with marriage. The critics made only veiled references to the undoubted background of the production. It so happened that this was a play about marriage by a young man whose own marriage had but recently collapsed with much attendant bitterness and recrimination. There was no mention of this in the reviews. Naturally enough the critics would be embarrassed to deal roughly with a fine fellow whose soul was still harassed by tribulations. I admit that I would never have brought the matter up into a newspaper review had I been under assignment. And yet only those who knew and understood the personal adventures of the author could have had any comprehension of the curiously acid and almost petulant quality which ran through the play.

I admit that there are places where in all humanity and mercy the line of revelation must be drawn, but it is nonsense to say that the personality of the author is none of the reader's or the critic's business. Everybody will concede that the public has a right to know that the author of "All Quiet on the Western Front" is a German who served in the army during the Great War. Such facts help us to understand and appreciate his point of view. It may be equally useful for us to know in the case of a novel concerning marriage whether it was written by an ex-husband, one about to give hostages to fortune, or one still holding the franchise.

Reticence is an admirable quality under certain circumstances, but it is almost the chief foe of literature. It is an adornment when worn by a gentleman, but a millstone round the neck of any author. It is well enough that we should discourage vulgarity when it rises up to smite us in our own actions or those of our friends, but there will be precious little stuff of any moment written when Emily Post has completed her conquest of the United States. Only a cad can write a first-class biography. It may be a grave offense to kiss and tell, but I fear me that fiction of the first rank cannot be obtained without some such loss of grace.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Divorce—and After

II. Separation Without Divorce

A PERSONAL NARRATIVE

The first article in this series, published last week, indicated the problems of adjustment created when families are broken up by divorce or separation. The present article, to be followed by others of like character, is a personal statement, necessarily anonymous, for whose authenticity we vouch to our readers, of the way in which those problems have been met in a particular case.—EDITOR THE NATION.

OUR separation has been on the whole a happy one. As things have worked out, each of us has got out of it about everything that would have had to be fought for if the arrangement had been determined by a contest in the courts. Of course each of us has had to make sacrifices—some of them pretty heavy—which it is proper to charge up in the reckoning as the price of the mistakes we both made in the beginning. I think neither of us is any longer disposed to put all the blame on the other, but my wife undoubtedly feels as certain as I do of having grievances. I am convinced, without any misgivings, that separation was the wise and necessary course, and I trust that my wife is likewise convinced that it was the only solution.

Our first mistake was in marrying too young. If we had waited another year or two, my wife would have had time to learn that she was inseparably bound to the church—the church that so wisely warns her children against "mixed marriages." As it was, we married during a lapse of faith on my wife's part, which made it possible for her to assure me quite sincerely that the formal waiver of rights over the education of possible children which I had to sign would have no more force than I should choose to give it. I was too young—only twenty-three—too ignorant of the ways of Mother Church, and too much in love to know that lapses of faith are temporary as a rule and that assurances given off the record are mere chaff before the winnowing breath of Mother Church, while the solemn pledge of an unbeliever is binding forever.

Another thing that I did not know at the time but was immediately to learn was that a family of children is the probable consequence of every marriage in which Mother Church has a hand. The first child was on the way before the first year of our union had passed. The economic problem promptly became acute and remained so through all the years that we remained together. How acute the problem became may be judged by the fact that the number of children was ultimately six. The frictions and anxieties that accompanied this family increase were aggravated by my ever-intensifying disapproval of the religious training to which the children were subjected. I here attempt no justification of my failure to take heroic measures for family limitation, nor do I offer any excuse—other than my quixotic regard for the promise I had made not to interfere—for my inability to cope with the educational problem. Fundamentally the trouble was that in spite of everything we continued for a long time to have a good deal of affection for each other. Besides, the children were all of them children to be proud of and made an additional bond that kept us together past the point when expediency should have separated us.

It would have ultimately become impossible for me to remain a member of the family without insisting on a modification of the part the church was playing in the upbringing of the children. That would have meant an atmosphere of contention which would have made everybody unhappy. The contest would have been one which I could not hope to win, and sooner or later it would have taken the form of a contest for the affections of the children. On the economic side there was nothing in prospect for us but growing debts and ultimate ruin. There was at least a chance that the worst features of the threatening future might be avoided if we broke up the partnership and worked out a new solution.

This much of the background is necessary for the understanding of the terms of our home-made separation. When it came the decision was mine, and it was my abrupt act that made it effective. We have been separated for about ten years. There was no stipulation as to what rights, privileges, and exemptions either one should claim. By voluntarily giving up all claim on the children, I immediately removed the most formidable issue from the area of possible dispute. It was tacitly understood that I should contribute whatever I conveniently could to the support of the family. With the exception of one trying period when I was not earning enough to support even myself, my wife has accepted the situation as she found it without complaining that she was ill-treated. But as I have not been able to carry the whole financial burden alone, my wife herself has been forced to go to work in order to maintain the standard of living which she considers appropriate. This she has done with commendable courage. Her work is dignified and congenial and is of a sort for which she has special qualifications of training and temperament. The fact that she has had a free hand in bringing up the children must go far toward reconciling her to the hardships in her situation. All the children have received or are receiving their education in religious institutions. One of them is a nun.

If my wife has ever used the advantages of her position to turn the children against me, I have seen no sign of it. Of course all of them but the oldest—a boy who left home and the church soon after my defection—are sorry for me and pray diligently for the salvation of my heathen soul. The reason our first-born struck out for himself at the age of sixteen was that he had grown weary both of the hothouse atmosphere of the home and of the demands made upon him by the church. He is now happily married and successful in business. He and his wife and I are great friends. The young man and I have the utmost respect and esteem for each other, as well as a warm affection. My acquaintance with the two youngest children was too brief to make any impress on them that is likely to last. That is a part of my sacrifice. The other two children—both attractive and amiable girls—have paid me the spontaneous tribute of genuine affection, where I might have expected nothing better than indifference or tolerant kindness. My sacrifice, so far as they are concerned, is in the fact that, owing to distance and the high cost of travel, I cannot see them as often as I should like.

I have never raised the issue of taking any of the children to live with me. The answer to such a demand would be that I was free to rejoin the family whenever my desire to be with them grew strong enough to impel me to that step. My wife might well claim also that as she has had the sole responsibility for ten years of managing the family and keeping up the home, she is entitled to keep the children near her instead of intrusting them to the dubious influence of a truant father.

According to the conventional view, the worst disadvantage of the arrangement I have described is that it has deprived the children of what is called "a father's care." But I discount that. It was better that they should grow up in peace and piety than that they should have had a father about the place who would daily, before their young observant eyes, be turning into a sour, unsympathetic old grouch. As it is now, when they do occasionally see their father, they meet him as a friend and find him a fairly mellow and kindly old party whom they cannot help liking, though they expect to see him damned at last.

As the account checks up in the end, my wife and I have both got what we felt to be most important. My wife, after enjoying, not without hardship, the companionship of the children in a peaceful and fairly comfortable home, has the assurance of sharing her eternal reward, unless something goes wrong, with all of them but one. As for my part in the bargain, I have won for myself, not without sacrifice, a sort of freedom that makes it possible for me to live my life about as I choose—that is, in interesting occupations, in normal comfort, in total release from exactions by the conscience of others, and under adequate provision for my mental, moral, emotional, and physical health. I believe these blessings were worth the prices we paid for them.

Harvard "Explains"

By GARDNER JACKSON

Boston, February 3

IN answer to widespread criticism, Harvard University has officially explained to her alumni, in a statement by Arthur L. Endicott, controller, that the sudden dismissal of twenty scrubwomen from Widener Library "had nothing to do with the decree of the Minimum Wage Commission except the time at which the change was made." The statement, prepared last week for the Harvard Alumni Bulletin and issued to the Boston newspapers, contradicts the letter to the Reverend William H. Duvall of Cambridge in which President A. Lawrence Lowell said: "I find that the Minimum Wage Board has been complaining of our employing women for those purposes at less than thirty-seven cents an hour, and hence the university has felt constrained to replace them with men."

The minimum-wage decree covering "office and other building cleaners" was published from the State House on December 30, 1920, to take effect February 1, 1921. Ignorance of the decree cannot be pleaded. In the first place, under the law copies of it were automatically sent to employers for prominent posting in restrooms of cleaning women. Harvard thus received copies soon after it was published. In the second place, an inspector for the Minimum Wage Commission inspected Harvard early in 1922 on the basis of the thirty-seven-cent decision. The Harvard official did not show the inspector the pay roll but insisted that they were paying wages satisfactory to the commission. This conversation was reported to the commission and should be a part of the record at the State House, if that record is intact. The dismissal of the women at the library discloses the fact that Harvard was, in truth, paying the women thirty-five cents an hour—two cents under the minimum standard—in 1922 but was able to assure the inspector that the wages were satisfactory to the commission on the strength of "an understanding" with a majority of that body. This "understanding," fortified by subsequent conferences and correspondence, including a conference at the State House in 1925 between the commission and "Nelson Perkins"—presumably Thomas Nelson Perkins, member of the Harvard Corporation (now president of the Boston and Maine Railroad)—enabled Harvard to evade the law in comparative peace till the last inspection which took place in February, 1928.

At that time inspectors for the commission persuaded that body to try to make Harvard increase the wages of the women to conform to the decree. Mr. Endicott, in an interview with a New York newspaperman following his official explanation, was blunt in saying that he had an "understanding" with the commission that the women's wages were "all right." Hence the relative lack of trouble—over two cents an hour—from 1921 to 1928. It is, as the World has said, "incredible . . . like a chapter from Dickens."

The first part of Mr. Endicott's official explanation describes the reorganization, started in 1921, of the Harvard buildings administration under a central head. It says next: "The new policy was approved in April, 1929, and at that time I wrote the Minimum Wage Commission that we proposed to replace the women cleaners in Widener Library with men as soon after July 1, 1929, as we had opportunity to find other employment for the former. It was not at all a question of wages; it was the question of following the policy which we had found from our experience to be economical and efficient." Why did Mr. Endicott write to the Minimum Wage Commission if wages were not at issue? And what about the wages from April till the end of the year, when the women were dismissed?

Further on Mr. Endicott says: "In October, after giving entirely adequate notice, we replaced some of the women who were the least capable and we notified the Minimum Wage Commission that we wished a little longer time in order to find other employment for the remainder." Again, why did Mr. Endicott notify the Minimum Wage Commission if Harvard was violating no wage decree? I have talked with twelve of the women since Mr. Endicott's statement was issued. They all emphatically deny that any of the group was given advance notice. They received their written notices the day the discharge took effect.

When the Minimum Wage Commission sent its ultimatum of December 18, 1929, threatening that if on December 26 any of the women were still employed in the library at less than the thirty-seven-cent rate, it would exercise its right to publish a notice to the effect that the university was not complying with its decree, Harvard immediately dismissed the remaining women. The hope was expressed in their notes of dismissal, as in the case of the earlier dismissals, that other work would be found for them at the university. "All of the women whom we discharged in December," continues Mr. Endicott, "have either been offered work or given employment, with the exception of two. In the case of one, her son has been employed." Four of the women, Mrs. Selina Taylor, Mrs. H. Sullivan, Miss Catharine Donlon, and Mrs. H. Malloy, went to work almost immediately from the library to the dormitories—on their own application—at the reduced rate of thirty-two cents an hour for so-called chambermaid work, though, by their own account, this work involves as much scrubbing as the library work. (Harvard officials asked the commission that these dormitory women be classified as chambermaids, a category outside the minimum-wage law.) Two more of the women, Mrs. Annie McIntyre and Mrs. Hannah Hogan, so Mrs. McIntyre told me, were sent for and offered temporary work as substitutes in the dormitories at the thirty-two-cent rate. Since they wanted steady jobs at the minimum-wage level, they refused this offer. Four others, Miss Annie J. Corcoran, Mrs. Catharine Curran, Miss Margaret O'Connors, and Mrs. Emma Trafton, told me they have not been offered any kind of work at Harvard since their discharge. None of the group dismissed on November 1, 1929, has been offered work as I write this. Thus four of the twenty women dismissed are at work at Harvard and two were tendered temporary work. Mr. Endicott's statement gives a very different impression.

At one point Mr. Endicott's statement says: "It is not customary in industry, I believe, to pay employees hired by the hour for time when they are out sick, or for vacations. In the case of these women we have done both, and the amount of pay received on account of sick leave and vacations much more than equaled the difference about which the Minimum Wage Commission has complained." Each of the twelve women whom I have interviewed since Mr. Endicott's statement was issued vehemently denied to me that they or their associates ever received a penny from Harvard for sick leave or when out because of injury. "We were paid by the month," declared Miss Corcoran, "and pay for the days we were out sick was always taken out of our money at the end of the month. I don't know how he dares say such a thing." Miss Corcoran had worked in the library for ten years.

The vacation pay, the women said, consisted of one week's pay for a six-day week of three hours a day at thirty-five cents an hour—a total of $6.30, even though the majority of the women worked five hours a day—from 6 a. m. to 11 a. m. Mr. Endicott may fairly be asked how that vacation pay of $6.30 a year "much more than equaled the difference about which the Minimum Wage Commission has complained." The vacation pay amounted to $56.70 for each woman during the approximately nine years that Harvard was ignoring the minimum-wage law. Compare these figures with the $31.20 a year which the increase of two cents an hour asked by the Minimum Wage Commission would have meant to each woman, or a total of $280.80 for each woman who had been there during the almost nine years in which the decree was in effect. The majority of the women had been at Harvard ten years or more.

Mr. Endicott's statement minimizes the importance to the women of the wages paid them for their work at Widener Library. It is true that some of them had other cleaning jobs in the afternoons. "But," says Mrs. McIntyre, echoing all her associates, "who gets up at 5 a. m. every morning winter and summer to go to a job unless the pay means a lot to her? It's no joke, I can tell you. And this was steady work—thirteen years of it for me."

In his concluding paragraph, attempting to justify the replacement of the women by men, Mr. Endicott asserts: "We have not at any time attempted to violate the Minimum Wage Law." There is no need to argue with him. The facts speak for themselves: the Minimum Wage decree became effective February 1, 1921; the first inspection took place early in 1922; the women were dismissed November 1 and December 21, 1929, about eight years later, under pressure from the Minimum Wage Commission.

To delegations of protest Mr. Endicott has shown noticeable irritation at the Minimum Wage Law as interpreted on the ground that all Harvard employees would want pay based on minimum-wage levels if the scale had prevailed for the Widener women. His stock conclusion for all questioners is that employees would rather work at Harvard for lower wages because of "pleasant working conditions" and because there is a certain "prestige" about working at Harvard University!

It is rumored that certain prominent citizens who have the moral health of Harvard at heart are assembling facts with a view to requesting that the university pay to these scrubwomen the additional two cents an hour which it should have paid them during the years after the State set the thirty-seven-cent minimum. That amount of money would come as a substantial blessing to some of the women and it would not put too great a strain on the finances of Harvard University, since it would amount in all to something under $5,000 for the twenty women. Such an act of penitence, though it might ruffle Harvard officialdom, would have an extremely salutary effect upon those Olympian dwellers. Moreover, it might be useful, especially to the workers whom the Minimum Wage Commission is supposed to protect, if that body were asked to explain why Harvard was permitted to evade its decrees for nine years.

Secretary Wilbur and Boulder Dam

By RUTH FINNEY

Washington, February 10

THOUGH liquor has monopolized the speeches and the statements and the headlines in the capital this winter, it is water that is engaging the serious concern of those with most at stake in Washington. In and out among all other questions, among the noisy sham battles and the grim quiet struggles, the water-power issue seeps and flows. In the Northwest an ally of the Electric Bond and Share Company is trying to secure control of power on the Flathead River. All the private interests that have wanted Muscle Shoals are uniting to make sure of success in their next attempt to get it. Before the Federal Trade Commission, power companies are attempting to justify their financial, operating, and propaganda methods. The Federal Power Commission, titular guardian of the public's power resources, is under fire from several directions. Most serious of all, the Federal Water Power Act itself, Magna Charta of public power development, faces nullification. The power from Boulder Dam, worth hundreds of millions of dollars, is being leased. Since last June, Secretary of the Interior Wilbur has been working on plans for the disposal of this power.

Congress looked on passively while the Secretary rejected the plan for a government-built, equipped, and operated power plant, as made possible by the Boulder Dam Act, and announced that he would sell the falling water at the dam, an alternative method of financing the project which friends of the measure expected him to resort to only if all others failed. Congress exhibited slightly more concern when he announced a tentative allocation of power giving almost one-fourth to private power companies, although States and cities, expressly given a preference right in the Boulder Dam Act, were asking for all the power. Little was said, however, because those most familiar with the matter thought the Secretary would find, when the legal business of drawing contracts was begun, that State and municipal applicants must be given the power they wanted.

Secretary Wilbur's next move was to put certain questions concerning the Boulder Dam situation to his legal adviser, E. C. Finney—the same Finney who figured so prominently in the Teapot Dome and Elk Hills oil cases. Solicitor Finney's answers constituted an interpretation of the Boulder Dam Act and the Federal Water Power Act which swept away, in effect, all the preference rights provided for public agencies. He said, in answer to Secretary Wilbur's leading questions, that the Secretary would be justified, in the "public interest," in ignoring the preference rights of States and cities if "other applicants" offered better financial security and greater contractual responsibility.

Congress first looked at this opinion in dazed silence, and then roused itself to insist that it should know better than any department solicitor what it means when it writes law. And now, for its water-power act and its integrity as a law-making body, Congress has taken up the cudgels and is preparing to fight. Senator George W. Norris, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has sounded warning that to permit Solicitor Finney's opinion to be adopted as the basis for power contracts will leave the executive branch of government free to nullify any act of Congress at any time. Senator Hiram W. Johnson, one of the authors of the Boulder Dam Act, has expressed dismay and a determination to fight. Representative Philip D. Swing, co-author of the act, has prepared a brief, warning the Administration that "to graft into a law by interpretation a policy that Congress had deliberately declared should be no part of that law is executive usurpation."

During the years when the Boulder Dam bill was pending in Congress the private power companies, with one voice, fought it. They said the government must control floods on the Colorado but must not generate power at its dam, because to do so would be "red." Once the bill was passed and authority given for a great public power development, the Southern California Edison Company and the Southern Sierras Power Company began asking for all or part of that power. But southern California cities wanted the power also, to supply to their people over publicly owned distributing systems and to pump their drinking water. Together with the State of Nevada, they asked for more power than Boulder Dam will produce. The Boulder Dam bill had been framed with these needs in mind and the provision to meet them. The cities had done battle for it for years because they were sure it safeguarded their interests. Mr. Wilbur, however, said he believed the Edison Company and its associates should be given a share of the power. He tentatively allocated to them about one-fourth of the output, an amount as great as that given Los Angeles and more than four times as great as that given smaller cities. He provided that Los Angeles and its ancient enemy, the Edison Company, should jointly equip the Boulder Dam power plant and jointly operate it.

Los Angeles and her smaller neighbors protested and claimed a right to priority over the company in allocation of power. They pointed to the wording of the Boulder Dam Act. This act had been drawn with just such a controversy in mind, and its authors thought it was drawn in such a way as to leave no doubt as to what must be done. It provided that the States of Nevada, Arizona, and California should have first opportunity to buy power within a limited time. After that, conflicting applications were to be settled by the Secretary of the Interior "with due regard to the public interest and in conformity with the policy expressed in the Federal Water Power Act"—a policy contained in these words:

> The commission shall give preference to applications by States and municipalities, provided the plans for the same are deemed by the commission equally well adapted, or shall within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the commission, be made equally well adapted, to conserve and utilize in the public interest the navigation and water resources of the region.

In the past the Federal Power Commission has given preference to State and municipal applications for power because of this wording. But the commission was wrong in that interpretation, says the Southern California Edison Company in effect, for the "public interest" in the present case requires that Boulder Dam power be allocated to the company, because the company has almost a million customers. Secretary Wilbur, already on record as in substantial agreement with this view, put to Solicitor Finney these questions:

> What is meant by the public interest? What body of people comprises the public as the act uses the term? Is the interest referred to as public the government's responsibility to the whole people of the United States or is it the interest of the area to be immediately served by Boulder Dam power, or is it the interest of a particular part of that area?

Mr. Finney replied as follows:

> Public interest is one of those broad terms like "public policy" capable of different legitimate interpretations in the discretion of the officer called upon to administer it. The interest referred to is primarily the government's responsibility, financial or otherwise, to all the people of the United States for the greatest good to be derived from this project, the cost of which is to be advanced from the public treasury. The term "public interest" is the dominant consideration. . . . The primary public interest is in the soundness of the contracts and the solvency of the contractor, not in the corporate or municipal character of that contractor. . . . The public interest requires . . . equality of access to Boulder Dam power by areas composing the region in proportion to the needs of the applicants.

This means, said Representative Swing in his answering brief, that "you [Secretary Wilbur] have asked your adviser in what direction to travel to reach your goal and he has answered, 'In any direction you choose to proceed.' "

> The words "public interest" used in the Boulder Dam Act [continues the brief] were intended to mean exactly the opposite of private interest. . . .
>
> If the solicitor's opinion is to be accepted that the words "due regard to the public interest" must be construed as a check upon preference rights given municipalities by the Federal Water Power Act, then indeed a strange irony of fate has here played its part, because by this contention the municipalities are to be grievously injured by a weapon forged by them as an aid for the defense of their rights.
>
> The effort of the solicitor to introduce the foreign factor of finance in the interpretation of public interest to subordinate the preference rights of municipalities was not contemplated by Congress and must not be countenanced. The financial interest of the United States was safeguarded in other sections of the act.
>
> Congress meant and intended and declared that whenever possible the public, that is the people, should get the benefits of the development of this great public resource through their own public agencies, direct and at cost, without . . . paying profits to a private power corporation.

It is customary in disputes of this sort to search through debates of the Congress that enacted a law in order to arrive at a clearer understanding of its intention. The Sixty-fifth Congress passed the Federal Water Power Act. When the act was pending it considered two alternative ways of treating the section about preference rights for public agencies. It was proposed at that time to leave the question of preferences to the discretion of the power commission. This proposal was debated in the House of Representatives and voted down. The House instead adopted the section that is now law. In the Senate debate it was referred to as making mandatory the recognition of municipal and State projects. This interpretation was not challenged. The section became part of the law as enacted.

In the year following, the Sixty-sixth Congress strengthened the position of public agencies by providing that even when the Federal Power Commission found plans of a private company more acceptable for utilizing the water resources of a region, public agencies should be given a chance to make their plans equally acceptable. This amendment, Congress believed, closed the door to any possible attempt to defeat preference rights for public development. If a city could adopt a corporation's plans, the question of difference in suitability therefore could not arise. There is still other evidence to show the frame of mind of Congress on this question as recently as December, 1928. Senator Reed of Pennsylvania offered an amendment to the Boulder Dam Act providing that the government should not construct, equip, and operate a power plant at the dam unless it failed to find anyone else willing to do so. The amendment was defeated. With the policy of federal power development established, no attempt was made to attack the subordinate rights of States and cities. It was thought to be futile to do so. And the question would never have arisen if Secretary Wilbur had not departed from the approved plan for a government-built and operated power house.

Mr. Wilbur asked another question that is even more significant, and Mr. Finney made another answer that is even more amazing. To appreciate them it is necessary to remember that the Boulder Dam Act says that no application of a city or State for power shall be denied or an application in conflict therewith granted on the ground that bonds have not yet been voted to finance the proposed work. Secretary Wilbur wrote to Mr. Finney:

> If Los Angeles and other municipalities cannot now execute enforceable contracts meeting reasonable financial requirements of the Secretary, what would be the duty of the Secretary under provisions of the act that an application is not to be denied because of the necessity for a bond issue? Would he be authorized to make contracts with other bidders preserving to the preference claimants the right to contract for part of the power if enforceable contracts are tendered within a designated time?

The Solicitor wrote to Mr. Wilbur:

> This proviso is not designed to tie the hands of the Secretary pending the authorization and marketing of the bond issue so long as the right of the preference claimants to contract for power allocated to them is preserved.

He went on to explain that while the Secretary could not grant an application in conflict with the city's, an application and a contract were two different things, and a contract would be proper that preserved the right of a city to contract within a reasonable time "when, as, and if the necessary bond issue is authorized." To Los Angeles, whose bond issues have been defeated before now by the Edison Company, this has an ominous sound. Representative Swing points out that "private companies once having secured control of the power would be forced by self-interest to immediately engage in a political campaign in every city that was an expected beneficiary to defeat, if possible, the bond issue."

Not power, but the right to batter and bruise themselves fighting for it, may be the privilege of the cities of the Southwest under the bill for which they worked so many years, with such high hopes. Congress will have the last word in this fight because it alone can appropriate money to build Boulder Dam, and, in appropriating, it can make any requirements for use of its money that it sees fit. It can, if it will, exert a substantial veto over any contracts Secretary Wilbur makes.

The more or less spectacular aspects of this controversy may, it is possible, focus new interest on the duller aspects of the general power war. No one denies the importance of proper accounting in the Federal Power Commission, where companies, unless curbed, may build up vast and fabulous capitalization claims to serve as the basis for future recapture proceedings and future rates. But neither is anyone fired with potent indignation about it. The issues are difficult to present now. There are so many things to be done.

The Boulder Dam fight, on the other hand, has immediate interest for all parts of the country. On its outcome hangs, to some extent, the fate of Muscle Shoals and of every other water-power project, great or small. Senator Norris declares that its outcome will determine who shall make the law of the United States.

Mexico Instals a New President

By LYLE C. WILSON

MEXICO accomplished a change of administration on February 5 under circumstances promising more good than evil, greater success than failure, better conditions rather than worse. But it is only a promise. As Emilio Portes Gil departs and Pascual Ortiz Rubio enters the presidential palace, from opposition throats comes the challenging accusation of fraud, duplicity, and murder. And unhappily, within two hours of his inauguration President Rubio is struck down by the bullet of a would-be assassin whose act reminds us of the constant threat of death that overhangs the chief executive of our southern neighbor. Fortunately, the wound seems not to be mortal.

Jose Vasconcelos was Rubio's defeated opponent for the presidency. Vasconcelistas proclaim that Ortiz Rubio was elevated to that office by a combination of violence and thievery at the polls by which the National Revolutionary Party prevented the people from making effective their collective enthusiasm for Vasconcelos. Some measure of fraud did prevail in Mexico on election Sunday. There were intimidation and violence at various polling places, on the evidence of the Mexicans themselves, and denial of the franchise with no more justification for it than ability to exert essential force. That Vasconcelistas suffered most from this crime against democracy appears indisputable. But that Vasconcelos would have been chosen under ideal conditions is subject to doubt. The margin of his defeat seems too great.

In view of Mexican electoral practices, it must be doubted that Vasconcelos himself could have expected election. In their effort to prevent machine control of electoral procedure, the Mexicans have leaned over backward so far that instead of protecting their polling places they have polluted them with good intentions gone wrong. At the cornerstone of Mexico's elaborate system of protection for the polls is a prescribed precinct procedure designed to prevent government officials—minions of the party in power—from controlling the ballot. The first eleven qualified, ordinary electors, privately employed or unemployed, who arrive at the polling place must organize the precinct voting machinery, pass on qualifications of other voters, supervise and report the poll. Under these conditions the precinct is likely to be carried by the candidate whose supporters first reach and organize the precinct polling place. Picture such a procedure in New York. It needs no strain on the imagination to understand that Tammany would be first on the job even in precincts where registered Republicans were scarce. And Tammany would be charged by the Republicans with stealing precincts which Republicans couldn't have won even if every Republican in the district had been allowed to vote twice.

That seems to approximate what took place in more than a few places in Mexico last November. Whether such tactics produced ballots essential to Ortiz Rubio's election cannot be said, at least by this writer. He believes it did not. Violence by Ortiz Rubio's henchmen provoked the editor of El Dictamen of Vera Cruz to discuss the matter on November 19 beneath the caption, Our Democratic Failure. "In this port," the editor related, "we saw them [the government faction] gaining possession of polling booths which they could not secure in any other way by shooting; we saw that the polling lists were defective in order to hinder the voting of members of the opposing party; that the ballots of the opposing party were not accepted."

Elsewhere, among comparatively impartial observers, emphasis was placed rather upon the relative absence of violence last November as compared with prior elections. But more important than this abatement of violent folkways was the presence of two parties in the field instead of one, even though the margin between their polls was tremendous. And the trend from militarists to civilians for the presidential office is significant from whatever standpoint Mexico may be surveyed. Portes Gil is a civilian but he also is a political accident. Ortiz Rubio is a civilian, an engineer by coincidence, but no accident. He or his like was inevitable soon in Mexico if the republic was to prevail. True, Ortiz Rubio holds office largely by grace of General Plutarco Elias Calles, Mexico's strong man. It is also true that Calles's support is practically synonymous with the support of the army. But within ten years the Mexican army has changed. A new crop of generals has succeeded the revolutionary veterans whose high-handed and repeated recourse to rebellion gradually disposed of them via courts martial and firing squads. The newer militarists are Calles's pupils, not his peers.

The brighter stars of Calles's Cabinet, in general, owe allegiance to the new President. For the present, at least, Ortiz Rubio may count upon useful support from the labor group and the agrarians. Their interests will not always coincide and it remains to be proved that Ortiz Rubio is strong enough to maintain political discipline. The National Revolutionary Party, of which Calles was the founder and Ortiz Rubio has become the nominal head, has its blocs and insurgents. Already Rubio's campaign support is dividing into cliques, one recognizing Calles as the man behind the throne and the other insisting that Ortiz Rubio shall lead as well as march in front. The new President's policies must be founded upon the necessity for keeping his mixed support contented. It is axiomatic that no Mexican rebellion can succeed without at least negative assistance from the United States Government, for rebels must have arms and munitions. Therefore, foreign policy number one in Ortiz Rubio's administration will be to cultivate American friendship. That Washington will not rebuff but will welcome that policy is a fact to inspire hope. The unprecedented official welcome given the Mexican President-elect in the American capital foretold much, specifically that the Morrow era of Mexican-American relations will not fade if the United States can prevent it.

With American good-will in mind, Ortiz Rubio will modify the land-seizing agrarian policy somewhat, especially with respect to seizure without immediate compensation. That means some slowing-up of the seizure program and the new President must travel that road carefully, for his agrarian supporters are land-hungry. Ortiz Rubio hopes to liberate isolated communities by provision of roads. Mexico will sow pesos and reap schoolhouses if the pesos can be had. Above all, Ortiz Rubio will look to his credit at home. The army will be paid regularly. It is very necessary to pay the army regularly. Not long after Ambassador Morrow went to Mexico he advised President Calles that the best of all policies to follow would be to maintain his credit at home before satisfying creditors abroad. The current budget set aside 26,000,000 pesos for the public debt, but the proportion to be devoted to international obligations is not established. Foreign bankers and investors, particularly private investors, are not happy as they contemplate this situation. They do not appreciate the advice Morrow gave Calles. They hope Ortiz Rubio will forget about it. They have received almost nothing since 1914. Short of a Dawes plan for Mexico it appears they will not soon receive more. The idea of a Dawes plan—in which Mexico's capacity to pay would be compared with her obligations, and the two, somehow, be made to balance—has been discussed informally. Such procedure would reduce Mexico's current international debt, which amounts to 1,900,000,000 pesos.

The appointment of Calles to the Mexican National Railway Administration may foretell a beginning of a better day for the investors. At present the railway operates at a loss, its pay roll choked by political employees. It is a personnel problem that Calles must undertake. The howls of the discharged will echo along the right of way, and it would not be surprising if a bridge here and there were consumed in fiery protest. But once purged of graft, and freed from revolutionary destruction, the railway may thrive and its bondholders fatten.

Meanwhile, two essentials to Mexican well-being have already been achieved: the first is Washington's substitution of understanding for suspicion in Mexican-American relations; the second is the armistice in religious warfare.

In the Driftway

CHARLES H. INGERSOLL, one of the brothers who made the dollar famous by the manufacture of a watch, who is now trying to perpetuate the dollar's reputation through making a fountain pen, writes in regard to an idea of his "which one of your recent articles reminded me of—namely, a fleet of sailing vessels plying regularly across the Atlantic, designed primarily for passengers." The idea "may be a crazy notion," Mr. Ingersoll goes on to say, "but I think there would be plenty of patronage." And the patronage would come "not only from the idle rich" but from "millions of people, with more or less sporting blood, some of them desiring long passage and all enjoying the sea and sailing." Also "there might be a price consideration which would settle the question of popularity. If the overhead were small enough, for the average wage person the saving in dollars might offset the time wasted."

* * * * *

BEFORE going any farther the Drifter must rap Mr. Ingersoll on the knuckles for the final word in that last sentence. Probably Mr. Ingersoll did not actually mean "time wasted" or he would not have broached the main suggestion, but the idea that time spent in the manner described would be wasted is so typical of American thinking that the phrase slipped unconsciously into Mr. Ingersoll's letter. As to the scheme proposed, the Drifter thinks so well of it that if he had a little money to play with he would like nothing better than to carry it out. These words are chosen advisedly. The financial possibilities of the project do not appear so rosy that a man would be justified in putting into it any hard-earned capital on which he had to live, but if one had a little extra—if one ever does have that—the venture would be a fascinating one and in the end might turn out profitable to boot. The Drifter cannot envisage Mr. Ingersoll's "millions" of passengers, and the word "fleet" sounds a bit ambitious. Probably four vessels would be enough. Allowing thirty days for the trip across the Atlantic Ocean, this would make possible a schedule of semi-monthly sailings—quite sufficient with which to start.

* * * * *

THE Drifter does not believe that sailing vessels could be run so cheaply as to attract passengers for financial reasons. But this would not be necessary for the success of the project. This is a day in which there is a pronounced urge to get away—especially for one's vacation—from the conventional and the mechanical. People are glad to pay more nowadays to live in primitive fashion in summer camps than it would cost them to have all the comforts of a first-class hotel, and among persons having vacations of two to three months there must be many who would jump at the chance to go to Europe on a windjammer. Probably it would not be worth while to operate a transatlantic service for more than six months of the year, but the ships need not be laid up for the rest of the time. Winter sailings could be arranged to West Indian or South American ports, or cruises could be organized—to the South Seas or other warm and quiet waters.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Farmer Subscribes

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: When I read in certain Eastern papers of the remarkable prosperity you have had during the past eight years, I rise to reply: "It never touched us here in the wheat belt of northern Montana." The agricultural marketing act has engendered a new hope but many fear it will prove a dud. The only way to make ends meet is to cut one's standard of living.

I am trying out The Nation, hoping the editor will have the vision to see this far west. Today at my local elevator it takes five and one-third bushels of No. 1 Northern to pay for your magazine for one year. This would bread the editor for twelve months, I know.

You seem to have a passion for justice so I am hoping we may be good friends.

Hogeland, Montana, January 17 P. T. Anderson

"Darkness for Light"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Please discontinue my subscription to The Nation. If you care for a reason, you can find it in a book, a copy of which you may have in your morgue, the Bible. I refer you to Isaiah, fifth chapter, twentieth verse.

Oregon, Ill., January 14 D. A. Richardson

One of the Real Heroes

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: If you are accepting supplementary nominations for your Honor Roll for 1929, I should like to propose the name of Elmer Smith, the labor lawyer of Centralia, Washington, who, without remuneration, without publicity, and with only a handful of supporters, has given ten years of his life, his health, his professional standing (the State bar association disbarred him in an unsportsmanlike attempt to silence him) to an unflagging agitation for the release of eight men railroaded to prison under sentences of twenty-five to forty years for defending their union hall against a mob of lynchers. I consider him one of the real heroes of the present time.

New York, January 24 Frederick A. Blossom

A Soviet Prison

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I hope that Winthrop D. Lane, who wrote the article, Science and Crime, will soon make a trip to Soviet Russia so that when he writes again about prisons, he will also speak about prison conditions in the Soviet Union. A visit to a long-term prison here was of considerable interest to a group of about a dozen Americans. We entered, went all over the place, and were permitted to speak freely to the prisoners with no guard present. Since we were not searched, it would have been the easiest thing in the world to have passed guns and saws to the prisoners, but escapes were unknown, according to the head guard.

We saw the prisoners working in the factory. We spoke to them (the guard was not present) and were informed they work eight hours a day, for which they are paid. Later we saw the inmates in their cells, having dinner. The food was plain, but tasty and nourishing. A loud speaker in each cell supplied music during the meal. There was also a library and clubroom which they could visit after working hours. The prisoners mentioned that there was no corporal punishment. The only complainers were two ex-commissars who had taken graft and felt unjustly treated because they were there "for nothing."

Moscow, January 9 Harry Jaffe

Boy-Scout Militarism

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A bill has been introduced into the New York Assembly which proposes to make boy-scout training compulsory in the public schools of this State for boys of ten to eighteen, and requires as well that they devote a considerable part of their present leisure, non-school time for this purpose.

Such a law would introduce military training into our public schools, under the seemingly innocent guise of boy-scout work. The measure cannot pretend to be simply for the better physical training of our children in the grammar schools. If it were intended to accomplish this purpose, the extension of gymnasium and playground facilities, together with the present exercises practiced in the schools, would be ample to satisfy this object.

The proposition requires for its execution the wearing of uniforms, submission to "commanders," drills, and all the routine and paraphernalia of the scouts. It is plainly conceived in a military spirit with a view to advancing the idea of military practice and preparedness among the children in our schools. I respectfully submit that such a law would be out of harmony with the democratic ideals and the best traditions of our Republic, and certainly not in line with the efforts of the United States to help bring about international peace.

New York, February 3 Abraham A. Conan

Contributors to This Issue

Gardner Jackson is an independent and courageous Boston journalist.

Ruth Finney has covered the story of Boulder Dam since 1923 for the Scripps-Howard Newspaper Alliance.

Lyle C. Wilson is a Washington newspaperman specially conversant with Latin American affairs.

Ruth Lechlitner frequently contributes poetry to the magazines.

Henry Hazlitt is literary editor of The Nation.

Norman Thomas is one of the directors of the League for Industrial Democracy and a contributing editor of The Nation.

Royal J. Davis is a member of the editorial staff of the New York Evening Post.

Donald A. Roberts is a member of the department of English at the College of the City of New York.

Fred T. Marsh writes occasional book reviews for The Nation.

Granville Hicks is assistant professor of English at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute.

Alexander Bakshy writes on motion pictures for The Nation.

Books, Films, Drama

Cocoon

By RUTH LECHLITNER

Some supple creature, smooth as jade, and still
As a tenacious sphinx upon the green
Protective leaf, set her small mouth at will
To taste the flesh of summer. Carven clean
This branch, lace-ribbed, is frescoed on the bough
And braced to catch the web, to hold a skein
For the swift spinner and the silk that now
Cradles a sleeper from the bitter rain.

What word is woven with this little death
From the neat pattern of a dream, to wake
The mummy-chrysalis, to stir the breath
Within this brittle case, and deftly shake
From its thin sheath the fearful, folded wing
Out on the green, young branches of the spring?

Tradition and Experiment

Tradition and Experiment in Present-Day Literature. Addresses Delivered at the City Literary Institute of London. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

THE most useful terms of literary criticism are ghosts; the hand passes through them, grasping nothing solid. From a volume such as this, the reader expects to emerge with his ideas sharpened and clarified; he is likely, instead, to find himself more in a fog than ever.

Here are essays by ten writers, writing by pairs on five branches of literary art, the first of the pair discussing his branch in relation to tradition, the second in relation to experiment. One looks for clean divisions of opinion, for a series of five debates. One finds, in fact, that not a single contributor has been willing to throw in his lot entirely either with tradition or with experiment, nor does he even seem willing to admit that he knows precisely the difference between them.

R. H. Mottram, opening with a paper on Tradition in the Novel, begins by remarking that "the general tradition in the English novel, as in anything else that is English, is to have no strongly marked tradition," and adds that "it would hardly be too much to say that the tradition of the English novel is experiment." J. D. Beresford, writing on Experiment in the Novel, confesses that he is confronted by the same difficulty—that of "defining a recognizable tradition in English fiction to which I might conclusively point the exceptions." And he, too, concludes that "our best novelists have always been experimenters."

In spite of these remarks, both Mr. Mottram and Mr. Beresford do try to characterize the tradition of the English novel, and add point to their original misgivings by disagreeing on a simple question of fact, for Mr. Mottram thinks that tradition "in the main . . . a weakly romantic one," while Mr. Beresford is equally confident that "the tradition of the English novel has always been realistic in the main." But then, if we cannot tell the difference between tradition and experiment, how can we be expected to know the difference between realism and romance?

Mr. Beresford makes the point that the great novelists whom we now look back upon as traditional were in their own time experimenters. Those of their experiments that failed, or were for some reason inimitable, are still regarded as experiments; but most of their experiments inspired succeeding authors to copy them, and "this successive copying is the sole means by which an experiment becomes in the course of the centuries an accepted tradition."

When we come to Tradition in Drama, we find Ashley Dukes reminding us once more that "tradition is surely no more than the fruit of successful experiment." C. K. Munro, supposedly writing on Experiment in Drama, gives in fact very little attention to that subject, but wanders off into a consideration of the nature of art in general. Nor is he the only contributor who can be accused of departing from his assignment. T. S. Eliot, under the title of Experiment in Criticism, devotes merely his first paragraph to all that he has to say about the dubious distinction between "traditional" and "experimental" work in literary criticism, and thereafter writes about the changes in the last century in the scope of the critic's knowledge, and about our curious modern habit of living in the future: "We hardly have time to get any fun out of what is being written now, so concerned are we about the quality of what may be written fifty years hence."

Much of the confusion that surrounds these discussions of tradition and experiment is the result, I think, of the vagueness of both terms; for the meaning of each is indefinitely extensible. There is a sense in which writing of any kind is impossible without tradition. The reader of this review can understand it only because each word is to him not an unintelligible black smudge on a white background, but a symbol which has the meaning, or group of meanings, that tradition has given to it. On the other hand, nearly every sentence, no matter how ordinary, is to some degree an experiment: it is an assembling of words in a unique and hitherto non-existent order. We do not ordinarily recognize experiment as such unless it is an unusual type of experiment; and we do not recognize tradition as such unless it is not all-pervading. Gertrude Stein and James Joyce, for example, have sharpened our notions of what we mean by a traditional sentence and a traditional word.

Of all the writers in the present symposium, it has remained for Edith Sitwell, writing on Experiment in Poetry, to offer as satisfactory a brief summary of the respective roles of tradition and experiment in literature as we are likely to get:

> The truth is, that the great poet is, in almost every case, both a traditionalist and an experimentalist. He does not forget the discoveries made and the examples shown by his great predecessors, but, at the same time, he must bring some freshness into the language, some technical innovation, some new discovery of the world of sight or sound, else he is merely an echo, and will not take his place among his predecessors.

HENRY HAZLITT

Chain-Store Civilization

The Passing of Normalcy. By Charles W. Wood. B. C. Forbes Publishing Company. $3.

CHARLES W. WOOD is a writer with a knack for shrewd observation and a skill in a sort of writing that is easy to read. These gifts he is now applying to the new gospel of salvation by Big Business, which, it seems, has discovered or is discovering that the way to prosperity is to make everybody prosperous. We are to be saved by scientific mass production. Mr. Wood's latest book is a sermon on this theme with Marion, Ohio, as its background and the role of the chain stores as its principal preoccupation. Indeed, as Mr. Wood explains with scrupulous honesty, the book grew out of a suggestion from the chain-store men, and the study was somewhat aided by them although the results were not quite in line with their desires. Mr. Wood makes no Middletown study of Marion, but he does make some sound and shrewd observations about it, and tells us rather vividly how and why the old days of normalcy are passing—which is a very different matter from proving the adequacy of his gospel. It remains to be seen how far he can convince even the business leaders to whom he appeals. And if he convinces them, there are still problems inherent in landlordism, Wall Street speculation, and the whole profit system which make this reviewer pretty skeptical about the capacity of Big Business as we know it to achieve that "more abundant life for everybody" which Mr. Wood thinks is its logical object. But the book contains a prophecy which ought to warm the hearts of thousands of underpaid employees of chain stores. Mr. Wood is sure that those stores "will some day take a conspicuous leadership in the movement for higher wages." Here's hoping. NORMAN THOMAS

Spring-Rice's Career

The Letters and Friendships of Sir Cecil Spring-Rice. A Record. Edited by Stephen Gwynn. Two volumes. Houghton Mifflin Company. $10.

TWO young men, one an American, the other an Englishman, crossed from New York to London in November, 1886. The Englishman had been told of the American, who had just been defeated in the election for Mayor of New York, and introduced himself. The acquaintance ripened into friendship so rapidly that within a month the Englishman was acting as best man at the American's wedding in London. Fifteen years later the American was President of the United States; twelve more years and the Englishman was British Ambassador at Washington. Romance would have had Roosevelt President when Spring-Rice was Ambassador, with the two joining hands to take the United States into the war beside Great Britain. History, which is made of sterner stuff, sent Spring-Rice to Washington as one of the secretaries of the British legation in 1887 for a year, sent him back in 1889 for two years, again in 1894 for a year, in 1905 for a visit of a few days, and finally in 1913 for what were destined to be the last five years of his diplomatic career and of his life.

Thus he served at Washington for considerable periods in the administrations of three Presidents—Harrison, Cleveland, and Wilson—but his activity there during the Presidency of the friend with whom he had stood up as best man was limited to the brief visit in 1905 when he was first secretary of the British embassy at St. Petersburg. The war between Russia and Japan was approaching a crisis, and Roosevelt suggested that Spring-Rice, who had rather unconventionally been supplying him with information from the Russian capital, should give him the benefit of his knowledge and judgment in person. Hence the extraordinary visit, which was followed a few months later by Roosevelt's proposal to the two belligerents to send representatives to a peace conference—a move which resulted in the treaty of Portsmouth.

When Spring-Rice first came to Washington he was an almost total stranger, but in a short time his capacity for making friends—one of his strongest traits—had brought him into the circle of what Mr. Gwynn characterizes as "perhaps the most distinguished group of men and women that America could then show." It was the group of which Henry Adams was the center and which included John Hay, whose house was near that of Adams, Senator Cameron of Pennsylvania, Senator Lodge, Roosevelt, and in particular two brilliant women, Mrs. Cameron and Mrs. Lodge. Throughout his subsequent absences from Washington—at the British Foreign Office 1888-89, at the British legation in Tokio 1892-93, at the British embassy in Berlin 1895-98, at Constantinople 1898-99, at Teheran 1899-1901, at Cairo 1901-2, at St. Petersburg as first secretary of the embassy 1903-6, at Teheran again, this time as minister, 1906-7, in England 1908, at Stockholm as minister 1908-12—wherever he happened to be, he maintained his connection with his American friends by a stream of letters. These letters and the friendships they preserve bulked so large in his life as to justify their part in the title which Mr. Gwynn has given to his volumes.

One other friendship has an ironical piquancy which renders it worthy of mention. Among the letters which Spring-Rice received congratulating him upon his appointment as Ambassador to Washington, was one from Vienna beginning: "Dear Springy, Hurrah three times for your appointment to Washington. Now I have made up my mind to go there too . . ." It was from Count Dumba, between whom and Spring-Rice a close friendship had been formed at Stockholm. Dumba did go to Washington, where the friendship was renewed, but was sent home in 1915 for having encouraged plots to cripple American munition factories which were turning out great quantities of war material to be used by his friend's country against his own.

The crucial test of Spring-Rice as diplomat came with the outbreak of the World War. His delicate task was to uphold Great Britain's interference with American commerce and at the same time to create and strengthen sympathy for the cause of the Allies. In the very nature of the case it was a task which was incapable of perfect performance. Spring-Rice met it partly by urging his own government to yield where vital interests were not at stake, partly by reminding the government to which he was accredited of the forbearance shown by English laborers who were thrown out of work by the cotton blockade in our Civil War. He advised against propaganda as not only useless but mischievous. Even after the United States entered the war, when it was proposed that the Pilgrims Society return the compliment of its London namesake and give a dinner in honor of the British Ambassador, Spring-Rice replied, "I still think silence is best." For this reserve he was criticized and his policy was reversed by the flamboyant Northcliffe during the short time the publisher was in this country as head of the British war mission, but Spring-Rice had on his side the impressive example of Ambassador Jusserand. Moreover, his common sense told him that if in similar circumstances the United States would have acted very much as his own government was acting, it was equally certain that Great Britain would have acted very much as the United States was acting.

The measure of his success and, accordingly, of the wisdom of his policy is found, not in the fact that the United States finally threw its sword into the scale against the Central Powers—his biographer discountenances any such preposterous allegation on his behalf—but in the more modest although far from unimportant fact that "he kept the way clear of unappeasable quarrels . . . so that when a sense of America's own interest urged America to enter, there was no envenomed feeling against Great Britain to check that impulse, nor any diplomatic complication to hold America back."

While there are no political revelations of significance in these volumes, there are pictures to which future historians may well turn for an understanding of the time. One of them is contained in the crisp sentence, appearing in a letter to Sir Edward Grey in September, 1916: "The nation is anti-German, anti-British, and somewhat pro-Ally." More strikingly significant is an analysis of the political psychology of the almost inaccessible man who was head of the American government during Spring-Rice's ambassadorship:

TEN YEARS of ACHIEVEMENT

HAVING made permanent its place in New York as an institution setting new precedents in higher education by the establishment of its curriculum of adult education, The New School for Social Research plans ending the first year of its second decade in a new and modern building.

Proposed Building at 66-72 West Twelfth Street

SETTING A NEW PRECEDENT IN MODERN ARCHITECTURAL DESIGN

Joseph Urban, famed throughout the world for his unusually beautiful, yet eminently practical modes of design, reaches new heights in his plans for this new building. He has combined the appreciation of the artist for color and effect with the sense of utility of the most efficient architect. The result is startling in its radical departure from the ordinary.

The building is a step ahead of today. Indeed, it may also be a step ahead of the century. But it is strictly in sympathy with the high standards of the curriculuum which have been a part of the New School for the last decade.

You May Become Identified with this New Project

The building is to be erected at a total approximate cost of $780,000, for property and construction. Ground has already been purchased at 66-72 West Twelfth Street. An issue of $500,000 Six Per Cent Twenty-five Year Income Bonds will finance the building and equipment costs. Already close to $400,000 has been subscribed.

Bonds may be purchased in denominations of $1,000, $500 and $100. Will you become identified with this well established institution of higher education through the purchase of one or more bonds?

The NEW SCHOOL for SOCIAL RESEARCH

ALVIN JOHNSON, Director

465 West 23rd Street
New York

THE NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH
465 West 23rd St., New York, N. Y.

Please send me full particulars of how I may purchase Six Per Cent Income Bonds to help the erection of the New School Building.

Name ____________________

Address ____________________

____

> I have been in Russia, Berlin, Constantinople, and Persia, which are all popularly supposed to be autocratic governments. But I have never known any government so autocratic as this. This does not mean that the President acts without consulting the popular will. On the contrary his belief and practice is that he must not lead the people until he knows which way they want to go. But his interpretation of the oracle is his own secret, he consults it alone, he makes his own interpretation, and he acts according to his own judgment of what the people desire should be done. To curse him as many people do would be as wise as to curse the weather, or rather as to curse the weather-cock. But the mysterious way in which he moves makes everything a matter of divination rather than diplomacy. The F. O. [Foreign Office] used sometimes to say the same of Lord Salisbury. It is impossible even for his closest associates to foretell what he will do, for even his most intimate advisers do not know what other advisers had access to him and his left hand knoweth not what his right hand doeth.

Spring-Rice's recall at the beginning of 1918 was made in a cablegram which, although courteously worded and apologizing for its "telegraphic bluntness," unavoidably had the appearance of a censure. He had expected to be succeeded shortly by "some prominent and well-known British statesman" and his successor was no less a personage than Lord Reading. Nevertheless, the suddenness of the event was a shock. A few weeks later, while in Ottawa on his way home, he became unconscious and in a few minutes was dead—of what "in the old days," wrote Senator Lodge, "used to be termed a broken heart." He had not lived to see the outcome of America's entry into the war, but that entry itself, by aligning the English-speaking nations side by side, had realized a long-cherished dream.

ROYAL J. DAVIS

Sir Francis Bacon

Sir Francis Bacon: The First Modern Mind. By Byron Steel. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

OF all the notable Elizabethans Francis Bacon stands most in need of a fresh and fearless evaluation. He is ripe for the treatment known as debunking, but Mr. Steel has not chosen to accept either the hints so obviously offered by Lytton Strachey or his own legitimate opportunity.

In a popular and somewhat undistinguished style—so simplified that he defines, explains, and discards as worthless the whole system of the Schoolmen in one short paragraph—Mr. Steel narrates the undisputed facts of Bacon's life. By an effective use of excerpts from Bacon's letters, and a clear portrayal of each step in the long and devious road he trod to his short-lived eminence, the author shows Bacon in all his moral and spiritual nakedness. His fawning upon Cecil and his tiresome boasting to the King of scholarly aims appear clearly as the essential falsehoods they are. The controversial places in Bacon's life, however, receive scant attention. If he is called "the first modern mind" his biographer must justify his claim to the title. Did he leave Cambridge principally because the curriculum was unbearable? What claims to distinction at the bar could he offer in disputing high judicial offices with Coke? If he is to take precedence over Roger Bacon, an avowed empiricist, and over his contemporaries, Galileo and Kepler, in what respect was he greater or more modern than they? Does his scientific reputation rest more on his literary skill than on his laboratory achievement? Did he create the concept of inductive reasoning or did he merely give expression to a prevalent, though as yet not clearly defined, idea?

With these questions and others like them the biographer of Bacon must deal. Partly by the antics of the Baconians and partly by the adulation of those who, without careful investigation, have put Bacon forward as a great lawyer and a pioneer natural scientist his fame has become the subject of much doubt. The shortcomings of his character have been sufficiently dealt with; Aubrey told the whole story when he said that Bacon had the eye of a serpent. Everyone acquainted with the subject knows that Bacon was the viper Mr. Steel a little reluctantly pictures. What was needed, and is still needed despite Mr. Steel's effort, is a dispassionate scholarly study of the discrepancy between Bacon's utterance and his character, and of the actual nature of his scientific and legal attainments.

DONALD A. ROBERTS

"—Lasst Uns zu Grunde Gehen!"

A Roman Holiday. By Don Ryan. The Macaulay Company. $2.50.

THE Western World is on the decline; so let us eat, drink, and be merry. The strong man is at one with his age, embraces its destiny—and likes it; nor strives to swim upstream against the remorseless current which bears along with it all cultures, swelling into civilizations, into the stagnant sea of fellahdom. The present age is "contemporary" —to use the word in its Spenglerian (I was about to say Pickwickian) sense—with the latter days of the Roman Empire, the final stage of classical civilization.

Quite appropriately, Mr. Ryan has dedicated his new novel to Oswald Spengler. Appropriately, too, he has chosen for his protagonist a woman with a man's mind, an uprooted woman who in girlhood has run away from a sordid home to become a hooch dancer in Tia Juana. But that is only the first step, for Diana is not only ambitious, she is a reader, an intellectual, who learns from the philosophers and poets as she goes along. She works her way to Hollywood, gets into the movies, and rises to stardom—only to have her career shattered by a scandal that rocks the motion-picture world. But with the help of the Negro comedian who has always loved her she eventually rises to even greater heights, for now she has read Spengler and her ambition flares up to make the talking picture the true art vehicle of this decadent age. All through her career Diana uses men when it serves her purpose and proves herself stronger than any of them.

Opposite her, through the first half of the book, plays Tom Egan, a young man of family, also intellectual, but a man without ambition, to whom life has lost meaning—a man whose blood has run thin. Comes the war. Egan goes through with it brilliantly, but it gives his character the final shove into dissolution. When he rejoins Diana he is jaded, seeking only the "kicks" he can get out of life—women, dope, perversions. Finally, after an orgiastic party given by Wally Mead, the film star, where liquor and narcotics and "strange sins" (as Oscar Wilde loved to say) are freely indulged in, where a cast-off classical professor describes in noble language the visions of a hashish dream, lapsing into Latin when he comes to the obscene portions, Egan commits suicide in the old Roman manner—to the strains of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Mr. Ryan—with a bow toward Aldous Huxley—has written a Hollywood Satyricon, using a moving-picture tempo, with overtones of Spengler, Nietzsche, Freud, Ouspenski, and the new physics. Strangely enough, the learning, though thrown into the book in great chunks, does not seem to retard the pace of the story; for even if it is not—as has been claimed for it—a Spenglerian novel, "converting a philosophic theory into a living reality," yet it is certainly a glamorous Hollywood novel. And Mr. Ryan would probably say that Hollywood was the Western World in microcosm—with lighting effects; that he who has seen Hollywood has seen the world.

There is much in this audacious book that seems to this reviewer quite absurd; and there are some things about the extraordinary and fascinating heroine that seem to him incredible. But this is the most interesting novel ever to have come out of Hollywood. It could never have come from anywhere else. That is its curse as well as its significance.

FRED T. MARSH

The Case of Ambrose Bierce

Ambrose Bierce: A Biography. By Carey McWilliams. A and C. Boni. $3.50.

MR. McWILLIAMS'S book, the fourth study of Bierce published within a year, is so much the best of the four that it might be allowed to stand as the definitive account of Bierce's life. That it is not completely accurate is indicated by Professor Wilt's article in "American Literature," which throws doubt on a source McWilliams regards as impeccable—Bierce's war reminiscences. There are still, it appears, mysteries within mysteries. But McWilliams has diligently verified dates, examined unpublished letters, consulted newspaper files, and interviewed those who knew Bierce. The result is as close an approach to authenticity as we are likely to have, and perhaps as close as there is any legitimate reason for demanding. In its important details the case of Ambrose Bierce is perfectly clear.

It is clear, for one thing, that Mr. McWilliams was not far wrong when he stated in The Nation last June: "His [Bierce's] contribution to American literature could be summarized in a footnote of no considerable length." His satire, which to the reader of today displays no penetrating or philosophic quality of survival value, was even in its own time, as McWilliams is careful to point out, essentially futile. His short stories grew out of a theory of fiction that squeezed vitality and verisimilitude from his material the moment he began to write. Even Professor Pattee should have been able to estimate Bierce's place in literature without recourse to the opinions of Walter Neale.

Less obvious but not altogether obscure are the reasons for Bierce's vogue. Because he had an air of self-confidence, because he was courageous, because he possessed more integrity than was common in that day, he impressed his younger contemporaries. Myths grew up about the man from the first; he was a legend forty years before his mysterious disappearance provided the opportunity for apotheosis. Moreover, there had developed by the time of his death a school of writers who, having brushed aside the accepted authors of Bierce's generation, flattered themselves by hailing him as a prototype of their enlightenment.

There is also, of course, the fact that Bierce has attracted the attention of critics interested in explaining the repeated frustration of literary talent in America. Bierce's defeat seems to have been the result of his romantic, sentimental, almost adolescent cynicism. Mr. McWilliams, by tracing this cynicism as far back as Bierce's earliest experiments in journalism, lends plausibility to Lewis Mumford's theory that the Civil War was its cause. The real question, however, is why Bierce never outgrew this attitude. To me his environment is sufficient explanation. What could a man like Bierce do in the midst of the chaotic life of the Coast in the post-bellum period? He could alternate between the literature of protest—bitter, heartfelt, and useless—and the literature of escape—skilfully written, momentarily effective, and completely unreal. It is not a question of what a great genius could have

FRANCE
A NATION OF PATRIOTS
BY
CARLTON J. H. HAYES

This book is a study of national propaganda. It tells of the efforts that are being made to stimulate patriotic force, speech and action at the expense of at least un-national, if not international indoctrination. Professor Hayes has done an intensive and intensely interesting analysis and investigation of French school books, journals, newspapers, and the activities of the church, cinema, radio and the many patriotic societies.

$4.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

LONDON—A MILESTONE?

The present Disarmament Conference in London may well be the most significant event of the present century.

Important decisions may be taken by the principal nations of the world bringing the dream of idealists for centuries—a condition of world peace—close to accomplishment.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

will give a sympathetic and, what is more important, an accurate and unbiased account of this epoch-making conference.

At all times The Manchester Guardian Weekly keeps its readers advised of progress in international affairs.

To leaders of intelligence in more than sixty countries, it is a constant source of reliable information on all important world happenings and a faithful guide in keeping their viewpoint on vital events, clear and unprejudiced.

MAIL THIS COUPON

The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.
Gentlemen:
Enclosed please find $3.00 for which send THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY for one year to the below address.

Name ....

Address ....

done; there is no evidence that Bierce was even potentially a great genius; he was a man with a literary gift that might have developed and with a mind that might have grown.

If the Bierce myth had never existed, one would find it difficult to justify the conscientious labor that has gone into this book. As it is, it is well for us to be able to separate fact from fable, and for that reason Mr. McWilliams's subject is not unworthy of the care, intelligence, ingenuity, and insight he has devoted to it. His work is conspicuously and satisfyingly unlike the slap-dash biographies that clutter up the bookstands. Though his style is uneven and his pages are not wholly free from solecisms, the diligence of his research and the sanity of his critical judgments make the book an admirable performance. GRANVILLE HICKS

Books in Brief

Shadows of Men. By Jim Tully. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Jim Tully has come a long way in craftsmanship since his earliest books, but in other respects he remains unchanged. And in this collection of reminiscent tales, loosely tied together, about jailbirds, dope fiends, outcasts of all sorts, from Dippy the pyromaniac to the tragic boy, Bright Eyes, he writes of a world with which his readers are already familiar. If one has suspected—or hoped—that Jim Tully might some day become an American Gorki, "Shadows of Men" will not satisfy him. Mr. Tully has not yet succeeded in conveying to his readers that transcendent sense of universality which is the secret of power in the great literature of the despised and rejected. But if one asks only for vivid yet realistic stories of the lower depths in American life, here is another book to add to Mr. Tully's growing list. It is a moving book; the characters live because their creator knows them, not only by experience, but with an understanding heart.

Mothers Cry. By Helen Grace Carlisle. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

The reader who begins this book is likely to finish it. A mother, poor but refined, simple in thought but "rich with life," tells her seemingly artless story with tremendous cumulative effect. It opens with her courtship and ends on the day after her oldest child (and the author herself gives this away at the beginning of the book) dies, a murderer, in the electric chair. The years of struggle to keep herself and her little brood going, the growth and development of the four children, how one boy becomes "a builder to make beauty greater" while the other is born "a destroyer to kill"—all are touchingly described. Possibly this novel will be revived some day as a typical example of the pathetic literature of our period, just as we occasionally turn back to faded and forgotten romances over which our grandfathers and, more particularly, grandmothers wept. For this book, conceived and projected in the approved contemporary manner, is essentially as meretricious as those incredibly popular thrillers. On the surface it appears simple, sincere, utterly realistic; but in truth it is planned and constructed with reasoning care toward a single purpose—not to mirror life but to wring the heart. No single stop is left unpulled; no chance to twang a heart-string is overlooked. Mr. Dreiser, however, recommends it warmly, the master being, it would seem, the most generous of critics.

Iron Man. By W. R. Burnett. The Dial Press. $2.50.

Mr. Burnett's first novel, "Little Caesar," was about a Chicago gangster, and was—to adopt the language of the sporting fraternity, in which dialect "Iron Man" is written—a

Individual and Community Social Work

The social worker working with Jews must be trained to deal successfully with the socially maladjusted Jewish family and individual.

But he must be able, also, to see the problem in the large. He must "see" the Jews of America as a distinctive group aiming at adjustment to the general environment for its own greater happiness and the enrichment of American life.

Holders and prospective holders of a bachelor's degree are invited to examine carefully the advantages of

Jewish Social Work as a Profession

A number of scholarships and fellowships ranging from $150 to $1000 for each school year are available for especially qualified candidates.

For full information write to
M. J. KARPF, Director

The Training School For Jewish Social Work

A Graduate School

71 W. 47th St., New York City

SEE RUSSIA ON THE MAY 1ST

The celebrations on May 1st dramatize again the events of 1917 midst renewed outbursts of enthusiasm and a glorious panorama of color and costume.

Sail from New York on

ST. LOUIS.....April 12th
BREMEN ..... " 12th
RELIANCE ... " 15th
AQUITANIA .. " 16th
OLYMPIC .... " 18th
ILE de FRANCE " 18th or any other ship and join our party in Paris on April 26th.

Members of this tour will visit the Russian theatres and Universities at the time of their greatest activity.

Write or call for Information

AMALGAMATED BANK
Travel Dept.
11-15 Union Square, New York City
or Amalgamated Trust & Savings Bank
111 West Jackson Blvd.
Chicago, Ill.

For Information on other Spring and Summer trips write for booklet "N"

"natural." This second novel, therefore, suffers by comparison, though it deals with an equally glamorous phase of the American scene—the "fight game." The action here is not so rapid, nor are the dramatic moments so tense; and "Coke" Mason, the "dumb" middle-weight who becomes world's champion in his class only to go down in defeat because of a woman—who, by the way, happens to be his wife—cannot begin to compare as a hero with Rico, the gangster in "Little Caesar." But "Iron Man" should make a hit. The situations are plausible and skilfully handled, there are several thrilling reportorial accounts of ring battles, and the talk—of which there is a great deal—is authentic. Mr. Burnett knows his fighters; he has also studied his Hemingway—possibly too assiduously. Those who like the usual run of prize-fight stories will here find a book that tops the list. But the real prize-fight novel has yet to be written. As a work of art "Iron Man" is simply not in the running.

Twelve Against the Gods. By William Bolitho. Simon and Schuster. $4.

An adventurer, according to Mr. Bolitho, is an outlaw, charlatan, or idealist, who dares to resist not only the course of the social and moral order but the experience of mankind, and attempts the impossible in life. One may dispute the definition and question the omission of certain figures or the suitability of others, but no one will wholly regret the author's choices. Alexander, Casanova, Napoleon I, Isadora, these are the recrudescent idols of every romanticist whatever his hypothesis. The combination is often not so happy as this one. Mr. Bolitho's estimates, which are just without being cynical, his enthusiasm, and his vibrant prose are really worthy of his subjects. His book should make a holiday for all who worship at the same shrines.

Look Homeward, Angel. By Thomas Wolfe. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

Between the apostrophes, soliloquies, and philippics, through the torment, the despair, and the rapture of this prodigious first novel run the story of a mad clan of Georgians and the social history of that lost class which manages to escape the lot of Negroes and poor whites without becoming the eminent minority. Here is a fragment of the American scene unfamiliar to our social novels; here is "naked life" described with scope and fervor. As in the best tradition of naturalism, nothing has been omitted—nothing except that unobtrusive artifice which bestows upon a great novel the aesthetic quality, the impression of something other than life. There is novelty in the book's intensive compound of romantic fancy and irony, and there is great vitality in the episodes, but the vigor never becomes strength because it is dissipated by incoherence and the lack of a steady emphasis. Like life it is incomplete and unfinished—it might go on forever. The author gives no structural reason for it to stop.

Joaquin Miller and His Other Self. By Harr Wagner. San Francisco: Harr Wagner Publishing Company. $5.

Mr. Wagner makes good his claim that he has new information to offer concerning the once-great poet of California; letters, journals, and other bits of biographical evidence serve to fill out our picture of this man who went as a pioneer youth from Indiana to California, sowed his wild oats on the plains and among the mountains, settled down to pedagogy and poetry, enjoyed a period of rather flashy fame in England, and spent the long remainder of his Western life as a flowing-bearded bard and a "natural" lover. The personality so sketched is indeed interesting. But Mr. Wagner fails to convince us that his hero was even a third-rate poet. If one was uncertain about this before, the quotations would settle the matter.

Lloyd Express
★ BREMEN ★
EUROPA
COLUMBUS
★ Fastest Liner in the World ★
To England, France and Bremen
◆
Lloyd Cabin Quartet
BERLIN · STUTTGART
MUENCHEN · DRESDEN
To England, Ireland, France, Bremen
◆
Every Lloyd Liner Carries Tourist Third
NORTH GERMAN LLOYD
57 Broadway New York, or your local agent

Visits to Soviet Russia
FOURTH SEASON

EXPLORATIVE itineraries worked out with reference to social, economic, historic, artistic and scenic features.

Visits to factories, schools, children's communities, collective farms and villages . . . art treasures, palaces and workers' rest homes . . . for the adventurous . . . camping in the Caucasus and study of primitive tribes.

Small groups, each accompanied by a qualified American leader and Russian interpreter. From $395 including express steamship passage. Literature available.

Individual itineraries also executed ▲ Independent year-'round representation in Russia

20-30 WEST 43rd STREET ▲ NEW YORK
THE OPEN ROAD

Films

A Soviet Fantasy

POLITICAL sympathies enter to such a large extent into the public appreciation of Russian films that it is something of a problem to consider "A Fragment of an Empire" (Cameo) on its merits as a picture. Here is unquestionably an unusual piece of work if measured by the standards of Hollywood. It deals with the interesting if not quite original theme of a man who suddenly finds himself in a new world, unaware of the changes which took place while he was suffering from the effects of amnesia. It also employs some very striking images to describe the man's experiences and reactions. Moreover—which is rare—the acting in it is reserved and sensitive. With all this excellent material "A Fragment of an Empire" might have been a great picture. It actually falls short of this by a very considerable margin.

Perhaps the most disappointing thing about it is its treatment of the new ways of life in Soviet Russia as they reveal themselves to the primitive mind of a peasant worker who remembers only the Russia of the Czars. The war scenes which make up the first half of the picture, though not quite relevant to the theme and somewhat overburdened with symbolism, are magnificently conceived. One expects an equal wealth of imagery and an equal sense of dramatic contrast in the scenes which describe the impact of the new life on a mind that has been bound by tradition and ruled by the idea of the sacred rights of master over his men, of husband over his wife, of father over his children. Here was an opportunity to show the remarkable changes wrought by the revolution in the status and mentality of the worker.

But just at this point inspiration seems to have deserted the authors of the picture. Their hero, on recovering memory and returning to Petrograd, is thrown into a state of utter bewilderment by such trivial changes as a monument to Lenin—of whom he had probably never heard—a block of new buildings, the short skirts worn by women, and the fact that the old owner of the factory in which he used to work no longer owns it. On the other hand, the picture makes hardly any attempt to show the reactions of the man to his new social standing and new opportunities for enjoying life. In fact, in one respect, namely, the relationship between husband and wife, it seems to suggest that there has been no change at all, our hero recovering his wife from a man whom she has been obeying with as much docility as she had probably obeyed himself.

Of the two other silent pictures recently shown suffice it to say that "The Demon of the Steppes" (Film Guild) is a rather mediocre Russian picture, and "The Last Night" (Fifty-fifth Street Cinema) a somewhat better German one.

Richard Barthelmess, who distinguished himself in the part of a Chinaman in Griffith's "Broken Blossoms," plays another Chinaman in "Son of the Gods" (Warner Brothers Theater), an effort to show the injustice of race discrimination, culminating in a complete surrender to existing prejudices. The oriental color of the picture is about as authentic as Hollywood can make it, and the same must be said of the credibility of the story. The only feature of the picture deserving praise is the very able acting of Miss Constance Bennett.

The appearance of a singer of the Metropolitan Opera in a full-length motion picture may be a portent of the times indicating the trend toward a screen opera, but Mr. Lawrence Tibbett's vocalizing in "The Rogue Song" (Astor) fails to make this musical travesty a notable achievement in any other respect. Except for a few ballet scenes, it is quite crude.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Drama

Gopher Prairie, Spain

EVA LE GALLIENNE has added still another play by the Spanish brothers Quintero to her list at the Civic Repertory Theater. This time it is the light but graceful and consistently amusing comedy, "The Women Have Their Way." A young lawyer from Madrid comes to a small town in Andalusia to settle the estate of an uncle. No sooner does he arrive than the women of the town begin to invent a romance for him with one Juanita La Rosa, a girl of whom he has caught a casual glimpse, and of whom he has remarked, unfortunately within the hearing of two or three others, that she is rather pretty. Against his will an introduction is arranged; they are continually thrown together at every social gathering; their every look and comment is interpreted as if it held a deep significance; various subterfuges on the part of others bring the affair to a crisis, and the young lawyer, of course, finally capitulates, actually does fall in love, and proposes. The authors are relentless in their exposure of the almost incredibly narrow range of interests and topics in a little humdrum village which makes such busybodies possible, but there is never the slightest bitterness or malice in their humor; it is all as gentle and kindly as the warm Spanish sunlight. The outstanding performance in the play is that of Egon Brecher as the easy-going priest Don Julian.

This short two-act play is preceded by a curtain-raiser, "The Open Door," by Alfred Sutro, a deft and moving piece in which nothing more unusual happens than that two people who can do nothing more about it confess that they love each other. Miss Le Gallienne acts with her usual capability both in this and in the Quintero comedy.

"Josef Süss" (Erlanger's Theater), the play by Ashley Dukes, has been harshly judged on the ground that it does not adequately reflect the richness and sweep of the novel by Lion Feuchtwanger on which it is based; but in the drastic reduction which dramatization necessitates this result was inevitable. "Josef Süss" as a play does, it is true, suffer from a certain episodic quality, but it is none the less powerful and impressive. The play opens at the moment when Süss ingratiates himself with Karl Alexander just before the latter becomes Duke of Württemberg; it carries the Jew through his unscrupulous rise to power until his own daughter kills herself to escape from the libertine Duke, and then to the moment when he has achieved his revenge and is led off to prison. Maurice Moscovitch plays the title role with a fine restraint, and Malcolm Keen gives a convincing performance as the Duke.

"Strike Up the Band" (Times Square Theater) is a musical show that is not only boldly original in plot but even flirts with social satire. It concerns a war between the United States and Switzerland over an increased duty on Swiss chocolate. For an act and a half the authors (the book is by Morrie Ryskind, "based on a libretto by George S. Kaufman," and the lyrics are by Ira Gershwin) have a gay time with the self-made American business man and his philosophy and with imperialism and war psychology; then everything evaporates into a typical song-and-dance show with the usual sentimental ending. The lines and lyrics are considerably above the average; George Gershwin's music, though it does not easily cling to the memory, is very pleasant while it is going on, and Bobby Clark, with his miraculous cigar, cane, and eyebrows, is responsible for a more than generous supply of humor.

H. H.

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

PLAYS TO SEE

*At the Bottom—Waldorf—116 W. 50th St.
*Berkeley Square—Lyceum—E. 45th St.
Children of Darkness—Biltmore—W. 47th St.
City Haul—Hudson—44th St., E. of B'dway.
*Civic Repertory—14th St. & 6th Ave.—See Advertisement.
*Criminal Code—National—W. 41st St.
*Death Takes a Holiday—Barrymore Theatre—47th St., W. of B'dway.
*Dishonored Lady—Empire—40th St. & B'dway.
Ruth Draper—Comedy—41st St., E. of B'dway.
Everything's Jake—Assembly—39th St., E. of B'dway.
*Josef Suss—Erlangers—44th St., W. of B'dway.
*Journey's End—Miller—124 W. 43rd St.
June Moon—Broadhurst—W. 44th St.
Meteor—Guild—W. 52nd St.
Out of a Blue Sky—Booth—44th St., W. of B'dway.
Rebound—Plymouth—45th St., W. of B'dway.
*Red Rust—Beck—302 W. 45th St.
Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45th St.
Strike Up The Band—Times Sq.—W. of B'dway.
Sweet Adeline—Hammerstein—Broadway & 53rd St.
*The Boundary Line—Forty-eighth—48th St., E. of B'dway.
*The First Mile—Comedy—41st St. E. of B'dway.
Wake Up and Dream—Selwyn—42nd St., W. of B'dway.

FILMS

Across the World—Cohan—43rd St. & B'dway.
Caught In The Berlin Underworld—Cameo—42d St., E. B'dway.
Disraeli—Central Theatre—Broadway and 47th St.
The Green Goddess—Winter Garden—1646 B'dway.

CONCERTS AND RECITALS

Harold Bauer—Town Hall—Sat. Aft., Feb. 15.
Mischa Elman—Carnegie—Sun. Eve., Feb. 16.
Heifetz—Carnegie—Wed. Eve., Feb. 19.
Martinelli—Carnegie—Tues. Eve., Feb. 18.
Philharmonic Symphony—Carnegie—Thurs. Eve., Feb. 13; Fri. Aft., Feb. 14.
Students Concerts—Philharmonic—Carnegie—Sat. Eve., Feb. 15.
Tales of Hoffman—Grand Opera for Children—Town Hall—Sat. Morn., Feb. 22.

*Drama. Comedy. Musical.

ANNOUNCEMENT

How Far Should Government Regulate Business—Mr. Henry Goddard Leach, Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard, and Mr. Frederick A. Korsmeyer, speakers, over WEAF, Feb. 18, 7 to 7:30 P. M., Eastern Standard Time, under the auspices of the National League of Women Voters.

The Actor-Managers, Inc., has the honor to present
RUTH DRAPER in her ORIGINAL CHARACTER SKETCHES
Every Eve. including Sunday (except Mon. & Thurs. nights) at 8:50
COMEDY THEATRE, 41st East of Broadway. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:30. VERY GOOD SEATS at $1.00

Coming—
The Idol of 500 Million People!
F. C. Coppicus presents
MEI LAN-FANG
China's Foremost Actor
"Grand Abbot of Ching-Chung Monastery"
"The Foremost of the Pear Orchard"
DIRECT from PEKING to NEW YORK
For a Limited Engagement
Opening at 49th St. Thea. Mon. Evg. at 8:50, Feb. 17th
Mr. Mei will be supported by his own company of actors, dancers and musicians in scenes from his most famous dramas.
TICKETS: Opening Night, $5.50, $3.85, $3.00, $2.00
Other Performances, $3.85, $3.00, $2.50, $1.50
Mail Orders to F. C. COPPICUS, 33 W. 42nd St. Tel. LON. 8250
Auspices: China Institute in America

□ THEATRES □

LEO BULGAKOV
THEATRE ASSOCIATES, INC., presents
AT THE BOTTOM
by MAXIM GORKY
New version by William L. Laurence
Phone reservations accepted—Circle 1407
"Really worth seeing."—Brown, Post.
"A fine play"—Mantle, News.
WALDORF THEATRE—50th St., Bet. 6th & 7th Aves. Eve., 8:50
MATINEES Thursday and Saturday, 2:30

Kenneth Macgowan and J. V. Reed present
BASIL SYDNEY and MARY ELLIS
in CHILDREN of DARKNESS
by Edwin Justus Mayer, author of "The Firebrand"
BILTMORE THEATRE—47th Street, West of Broadway
Evenings, 8:50—Mats., Wed. and Sat., 2:40.

CIVIC REPERTORY 14th St.—6th Ave. Evenings, 8:30.
50c, $1, 1.50. Matinees Thursdays and Saturdays, 2:30.
EVA LE GALLIENNE, Director
Fri. Eve., Feb. 14, "Mlle. Bourrat"; Sat. Mat., Feb. 15, "Peter Pan"; Sat. Eve., Feb. 15, "The Would Be Gentleman"; Mon. Eve., Feb. 17, "The Living Corpse"; Tues. Eve., Feb. 18, "The Sea Gull"; Wed. Eve., Feb. 19, "The Open Door" & "The Women Have Their Way"; Thurs. Mat., Feb. 20, "Hedda Gabler"; Thurs. Eve., Feb. 20, "The Living Corpse."
Seats 4 weeks in advance at Box Office & Town Hall, 113 W. 43rd St.

WILLIAM HARRIS, JR., PRESENTS
"THE FIRST PLAY OF THE SEASON WITH TEETH IN IT."
ROBERT LITTELL, WORLD.
CRIMINAL CODE
By MARTIN FLAVIN with ARTHUR BYRON
NATIONAL THEATRE 41st St., West of 7th Ave. Evenings 8:50
Matinees Wednesdays & Saturdays, 2:30

ETHEL BARRYMORE Theatre, 47th St., West of Broadway
Evenings 8:50; Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:30
LEE SHUBERT Presents
PHILIP MERIVALE
IN
DEATH TAKES A HOLIDAY
A COMEDY ABOUT LIFE
"BRAVE, AUDACIOUS, PROVOCATIVE"—Robert Garland, Telegram

IS LIQUOR A MYTH?
THE ONLY WAY TO REALLY KNOW IS TO SEE
EVERYTHING'S JAKE!
THE RIP-ROARING ALCOHOLIC COMEDY
by DON MARQUIS
"GOOD, ROBUST FUN"—N. Y. Times—"A RIOT"—Benchley, New Yorker
ASSEMBLY Theater, 39th St., E. of Bway. Eves. at 9. Mats. Tues. & Sat. 3

The Theatre Guild Presents
METEOR
By S. N. BEHRMAN
Guild THEA., 52nd St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

"REBOUND"
With Hope Williams
"This is the best light comedy written by anybody hereabouts in ten or twenty years, and it's not so damned light, either."—Heywood Broun, New York Telegram.
ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
DONALD OGDEN STEWART'S COMEDY.
Plymouth Theatre. Eves. 8:50; Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:40.

HERMAN SHUMLIN presents
THE LAST MILE
A new drama by John Wexley
Directed by Chester Erskin. Settings by Henry Dreyfuss
SAM H. HARRIS Theatre 42nd St. W. of Broadway
Eves. 8:50. Matinees Wed. & Sat., 2:30

Mr. Preston Sturges, whose delightful comedy "Strictly Dishonorable" is still playing to crowded houses in a bad season, now offers another entertainment called "Recapture" (Eltinge). It is all about a lady—played as well as possible and very decoratively by Ann Andrews—who has loved rapturously once and who is distressed because having lost "the rainbow"—Mr. Sturges's language—she cannot find it again. Figuring prominently in the action also is the lift in a French hotel, which usually will not work but which works too well at the end and carries the lady to an untimely death. The whole thing seems very gaudy and unreal. If Mr. Sturges wrote it a long time ago he can be forgiven; if he wrote it after "Strictly Dishonorable" one wonders what has become of his talent for high comedy. D. V. D.

Oscar Straus's "The Chocolate Soldier" (Jolson Theater), based on George Bernard Shaw's "Arms and the Man," is one of the pleasantest revivals in some years. The music is as delightful and the book of course is as clever as ever. The performance generally equals the productions of the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas staged by Winthrop Ames a few seasons ago. Alice Mackenzie, Charles Purcell, and Vivian Hart are to be commended particularly. M. G.

MATINEES: GOOD SEATS, ALL PRICES, AT BOX OFFICE

WARNER BROS. Present

GEORGE ARLISS

in

"DISRAELI"

(A Vitaphone All-Talking Picture)

CENTRAL THEATRE Daily 2:45—8:45
Broadway and 47th St. Sunday 3—6—8:45

New York Branch
FREETHINKERS OF AMERICA
130 W. 56th St. Friday, Feb. 21st, 8:30 P. M.
MAJOR GEORGE HAVEN PUTNAM
Noted Publicist
will deliver an important address entitled,
"FREEDOM OF THOUGHT AMONG ENGLISH SPEAKING PEOPLE"
Admission Free. Questions and Discussion

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 E. 15 St. Alg. 3094

New Courses: Inquire for Details

HERMAN EPSTEIN Fri., 8:30
"The Ring of the Niebelung" Feb. 14th
WILLIAM H. BRIDGES Wed., 7:00
"Creative Psychology" Feb. 19th
ALGERNON LEE Tues., 8:30
"Symposium: Socialist Policies" Feb. 18th
ANITA BLOCK Wed., 8:30
"The American and European Theatre" Feb. 19th
ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS Sat., 2:00
"Martyrs of Injustice" Feb. 15th

CAPITAL AND LABOR UNDER FASCISM

BY CARMEN HAIDER

Professor Herbert W. Schneider, author of THE FASCIST STATE, says: . . . the most careful study yet made of the economic institutions and policies of Fascism. It contains strictly up-to-date and first-hand information regarding the actual workings of the 'Corporative State.' It should interest every student of labor problems and politics. Useful for both prophet and historian."

$4.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

PRIVATE LETTERS PAGAN AND CHRISTIAN

"I KILLED my wife by mistake. You, however, have deliberately made mischief by setting my son against me." Thus ran a letter from Periander, tyrant of Corinth to his father-in-law in this intimate collection of private letters contributed by prostitutes, poets, philosophers and erring citizens. "Never again!" was Cicero's comment after he had been host to Caesar for the evening. $3.50

E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc., 300-4th Ave., New York, N. Y.
(Publishers since 1852)

A CHICAGO DINNER
FOR NORMAN THOMAS
WHO WILL SPEAK ON
CATCHING UP WITH OURSELVES
A Program for the Times
Hotel Morrison, February 22nd, at 7 P. M.

Make reservations in advance at $2.00 each.
Robert Morss Lovett, Chairman.

COMMITTEE ON DINNER FOR NORMAN THOMAS
800 South Halsted Street Seeley 0940

Security and "Sanctions"

THE following article, which we reprint from the London Economist, analyzes and explains in illuminating fashion the opposing attitudes of Washington and Paris toward the whole question of armaments and peace pacts.

The declaration in the new German-American reparation agreement that "the United States Government agrees to regard Germany's loyalty and faith and credit as sole security and guaranty for the fufilment of Germany's obligations under this agreement" introduces an unaccustomed note into a formal diplomatic document, and it is not surprising that pointed contrasts have been drawn in Germany itself between the attitude of the American government and that of certain other countries a good deal nearer to Berlin, whose habit it is to raise the "sanction" issue wherever possible.

That contrast does in fact exist, and it springs from a divergence of outlook which finds expression in more fields than one. So far as reparations go, it may be observed without suspicion of cynicism that the United States can well afford to be tender to German susceptibilities, for Germany's obligations are now being so largely commercialized that the whole national credit is involved in any case, and the last nation with which the German government would willingly embroil itself financially is the state to which financial dominance has largely passed. By introducing into the agreement a passage expressly renouncing all idea of any but moral sanctions, America creates a general atmosphere of good-will and establishes herself in particularly good odor in Berlin. Even from the purely business point of view there is sound sense in such a course, just as from the business point of view there was sound sense in America's renunciation of a considerable portion of her share of the Boxer indemnity in 1908. . . . In such matters American idealism is entirely genuine, but it is perhaps commended rather more than it otherwise would be to the average American mind by the fact that it has its uses as an asset in international relations as well.

Akin to the opposition of view between the United States and, for example, France over sanctions in regard to Germany is the same opposition of view between the same two countries over such larger questions as the naval conference and the relationship of the League Covenant and the Kellogg pact. In all these fields Washington and Paris represent merely the poles of opposition. The questions on which they thus take position concern equally the other Powers of the world, particularly those participating in the naval conference. . . . Broadly speaking, the contrast is between tight and loose understandings, . . . France standing, as she always does stand, for the system formally complete and worked out remorselessly in every logical detail. The Treaty of Versailles, with its specific provision against every possible contingency and its sanctions in reserve against every possible default, is characteristically French. So—paradoxically enough in view of its partially American origin—is the League Covenant as contrasted with the Kellogg pact, which, to carry the paradox further, is characteristically American in tenor despite its debt to the initiative of a French foreign minister.

Fundamentally, the contrast is due to the difference of conditions on the two sides of the Atlantic. For France, and in lesser, or in some cases even in greater, degree for other European states, security is a real and vital issue. For the United States it is not and never has been. The inevitable intermediary and interpreter between France on the one hand and the United States on the other is Great Britain, a fact which imposes considerable responsibilities on a government which has just sent its Foreign Minister to Geneva to carry a stage farther the task of bringing the League Covenant into harmony with the Kellogg pact, and will in ten days' time have four of its Cabinet Ministers sitting side by side with the French and American delegates hammering out the details of a naval limitation agreement. Those two tasks are far more intimately associated than at first sight appears.

Naval limitation raises immediately the security issue on which France lays such increasing stress. In American eyes France's views on security are no less than an obsession. Because of France's insistence on guns and aeroplanes and submarines as bulwarks of security, instead of on covenants of good faith between nations, the whole limitation of armaments is imperiled. So reasons Washington. Because America, Paris replies, will give no assurance that she will take her part in enforcing covenants if they are wantonly broken, France at least must take measures in other directions for her safety. She is a loyal member of the League of Nations, lacking though the League is in that material force with which the French delegation at the peace conference strove so hard to equip her. But even the Covenant of the League is insufficient for France, in view of the room it leaves for uncertainty as to whether war in violation of obligations will, in fact, be repressed by collective action. Hence the enthusiasm for measures like the Geneva Protocol, designed to tighten the Covenant up in this respect.

In contrast to the Covenant, with its palpable insufficiencies, from France's point of view, America sets the Kellogg pact. There is, fortunately, no sort of opposition between the two documents. If the pact goes farther in the direction of formal prohibition, or rather renunciation, of war, the Covenant goes farther in the measures it embodies for the protection of the law-abiding nation against the lawless. In the former respect the Covenant is in process of being brought up to the level of the pact. In the latter there is no visible prospect of the pact being invested with the provisions for enforcement included in the Covenant. That matters little to signatories of the pact who are also signatories of the Covenant, except in so far as it fails to give them an assurance that America will be in action at the side of the unoffending law-observer when attacked by a law-breaking aggressor. So far from that, there is not even the assurance that America will not interfere, in the interests of her own traders, with the measures the law-observers may find it necessary to take in concert against the law-breaker. It is under these conditions that France declares openly that till the American attitude—and, to a much lesser degree, the attitude of various prominent members of the League of Nations, including Great Britain—changes, her eastern fortifications and her air squadrons and her supersubmarines must be her safeguard. . . .

The process of increasing Europe's faith in the sanctity of covenants unaccompanied by any obtrusive menace of enforcement is developing. So is the process of the education of the United States in the lesson that world citizenship means world responsibilities. No one soberly reviewing the course of events in the past ten years can be blind for a moment to the progress achieved in both directions. The present attitude of the United States and France may present strong contrasts. But, at any rate, the roads the two states are taking are tending to converge steadily, not to diverge farther.

PUBLIC
LIB.

☐ RESORTS ☐

SONAQUA CLUB
Lake Mohegan, N. Y.

The Haven for Sport Lovers. Ideal for recreation and relaxation. Convenient for week-ends. Only 45 miles from New York.

Sports	Special programs for
Skating, Hiking,	Lincoln's & Washington's
Skiing, Tobogganing.	Birthday Weekends.

For reservations call Peekskill 1276

THE LAKE VIEW
SILVER & CAMEN
Surpassing Accommodations
Atmosphere of Refinement
Excellent Cuisine
Moderate Rates
59 Madison Ave. Phone Lakewood 287
Lakewood - New Jersey

RUSTIC Beauty for your relaxation and recreation, convenient for week ends. 1½ hours from Grand Central. Skating, Skiing and tobogganing.
HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 852

FOR A WINTER VACATION

Complete rest and rebuilding, in delightful country. Invigorating outdoor life. Winter Sports. Saddle horses.

Only 1½ hours from New York.

TOPSTONE FARM
IN THE CONNECTICUT HILLS
Write: R.F.D. 4, Ridgefield, Conn.
Telephone: Ridgefield 648

BEAUTIFUL country, hills, pinegroves, wonderful views; home-like atmosphere; finest food; skating and other sports; 1½ hours by Erie R. R. or route 17.

ZINDOREST PARK
Monroe, N. Y. Phone 122 F 3

UNITY HOUSE
FOREST PARK, PA.

Open all year. Modern accommodations

Skating on private mile and a half Lake. Tobogganing, Sleighing and Skiing on premises.

Make reservation—New York Office
Chelsea 2148 3 West 16th St.

Owned by International Ladies' Garment Workers Union. Operated on non-profit basis.

New!
HOTEL BELMONT
At the highest point of Lakewood, N.J.
Come!

Interesting People.
Delicious Food.
Most every room with bath.
REASONABLE RATES
Phone Lakewood 667
Weissberger H. H. Oxman

CAMP

CHILD Training Camp. Its director as character builder, known to many New Yorkers for the past 20 years. For more information, write 12 Pinehurst Ave., Apt. 3-F., N. Y.

☐ FOR RENT ☐

FURNISHED ROOMS

Manhattan Beach Hotel
Manhattan Beach, N. Y. C.

LIVE in a modern fireproof hotel by the seashore for less than in the crowded city—$9.00 per week and up for one; $12.00 per week for two. All hotel services included. Tennis and handball courts. 37 minutes from Times Square (B.M.T. Brighton Beach Station). Phone Sheepshead 3000.

YOUNG widow will share exquisitely furnished apartment with refined couple or two friends. One-half block from Cortelyou Station B.M.T. Every comfort and convenience of real home; plenty steam heat, constant hot water, excellent home of good taste. No other guests. $12.50 a week includes gas, telephone, electricity and full use of kitchen, dining and living-room. Buckminster 1725.

LARGE room, suitable one or two persons, cleanly kept, homelike atmosphere; elevator apartment house; rent reasonable. Sawyer, 115 W. 104th St., Apt. 25. Tel. Academy 9094.

ATTRACTIVE furnished room, business girl; kitchenette privileges. Private bath. Call evenings Spring 4087, also Sundays all day.

APARTMENTS TO SUBLET

4 ROOM apartment in Chelsea, accessible from any part of town, unobstructed air and sunlight, from 3 exposures. Kitchen with electric refrigeration. Sublet until Oct. $90. Will consider any offer. Watkins 3299.

TO sublet from Feb. 15th to Sept. 1st, attractive apartment, furnished, 2 rooms and kitchen, 4 large closets. Southern exposure. $150 a month. 6 E. 360 Central Park West.

2 WEST 86th ST.—Peter Stuyvesant Hotel, room and bath, Park view. March 1 to July 1. $100 per month. Would sell furniture. Room 1116.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

SOME congenial fellow will appreciate sharing my 3 room apartment. Quiet, cheerful atmosphere, located Washington Heights, corner 170th St. right off Riverside Drive. One-half hour Times Square. References necessary. Box 2302, % The Nation.

HOUSE WANTED

WANTED: in Berkshires, modernized furnished or semi-furnished homestead, preferably stone, in wooded tract with brook, 4 or more bedrooms. Desire rent from May 1 for year with option purchase. Box 2305, % The Nation.

THE TIME TO FIND YOUR SUMMER HOME IS GET RESULTS!

Call READERS' SERVICE
For information about our REAL ESTATE columns.
THE NATION, FITzroy 9074

☐ EDUCATIONAL ☐

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

PROGRAM—Feb. 14-22
AT COOPER UNION
8th Street and Astor Place at 8 o'clock.
Admission Free.

Friday, Feb. 14—DR. EVERETT DEAN MARTIN—

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF PROGRESS

"Psychological Factors in the Evolution of Industry. Is there an Instinct of Workmanship?"

ETHICS AND SOCIAL SCIENCE

Sunday, Feb. 16—Dr. Scott Buchanan—"Cassirer: Substance and Function."

NATURAL SCIENCE

Tuesday, Feb. 18—Dr. Gardner Murphy—"Childhood."

MUHLENBERG BRANCH LIBRARY

209 West 23rd St. at 8:30 o'clock.

Monday, Feb. 17—Mr. Nathaniel Peffer—China: A Civilization in Disintegration." "Coming of the West: Conquest and Attrition."

Wednesday, Feb. 19—Dr. John Bartlett Brebner—Literature as Social History—"The Myth of Chivalry."

Thursday, Feb. 20—Dr. E. G. Spaulding—The Ways and Means of Reasoning—"Reasoning in Mathematics: The Nature of Number, Infinity, Finiteness."

Saturday, Feb. 22—Dr. Richard McKeon—The Old and the New Logic—"The Absoluteness and Relativity of Truth."

Paths to World Unity and International Cooperation

PUBLIC LECTURES

under Joint Auspices

World Unity Foundation and Roerich Museum

February 26—"ECONOMICS"
REXFORD G. TUGWELL, Ph.D., Dept. of Economics, Columbia University

March 5—"SCIENCE"
CASSIUS J. KEYSER, Ph.D., Dept. of Mathematics, Columbia University

March 12—"RELIGION"
ALFRED W. MARTIN, M.A., Society for Ethical Culture, New York

March 19—"PHILOSOPHY"
JOHN HERMAN RANDALL, JR., Ph.D., Dept. of Philosophy, Columbia University

March 26—"EDUCATION"
HARRY A. OVERSTREET, B.A., Dept. of Philosophy, College of the City of New York

COURSE OF FIVE LECTURES, $3.00
SINGLE LECTURE, 75c

All lectures 8:30 P. M. in Auditorium of Roerich Museum

310 Riverside Drive, N. Y. C.

For prospectus and registration
Write: WORLD UNITY FOUNDATION
4 EAST 12TH ST., or the ROERICH MUSEUM

RESTAURANT

CAFE INTRO
249 EAST 13th St.—Close to 2nd Ave.
An eating place of distinction
—And a lot of it—
A quiet place for a rendezvous
Chess Conversation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1930 No. 3373

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 231

EDITORIALS:

Grave News from London 233
President Hoover's First Year 234
Facing Unemployment 235
Who's Obscene? 236
A Neighbor Returns 236
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 237
THE HUGHES REBELLION. By Paul Y. Anderson 238
MUST BANKS FAIL? By J. G. Curtis 239
THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE CENSOR: III. FREEDOM OF THE PRESS. By Henry Raymond Mussey 241
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 244
CORRESPONDENCE 244

BOOKS, MUSIC, DRAMA:

Mid-Voyage. By Isidor Schneider 246
Mr. Wilder Turns to Terence. By Henry Hazlitt 246
Brutalities Under Mussolini. By Hiram Motherwell 246
The Truth About Washington. By Claude G. Bowers 248
The Man Ibsen. By Lee M. Hollander 248
The Poetry of Léonie Adams. By Eda Lou Walton 249
Rabelais. By Eliseo Vivas 250
The Student Volunteer. By Walter Kien 252
Music: Four Moderns. By Hubbard Hutchinson 252
Drama. The Unruffled Mrs. Tyler 254
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 252

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Forced Labor in Liberia 256

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor
HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THAT WAS AN EXTRAORDINARY SPEECH which Philip Snowden, Chancellor of the Exchequer, made on February 9, especially directed at the American and Canadian radio audiences listening to him on that Sunday afternoon. After pointing out that the United States spends more for armaments than any other great Power—$879,000,000 annually—and Great Britain $175,000,000 more than in 1913, before the successful war to end war, he stressed the fact that, with the exception of Germany, every other great Power is spending more than before the war, with a total war expenditure for armaments of $4,500,000,000 a year. Already, he declared, Great Britain has spent some $50,000,000,000 on its part in that colossal tragedy without counting the loss of the productive power of the men killed and of those who were for four years withdrawn from industry. At the present rate, he said, it will take 140 years to liquidate the British war debt. Today England must raise for debt purposes "$5,000,000 every day, $200,000 every hour, $3,000 every minute." He added that "it takes the whole-time labor of 2,000,000 workers year in and year out to pay the annual cost of our debt burden." Add to this the present cost of armaments and pensions, and Great Britain has to provide $5,000 a minute for war purposes. Three-quarters of its taxes are spent in paying for past wars and preparing for future wars. Yet there are many people in England and the United States who believe that nations can have no other method of settling international disputes than by continuing to burn up their resources in wars.

THE SENATE never did a better job than when, on February 17, it struck straight at the monopoly of the Aluminum Company of America, the chief owner of which is our sanctimonious Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon. It is true that the action was made possible only by two votes, the roll call standing 41 to 39, but that was sufficient to reduce the present duty of 5 cents a pound on crude aluminum to 2 cents. Next the Senate voted without a roll call to lower the duty of 9 cents on aluminum bars, sheets, and coils to 3½ cents, and by a vote of 41 to 30 it restored the pre-war tariff of 25 per cent ad valorem on aluminum kitchen and household utensils. If these rates remain in the bill when it is finally passed the result will be felt in every household in America which uses aluminum ware. Every such family has been robbed for years merely because of the political influence of the chief owner of the trust. The aluminum duty was raised from 2 to 5 cents per pound in 1922, and the trust promptly raised the price of the metal 3 cents per pound to every American citizen, while bauxite and carborundum, materials used by the trust, were kept on the free list—so ardent a protectionist is Mr. Mellon when his own pocket is involved! The Senate made one mistake; it should have put the whole business on the free list.

PROHIBITION IS UNDER FIRE as never before, and the friends and enemies of the system are massing their forces for a fight the end of which is not yet. The first of the so-called Hoover "reforms," the transfer of the enforcement machinery from the Treasury Department to the Department of Justice, has been approved by the House of Representatives and seems likely to be accepted by the Senate. The Wickersham proposal for the virtual abolition of jury trial in certain classes of liquor cases has, however, awakened an imposing volume of protest, and Congress has thus far shown little interest in a step which many lawyers believe would be a direct violation of the Constitution. Hearings before the Judiciary Committee of the House, which began on February 12, have brought out a mass of testimony regarding the failure of the system, some of the most impressive statements and arguments being offered by representatives of national organizations of women who are opposed to prohibition and demand a popular referendum on the question. Meantime the newspapers carry columns of news of prohibition raids and wholesale arrests, the federal courts are swamped with prohibition cases, and prohibition agents and the Coast Guard go on shooting and being shot in support of the "noble experiment." Senators Wheeler and Norris have offered resolutions asking a Senate inquiry into the whole enforcement situation.

THE SUPER-PATRIOTIC D. A. R., self-constituted guardian of our liberties and detector of treason and heresy afar off, has again come in for drastic criticism from one of its members, the critic this time being no less a person than Dr. Valeria H. Parker of New York, honorary president of the National Council of Women and long prominent in work for better social hygiene. Dr. Parker, who frankly states that she has "not been in sympathy with organization policies for several years," has resigned her membership in the Hartford, Connecticut, chapter in a letter sharply arraigning the course of the National Board of Management. The circulation of lists of alleged disloyal individuals and organizations, "unwarranted charges" against the United States Children's Bureau, sponsorship of "men who have been publicly convicted of unethical activities" as advisers and public speakers, repression of opportunities for "frank expression of members," and "active support of extensive armament programs" are the principal points of Dr. Parker's indictment. Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart, president-general of the D. A. R., flippantly suggests that Dr. Parker may have "wanted publicity." She makes no bones of admitting that the D. A. R. is opposed to pacifism and wants "a sufficient force" to insure "adequate protection." She declares "we have got to keep this country for Americans."

WE PRINT ELSEWHERE A LETTER in regard to the proposal of Congressman Hamilton Fish, Jr., to enlarge the reservation at West Point by no less than seventeen hundred acres. Since our correspondent wrote to us, we understand, Mr. Fish has consented to strike from his plans the lands adjacent to the town of Cornwall and the Stillman forest. But that is not enough. The whole project should be abandoned, if only because it is another unhappy illustration of the way we are increasing our military establishment at the moment we are in a conference for the reduction of naval armaments and have given in the Kellogg pact our sacred word as a nation that we shall not engage in international warfare hereafter. The contention of the authorities at West Point is that the academy needs, beside more room for artillery practice, an additional water supply, especially as a new apartment house is being built to lodge seventy more officers. Instead of increasing the water supply West Point should cut down the cadet corps and the number of instructors, with the idea that it shall eventually become a great civilian school. West Point is one of the most heavily over-staffed colleges in the world. It is time to call a halt in teaching the art of man-killing.

A NEW YORK BOARD OF PAROLE entirely separate from the correctional department of the State and made a part of the executive department is the recommendation of Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt's special committee on the parole problem, the chairman of which is Sam A. Lewisohn. This board, which would replace the five different parole systems now obtaining in New York, would be freed from custodial duties, it would be able to devote its whole time, with the aid of a properly chosen and trained staff, to administering the parole system, and it would be in a position to assist the Governor in the matter of pardons. The committee has been guided in its recommendations, the details of which are set out at length in its report, by two principles: first, that while "discipline and authority must be maintained by the State under all circumstances in dealing with its prisoners," there is no necessary conflict "between the exercise of discipline and authority and humane and constructive treatment"; and, second, that, while good behavior and a desire for rehabilitation in the community should be recognized and compensated, "we should also vigorously refuse to be swayed by sentiment toward those who are unwilling to accept and abide by prison discipline and authority, or those who because of physical or mental disabilities would be unable on their release to adjust themselves to the requirements of society." The committee points out, however, that "laws, courts, prisons, executive clemency, parole, and readjustment" are all parts of a common program, and that they must work together if the crime problem is to be solved. The report is so sensible that it is hard to see how the Legislature can find fault with it.

A SURPLUS OF PRISONS and jails is the agreeable situation with which the British Home Secretary, J. R. Clynes, is confronted. With only half as many prisons now as there were a century ago, and with not fewer than twenty-seven closed since 1911, Mr. Clynes now proposes to close a number of others to prevent the supply from exceeding the demand. "We are able to pull down the prisons," he is quoted as saying, "partly because we have fewer wrongdoers and partly because we keep the people out of such places unless it is absolutely necessary." Slow-going Britain, which incidentally seems to be a stranger to the "third degree," sees crime and criminals on the wane, while alert and up-to-date America multiplies its criminal statutes, crowds its prisons and jails with offenders, and arrests suspected persons by the hundreds or thousands in spectacular raids. The other day County Judge McLaughlin of Brooklyn regretfully sentenced one Patsy Destasio, thirty-two years old and the father of five children, to a term of fifteen to sixteen years in Sing Sing for taking part in a theft of $180. Destasio was thirty-two years old instead of under thirty, and the notorious Baumes laws made a prison rather than a reformatory sentence mandatory. How long will it be before the United States ceases to multiply criminals by turning its back on humanity and common sense?

TWO WEEKS AGO we said that the victory of the Illinois mine workers' district officers in the State court against President John L. Lewis's attempt to put them out of office points to a possible new alignment in the labor-union world. But more than one court decision is necessary before possibility becomes actuality. Entirely aside from any legal questions that remain unsettled it is still possible that these sworn enemies will kiss and make up—such things have happened before in the United Mine Workers' Union—that the Illinois leaders will lack the capacity and idealism to take proper advantage of the situation, or that they will not keep the confidence of the rank and file. Certain reports which we have recently received seem to show that Lewis's charges against the Illinois leaders whom he tried to remove were not altogether baseless. Some of the acts of President Fischwick's administration in Illinois require a great deal of explaining to the rank and file. So, too, does the prominence of ex-President Farrington in the anti-Lewis movement after his three years of employment by a great coal company. Finally there is the hard fact that the Illinois administration by silence or open support gave aid and comfort to President Lewis in some of the very acts which its spokesmen now justly hold against him. To say this is not for a moment to whitewash John L. Lewis. Neither is it to deny that there is a real opportunity for progressive unionism in the break between him and the Illinois district. It is to call attention to the old, old story that in union as in civic politics it is not enough "to throw the rascals out."

A STRIKING TESTIMONY to the value of labor organization under intelligent leadership is contained in the news of the past week. On the one hand we have the successful outcome, under the mediation of Lieutenant-Governor Lehman, of the eight-day strike of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union in the New York dressmaking industry; on the other, the report of the Federal Council of Churches on conditions in the non-union steel industry. The conditions of settlement in the dress industry offer promise of stabilization, to the advantage at once of the workers, the employers, and the public. The jobbers are to confine their work to members of the contractors' association, who employ only union labor, thus putting an end to the inroads of the sweatshop and strengthening the competitive position of the inside manufacturers, who maintain the prize labor conditions of the industry. Compare the steel industry. For years it fiercely resisted all attempts to get rid of the twelve-hour day, finally yielding in 1923 only after terrific outside pressure. The Federal Council's report covers 155 plants employing more than 248,000 men in all. Of these men, 46.6 per cent are working eight hours a day, 44.6 per cent ten, 2.1 per cent eleven, and 6.7 per cent twelve hours. Only 20.6 per cent enjoy a week of five or five and a half days; 52.5 per cent work six days, and 26.9 per cent seven days a week. Four-fifths of them thus spend six or seven days a week at the furnace or in the mill, where common labor in a majority of cases gets from thirty-five to forty-five cents an hour, say twenty-seven dollars for a six-day sixty-hour week. Contrast these figures with the five-day, forty-hour week of the dressmakers, and the ordinary operators' scale of forty-four dollars.

FEW, INDEED, of those who see the current performances in New York of Mei Lan-fang, China's foremost actor, understand what the play is about or even what the acting intends to convey. But the fascination is there none the less. There is the evanescent, sensuous fascination of delicate rhythmic grace in carriage and gesture, and another fascination, largely mental, of being in the presence of a completely alien civilization. The conventions of Chinese drama and acting are so utterly different from ours that there is no standard whatever for comparison. The ancient plays which this company enacts are ritualistic developments of dance and rhetoric, rather than representations of action; meaning is conveyed rather by formal gesture than by histrionic imitation. But this only brings to mind that every art is conventional, even our supposed realism. To understand a foreign art, or a foreign civilization, it is first of all necessary to understand its conventions. If the China Institute of America, which is sponsoring Mei Lan-fang's tour, thereby reminds us that in dealing with the Oriental nations we must sympathetically familiarize ourselves with their standards, it will have accomplished its purpose.

Grave News From London

WE have carefully refrained from taking a pessimistic position about the outcome of the London conference in the belief that its proceedings were bound to be enveloped in a fog of rumor and gossip. We have been certain, too, that all sorts of trial balloons would be sent up, and statements made by the various conferees solely for bargaining purposes. We have not yet given up our belief that something worth while will result, but we admit to a great sinking of heart since the news came that the American delegation has advocated the immediate building of a $50,000,000 battleship in order to reach immediate parity. Trustworthy advices from London assure us that nothing has done so much to endanger the conference as this. A correspondent of the New York Times even went so far as to declare, on February 16, that all hope had been abandoned of any reduction whatever. Mr. Stimson gave up the abolition of the submarine before he began to fight for it. From Washington it is reported that the Hoover Administration is now hopeful, not of any cuts at this conference, but that the way will have been cleared to substantial reductions at the next naval conference now tentatively projected for 1935.

Should this really be the outcome of the London conference it will be a disaster for all humanity. For it will mean immediate embarking upon additional building programs by Italy, France, Japan, and the United States. In other words, the net result of a conference to reduce armaments will be that they increase! It will make the failure of the tri-partite Geneva effort to reduce armaments seem like a trifle. It will stamp the governments of the five leading Powers as hopelessly insincere, or hopelessly incompetent to solve the most vital problem of the day. The resignation of the Tardieu Government at this critical time offers further complications and excuses for delay.

As for Mr. Hoover, failure at London would be both a personal and a political calamity. We have reviewed in another column the first year of his Administration. The record proves that no President was ever in greater need of a success in foreign affairs than is Mr. Hoover at just this juncture. If his delegates come back with nothing but the hope that five years from now the same group of men or their successors will really set about the business of reduction, he and they will be merely a laughing-stock, fit subjects for the sneers of the cynics and the bitter upbraiding of those who seek to ground the world's arms.

Mr. Hoover has returned to the White House which he should never have quitted in these critical days. He should hear from the country as he has just heard from that rock-ribbed election district in Massachusetts, which for the first time has given a majority to a Democratic candidate for Congress. We hope that not only he, but our delegation in London will learn through letters and telegrams from people the country over that this nation desires prompt reduction; that it takes no pride and has only shame in the fact that the United States now spends more upon its armaments than any other country in the world. This is no time for hesitation or delay.

President Hoover's First Year

MR. HOOVER'S first twelve months are drawing to a close, with many storm clouds upon the horizon. Some questions are inevitable. What achievements has he to show for the first year of his Administration? What quality of leadership has he developed? What are the prospects for the remainder of his term? What constructive acts have been recorded for the advancement of the country and its extrication from the economic difficulties in which it flounders? How does he stand before the American people?

These queries are the more vital because of the peculiar situation in which the President finds himself at this moment. The London disarmament conference is under way—in the doldrums, with its delegates apparently forgetting, in their desire for one more modern battleship, President Hoover's words that "it only remains for the others to say how low they will go. It cannot be too low for us." At home the tariff debate drags its weary, wounded length along in the eighth month of its exhibition of incredible sectional selfishness and economic error. Throughout the country the industrial depression continues and the roll of the unemployed lengthens. The prohibition debate waxes louder and, if anything, becomes more futile. On top of all this Mr. Hoover has received the news that in the only clear-cut contest for the House of Representatives since his accession Mr. Coolidge's own rock-ribbed Republican district went Democratic for the first time in its history by a majority of 6,421 votes. Almost at the same time the President's nominee for Chief Justice, Charles E. Hughes, was confirmed only by a vote of 52 to 26, with the nominee permanently branded by some of the best lawyers in the Senate as unworthy to be Chief Justice by reason of his past services to the big corporations and his complete conservatism in all conflicts between property and personal rights.

Upon this record no President could look back with satisfaction, even though he might be able to shoulder a considerable part of the responsibility upon the Congress, notably in the matter of the tariff. Even as to that, however, Mr. Hoover cannot avoid all responsibility. Here as in all his dealings with Congress he has shown complete ineptitude. Had he been familiar with our tariff history he must have realized when he gave to Senator Borah his campaign pledge to submit the tariff to the tender mercies of the special session that it meant months and months of discussion and conflict with the outcome extremely dubious. At no time has he been able to induce the Congress, despite his enormous majority in the House and his titular majority in the Senate, to pay any attention to his wishes; his frantic demand in November last that the tariff revision be concluded before the ending of the special session fell upon deaf ears. So far there is not the slightest prospect, as has just been attested by the protest of the federation of farmers' organizations, that the farmer will profit by the bill which will eventually be enacted; nor is it certain that Congress will honor his request for the establishment of the pernicious system of American valuation of imported products now subject to ad valorem customs duty, instead of valuing them according to the foreign statements of their value. One achievement of some worth remains to his credit in this connection. At his behest Congress voted a Federal Farm Board and appropriated for it the sum of $500,000,000 to be used as a revolving fund to encourage cooperative marketing and otherwise advance the interests of the farmer. To this board Mr. Hoover made excellent appointments.

For the rest, Congress also disregarded the President's demand for the repeal of the National Origins Immigration law, precisely as the Senate revolted in May and adopted the debenture proposal for the relief of the farmers. On the other hand, it gave him his commission on law observance and enforcement and that for the study of conditions in Haiti. Among his own most commendable acts was the establishment of publicity for tax refunds larger than $20,000, in which case he overruled his own Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, and his own predecessor, Calvin Coolidge. Again, he wisely withdrew all oil lands from leasing save where such leases had been made mandatory by the Congress. On the other hand, his proposal that the United States turn back to the several States 190,000,000 acres of public lands, which had never belonged to them, to be managed and later sold has thus far fortunately fallen upon deaf ears. His admirable appointments to the Indian Bureau and to certain other offices seem to us to have been more than offset by bad judicial appointments and by his selection of business men without previous experience for the highest diplomatic posts in Europe. He has much improved the relations of the President to the press by abolishing the subterfuge of the unofficial spokesman of Calvin Coolidge, returning to the historic policy of issuing statements in his own name, and accepting responsibility therefor. Finally, in the field of foreign affairs he has yet to lay before Congress his proposal that this country enter the World Court on the modified terms accepted by the signatories thereto, and he has most commendably declared that he does not wish this country represented by marines abroad, notably in Haiti, where he has taken the first step, through the appointment of his commission, toward our withdrawal.

The fact is that Mr. Hoover has not added a cubit to his stature as a leader or as a statesman. He has not only been entirely destitute of the necessary skill and persuasion to obtain a worth-while legislative program; he continues to be amazingly inept in his relations with other public men—witness the few real friends he has in Congress, and the unseemly haste with which he appointed Mr. Hughes Chief Justice the minute that Mr. Taft's resignation reached him, dismissing Mr. Taft with a brief and utterly inadequate letter. Here lies his greatest weakness and his greatest danger. It is not difficult to be a departmental head and to achieve much by constant conferences. No President can carry on in that way. Commissions may help him to share the labor of getting at the facts, but in the end the President himself must bear the responsibility and be courageous and forthright in declaring his policies and defending them. If the Massachusetts election is anything of a guide it is apparent that the public is strongly of this opinion.

Facing Unemployment

THE people of the country have a right to know the facts about unemployment, and the public authorities have a duty to set forth the situation, as far as they can learn it, exactly as it is. A strange theory, however, has developed during recent months that it is the duty of such officers to make business good by giving out cheerful statements and thus inducing everybody to keep on buying and producing. This practice is bad morals and bad logic; its results are bound in time to be disastrous.

Secretary of Labor James J. Davis, with at least the passive connivance of President Hoover, is now engaged in an effort to persuade the country that all is well in the business and labor world, with the hope that then all will be well. We have questioned his outgivings on unemployment. It is time for a forthright statement of facts about them, in order that his political performances may not mislead the people and at the same time discredit the careful work of conscientious statisticians in the labor departments of the federal and State governments. These public servants have been making some progress in the collection and reporting of employment facts, and we are unwilling to see public confidence in their important work jeopardized in order to make ballyhoo for business.

Since 1915 the federal Bureau of Labor Statistics, utilizing partly returns which it collects directly and partly figures placed at its disposal by the labor departments of cooperating States, has presented each month a useful report on employment and unemployment. Several important industrial States also have collected and published their own figures. Some of these series, notably that patiently built up by the Bureau of Statistics and Information of the New York State Department of Labor, have become the most reliable current sources of information on the labor market, and much of the value of the federal figures is due to the cooperation of the State bureaus. A committee of the American Statistical Association, under the chairmanship of Miss Mary Van Kleeck, has for years been at work helping to improve the technique of such reporting; for there are almost insuperable difficulties in building up and maintaining prompt and accurate reports of employment conditions.

In the early winter, with the desire to speed up things, the President asked weekly, instead of monthly, reports from the Bureau of Labor Statistics. That unfortunate organization, caught by the demand for quick action, without notifying the cooperating State agencies or asking their aid sent to its reporting firms all over the country a request for weekly instead of monthly reports for a temporary period of possibly three months. This threw the whole situation into confusion and apparently buried the bureau under a mountain of reports that it could not handle properly and that had no great value if it could, as there was no real basis for comparison and as weekly fluctuations have little significance anyway. It was an admirable example of how not to monkey with a delicate machine of this kind, but apparently the Bureau of Labor Statistics had no option.

Then what happened? As we later learn, the figures for December 23, however little they were worth, indicated a decrease in employment of 1.5 per cent from December 16, and those for December 30 a further drop of 4.7 per cent. Secretary Davis's mouth was tight shut. But when the next week indicated an upward movement of 3.4 per cent and January 13 of 3.3 per cent more, the President rushed to the country with the statement that the tide had turned and that business was definitely on the upgrade. We will not characterize that statement of January 22 or the further weekly statements of the President and his Secretary of Labor. We will only say that Secretary Davis's radio speech of February 13 was distinctly misleading, though only the informed expert will be able to put his finger specifically on its indefensible features. The federal bureau's own monthly figure for January, just released, shows a decrease from December of 1.8 per cent in employment in manufactures, and 2.6 per cent for all industries.

Of one thing we are certain. With the authenticated New York figures for January showing a 2 per cent drop in employment from December, and actually standing at the lowest point in their fifteen years' history except for three months in 1921, with relief societies showing an 80 per cent increase over last year in families in distress because of unemployment, with Philadelphia clergymen urging householders to have spring work done now in order to help relieve the great numbers of the unemployed, with as sober and conservative a man as R. Fulton Cutting advocating an unemployment dole in New York City, with unemployed men rioting in Philadelphia and Cleveland, with a political revolution, due to acute industrial distress, effected in ex-President Coolidge's own Congressional district, and, more significant in its sober reality than all the other indications put together, with the economists of the country now day in and day out seriously discussing a permanent problem of "technological unemployment" involving literally millions of men—with all this staring us in the face we know that we confront a situation not adequately to be met by "optimistic ballyhoo." It is no problem of this winter or next. The unemployment situation calls for a constructive program. No answer comes out of Washington.

Inheritor and willing beneficiary of an evil tradition of government by prosperity bluff, developer of a theory of business Couéism that puts moral props under almost any form of public deceit provided only it be cheerful, the Hoover Administration faces a condition that threatens not to be wholly amenable to treatment by such means. We commend to Secretary Davis and his chief the benefits of a period of repentance, fasting, and prayer, followed by an absolutely honest attempt to learn and make public the facts, with that followed in turn by a further honest attempt to develop a genuine national program to cope with the steadily mounting dangers of unemployment. Many of the materials lie ready to hand in the findings of the President's Conference on Unemployment of 1921, the program of the American Association for Labor Legislation, the record of the experience of foreign nations, and the experiments of progressive American employers. Has Mr. Hoover the statesmanship to formulate a program?

Who's Obscene?

D. H. LAWRENCE'S pamphlet "Pornography and Obscenity"* is, as we might expect, a remarkable document, full of power and passion. That it offers a clear solution of a practical problem is more dubious. Mr. Lawrence is denouncing the British and American censorships and deriding their conception of pornography. Why do we dislike pornography? he asks. Because it arouses sexual feelings? He can only dismiss such a reason as canting hypocrisy. "Half the great poems, pictures, music, stories of the whole world are great by virtue of the beauty of their sex appeal."

We expect Mr. Lawrence, after that, to condemn all censorship. But he does not. "Even I," he continues, "would censor genuine pornography, rigorously." Ah, but what is "genuine" pornography? To Mr. Lawrence the answer seems simple. "In the first place, genuine pornography is almost always underworld, it does not come into the open." And again: "The whole question of pornography seems to me a question of secrecy. Without secrecy there would be no pornography." Now this criterion clearly seems to us to put the cart before the horse. Without a concept of pornography already existing in law or in public opinion, there would be no secrecy, because there would be no need for it. Mr. Lawrence's second criterion of pornography is far sounder. "You can recognize it by the insult it offers, invariably, to sex and to the human spirit . . . the insult to the human body, the insult to a vital human relationship . . . [its] disgusting attitude toward sex, a disgusting contempt of it."

Yet no matter how much one may sympathize with this definition, one dreads to think what would happen if everything to which it applied were to be censored as we now censor the outspoken attitude toward sex. In Mr. Lawrence's opinion, for example, "Jane Eyre" and Wagner's "Tristan" are much nearer to pornography than is Boccaccio, while "the most obscene painting on a Greek vase . . . is not as pornographical as the close-up kisses on a film."

If the official censors, by a complete reversal of their customary attitude, were to make Mr. Lawrence's tests of pornography their own, they would be obliged to suppress perhaps the majority of all existing novels and plays. The enterprise seems a bit staggering; it is certain that Mr. Lawrence's censorship would prove a great deal more oppressive and disconcerting to the general public than that at present in existence. We suggest that Mr. Lawrence agree to tolerate the sly smirker's, the peeper's, and the censor's attitude toward sex as a "dirty little secret" if the censor, in his turn, will tolerate Mr. Lawrence's attitude of coming out "quite simply and naturally into the open with it." Mr. Lawrence would win his real point in the end. For the effect of abolishing censorship completely, of permitting sex to be treated with entire candor, of allowing spades to be called spades, would ultimately be to demolish the notion, held by the Watch and Ward Society, by Senator Smoot, by the censor always and everywhere, that the natural processes of the human body and the means by which the race propagates itself are essentially shameful and degrading.

---

*Alfred A. Knopf. New York. $1.

A Neighbor Returns

WHEN the Neighborhood Playhouse, after twelve years of fruitful activity, closed its doors in 1927, announcing that it needed time and leisure to think about itself and its future, there were many in New York who genuinely mourned its passing. Now, fifteen years old and refreshed by contemplation and unobtrusive work, the group that flourishes through the generosity and under the accomplished direction of Alice and Irene Lewisohn issues a most promising report of its plans.

The little theater on Grand Street, often enough filled to overflowing by eager and delighted audiences, was not of sufficient seating capacity to make possible any real financial success. What the group needs now, therefore, is a new theater. Plans for the building include not only a theater suitable for the production and presentation of all forms of drama, but galleries for exhibits related to the theater, studios for classes in the various related arts, and living quarters for workers. Thus the old idea of a center where dramatic art could be nourished intelligently and tenderly is to be carried out in the new venture. Moreover, the company plans to continue its school of the theater and to establish a road company.

All this is cheerful news. It is a strange paradox that in the city where more than 90 per cent of all plays produced in this country are either first or exclusively seen, a small theater in a neighborhood which it was almost impossible to reach with any comfort, a theater whose benches were of hard, uncompromising wood, whose stage offered no opportunities for any but the simplest sets, should have made a mark as significant and memorable as any single dramatic group in our history. Broadway managers whose theaters are half empty night after night might well pause and consider for a moment the Neighborhood Playhouse on Grand Street. The plays were, for the most part, frankly "highbrow." There were no fancy-priced seats; there were, with due respect to the pulchritude of the young ladies of Grand Street, no Ziegfeld choruses; there were no dazzling costumes or equally dazzling lack of costume. It is true that once a year the young people at the Neighborhood Playhouse turned themselves loose, in the "Grand Street Follies," in a huge horse laugh at Broadway. But the annual "Follies" does not explain the succès d'estime of Grand Street. There is really only one plausible explanation, which is that the New York theater public really prefers good plays to bad.

Nor was the Neighborhood Playhouse the sole exemplar of this interesting fact. Eva Le Gallienne, with her comfortably successful Civic Repertory Theater, proves it nightly. The Theater Guild, in spite of several indifferent plays in a row, can point to the same reason for its success. A season or so ago Shakespeare in modern dress found audiences eager for more. Why does not an enterprising producer introduce a repertory of Shakespearean plays given in this manner? Above all, why not a regularly repeated repertory of Gilbert and Sullivan operas? "Iolanthe" and "The Mikado" were played successfully in New York a while ago. Add to these "Patience," "The Gondoliers," "Ruddigore," give them bright scenery and a dashing Broadway ensemble—and see if the money does not come rolling in!

It Seems to Heywood Broun

WHEN Ralph Pulitzer resigned recently as president of the Press Publishing Company there came to an end an interesting chapter in the history of the New York World. It also marked the culmination of a gallant though ineffectual struggle on the part of an individual against the authority of a dead hand. Joseph Pulitzer had been dead a good many years when I worked on the World, but his was an ever-present spirit. There remained on the staff and in the editorial offices some few of his old associates, but it was not solely their presence which kept the founder's memory alive. The shop was haunted, as often happens in any place where a great personality has paused and then passed by. In almost any time of crisis somebody on the paper said: "Now, what would J. P. have done in similar circumstances?"

And even if no one said it the thought was operative. Far from being an advantage, this continuing ancestor worship constituted a blight. You cannot run today's newspaper by assuming what some dead man would have done if he still walked the earth. In fact I have always felt that the integrity of American political leadership will always be impaired as long as present problems are evaluated in the light of Washington's Farewell Address. The masthead of the World's editorial page contains a paragraph written by Joseph Pulitzer in 1883 in which the World is identified as a paper "that should always fight for progress and reform." The business of looking back across a gulf of forty years is not generally conducive to progress.

Curiously enough, the task of continuing the Pulitzer tradition was intrusted to a man who had little in common with his father. The force, the drive, the vitality which animated Joseph Pulitzer were never in his eldest son Ralph. But at the outset I might as well pick my side in this duel between the living man and the dead hand. I was and am for Ralph Pulitzer. The paper's peak during his period of control constituted a higher journalistic achievement than it had ever known in his father's day. Though the younger Pulitzer lacked the founder's force he did bring to the job a far more sensitized intelligence. He brought the paper up out of the field of cheap sensationalism into which Joseph Pulitzer plunged it back in the days of the duel with Hearst. And so, though he may have plunged it at last into the red, he did remove it from the yellow.

The World has seemed to me the most interesting morning paper in America. It did not ever cover the whole field of human events with the tenacity of the Times. But the Times is so complete a journal of record that one almost suspects that it is published for the sake of posterity. If papers may be personified, the Times reminds me of a man who meets your casual greeting of "How are you?" with a detaining forefinger and a well-documented history. At the very least, one may say for the World that it kept a waste basket around the place.

To be sure, the light of the World came in large part from personalities other than that of the publisher. Both Cobb and Swope colored it greatly in their day, but I trust that everyone will agree that an executive should reap some of the credit for the work done by subordinates whom he suffers or chooses. Ralph Pulitzer himself was always somewhat miscast. The fact of being dedicated to the task of honoring his father's memory must have been irksome at moments. And my guess is that these time periods were even longer. Indeed, had the younger man succeeded beyond the wildest dreams he would have shown up the fallacy of the judgment of Joseph Pulitzer. By the terms of the will the founder had said in effect that Ralph Pulitzer was not good enough to carry on the tradition. Upon Joseph, Junior, he had set the same verdict.

It was a curious document. In it the senior Pulitzer left the majority interest to his youngest son Herbert. Both Ralph and Joseph had entered newspaper work before their father's death. These two had been tried. One almost is tempted to say under his eye, for the blindness of the editor never blocked him from close contact with his paper. The result of this scrutiny of sons was the conviction that he must look elsewhere. Herbert was still a boy. He was the unknown quantity. It was on him that Joseph Pulitzer chose to gamble. It is too early yet to tell how the wager will come out. Herbert Pulitzer has been in charge of the Evening World for some little time and the paper has hardly seemed distinguished. But then it never was. The afternoon edition in recent years has done much better financially, but it has never approached the morning World in the matter of prestige.

In one respect the old man was quite right. For better or worse his son Ralph would never be the same sort of newspaper man as his father. In the first place, he was never authentically a liberal. Of course, the word requires a certain amount of definition. Surely one does not become a liberal merely by hating sham and fraud and corruption. I mean that Ralph Pulitzer had no passion for political or economic experimentation. Even in the arts his admiration was enlisted chiefly for the classic models. The new frankness that developed in the theater and in the novel found him not only abashed but indignant.

His interest was not that of his father, in man in the mass. He gave his greatest attention to the littler things in the paper. I believe that he took great pride in the page which lies opposite the editorials. Here F. P. A., Deems Taylor, Frank Sullivan, Stallings, Bolitho, Woollcott, and one or two others have flourished. This was highbrow journalism. Joseph Pulitzer would not have been interested. I doubt if he would have endured it. The most frequent criticism was that such stuff made the World a daily magazine rather than a newspaper. More accurately it might have been termed an attempt to elevate opinion to the dignity and importance of news. This may be heresy, but I'm for it, perhaps even more strongly than Ralph Pulitzer. No event is ever so important as its repercussions. On the face of things, the sort of journalism which Ralph Pulitzer had to offer seems not at the moment successful. I think I am very well aware of many imperfections in the man and in the method. And yet in all sincerity I cannot say other than "Good try!"

HEYWOOD BROUN

The Hughes Rebellion

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, February 13

IT is difficult, in this reporter's opinion, to overestimate the historical significance of the furious fight waged in the Senate against the confirmation of Charles Evans Hughes as Chief Justice of the United States. The limberness of conviction, the absence of a proper pride, which in recent years have allowed Mr. Hughes to hire himself out along both sides of the street to whoever could pay his price, were objections grave enough to explain the terrific opposition to placing him at the head of the Supreme Court. But something vastly more important than the individual character and fate of Mr. Hughes was involved. The fight on him resolved itself with dramatic swiftness into a protest against the social philosophy embodied in the present majority of the Supreme Court itself. It became a popular uprising against the practice aptly described by Senator Dill as "writing into the law of the land economic doctrines that enable organized wealth to pick the pockets of the people under the guise of protecting its constitutional rights." It was a revolt against that "legal legerdemain" whereby the court sets up billions of dollars in fictitious values, and then requires the public to pay profits on them. It revealed how deep and widespread is the loss of confidence in the justice and impartiality of the court's decrees. There was another element in this historic rebellion—the resentment of Congress against the continued usurpation of legislative powers by the court. Remembering the occasions on which the court had assumed to judge the "reasonableness" of statutes, more than one conservative lawyer in the Senate joined the protest as one way of protecting the Constitution against its supposed defenders. Whether the event will have a large salutary effect, may be conjectured. I have been told that the court exists in a vacuum, deaf to all but the facts at issue, and blind to all except the Constitution. Seeing them, hearing them, observing their respective backgrounds, and speculating on their various blood pressures, I have been tempted to doubt this sacred dogma. From the public's standpoint I suspect the Senate debate has done no harm.

* * * * *

AS for Mr. Hughes, unless he has the hide of a two-horned rhinoceros, he will enter upon his duties in a more chastened spirit than he has yet disclosed. Twenty-six Senators publicly pronounced him unfit, and their verdict was echoed privately by a dozen others who gave him their votes under pressure of expediency, political and otherwise. He resumes his robe under the charge of having dragged it in the slime of politics. As he takes his oath to "do justice to the poor and the rich," as he ascends the bench before which he has so often pleaded the case of the corporations against the people, and as he proceeds to render judgment on questions which he has already judged for pay, he must know that millions of his countrymen regard the performance as a mockery. He knows that the only thing which saved him from humiliating rejection was the power of a disreputable political machine—that he owes his high office to the preponderance of Grundys, Binghams, Watsons, and Smoots in the Senate—that the members whose confidence and respect an upright man would naturally covet most were virtually all against him. If he has any capacity for humility, it must surely be extended by reading the principal defense offered in his behalf. Uttered in various forms, it always boiled down to this: that the constitutional views advanced by him at various times before the Supreme Court were not to be taken seriously, because he had been paid to advance them, and it was highly doubtful that he actually believed in them. What a defense for a man of Mr. Hughes's supposed standing!

* * * * *

FOR inaugurating and leading what originally appeared to be this perfectly forlorn hope, the country is indebted, as usual, to Senator Norris, of Nebraska. When he arose on Monday to report the nomination from the Judiciary Committee and to read a brief statement recording his personal objection to it, not another man in the chamber was willing to join him openly in opposing confirmation. An irresponsible objection from the erratic Senator Blease, of South Carolina, delayed consideration until the following day. Next morning, when the Senate discovered the reaction to Norris's statement, the timid took courage, and the bashful became bold. Borah's magnificent indictment of Hughes's record, and his masterful identification of Hughes's point of view with the majority view of the Court, followed by a ringing denunciation of Hughes's "lack of sensibility" by Carter Glass, of Virginia, were enough to set off the fireworks. Seldom in recent years has the Senate afforded so tense and dramatic a spectacle. Probably not since the Grant administration have the acts of the Supreme Court been subjected in Congress to such savage assaults. Old Guard leaders who three days earlier had openly invited a fight in the belief that the result would discredit those making it hastily began checking up on the votes. New wobblers popped up suddenly, and old ones wobbled with new violence. One such, from a Southern State, approached his braver colleague and emphasized the awkwardness of his own predicament by pointing out that "Mr. Hughes is one of the leading Baptists of the country." "Are we voting for Chief Justice or Moderator?" was the scathing retort. Partisanship in the press gallery attained a stage unequaled in my experience. Usually the boys are fairly cynical about such matters, and those that aren't pretend to be. But smug self-righteousness, especially when attended by the suspicion of hypocrisy, has a singular power to antagonize people of all political beliefs, and few men are better known to the Washington correspondents than Mr. Hughes. Among some fifty or sixty that were actively engaged on the story, I know of only three who wished to see him confirmed. The mass antagonism of the others was so manifest that Senators noticed and inquired about it, and one of the devoted three registered his indignant protest—with raucous and ribald results. The whole affair has been edifying and wholesome. Once more the country may thank God and the enlightened Senate minority.

ON previous occasions I have hinted in this place that there were interesting disclosures to be made concerning the activities of Claudius H. Huston, national chairman of the Republican Party by the grace and influence of his personal friend, Mr. Hoover. Now it can be told, at least in part. It has been disclosed by the Senate Lobby Investigating Committee that just prior to accepting the Republican chairmanship, Mr. Huston busied himself in an effort to obtain the Muscle Shoals plant for the American Cyanamid Company, one of the two great corporations that for years have been snatching at that government property. It is said in Mr. Hoover's behalf that he was unaware of this activity when he selected his friend to direct the party organization, and it is declared in Huston's behalf that he discontinued it after his selection. On the other hand, it is a fact that Mr. Hoover was informed of the circumstances, and had an opportunity to secure Huston's resignation before the public disclosure, and did not do so. As to whether Huston doffed the garment of a lobbyist when he donned that of national chairman, the committee manifests a healthy appetite for information. It might even look into the sudden departure of James Francis Burke from his unofficial status at the White House several months ago!

* * * * *

SUCH distressing incidents as that involving Mr. Huston may or may not have inspired the Republican National Committee's determination to hire itself a press agent of proved worth in the person of Mr. James L. West, a veteran member of the Washington bureau of the Associated Press. Among those who are familiar with Mr. West's work in reporting the Hoover campaign, and subsequently in covering events at the White House, for the hundreds of newspapers subscribing to that great and wholly impartial news-gathering organization, there exists no doubt as to his willingness and ability to serve the Administration well. But there is considerable doubt as to the wisdom or tact involved in choosing him. For one thing, he now becomes an admitted partisan, and hence is suspect. There are some, like myself, who believe that the innocent and sincere admiration of the Associated Press reporter assigned to the White House would be more valuable to the Administration than the services of a paid press agent. Moreover, the incident leaves an unpleasant taste because of others which preceded it. In the midst of the oil scandal, the chief of the Senate bureau of the Associated Press resigned to enter the employment of Harry Sinclair. Later the superintendent of the Washington bureau departed to join the Van Sweringen organization, which had weighty matters pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Thus far, no word on this subject has come from the chaste Frank B. Noyes, editor of the Washington Star and president of the Associated Press, but he is about the only member of the profession here who has not expressed an opinion. Most likely it will prove to be beneath his dignity.

Must Banks Fail?[*]

By J. G. CURTIS

> In an unusually quiet way, taking the importance of the happening into consideration, the news spread through the community Monday morning that the doors of the ——— State Bank were to open no more for business. Small gatherings on the street corners discussed the event all during the day, but no demonstrations were made. . . .
>
> Organized over fifty years ago, this bank was one of the oldest in this part of the country. It has had the utmost confidence of the people of the community for many years, and experienced a steady growth until lately, following the accumulation of a number of farms taken as security for previously made loans.
>
> Assessments against the stockholders have been made regularly for seven years, according to Mr. Blackmore, president of the bank. Further assessments following the closing of the bank will amount to $25,000, the bank's capital stock, bringing the total loss to the stockholders to approximately $75,000.

THE foregoing obituary of one of the five thousand banks that have failed in this prosperous country during the past nine years is taken from the weekly newspaper published in a village of the Middle West. The stockholders who lost the $75,000 were a few farmers and a country-town merchant or two. The depositors, whose loss will be small, were their neighbors.

In 1928, the year in which this failure occurred, 491 other banks in the United States failed, their total deposits amounting to $140,000,000. In 1929 the record was still worse: in the first nine months the number of bank failures exceeded the total for 1928, and the indications are that the total of deposits involved in bank suspensions during 1929 will exceed $225,000,000, an increase of more than 60 per cent over the total for 1928. This state of affairs is all the more disturbing when it is pointed out that there were fewer commercial failures in 1929 than in 1928. Ten years ago there were a few more than 31,000 banks in the United States. Today there are a few less than 25,000. Roughly one-fifth of the banks in the country have failed since 1920—and they are still failing.

These suspensions—if "failure" is too inexact and harsh a word—have occurred chiefly in agricultural sections—in Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, Georgia, and Florida. In some of these States almost half the banks have closed. The failures are therefore endemic. More than 60 per cent of the banks were of the same size as the ——— State. More than 60 per cent of them were in villages like ———, with a population of a thousand people or so. More than 60 per cent—probably 90 per cent—involved losses principally to farmers, country-town merchants, and such persons of small means. On the Pacific Coast, where banking has become more highly organized than elsewhere, and on the Atlantic Coast, where banking, though less highly organized, is supported by greater capital accumulation in the general community, the number of bank failures has been, by comparison, almost negligible.

---

[*] The House Committee on Banking is now considering legislation authorizing branch banking by national banks. The frequency of bank failures lends special interest to this question at this time. A second article on branch banking by the same author will appear in an early issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.

It is not enough, therefore, to attribute the bank failures of the Middle West to the agricultural depression and let it go at that, for the agricultural depression was not confined to the Middle West. It is more sensible to say that the agricultural depression might have been far less severe in the Middle West had the banking business as a whole been as strong there as elsewhere in the United States. It is more sensible because it indicates a means of farm relief more practical than export debentures and federal farm loans, and far easier to achieve than cooperative marketing, though not of such final importance. These thousands of small banks—three thousand of them with only $25,000 capital apiece—instead of lending strength to their customers shared their weakness. They had neither the means nor the inclination to act collectively in any constructive program. They were not even able to save themselves as the metropolitan banks have been able to do under somewhat similar circumstances. The speculative increase in security values during 1928 and 1929 was unrelated to the earnings of business, just as the speculative increase in farm-land values before and during the war was wholly unrelated to the profits of farming.

In both cases the speculative increases depended very largely on bank credit, because people borrowed against their apparent wealth; in both cases the time came when the debts had to be paid. In the case of stock-market speculation, the loss fell upon a community comparatively well able to stand it; the losses in farm speculation, on the other hand, fell upon a class of people unable to afford it. Great city banks, holding the funds of balanced and diversified economic activity over wide areas, supported by membership in the Federal Reserve system, and managed by persons of greater experience, even if not necessarily more intelligent, were able to endure the exigencies of liquidation. One would expect them to be. Country banks, on the other hand, owned by farmers and country store-keepers—people with all their eggs in one basket, and without more than local experience—were swamped when analogous exigencies closed in on them. One would expect them to be. They had gone into business without adequate strength to meet its risks, and, what is more important, in an agricultural region where risks are, in the nature of things, especially great.

These failures, themselves the result of agricultural depression, have had the direct effect of making the depression still worse. The sum of $1,500,000,000 which, according to the Comptroller of the Currency, has been tied up in them is of course chiefly agricultural money. While not all of it is permanently gone, its withdrawal through insolvency at the time it was needed most was almost as bad as outright loss. In a way, the funds of the Federal Farm Board make up that loss, though not directly, for they should properly be used not for relief but for cure—for the removal, that is, of the primary hindrance to recovery, which is uncoordinated, individualistic farming practices. But a related secondary hindrance to recovery is to be found in uncoordinated, individualistic banking practices, and a cure for them lies in the realistic and constructive suggestions for banking reform offered to Congress by the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. J. W. Pole, and favored by Mr. Louis T. McFadden, chairman of the House Committee on Banking. Branch banking within cities is common; statewide branch banking is permitted in several States, but is common in few except California. The comptroller's recommendation, which in substance has been advocated for years by professional authorities, is for legalization of regional branch banking, i.e., the extension over wide areas of strong banking systems in place of the thousands of independent units which are now in operation.

Naturally, this proposal arouses the opposition of some thousands of bankers who a few years ago were trying to prevent establishment of the "socialistic" Federal Reserve system. It has the more jealous hostility of State banking departments, whose spokesman, Mr. Peter G. Cameron, is banking superintendent of the high and mighty State of Pennsylvania. It has the opposition of a former comptroller, Mr. Henry M. Dawes, of the Chicago Daweses, who holds the theory that it is better after all for little banks to fail than for big ones. It has the long-winded opposition of that sanctimonious guardian of "popular liberties," the Commercial and Financial Chronicle, which sees in branch banking a "menace" to the "constitutional right to engage in business for profit and accumulation." It has also, unfortunately, the opposition of a great many intelligent people without technical knowledge of banking, whose opinions about it are for that very reason influenced by the conventional and undiscriminating fear of anything big in business.

The implications of the comptroller's plan for regional branch banking are numerous; that it would prevent for the future such an aggravation of disaster as the failure of almost half the banks in the farm region is the point relevant to this discussion. The fact that the farmers do not realize this does not affect the merit of the plan. In this country, branch banking has always been regarded by students of finance as an indispensable condition of safety and serviceableness. In the rest of the world it has been taken for granted as a feature of banking so invariable that it required no comment. It is its absence here and not its advent that should arouse attention.

Ghosts

By WITTER BYNNER

Between courses at a dinner, he suddenly leaves
To remember and wonder how many moons ago
Those dinners happened that ghosts are attending.
He grieves,
Because the new persons whom he chooses to know
Never knew these others and might not have liked the dead.
There are new smiles now, new responses to his quips.
And yet there are intervals when, having said
His dinner-table say, he hears dead lips.
The dead have ways of mingling in the uses
Of the life they leave behind them. They can rise
When a dinner is over. One of them refuses
To be gone. One of them looks at him with eyes
From farther away than any rain can reach,
Leaving him only motion, only speech.

The Christian Science Censor
III. Freedom of the Press*

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

CONSTANT dropping wears away the stone. The committees on publication and the loyal members of the Christian Science Church, in whatever nook and corner of the country they may be, are forever on the job. Their zeal, earnestness, and discipline create the impression of large numbers, and consequently bring prompt results in newspaper, radio, and legislative fields. I report largely in the words of the committees on publication themselves, as published in the Christian Science Sentinel.

Starting at the top, the committees are carefully handpicked all the way down. To give a single example, John M. Dean, First Reader of the church in Memphis, was appointed Committee on Publication for Tennessee for the year beginning October 1, 1923. Mr. Dean was not considered sufficiently "loyal," and his appointment was vetoed by the Board of Directors in Boston. The (local) assistant committees are similarly controlled. The general manager of committees in Boston, by means of regular bulletins and, when necessary, special communications, keeps in touch with the State committees and through them with the local ones. State committees, according to the manager, are required to correct impositions and injustices as provided in the Manual, "to guard the rights of Christian Scientists against restriction by public authority" (a duty prescribed by the directors under Article I, Section 6), and to perform any other duties required under the same by-law. The duties of assistant committees are similar.

Now for the actual work. Committees are constantly on the alert to secure the insertion in local newspapers of notices and reports of Christian Science lectures and other news valuable to the church, and to see that there is promptly published a "correction" of any unfavorable publicity of whatever character. How this result is accomplished it is well worth while to observe, for the methods at need often go far beyond the simple friendly request that constitutes a natural and proper first step. Christian Scientists are commonly well-to-do persons with good business connections. The committees therefore can, and do if necessary, bring valuable personal influence and advertising pressure to bear on the newspapers with surprisingly effective results. Such power is ordinarily exercised quietly, and on that account all the more effectively.

An unusually well-known example occurs in Washington, D. C. The District Committee on Publication is part owner of one of the large Washington department stores. Through his advertising power he holds in the hollow of his hand the Herald and the Star, which Washingtonians read in the morning and evening respectively. Some time ago the business manager of the Star told an interested inquirer that anything on the subject of Christian Science was always submitted to this man before publication, and that as his store was among the Star's largest advertisers, the paper could not afford to antagonize him. The advertising manager of the Post complained that the man concerned was going much too far in putting pressure on that paper through advertising power. An examination of these two papers over a period of nearly four years shows that they have published no news adverse to the Mother Church, while authorized Christian Science lectures, given in Washington every two or three weeks, have been reported to the extent of anywhere from half a column to the full text of the lecture.

The District Committee on Publication, officially reporting his activities for 1924, says:

> There was also a syndicated article, critical and adverse to Christian Science, which was withheld from publication in one of the local papers upon the request of your committee. The wisdom of Mrs. Eddy in establishing the activity of the Committee on Publication is becoming more apparent each year in a rapidly diminishing desire on the part of newspapers to print any criticism or incorrect statement concerning Mrs. Eddy or Christian Science.

What a model diminishing desire! Four years later the committee reports thus:

> No unfriendly sermons were advertised, but an objectionable advertisement from a counterfeit organization appeared. A reply was presented, but the publisher stated that he could not accept a correction to a paid advertisement. Upon the insistence of your committee that something be done in the matter, the publisher in lieu of printing the correction agreed not to accept in future objectionable advertisements.

Desire is still diminishing, but presumably not department-store advertising.

News is not news in Washington alone. A rival Christian Science organization offered an advertisement to the Chicago Tribune, and elicited the two following telegrams from the advertising manager:

> November 17, 1927
>
> Sorry publisher will not accept my recommendation to run your advertisement. Will write you regarding changes.
>
> November 23, 1927
>
> Cannot accept religious advertising controversial in character. This ruling prevents acceptance of your order. Revision is futile in view of your objective. Very sorry.

One advertising manager apparently learned a good deal in the course of a week. One may hazard a shrewd guess as to who was the teacher. At any rate, the Illinois Committee on Publication was able to report in 1925:

> Many editors now refuse copy of a controversial nature and we are advised that any objectionable allusion to our religion reaching such well-guarded pages does so because of ignorance or oversight on the part of the newspaper employees.

---

* The fourth and last article in this series, on The Siege of Fort Scribner, will appear in the issue of March 12.—EDITOR THE NATION.

> The advertising departments of two of the largest daily newspapers firmly refuse advertising matter issued by false claimants of Christian Science.

The education of our journalistic brethren, however, cannot always be accomplished simply by "the sweet amenities of Love," as provided in the Manual, or even, it appears, by the sweet amenities of advertising, for in the report of the New York committee for 1925 we read:

> It is seldom that the better papers quibble over printing a correction. To be sure, it is still necessary at times to emphasize the moral obligation and discreetly to point out the possible legal liability on the part of publishers in connection with the printing of statements misrepresenting the teachings and practice of Christian Science.

Note correction outrunning error in Michigan in 1927:

> In August a press dispatch which quoted certain misstatements of Mrs. Eddy's teaching was printed in only one newspaper of this State, while fourteen newspapers printed a subsequent dispatch which quoted the Committee on Publication from New York in reply to the earlier statement.

The busy committees on publication, in their ceaseless pursuit of error, have much reading to do outside "Science and Health" and the newspapers. Despite such good work as was described in the preceding article, mortal mind still creeps into books and must be combated. Especially, the minds of the young must be guarded. In 1925 southern California reported:

> During the past year a textbook on hygiene, which misrepresented and attacked our religion, was excluded from Pasadena Junior College and Santa Barbara Teachers' College. In the former, the books were taken back and the amount paid by students was refunded to them in subsequent purchases at the school bookstore.

Two years later northern California reported progress in the good work:

> Success continues to be experienced in removing from schools textbooks which attack Christian Science. Assurance has been given by members of the State Board of Education that hereafter the manuscripts of books to be adopted will be read carefully to detect medical or sectarian propaganda and veiled attacks upon religion.

None of the other States, however, so far as reports indicate, could rival Illinois, which as early as 1924 had attacked the trouble at the root and likewise had smitten the noxious tree in its highest branches:

> At the request of this office several book publishers have revised incorrect copy, and one publisher destroyed plates containing disparaging references to Christian Science. An unauthorized work on Christian Science was removed from circulation at the Chicago Public Library, and an obnoxious textbook in hygiene, containing derogatory references to Christian Science, has been withdrawn from use in a university. It is also noteworthy that a plan purporting to accomplish the removal of objectionable books from all public libraries is now receiving the attention of committees on publication.

Whether the ensuing six years have sufficed for the execution of this laudable plan I do not know.

Fortunately, our reference books are being revised and brought into accord with the truth. New York is the great book center, and it is therefore natural that our knowledge of this work should come from the report of the New York committee (for 1927):

> The Grolier Society, which publishes "The Book of Knowledge," has accepted a revision of the biography of Mrs. Eddy they have been using. Their book editor was most willing and cooperative in this matter. Funk and Wagnalls, publishers of the "Practical Standard Dictionary," are using Christian Science definitions of words through an arrangement that they have made with the Christian Science Board of Directors. The "Encyclopaedia Britannica" has accepted and published two timely new articles, one on Christian Science, and one on Mrs. Eddy. A third one has been submitted and will appear in later printings. This is the result of many years of work with the publishers.

All this is encouraging. One wonders what was the character of the "many years of work with the publishers" of the Britannica. I can only note the fact that earlier editions of that immortal work contain a reasonably fair and critical, though by no means hostile, account of Mrs. Eddy and her religion, while the present one substitutes two articles written by Judge Clifford P. Smith, for fifteen years head Committee on Publication. I remind readers of the history of the Wilbur biography and the Dickey memoirs.

It is unfortunate that more space cannot be given to the activities of the committees in respect to newspapers and books, but I must hasten on to other fields where also error raises its hateful head. The theater seems to be relatively blameless, yet even here occasional work must be done. Southern California reports in 1927:

> On the stage, antagonism is seldom directed publicly toward our religion, but a play was lately produced which contained lines that conveyed a wrong impression of Christian Science. Before this play was given recently a protest was made, and the management agreed to omit the objectionable references.

Lectures and sermons still give occasional trouble, and sometimes zealous individuals use methods of direct action not sanctioned, of course, by their leaders. Dr. Morris Fishbein, editor of the Journal of the American Medical Association, recently lectured in Pasadena on healing fads and quackeries. According to the Los Angeles Examiner of January 9, when Dr. Fishbein included Christian Science "in the category of 'fakes,' several persons in the audience interrupted with a storm of objections and cries of 'That's not so.'" Dr. Fishbein thereupon invited those who did not like his remarks to leave. "Throughout the remainder of his address groups of persons rose from their places and left. Others remained throughout, interrupting and heckling the speaker with objections, boos, and hisses." Similar incidents have occurred at other lectures in the same district. Truth will be served in California.

If the theater troubles the directors and their publication committees little, they are fully alive to radio possibilities, and one could already write a fascinating volume on the deadly effectiveness of their air censorship. Publication-committee reports in recent years are full of radio references. In place of such references, however, I shall give a few details of a single case to show just how the machinery of suppression works. In January, 1929, a rival, or, as the Mother Church prefers to call it, "counterfeit," organization arranged a lecture tour by one of its British adherents, Sir Henry Japp, the distinguished engineer who built the Pennsylvania Railroad's East River tubes. In an interview at the end of his tour, Sir Henry declared that much to his astonishment he had been prevented by organized opposition from broadcasting his Christian Science lecture in Indianapolis and Schenectady, and that the same tactics had been tried unsuccessfully in Chicago and Phoenix.

Sir Henry's New York experience, however, was perhaps the most notable. The sponsoring organization arranged with the Columbia Broadcasting System, through its general manager and president, for a fifteen-minute talk over twenty stations of its basic network on the afternoon of January 15 (afterward postponed to February 17). The text of the address and of the introductory remarks was submitted, and after certain changes, apparently in response to criticisms by a Christian Scientist in the Columbia organization, was accepted by the general manager. The contract was signed and a payment was made. As soon as the address was announced, the Columbia system began getting telegrams and letters of protest from all over the country, and they became so numerous that eight out of the twenty stations finally refused to go on with the broadcasting.

On February 13 the following letter went out from an assistant committee on publication in New York:

> DEAR FRIEND:
>
> The Assistant, of ——— Church of Christ, Scientist, to Mr. Orwell Bradley Towne, Committee on Publication for the State of New York, received under date of February 11 the following communication:
>
> "The Columbia Broadcasting System has contracted to give the ——— representative the facilities of the Columbia System for an address on Sunday afternoon, February 17, from 4:45 to 5 o'clock. This has been done in spite of protests from this office and Christian Scientists elsewhere.
>
> "The Columbia System should know that this is a very unfair and unjust thing and I am therefore asking you to help get additional messages of protest from Christian Scientists in your section against it. It is not too late to stop the radio talk. . . .
>
> "One of the chief points to be emphasized is that ——— [the rival group] are actually engaged in a resentful and malicious war against the Mother Church under the pretense of preaching, and that the public statements of ——— have been deceptive, fictitious, and misleading, as well as controversial and hateful. It is wrong to have the facilities of the Columbia System used by a resentful propagandist with a handful of followers. . . ."
>
> Your Board recommends strongly to each member of ——— to follow Mr. Towne's advice. . . . Your active participation in this move of defense is considered a true service to the cause of Christian Science.
>
> Very sincerely yours,
> BOARD OF TRUSTEES.

On February 15 those who had arranged the lecture met by request with Columbia officials, and in their presence the Christian Science member of that organization talked over the telephone with Mr. Towne, New York Committee on Publication, and received a statement of further specific changes that must be made before the lecture would be satisfactory. The responsible parties, having a contract, refused to agree to these changes, and the Columbia company, despite its contract, at the lecture hour announced to the radio audience that owing to "unforeseen circumstances" Sir Henry would not broadcast.

No publicity machine is complete without its lobby, and the Christian Science lobby's rating is AA1. In a circular letter of November 19, 1918, Judge Smith, then manager of committees on publication, requested them all to send in information regarding newly elected Senators and Representatives together with additional information in regard to those "heretofore mentioned in reports." Admirable work is done both at Washington and at the State capitals. I have a body of material, some of it sensational, showing something of these extraordinary activities, but I must content myself with a few excerpts from publication-committee reports. Michigan says in 1925:

> The deliberations of the State legislature are looked after with the greatest care. . . . Many measures were presented which contained objectionable features, but all these were either defeated in committee or amended in a way which removed undesirable provisions.

California in 1927 was able to report that the legislature of that year was composed of members uniformly fair and generally friendly to Christian Science, and that the Committee on Publication received the cordial support of legislators in defeating or amending bills which were objectionable to Christian Scientists. Senate bills 570 and 815, for example, protected the San Francisco "unit" for the Christian Science Benevolent Association from the regulations of the State Department of Public Welfare, and from inspection by it, and likewise from the State requirements governing training schools for nurses—which suggests rather more protection for the "unit" than for the patients within its walls. And Illinois in the same year reported a triumph:

> Our visits to the Capitol during the legislative season of 1927 proved to be occasions for rejoicing that Christian Science is respected by Illinois lawmakers, a considerable number of whom are members of our church. Prior to this session our legislative duties were confined chiefly to protective or defensive action. The Fifty-fifth General Assembly, however, manifested such a fair and friendly attitude that it seemed an opportune time to initiate a measure to discourage misrepresentation of Christian Science and its Discoverer and Founder through radiocasting. Therefore, a bill was prepared "for an Act to prohibit slander over, through, or by means of what is commonly known as radio." After a period of watchful waiting, during which time appeals were made to the Governor and the Speaker of the House, our bill was called and passed by the House on June 30, 1927. It was presented to the Governor, received executive approval, and became a law.

I have let the committees on publication tell their own story from their own official reports, so far as those reports are presented to the public in the Sentinel. I have refrained from extensive comment and have given only the slightest and most inadequate suggestion of the methods by which their task of suppression is accomplished. There are enormous areas of the propaganda activity of the church that I have not touched—for example, the story of the Christian Science Monitor, that admirable newspaper whose advertising history is best covered with a broad mantle of charity, and the deadly whispering campaign whereby the influence and standing of practitioners are undermined on the very suspicion of "disloyalty." I have given simply a few glimpses of the working of a powerful machine.

In the Driftway

JUST as it is impossible to spoil some people, so it is impossible to spoil some places. St. Augustine, Florida, for instance, has the unpleasant external aspects of a town that lives on visitors—as is the fact. Yet in spite of its façade of hotels, souvenir shops, and tea rooms, it has an authentic charm that differentiates it from the average resort city of the State. Perhaps it is the historic background, for St. Augustine still has more indications than one would suppose, in our fast-changing civilization, of the fact that it is the oldest European settlement in the United States—some ancient houses, an old Spanish fort, and a network of narrow, crooked streets. But the city's charm lies not so much in any of these physical facts as in its atmosphere, which the seasoned traveler soon recognizes as Latin. One might think that after a century under the American flag St. Augustine would be no more Spanish than St. Louis, say, is French. Quite the contrary. The names and faces one encounters make it easy to believe—as one is told—that about two-thirds of the permanent population is of Spanish extraction. But in almost indefinable ways the Latinity of St. Augustine is even better authenticated. One feels somehow a respect for the amenities of life and an easy tolerance that link St. Augustine with Chartres, Naples, and Cadiz. The signs in the plaza, "Please Keep to Walk," have a graciousness that is lacking in our better-known "Keep off the Grass," while in a strictly American city one would not find the group which the Drifter encountered playing dominoes on an outdoor table in the old Slave Market in the Plaza of St. Augustine—an unmistakable Latin face, a Chinese, two Florida crackers, and several other types.

* * * * *

THERE is also a certain pleasant jesting which, once common all over America, has been largely subdued in the regimentation of recent years. A local resident, wearied perhaps by the monuments to stuffed shirts which he had encountered, has had a rude face cut in stone and has placed it in front of his property, with this inscription:

Notis
This Werry Elaborate
Pile
Is Ereckted in Memery of Tolomato
A Seminole Ingine Cheef
Whoos Wigwarm Stuud on
This Spot and Sirroundings
Wee Cherris His Memery
As He Was a Good Hearted Cheef
He Wood Not Take Yoor
Skalp Without You Begged Him to Do So or Pade Him Some Munny
He Allways Acted
More Like a Christshun
Gentleman Than a
Savage Injine
Let Him R. I. P.

* * * * *

OWING in part probably to the narrow streets, which are poor for motors, and in part to the survival of old traditions, horse-drawn carriages are still at the disposal of visitors to St. Augustine and seem to be enjoyed by them. There is even one hansom cab, with an old-fashioned black-and-white-spotted coach dog to trot underneath. The Drifter had thought the coach dog long extinct, and doubtless this one would be if he did his duty and trotted faithfully under the hansom in its peregrinations about town. But his motto seems to be "Safety and Comfort First," and while the hansom rolls the streets he lies asleep in the sun awaiting its return.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Harding Letters

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The following quotation may be of interest to all those who, like The Nation, are in doubt whether or not to credit the rumor that Harding's letters were destroyed.

> Mr. Charles Moore, acting chief of the Manuscript Division of the Library of Congress, is authority for the statement that the widow of President Harding burned practically all of the letters he left concerning political and national affairs. Mr. Moore had endeavored to obtain from Mrs. Harding any state papers that her husband might have left to add to the collection of Presidential documents in the archives of the library. Mrs. Harding told representatives of the library that she had destroyed her husband's letters, consisting chiefly of communications written to him. There were only a few copies of those he had written.

This item appeared in the Saturday Review of Literature for January 9, 1926. It does not, of course, settle the fate of the letters written by Harding, but it can leave little doubt, I think, that if they were not destroyed they should have been.

Washington, February 1 MARGARET WELPLEY

America and the League

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your number of January 15 you decry the suggestion that the United States should enter the League of Nations on the ground that it is a vicious body intent on fulfilling the terms of the treaty of Versailles. I am afraid that this criticism is to a certain extent true. But Europe is still war-heated and there are very few Europeans who can regard affairs over here from a really generous viewpoint. It is just in this that an American voice could be of such inestimable value in the councils of the League. If America is to wait till the atmosphere of Geneva is surer before she joins she will have to wait a long time, perhaps until we drift into another war.

The League will always be an unsatisfactory body until America and Russia officially take part in its councils, but though in its four main tasks—the abolition of armaments and of tariffs, the control of drugs and of traffic in women—it has failed almost completely, it has brought most of the governments of the world together to talk things over in a friendly atmosphere and to unite, in a small way at the present, in a serious effort to maintain peace. While the League must, of course, be immensely grateful to America for the fine way in which she has cooperated with the League in its fight against disease, and indeed for creating these activities of the League, we wish that she would become one of us, and help us out!

Oxford, England, January 22 R. F. COOKE

Shall West Point Expand?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The New York World of January 15 carried the report that Hamilton Fish was proposing a measure in the House of Representatives for the enlargement of the West Point Reservation. On January 22 the same paper carried a map showing the lands to be included in that project and the uses to which they would be put. Meanwhile, Dr. E. G. Stillman of New York City, who owns the greater part of the land, had received from Superintendent Smith at the Point a letter asking him to give this land to be used for maneuvers and for artillery practice. Dr. Stillman replied that he would neither give the land nor sell it. Whether it can be taken from him is an open question; in the interest of the civilian population sentiment should be aroused for the defeat of such a proposal. I write as one of the citizens of Cornwall, who would be seriously injured if Dr. Stillman's holdings, known as Black Rock Forest, should be taken. The reasons against it are, briefly, these:

1. Dr. Stillman has had built in Black Rock Forest a chain of lakes to be used as a reserve water supply for the town of Cornwall. During the drought last summer these lakes were turned into our town reservoir and supplied us with millions of gallons of sorely needed water at a total cost of $1 to the community. If West Point acquires these lands this source of water supply for our town will be cut off, and no other reserve supply for the town can be developed at a cost of less than millions of dollars, which a community of 4,000 could not possibly raise by taxation.

2. For ten years past Dr. Stillman has spent many thousands of dollars on experimental forestry in Black Rock Forest, seeking to preserve our woodlands and at the same time find a way of using them for lumber. The forests would of course be demolished by artillery practice, and all wild life driven out.

3. The forest now forms what is really an extension of the Interstate Palisades Park, and is frequented each week by hundreds of trampers and hikers. Not only does the forest serve the need of New York City, but it is providing a pleasure ground for the rapidly growing communities to the north and west. Of these privileges the civilian population will of course be deprived if the War Department gets possession of the Black Rock Forest.

4. The dangers of artillery practice in the rapidly growing and thickly settled area within fifty-five miles of New York City hardly need mention. Several years ago West Point attempted to close the Storm King highway to traffic during parts of each week for the sake of artillery practice, but public pressure was so great that it was forced to open the road in accordance with the agreement with New York State by which the road had been built. During the years when artillery practice was carried on at the Point, unexploded shells were frequently found out of bounds, constituting a danger to people walking in the woods outside the West Point Reservation.

5. If West Point gets this land it forever precludes the normal growth of the village of Highland Falls.

Finally, why do we need an expanding military reservation at this time? The authorities at West Point are using the threat that if they cannot get the land the academy will be removed from the banks of the Hudson. This threat seems to have terrified some of our local citizens. Would it not be very advantageous if the academy were removed to a less desirable region, and the present buildings and campus utilized for a great international university for the study of the arts and sciences that promote the peace and happiness of mankind?

Cornwall, New York, January 29 Civilian

Good News from California

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Since I feel that whenever progressive forces receive any encouragement the fact should be noted, I desire to report that the new editor of the conservative Sacramento Union, Charles J. Lilley, formerly a Washington correspondent, turns out to be not an Administration "yes-man," but a progressive. Today's editorial on Muscle Shoals said this: "We do not feel concerned about the problem as long as Senator Norris remains in the Senate. He will keep it out of the hands of those who want to seize it and reap huge profits from the power there."

Los Molinos, Cal., January 30 Don M. Chase

Another View of Boulder Dam

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I note Ruth Finney's article on Secretary Wilbur at Boulder Dam in The Nation of December 11. President Hoover and Secretary Wilbur are certainly doing their level best to keep the government out of business and allow business to run the government. The people of Los Angeles have fought for this dam against the opposition of the private power interests for eight years. The private power interests have all along claimed it would not pay, but now that the project has gone through in spite of them they want all of the power.

It is proposed eventually to bring 1,500 second feet of water from the Colorado River to this territory, and it will take 420,000 horse-power to pump this water. The allocation which the Secretary makes, assuming 550,000 firm horse-power at the dam, is about as follows:

	Horse-power
Arizona, 18 per cent	99,000
Nevada, 18 per cent	99,000
Municipalities other than Los Angeles, 4 per cent	22,000
Total	220,000
Balance	330,000

This balance is to be allocated as follows:

½ to the Metropolitan District for pumping	165,000
¼ to the City of Los Angeles	82,500
¼ to the Southern California Edison Company	82,500
Total	330,000

Thus, the people of this territory, represented by the Metropolitan Water District, having made possible this venture and arranging to pay for it, are getting out of it only enough water to pump 590 second feet. Moreover, when they need a larger amount of water, as they will very shortly after the aqueduct is completed, they will have to go somewhere else for the water or buy back from the Southern California Edison Company the power that is allocated to them, and in the end go to some other dam at a distance of some 200 miles in order to pump water at Boulder Dam. If anything could be more absurd than this I have yet to hear of it. To my mind, since the dam is made possible and is to be paid for outright by the electric customers of this city and by the payment for water by the Metropolitan Board, the allocation of power should normally be to the Metropolitan District to the extent of 420,000 horse-power when and as required, to the city of Los Angeles and other municipalities all power not used by the Metropolitan District.

The Boulder Dam bill distinctly provides preference for municipalities, and yet the Secretary is disregarding the wording of the law in order to favor the private interests.

Los Angeles, December 30 A. L. Smith

Books, Music, Drama

Mid-Voyage

By ISIDOR SCHNEIDER

Hard to break the day from time, the ship from water; though day has stations of going and coming to the sun, and the ship for marker, the sinking nape
of coal in the bunkers.

Meanwhile we imitate
our pendent lives; the deck's road walk that in its round encompasses the sea; we sentinel our sleeping stomachs, hibernate in the moving cave burrowing this chilled and salted field.
We stroke our memories sea lull to uncramp, are patient of the sea's interim.

All day we watch the long wave forward, the horizon; the small waves their white spines crunched, slide beside us in little bones. We hear fall the wall of wind; see the sky deal in one a dozen weathers, curdlings of storm, and ductile mile of rain, and cataracts
of sun from cloud ridge notches pouring.

Below
the ship's engine beats; we hear the careful heart scratching its thin artery, the infinite seabreast on.

Mr. Wilder Turns to Terence

The Woman of Andros. By Thornton Wilder. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.50.

THE first one or two books by a young author of unusual talent often give the impression of indefinitely wide possibilities. With succeeding books this impression is modified; the author begins to betray his limitations: his manner, his fictitious world gradually harden into a fixed mold; the reader can draw a definite circle around him. Witness the careers of Cabell and Sinclair Lewis: we now know almost as surely what to expect from them as we know what to expect from the Packard or Cadillac factories. In "The Woman of Andros," it seems to me, Thornton Wilder gives signs of approaching precisely such a stage. Not only does the novel betray no new possibilities; it does not even realize all the possibilities suggested by "The Cabala" and "The Bridge of San Luis Rey." It is, so to speak, a smaller circle drawn entirely within the circumference of the two preceding novels.

"The Woman of Andros" is even briefer than "The Bridge," and like "The Bridge" it is set in a former age and in a foreign place. The place is the Greek island of Brynos; the time is after the great age of Pericles and before the birth of the Savior. The story is conventional: A young girl, innocent sister of an eminent hetaera, has a love affair with a young man of good family on the island, and becomes pregnant. The young man is then called upon to decide whether he shall leave her to her fate or whether he shall marry her with all the serious social consequences which that would involve. His period of indecision is the period of the novel's suspense. He has just made up his mind to marry her, and she has just been rescued from slave dealers, when she dies in childbirth. To this summary we must add the title role: the woman of Andros is the hetaera Chrysis, and not her poor sister Glycerium. Chrysis gives famous banquets, and gathers about her a group of the young men of the island, and recites to them from Plato and Homer and Aristophanes, and talks of the pain of life, for she is very wise and very sad.

I wish I could speak of this book with more enthusiasm. It is written with scrupulous care; there are passages of genuine beauty in it, and flashes of what I suspect are real insight and wisdom; there are appealing characters, like the father Simo, and the atmosphere is sustained with great skill. But somehow the novel leaves me cold. The situations seem to me patently arranged, the plot shopworn, and at no time in reading the book was I able to lose sight of Mr. Wilder in the act of being a fine stylist. The whole thing, in fact, seems to me primarily an exercise in style; and to be told that "the first part of this novel is based upon the 'Andria,' a comedy of Terence, who in turn based his work upon two Greek plays, now lost to us, by Menander" does not help me to appreciate it. It serves, rather, to suggest its occasional resemblance to the work of John Erskine, though Wilder is never so facetious as the author of "The Private Life of Helen of Troy," and though he feels his situations more deeply.

The type of novel to which Mr. Wilder seems to have dedicated himself is inspired largely by Anatole France, and because it is not indigenous to our soil, I cannot believe that it can take deep root. Its mood and tone can be sustained only by a constant self-conscious effort; it is apt to be always a trifle anemic; and as the work of Cabell shows, it may quickly suffer from a poverty of fresh themes. But even if Mr. Wilder chooses not to depart from his present vein, we may justifiably look for better books from him than the present one, which does not quite fulfil his earlier promise.

HENRY HAZLITT

Brutalities Under Mussolini

Escape. By Francesco Nitti. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

THE first thought of many a reader who picks up this book will be to recall that a similar book, Silvio Pellico's widely read "My Prisons," played a powerful part in awakening Italians to revolt against the tyranny of the Hapsburgs and their client rulers. Likewise, that it was Gladstone's revelations of the condition of political prisoners in Naples under the Bourbons which swung English public opinion in favor of the Risorgimento and made possible Garibaldi's crusade.

Here is another terrifyingly vivid account of the life of the political prisoner under another Italian tyrant. Francesco Nitti, nephew of Italy's former premier, was arrested on vague charges of opposing the Mussolini regime, supported by the allegation that he had neither wife nor mistress and so must be up to mischief. He was condemned, without trial, under the special laws for the defense of the regime, to five years on one of the penal islands. Handcuffed to three fellow-prisoners he was transported to barren Lampedusa, where with professors, scientists, lawyers, teachers, workmen, and peasants, he was subjected to the obscene brutalities of the notorious sadist Lieutenant Veronica. For a year he plotted his escape with two friends. One night the three of them swam out to a launch which was waiting for them in the darkness. A roar of the engines, police boats in pursuit, searchlights playing, bullets flying about them, and then—liberty!

BUY YOUR BOOKS BORZOI BOOKS BY THIS LABEL

A CULTURAL HISTORY OF THE MODERN AGE

by EGON FRIEDELL

"Unquestionably a superb attempt to interpret the past five and a half centuries of European history in Spengler's terms of rise, maturity and decay, but in a manner less abstruse than that which Spengler sometimes employs, and with an emphasis upon personality which he, on the whole, disdains. Its learning is great, its thought penetrating and wholly unconventional, and its style moving and often brilliant."—WILLIAM MACDONALD, in The New York Times. $5.00

THE HUMAN MIND

by KARL MENNINGER, M. D.

Here at last is a popular book that tells all that science has revealed of the normal and abnormal workings, disorders and treatments of the mind that lives as the personality behind our features. Richly illustrated with many cases from the author's long experience as a psychiatrist. $5.00

STORIES OF THE OPERA

Third Series

by ERNEST NEWMAN

An interpretation of the music, stories and circumstances under which were created: Verdi's Rigoletto, La Traviata, Il Trovatore, Aida, Otello; Gounod's Faust; Bizet's Carmen; Offenbach's Tales of Hoffmann; Humperdinck's Hansel and Gretel; and Puccini's La Boheme, Tosca and Madame Butterfly. With brief biographies of the composers. $3.50

UNROMANTIC SPAIN

by MARIO PRAZ

With gay humor and much worldly wisdom, Mario Praz writes about festivals, bullfights, dancing and architecture, giving us a new and realistic picture of Spanish life. Illustrated. $4.00

AMERICA CONQUERS BRITAIN

by LUDWELL DENNY

author of We Fight for Oil

The complete story of the greatest economic war of all time—a war which daily threatens the continuance of international peace. No one who reads here of the foreign battles won by General Electric, Standard Oil, Ford, etc., can deny that our country is gaining in her attempt to wrest from Great Britain her long-held world supremacy. Avoiding all bias, Denny gives an impregnably documented analysis of the situation such as is nowhere else available. $4.00

THE LIFE OF THE DEVIL

by

FATHER LOUIS COULANGE

A complete history of Satan from his rise in Heaven, through his vehement warfare against mankind and into his contemporary decline. Illus. $5.00

THE GREEK CITY AND ITS INSTITUTIONS

by GUSTAVE GLOTZ

The rise, development and fall of that unique organization, the Greek city, and the evolution of the various Greek institutions that accompanied its growth. The range of this study makes the book in reality a political and social history of ancient Greece. $6.00

By THOMAS MANN

Nobel Prizeman in Literature for 1929

BUDDENBROOKS

A new and cheaper edition of Mann's most popular novel. Over half a million copies have been sold in Germany in the last four months. 704 pages. Cloth binding. $2.85

EARLY SORROW

This delicate portrayal of a child's inarticulate love is Mann's latest prose fiction. $1.50

500 CRIMINAL CAREERS

by SHELDON and ELEANOR T. GLUECK

With a Foreword by RICHARD C. CABOT

By dramatically tracing the lives of 500 men before, during and after their imprisonment, this book effectively portrays the evils of our present day penal institutions. It is a study not only of absorbing interest, but of unexampled importance in the field of penology. "A work of unique value and interest... Eminently readable and displays vision as well as knowledge."—DR. GEORGE W. KIRCHWEY $5.00

At all Bookstores

ALFRED • A • KNOPF • PUBLISHER
730 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK

As a narrative of almost incredible adventure the book could not be better. As a denunciation of the brutalities which inevitably accompany such a dictatorship as Mussolini's, it is as powerful as it is truthful.

It will unquestionably further arouse public opinion abroad. But whether Nitti is another Silvio Pellico is another question. A dictatorship stands or falls not on its treatment of individuals or the behavior of its police, but on its ability to administer successfully the economic life of the nation. Whether the Fascist regime is doing that may not be known for several years to come. HIRAM MOTHERWELL

The Truth About Washington

George Washington, 1777-1781. By Rupert Hughes. William Morrow and Company. $5.

IN the third volume of his admirable and monumental biography of Washington, Mr. Hughes maintains the high standard of the previous volumes, and continues his devastating work with the myths. It is an appalling thing that we have had to wait for a novelist's study to get the truth about Washington. Between the Parson Weemses and the John Marshalls the biographers played havoc with the truth in the beginning, and succeeding writers have lacked the honesty, the industry, or the courage to give us a true portrait. Mr. Hughes seeks to dig a great figure out from the debris of fancy and fable, and, in doing so, has destroyed many a pallid myth, and been roundly abused for his pains. But he has accomplished one thing which is quite sufficient—he has given us the most thorough and scholarly biography of Washington yet written.

Because of the author's necessity of combating tradition and prejudice, one sometimes gets the impression of a rower straining against the stream. He is denied the privilege of merely building something; he is forced to demolish much, and this means some dust and dirt and confusion. But the fault is not his. We shall be delightfully surprised if he escapes the condemnation of the uncritical for some of his devastating work in this volume. Washington on his knees at Valley Forge—this goes overboard. Washington the pious devotee of the church makes way for the Washington of the Diaries. Conway, the wicked Irish renegade, is shown in a new and more favorable light, and even the Lee of Monmouth becomes more a half-crazed genius than a traitor. Even Arnold is shown to have had some cause for complaint; the tearful stories of his later repentance are discredited, and his beautiful wife no longer commands our sympathy, since she is shown to have been as deeply involved in treason as her husband. Here we learn more than the historians have thought wise to tell us before of the French, and of Washington's relations with them, and something of the impatience of Washington, which made him a bit trying to his subordinates.

It is probable that some of our super-heated patriots will be distressed at the author's indictment of the masses of the American people of the Revolutionary period, though Mr. Beveridge has painted the picture in colors quite as drab in his biography of Marshall. It is an ugly fact to which it is pointless to close our eyes. There were wholesale desertions, there were intolerable failures on the part of the Congress and the States, there were enemies of Washington among the Revolutionary leaders who had a contemptuous opinion of his military capacity, there was often chaos; and Mr. Hughes conveys a very bad impression of the Revolutionary fathers in the army. While the author seems at times in wrathful mood about the private soldiers, he nevertheless does much to explain their lapses in fidelity to the cause. After all, theirs was not an enviable situation. They were the ones who made the bloody footprints in the snows of Valley Forge, and pressed in flimsy rags against the bitter winter winds, and went without pay. The honors went to the leaders, and no fashionable ladies were knitting yarn gloves for the privates. In all the literature of the Revolutionary period one looks in vain for evidence of special appreciation of the work of the common soldier; and Mr. Hughes shows that Washington believed in keeping him in his place—which was far, far removed from the officers. Privates were to be paid in script, and after the war was over most of them were to be tricked out of this—and by officers and heroes! It is not surprising, therefore, that they were not all fidelity to the cause at all times; there were times when they must have felt that they were making a futile sacrifice. It is far easier to excuse the common soldier in his desertion than to palliate the merchants and the aristocrats in their indifference or disloyalty. It is to the credit of Mr. Hughes that in painting the black picture he does not conceal the fact that even the deserters were not without a grievance. It was not until Webster spoke at Bunker Hill that the common soldier was to hear glowing words of appreciation, and, alas, there were so few then living to hear it!

In these pages Washington the soldier is painted by the hand of a realist. It is not a military genius of the first order that is presented. The contemporary criticisms of his strategy are set forth fully, but with these all the heart-breaking handicaps that the Napoleons never knew. And out of it all emerges a Washington greater than ever, more human, more understandable, more masculine, and more than ever essential to the success of the mighty enterprise he led, and saved. Mr. Hughes has taken him from a vulgarly gilded pedestal and brought him to our hearthside where we see him as a human being. The author's Washington, created from his studies, is as follows:

> He was not at all the Washington that is taught in the schools. He was far greater than the bland miracle-worker. He was infinitely human, incessantly guessing wrong, making innumerable false prophecies, countless mistakes, losing his temper, regaining it, being driven into victories in spite of himself, and driving others to heights they could not otherwise have attained.

And this is the true Washington.

Mr. Hughes has thoroughly documented his work. His investigation has been exhaustive, his citations are conclusive on controversial points, and the result is that his biography comes closer to being definitive than any hitherto written. There are scrupulous honesty and superb courage in this work, and the author is to be congratulated on the performance of a real public service. CLAUDE G. BOWERS

The Man Ibsen

Ibsen, the Master Builder. By A. F. Zucker. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

INEVITABLY there came a lull in the Ibsen cult after the long storm of feverish discussion that had raged about him and his "problems" from the time his Nora slammed the door behind her and his "Ghosts" first walked the stage—from 1879 or 1881, that is, until the poet's death in 1906 and for a few years thereafter. The reformer shares the fate of the scientist and the discoverer in that all he has accomplished for the race is just taken for granted. Most of Ibsen's "problems" have long since become semi-historic and have ceased to agitate us—woman's rights, political, marital, occupational, the double standard of morality, the claims of youth, and all the rest. But while the meat of the animal is gone, the exquisite and perduring conch is left—his dramas, perhaps the subtlest yet most plastic portrayal of human nature in all literature.

In so far as Mr. Zucker's book, somewhat too modestly, disclaims any treatment of literary criticism and literary influences and lays its main stress on the outer circumstances of the life that gave birth to Ibsen's works, it is a step backward. Risking a paradox, one may say that in the present case the work is greater than the man. Whereas in this well-executed exposition Ibsen the artist towers again as incontestably the greatest literary figure in Europe after Goethe, Ibsen the man shrinks and at any rate is neither admirable nor engaging. His great contemporary and rival, Björnson, was not so wrong when he called Ibsen "only a pen." He was, rather, a specialist, one who to an extraordinary degree chose to renounce a broader life in order to achieve immortality in his chosen field. For all the many and interesting bits of new information about that bare life that are here brought together the Sphinx preserves essentially the same unrevealing silence. One almost questions the existence of a rich inner life behind the mask.

Within his self-imposed limitations, Mr. Zucker has produced an absorbing book. The story—the fairy story, as he himself called it—of Ibsen's life is told with a notable elegance, coupled with a certain vis comica and an epigrammatic felicity which raises the work above the usual "professor-made" biography.

LEE M. HOLLANDER

The Poetry of Léonie Adams

High Falcon and Other Poems. By Léonie Adams. The John Day Company. $2.50.

LEONIE ADAMS is, to my mind, the finest lyric poet writing in English. She is the type of poet, so seldom found in America, who is directly in the stream of literary tradition and yet a profoundly original genius. And this means that her work will live. "No poet, nor artist of any art," as Eliot remarks, "has his complete meaning alone. His significance, his appreciation, is that appreciation of his relation to the dead poets and artists. You cannot value him alone; you must set him by contrast and comparison among the dead." And this is probably the reason why the critics of Miss Adams's first book, "Those Not Elect," did not trouble to compare her with her contemporaries as much as they tended to trace her literary lineage. Their decision was that her influences were Donne and the Metaphysical school. Now, not until Miss Adams had noted their comment had she ever read Donne. She was, however, deeply read in the Elizabethan and Romantic poets. It is to these two periods, and more particularly to the first, that her roots are rightly traced.

Léonie Adams's language, even her grammatical structure, is often Elizabethan. She employs both the modern overtones of speech and all the shades of connotation and usage known to the Elizabethans, and in so doing has greatly enriched our poetic language. Her rhythms are, of course, not the simple song rhythms of the Elizabethans, but rather the subtle rhythms of written and beautifully patterned verse. She uses a variety of stanza forms, but has a strong individual inner rhythm attuned exactly to her meaning.

The themes of Miss Adams's poetry are love and nature, the two great Elizabethan themes, but in her love poetry there is none of the Elizabethan conventionality of phrase, and in her nature poetry no reflection of the pastoral tradition. The simple sensual outlook of the Elizabethans is replaced by the intricate intensity of a modern bent upon spiritual exploration and understanding of life. Like all truly fine English poetry, Miss Adams's verse, despite its literary roots, is unique. Although her themes are simple and her images as simply sym-

New Titles in the MODERN LIBRARY at 95¢
a copy

THE SUN ALSO RISES
By ERNEST HEMINGWAY —170

ANNA KARENINA
By LEO TOLSTOY —37

THE DANCE OF LIFE
By HAVELOCK ELLIS —160

THE TURN OF THE SCREW and THE LESSON OF THE MASTER
By HENRY JAMES —169

GREAT MODERN SHORT STORIES
Edited by GRANT OVERTON, including stories by Conrad, Sherwood Anderson, Hemingway, James Joyce, and others —168

THE ILIAD
By HOMER —166
Translation of Lang, Leaf and Myers

THE ODYSSEY
By HOMER —167
Translation of Butcher and Lang

COMPLETE & UNABRIDGED IN ONE VOLUME
Send for a list of 175 titles

To YOUR BOOKSELLER or N-2-30
THE MODERN LIBRARY, INC., 20 East 57th Street, New York

Please mail me MODERN LIBRARY Books Nos.....................
☐ I enclose $1.00 for each volume (95c for the book, 5c for postage).
☐ Send books C. O. D.
☐ Please send me, free of charge, your new catalog, describing all of the books in the Modern Library.

Name..
Address...
City..................................State.................

bolic as those of Dante, all her poems glow with richness of language, with music, and with an imagery which sweeps from understatement to a disembodied tracery of light and shadow as luminous and tranced as Shelley's own. Hers is a mystic vision as terrifyingly simple and universal as Blake's, but her mind is more subtle and more intellectual than that of the earlier mystics.

When "Those Not Elect" was published, Miss Adams was accused of obscurity. The reasons are several: packed and elliptical sentences not always consistently punctuated, the ageless command of language of which we have spoken, and, perhaps most important, the fact that most American lyrics can be paraphrased and those of Miss Adams cannot. Certainly the concentration of her lines and her special use of language do require an adjustment on the reader's part to her special technique. But in her actual emotional content there is nothing which can be rightly called obscure. Her poems arise, as all lyrics do, out of an intense personal experience, but this experience is almost immediately translated into its universal meaning through a profusion of images which flow rapidly into each other and are frequently summed up in a symbolic statement. The fact that her poems are not easily paraphrased is, indeed, a mark of their greatness.

Whatever difficulties there were in the piling up of clauses and in an archaic use of words have largely disappeared in Miss Adams's second book, "High Falcon." Here she has been more scrupulously critical of her own constructions and has, moreover, clarified her own vision. "High Falcon" is, therefore, a better book than "Those Not Elect." The melodious rhythmic flow is the same, the richness of language and imagery have the same magic; nothing is lost, and a complete lucidity—one or two poems excepted—is obtained. Certain of the poems—Song for a Country Fair and Winter Solstice, for example—make use of a more concrete detail than was to be found in her earlier verse. But these poems seem a little away from the main course of her development. The others are in the same key as the five poems in the first book and are concerned with the same search after significance and with the glory down "the waste track of beauty in the heart."

There are many singers, and excellent singers too, whose song is always of their own personal passion, with no roots going deeper than their own milieu. Miss Adams is infallibly the singer of such passions as are universal, and of a world ageless in its seasonal and transfixed wonder.

EDA LOU WALTON

Rabelais

Francis Rabelais: The Man and His Work. By Albert Jay Nock and C. R. Wilson. Harper and Brothers. $5.

François Rabelais: Man of the Renaissance. A Spiritual Biography. By Samuel Putnam. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.50.

IT HAS been felt by those who have even the slightest acquaintance with Rabelais that he has something infinitely valuable to give us. A need, therefore, has long existed for an introduction to his works and an evaluation in contemporary terms. A study of Rabelais that would meet this need must be done, if not in the spirit of the man, which would imply a genius equal in breadth and depth to his, at least in a spirit large enough to encompass, even on a reduced scale, his whole gargantuan personality, encircling the whole range of his expression with all its contradictions, paradoxes, and unintelligible bewilderment of richness. It would have to be done by someone who has not only something of the depth of seriousness the satirist was capable of, but also that unbounded

George Washington
VOL. III: THE SAVIOR OF THE STATES 1777-1781
By RUPERT HUGHES
"The third and the most interesting volume so far. This distinguished biography gains steadily in narrative momentum, in reality of background and in clearness of character portrayal . . . Probably the greatest tribute that any biographer has given him."
—Allen Tate, N. Y. Evening Post.
At all bookstores, illustrated, $5.00
WILLIAM MORROW & COMPANY

Visits to Soviet Russia
FOURTH SEASON
EXPLORATIVE itineraries worked out with reference to social, economic, historic, artistic and scenic features.
Visits to factories, schools, children's communities, collective farms and villages . . . art treasures, palaces and workers' rest homes . . . for the adventurous . . . camping in the Caucasus and study of primitive tribes.
Small groups, each accompanied by a qualified American leader and Russian interpreter. From $395 including express steamship passage. Literature available.
Individual itineraries also executed ▲ Independent year-'round representation in Russia
20-30 WEST 43rd STREET ▲ NEW YORK
THE OPEN ROAD

capacity for the enjoyment of experience in the raw with brutal gusto which characterized him. Above all, such an evaluation would have to be done from such a lofty lookout that there should not appear in it the slightest indication of the tendency to apologize for what the philistines since his day have condemned as his inexcusable coarseness.

The reviewer is sorry to report that Mr. Nock and C. R. Wilson seem to lack the necessary qualifications for the criticism of Rabelais. Their scholarship appears in places to flag. And what is worse, two fundamental defects vitiate their work. They approach their subject in a spirit of unmixed piety which, one soon realizes, is at best sublimated prudery, and they undertake to demonstrate too simple a thesis. It must be indicated in all fairness that their point of view is altogether preferable to the vulgar approach which regrets the "unseemly side of our satirist." Their apology is much more intelligent and subtle. They admit the coarseness in Rabelais but undertake to prove that his "moral relation toward [his] subject is correct." In the telling of his best stories, we are assured, he "communicates an unmistakably authoritative impression of detachment," and they go on to point out that the "tone and accent of Rabelais's writings betray no morbid obsession of any kind, but quite the opposite."

Their piety has another consequence. It tends to make of Rabelais a breviary for the comfort of those whose weariness and squeamish disgust with the conditions of our day impel toward consolation. Life in the sixteenth century was no better and no worse for all its intolerance and its stupidity than ours. But Rabelais did not go back to the past to seek comfort in it; he lived the life of his day with a dash and a relish incomprehensible to us. He laughed at its imbecility, but he derived no small measure of enjoyment from it. This is the true pantagruelism. The very last thing Rabelais would have wished to do—he who was, in Nietzsche's phrase, such a yea-sayer—is to offer comfort to those who lack a stout heart. And how he would have smiled patronizingly at our authors for even indicating the possibility of a parallelism between him and Marcus Aurelius!

The second defect must be indicated briefly. The authors contend throughout that Rabelais was a story-teller, a great artist, and they write of him as if that fact, which is of course obvious, made it impossible for him to have been a great satirist. But, one asks, are the two incompatible? The simplicity of their logic and their piety force Mr. Nock and C. R. Wilson to skip lightly over certain aspects of their subject's work which indicate that he was not only a great story-teller and a great satirist, but also a man not as disinterested in the partisan issues of his day as they wish to make him out. In their pious simplicity they miss an aspect of his work as important as the one they are so exclusively trying to emphasize. The "Works" are not only the expression of an attitude toward life, but they are also, it must not be forgotten, one of the most significant documents of the sixteenth century. Interest in this aspect of Rabelais they condemn as pedantry.

Mr. Putnam gives evidence of greater scholarship than Mr. Nock and C. R. Wilson, and his book is on the whole a more balanced one, though much less inspired. Nowhere throughout its pages did the reviewer detect a genuine attempt at evaluation. On the other hand, one does find judicious use of the scholarly labor which the men working through the Revue des Etudes Rabelaisiennes and others have gathered to date. A classic, however, is more than a historical relic; it is living word, with a meaning to us which may be quite different from the meaning it had for the past. Mr. Putnam seems not to have any inkling of this. As an introduction to Rabelais it is hard to tell which of the two books is to be preferred. The jazzed scholarship of Putnam makes agreeable and informative reading, but it misses the significance of Rabelais to us; the admirable high-

HEALTH CLASSICS at a Great Saving

Outstanding Health Books for Laymen

THE health books that should be in your home—those of all publishers which have proved most popular and helpful—are now available by mail at reduced prices. All are interesting, authoritative and written in clear, simple language. Any or all will be mailed postpaid at the prices quoted, with a money-back guarantee.

(1) The Lazy Colon. By Charles M. Campbell and Albert K. Detwiller, M.D. (Generally recognized as the leading work on constipation.) Sixth edition. $2.59

(2) Colds, Cause, Treatment and Prevention. By Russell L. Cecil, M.D., Cornell Medical College. $.97

(3) Rheumatism, Its Meaning and Menace. By Lewellys F. Barker, M.D., Johns Hopkins. $1.39

(4) Your Heart and How to Take Care of It. By Robert H. Babcock, M.D., New York. $1.39

(5) Blood Pressure—Its Cause, Effect and Remedy. By Lewellys F. Barker, M.D., of Johns Hopkins. $1.19

(6) The Skin, Its Care and Treatment. By Albert Strickler, M.D., Prof. of Dermatology, Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia. $1.39

(7) Indigestion, What It Is and How to Prevent It. By Arthur L. Holland, M.D., Cornell University Medical College, New York City. $1.19

(8) The Teeth and Mouth. By LeroyL.Hartman,D.D.S., Columbia Medical School. $1.39

"THE LAZY COLON" on the GREATEST SINGLE CAUSE OF ILL HEALTH

ONE book, The Lazy Colon, you will certainly need because it deals in the most comprehensive fashion with the human intestinal tract, which Dr. Foges of Vienna calls the most prolific source of dangerous disease. It presents the newer methods of treating intestinal stasis (constipation) as developed by 300 world-famous Physicians. 42nd thousand already.

Dr. John Dewey, Columbia University: "You have rendered us all a service by making this material available."

Prof. E. V. McCollum, Johns Hopkins University: "It is very well written and should accomplish much good."

Lloyd H. Wright, San Gabriel, Calif.: "Send by return mail one copy of 'The Lazy Colon,' recommended to me by my physician, Dr. Olson of Los Angeles."

Martin W. Barr, M.D., noted physician and author: "Sat up most of last night reading this delightful and masterly book."

SOME OF THE 36 CHAPTER TITLES

Mysteries of the Intestines Revealed by X-Rays; Curious Causes of Constipation; Startling Theories of Self-Poisoning; Story the Urine Tells; Surprising Theory of Water Drinking; Hardening of Arteries; High Blood Pressure; Purgatives, their Proper and Improper Use; Mineral Oil; Bran or Agar, Which?; Vitamin Facts; Greatest Menace of All; Intelligent Use of the Enema; Coated Tongue, Its Cause and Meaning; Is Sugar of Milk the Long Sought Remedy; Starting Right with Children.

Money Refunded If Desired

If you find that the books you order do not contain practical, important and usable information, simply return them and your money will be refunded.

- -

EDUCATIONAL PRESS, 8 East 12th St., Dept. H2, New York

☐ (1) $2.59 ☐ (2) $ .97 ☐ (3) $1.39 ☐ (4) $1.39

☐ (5) $1.19 ☐ (6) $1.39 ☐ (7) $1.19 ☐ (8) $1.39

Kindly send me the books checked above, postpaid. Enclosed is $——. If am not fully satisfied with any of them, I may return and my money will be refunded.

Name ....

Address ....

mindedness of Mr. Nock and C. R. Wilson, on the other hand, gives us a wry picture of that significance. Perhaps for those who have not yet entered the cool, spacious, free universe of the Frenchman and know nothing of the joy of its freedom and strength, both books might serve for the lack of a better guide.

ELISEO VIVAS

The Student Volunteer

German Students' War Letters. Translated and Arranged from the Original Edition of Dr. Philipp Witkop by A. F. Wedd. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

"WE only know that we got to win and that however war-weary we may be, we shall go on doing our duty." This sentence from a letter written early in 1915 is symbolic of the entire collection, all the contributors to which died in the World War. These letters express the mental attitude of the German student volunteer much more emphatically than any of the recent war novels could do. For though a war novel may revive the experiences of the war, it cannot conserve, as letters do, the ideology and outlook of those past days. Here we have a monument to the spirit of a bygone elite of a bygone Germany. It is significant of the heroism of a social group and generation, even though the letters were selected from a choice of about 20,000, all of which certainly did not manifest the same undoubting patriotism; even though they were chosen by a nationally minded professor, with the official cooperation of the ministries of education of various German states; and even though most of them were written before the summer of 1917, at a time when there was still hope.

The Malik-Verlag, Germany's greatest publishing house of radical authors, has announced, in protest against the reactionary tendency in Witkop's selection, its intention of publishing "Letters of Proletarians Killed in the War." One may trust that a collection of this kind, if published, will radiate a different spirit. Though abridged, the English version of the present letters preserves the breath of the original.

WALTER KIEN

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL Y. ANDERSON is the national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

J. G. CURTIS is the pseudonym of a careful student of present-day financial and industrial developments.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY is managing editor of The Nation.

ISIDOR SCHNEIDER is author of "The Temptation of Anthony."

HENRY HAZLITT is literary editor of The Nation.

HIRAM MOTHERWELL served for five years as a newspaper correspondent in Italy.

CLAUDE G. BOWERS is author of "The Tragic Era."

LEE M. HOLLANDER is associate professor of Germanic languages at the University of Texas.

EDA LOU WALTON is assistant professor of English at New York University.

ELISEO VIVAS is in the department of philosophy at the University of Wisconsin.

WALTER KIEN, on the staff of New York University, is an authority on German and Scandinavian literature.

HUBBARD HUTCHINSON has contributed articles on music to various periodicals.

Music

Four Moderns

WE are always indebted to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony for a constant fare of significant modern music. The New York concert of February 8 at Carnegie Hall, however, was especially interesting because its two principal scores, new to America this season, might fairly be said to represent the romantic and the classic tradition in music—old labels for antagonists far older, the heart and the head. The same program rarely displays two contemporary works so wholly devoted to the one spirit or the other as the Second Symphony of Arnold Bax and the Second Concerto of Serge Prokofieff, although they seemed to this writer too unevenly matched to prove anything of the relative merits of the two attitudes.

The program opened with the Portsmouth Point Overture of William Walton, a young Englishman who derived his inspiration from an eighteenth-century print of a roaring British port. Bits of bellowed chantey, ballads, scraps of melody from a dance hall are woven cheerfully together. The individual tunes employ intervals familiar as those of Turkey in the Straw, and as impudently gay. They speak a language clear to anyone. But Walton combines them in odd ways, purposefully crude, like the turmoil and clamor of a busy waterfront, and thereby produces pungent polytonal dissonances. It is a vigorous, merry, and amusing work, which would gain if somewhere sixteen quiet bars relieved the pound of syncopated rhythms. Even sailors drowse.

Bax builds his symphony in exactly the opposite way. Where Walton's tunes, the girders and beams of his bawdy little tavern, are homely as pine and oak, Bax brings to the pillared vaulting of his dark and lofty palace exotic substances, porphyry and ebony. For the stuff of his melodies is highly personal and hence unfamiliar to the average ear. But as he develops them he builds a structure which we enjoy, I believe, because we unconsciously recognize in it the same laws of organic growth that we have—usually thoughtlessly—felt elsewhere in mediums better known to us, such as architecture or literature. The edifice itself is new and we enjoy that as well, being changeful creatures. But it has taken shape around laws inherent in ourselves, which must be satisfied if we are to experience aesthetic pleasure.

Above all, this clarity of form and freshness of material are fortunately fired with a profound emotional sincerity. The score is neither artificially made nor muddled. Bax employs the entire range of the harmonic palette. He is untroubled with the fear of being considered old-fashioned which haunts lesser moderns, and uses simple major triads when they serve his purpose. He embodies his lyric impulse in subtle orchestral coloring gained by weaving many individual tonal threads. The effect is that of a somber tapestry shot through with glints of gold and silver, the principal themes embroidered in bold design. If a second hearing of the work reveals occasionally reminiscent decoration from older façades, such as the Poème d'Exstase of Scriabine or the Prelude to Tristan, it also confirms the originality of the basic material and the impression of music written because it was deeply felt.

On the other hand, the Prokofieff concerto for piano, excellently performed by the composer, was essentially music of the brain. No petals or perfumes of emotion were permitted to clutter this glittering chamber of clear-cut crystals. With its carefully made designs, beautifully fitted and crisply turned, it was clean swept and spare as the lobby of the Chanin building, brilliant as an empty conservatory. Perhaps this impres-

□ LUNCHEON AND LECTURES □

A CHICAGO DINNER
FOR NORMAN THOMAS
WHO WILL SPEAK ON
CATCHING UP WITH OURSELVES
A Program for the Times
Hotel Morrison, February 22nd, at 7 P. M.

Make reservations in advance at $2.00 each.
Robert Morss Lovett, Chairman.

COMMITTEE ON DINNER FOR NORMAN THOMAS
800 South Halsted Street Seeley 0940

MRS. PATRICK CAMPBELL famous British actress, herself distinguished for the beauty and purity of her diction will lecture on Beautiful Speech and the Art of Acting
Monday, March 3 8:20 P.M.
Admission $1.50
THE NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH
465 West 23rd Street

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

Plays to See

*At the Bottom—Waldorf—116 W. 50th St.
*Berkeley Square—Lyceum—E. 45th St.
Children of Darkness—Biltmore—W. 47th St.
*Civic Repertory—14th St. & 6th Ave.—See Advertisement.
*Criminal Code—National—W. 41st St.
*Death Takes a Holiday—Barrymore Theatre—47th St., W. of B'dway.
Ruth Draper—Comedy—41st St., E. of B'dway.
Everything's Jake—Assembly—39th St., E. of B'dway.
June Moon—Broadhurst—W. 44th St.
Mei Lan-Fang—49th St.—W. of B'dway.
Meteor—Guild—W. 52nd St.
Rebound—Plymouth—45th St., W. of B'dway.
Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45th St.
Strike Up The Band—Times Sq.—W. of B'dway.
*The First Mile—Comedy—41st St. E. of B'dway.
The First Mrs. Fraser—Playhouse—48th St., E. of B'dway.
Topaze—Music Box—45th St., W. of B'dway.
Wake Up and Dream—Selwyn—42nd St., W. of B'dway.

Films

Disraeli—Central Theatre—Broadway and 47th St.
The Green Goddess—Winter Garden—1646 B'dway.

First Nights

Green Pastures—Mansfield—W. 47th St.
Neighborhood Playhouse Program—Mecca Temple—W. 56th St.
The Infinite Shoeblack—Elliott—39th St., E. of B'dway.

Art Exhibits

Exhibition of contemporary Belgian painting sculpture and graphic arts—Brooklyn Museum—to Feb. 23.
Paintings by Arnold Blanch and drawings by Peppino Mangravite—Dudensing Galleries, 5 E. 57th St.—thru Feb.
Oil paintings by Jean Pfister—Holt Gallery, 630 Lexington Ave.—thru Feb.
Woodcuts and Lithographs by Ellsworth Ford—The Fifty-Sixth St. Galleries, 6 East 56th St.—Feb. 18 to March 1.

---

*Drama. Comedy. Musical.

Are you interested in Humanism?
Will it supplant Christianity?
HEAR
HARRY ELMER BARNES, Ph.D.
in a Course of Six Lectures on "Religion in the Twentieth Century"

Thursday Evenings
February 20, 27, March 6, 13, 20, 27
8:15 P. M., at the
COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM
Park Avenue and 34th Street
Course $3.50 Single Lecture 75c

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
7 EAST 15TH STREET ALGONQUIN 3094

HERMAN EPSTEIN Fri., 8.30 p. m.
"The Ring of the Niebelungen" February 21
DR. S. ADOLPHUS KNOPF Sat., 2.00 p. m.
"Birth Control for the Benefit of Humanity" February 22
HARRY W. LAIDLER Tues., 8.30 p. m.
"Socialist Tactics in the New Capitalism" February 25
WILLIAM H. BRIDGE Wed., 7.00 p. m.
"Creative Psychology" February 26
ANITA BLOCK Wed., 8.30 p. m.
"The Theatre as a Criticism of Life" February 26

Debates
Sundays, 8 P. M., INGERSOLL FORUM, Admission, 50c
PYTHIAN TEMPLE, 135 W. 70th Street, New York City
Feb. 23—"IS WOMAN MORALLY AND INTELLECTUALLY INFERIOR TO MAN?"
MARK JACKSON vs. JOSEPH PORTAL
March 2—"OPTIMISM OR PESSIMISM?"
JOHN T. KEWISH vs. ERNEST GILBERT
March 9—"DID JESUS EVER LIVE?"
JOHN W. HAWKINS vs. MAJ. JOSEPH WHELESS

Atheism
Catalog of anti-religious books FREE. Tracts, 10c.
American Association for the Advancement of Atheism, Inc.
119 E. 14th Street New York, N. Y.

sion of limpid and elaborate vacuity was the result of collaboration between the Prokofieff of 1913 and the Prokofieff of 1924. The concerto was lost and ten years later rewritten from sketches. In the interval the composer has been increasingly preoccupied with "neo-classicism," a return to strict older forms. Whatever the cause, the result was disappointing from a man of Prokofieff's caliber.

It may be that in some future golden age all composers will realize that music is a language for conveying emotion, and that if there is none to convey, all the skilful designs of cerebration, all the resources of technique, will not bring the resultant patterns to life, even when animated with the sensitivity and verve which Dr. Koussevitzky brings to his readings.

HUBBARD HUTCHINSON

Drama

The Unruffled Mrs. Tyler

As Mrs. Austin Tyler, Mrs. Fiske is the singularly serene and passive center about which the other characters in "It's a Grand Life" (Cort Theater) feverishly revolve. She is the eternal adjuster, the husher-up, the conciliator, everlastingly patient, a fountain of unperturbed philosophy. Her husband is the amorous president of a great trust company, too many of whose affairs have become subject matter for the tabloids. We are to understand that one more scandal and the directors will request his resignation. In the first act Tyler is brought home injured in a night automobile accident—in which he has been accompanied by his new lady secretary. Reporters arrive; as is fitting, the reporter from one of the tabloids is a rough, uncouth person, while the New York Times representative is a gracious young man in correct evening clothes. Mrs. Tyler consents to see only the Times reporter, explains away all the suspicious aspects of the case, presents him with a bottle of chartreuse, and sends him off to write a discreet story.

Complications, however, pile up. Tyler is the presumable father of a boy—born in the next room during the action of the play—whose mother is the wife of an Alabama military man who believes in adjusting such embarrassing tangles with a revolver. There are sub-plots: Mrs. Tyler's daughter has been having an affair with a married man; Mrs. Tyler's son marries a dancer who has had an affair with his father—and always Mrs. Tyler is being very calm and collected, very modern and broad-minded.

"It's a Grand Life" is, for the most part, a successful light comedy. The lines supplied by its authors, Hatcher Hughes and Alan Williams, are always intelligent; some of them are genuinely witty. And Mrs. Fiske, with her usual adroitness, makes what she has to say sound possibly a good deal wittier than it really is.

In "Dishonored Lady" (Empire Theater), based by Margaret Ayer Barnes and Edward Sheldon on the case of Madeline Smith of Glasgow, Katharine Cornell brilliantly portrays a woman who poisons the lover who, through threatened blackmail, has tried to force her to continue their relationship, and to prevent her marriage to the man she loves. The tension and excitement are built up with great skill, and the authors have contrived to have a courtroom scene with the courtroom left out. The play is as thrilling as "The Trial of Mary Dugan."

As you are shown to your seat in the Booth Theater, you are handed a program which professes to be that of the Stadttheater in Vienna, announcing the performance of "Camille." The curtain rises on a stage without scenery, revealing the stage hands playing poker, a scrubwoman cleaning, and so on, and one learns that through a grave mistake neither stage hands nor actors have expected a performance that night. Gregory Ratoff as the stage director then pleads with members of the audience to accept parts in a play to be improvised. A husband (Reginald Owen as Herr Neumann) volunteers with his reluctant wife; someone is asked to play the part of a lover, and the man who accepts turns out, of course, to be the wife's lover in real life. Thereafter the play becomes a very hackneyed version of the eternal triangle, and relies for freshness and humor chiefly on the husband's mistaken belief that the wife and her lover are merely acting. With the English title of "Out of a Blue Sky," the play has been "adapted" by Leslie Howard from the German of Hans Chlumberg. One is left to speculate why German names have been retained for the characters, and why the persons who emerge from a New York audience are all Herr This and Fräulein That. H. H.

THE first two acts of Donald Ogden Stewart's "Rebound" (Plymouth Theater) offer as swift, amusing, and heartwarming entertainment as has been seen in the theater this winter. Hope Williams, as a clear-headed and unfailingly gallant young woman who marries one young man after having been thoroughly jilted by another, is a joy to watch and hear. For the most part the cast is adequate to Mr. Stewart's slightly insane humor, which is the highest compliment that could be paid them. The second-act curtain, in which a newlywed husband is two-stepping with his old girl, while his bride watches them and sings the words of the tune they dance to, is comedy in the highest and soundest meaning of the word. And then in the third act things slacken up a good deal and the play ends in a fog of talk about what love is. Not that one need quarrel about what the play says it is, but that the happy ending, in which the pair who married on the rebound find that they really do love each other after all, is considerably less convincing than it should be. When they are merrily or sadly wise-cracking, Miss Williams and Mr. Stewart are a combination hard to beat. They are both, he as playwright, she as actress, masters of the unspoken word, the repressed emotion. It is only when it becomes necessary to reveal the inner heart that they become equally awkward and unsure. The best performance of the evening was that of Robert Williams as Johnnie Coles. D. V. D.

"City Haul," a play by Elizabeth Miele, portraying a corrupt mayor and the ease with which he gets out of tight places to bid for office again, has now moved from the Hudson Theater to the Eltinge. The play first opened at the Hudson on December 31. Curious stories have been going about New York that the play has been sabotaged by the politicians and ignored by the press. One theater refused to accept it after it was booked; and though Mrs. Harris finally gave it the Hudson, at least one agency decided not to announce the run of the play.

The author's offense is that the corrupt mayor, admirably acted by Herbert Rawlinson, has been made up to look remarkably like Mayor Walker, even to the amazing and frequently changed clothes and the boutonnière. Had he been represented as a tough-looking Westerner no politician would have cared. The play is sparkling and amusing; it is skilfully put together with clever and even sensational situations ending quite unexpectedly. It marches well and, though the mayor is incredibly base and his daughter's love story entirely conventional, the play was well worth writing and presenting. Both for its courage and its dramatic qualities it deserves a considerable run. O. G. V.

□ THEATRES □ □ □ FILMS □

City Haul By ELIZABETH MIELE
with HERBERT RAWLINSON
A COMEDY ON MUNICIPAL POLITICS
ELTINGE THEATRE, 42nd St., West of B'dway.
Evenings 8:50. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday 2:30.

LEO BULGAKOV
THEATRE ASSOCIATES, INC., presents
AT THE BOTTOM
by MAXIM GORKY
New version by William L. Laurence
Phone reservations accepted—Circle 1407
"Really worth seeing."—Brown, Post.
"A fine play" —Mantle, News.
WALDORF THEATRE—50th St., Bet. 6th & 7th Aves. Eve., 8:40
MATINEES Wednesday and Saturday, 2:40

Kenneth Macgowan and J. V. Reed present
BASIL SYDNEY and MARY ELLIS
in* CHILDREN of DARKNESS
by Edwin Justus Mayer, author of "The Firebrand"
BILTMORE THEATRE—47th Street, West of Broadway
Evenings, 8:50—Mats., Wed. and Sat., 2:40.

CIVIC REPERTORY 14th St.—6th Ave.
Evenings, 8:30.
50c, $1, 1.50. Matinees Thursdays and Saturdays, 2:30.
EVA LE GALLIENNE, Director
Fri.Eve.,Feb.21, "The Cherry Orchard," Sat.Mat.,Feb.22, "Peter Pan," Sat.Eve.,Feb.22, "The Open Door" & "Women Have Their Way," Mon.Eve.,Feb.24, "The Sea Gull," Tues.Eve.,Feb.25, "Mlle. Bourrat," Wed.Eve.,Feb.26, "The Cradle Song," Thurs.Mat.,Feb.27, "The Cradle Song," Thurs. Eve.,Feb.27, "The Open Door" & "Women Have Their Way."
Seats 4 weeks in advance at Box Office & Town Hall, 113 W. 43rd St.

WILLIAM HARRIS, JR., PRESENTS
"THE FIRST PLAY OF THE SEASON WITH TEETH IN IT."
ROBERT LITTELL, WORLD.
CRIMINAL CODE
By MARTIN FLAVIN with ARTHUR BYRON
NATIONAL THEATRE 41st St., West of 7th Ave. Evenings 8:50
Matinees Wednesdays & Saturdays, 2:30

ETHEL BARRYMORE Theatre, 47th St., West of Broadway
Evenings 8:50; Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:30
LEE SHUBERT Presents
PHILIP MERIVALE
IN
DEATH TAKES A HOLIDAY
A COMEDY ABOUT LIFE

The Actor-Managers, Inc., has the honor to present
RUTH DRAPER in her ORIGINAL CHARACTER SKETCHES
Evenings: Tuesday, Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday, 8:50.
COMEDY THEATRE, 41st East of Broadway. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:30. VERY GOOD SEATS at $1.00

IS LIQUOR A MYTH?
THE ONLY WAY TO REALLY KNOW IS TO SEE
EVERYTHING'S JAKE!
THE RIP-ROARING ALCOHOLIC COMEDY
by DON MARQUIS
"GOOD, ROBUST FUN"—N. Y. Times—"A RIOT"—Benchley, New Yorker
ASSEMBLY Theater, 39th St., E. of Bway. Eves. at 9. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 3

GRACE GEORGE
In the ST. JOHN ERVINE Comedy
"FIRST MRS. FRASER
with A. E. Matthews and Lawrence Grossmith
PLAYHOUSE 48th St. East of Broadway. Eves., 8:40
Mats. Wed., Thurs. and Sat., 2:30
EXTRA MATINEE EVERY THURSDAY UNTIL JUNE 15
Matinee Every Day during Easter Week.

The Theatre Guild Presents
METEOR
By S. N. BEHRMAN
Guild THEA., 52nd St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

"REBOUND"
With HOPE WILLIAMS
"This is the best light comedy written by anybody hereabouts in ten or twenty years, and it's not so damned light, either."—Heywood Broun, New York Telegram.
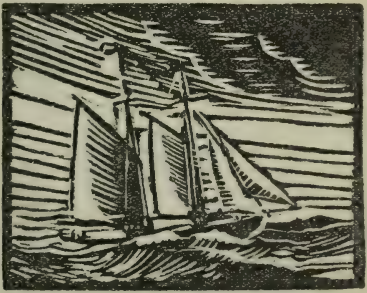
ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
DONALD OGDEN STEWART'S COMEDY
Plymouth Theatre. Eves. 8:50; Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:40.

HERMAN SHUMLIN presents
THE LAST MILE
A new drama by John Wexley
Directed by Chester Erskin. Settings by Henry Dreyfuss
SAM H. HARRIS Theatre 42nd St. W. of Broadway
Eves. 8:50. Matinees Wed. & Sat., 2:30

MATINEES: GOOD SEATS, ALL PRICES, AT BOX OFFICE
WARNER BROS. Present
GEORGE ARLISS
in
"DISRAELI"
(A Vitaphone All-Talking Picture)
CENTRAL THEATRE Daily 2:45—8:45
Broadway and 47th St. Sunday 3—6—8:45

□ ART EXHIBIT □

EXHIBITION
WOODCUTS and LITHOGRAPHS
BY ELLSWORTH FORD
February 18th to March 1st, 1930



THE FIFTY-SIXTH STREET GALLERIES
6 East Fifty-Sixth Street

Forced Labor in Liberia

CHARGES of forced labor and slavery in Liberia have been so persistent in recent years that a commission was named in August, 1929, to investigate conditions there. The commission consists of three persons, one each appointed by the League of Nations, the United States government, and the Liberian government. The American representative, Dr. Charles S. Johnson, a professor at Fisk University, has lately gone to Liberia, and it is understood that the commission will start its inquiry some time in the spring. We print herewith a letter of protest and appeal to the League of Nations which describes the alleged conditions of native laborers in Liberia. It is signed by Thomas J. R. Faulkner, citizen of Liberia, who was a candidate for the presidency of Liberia in 1927. He was defeated by the present incumbent, Charles King. His letter, addressed to the League of Nations on June 20, 1929, and not hitherto printed, is as follows:

SIR ERIC DRUMMOND, Secretary-General
League of Nations
Geneva, Switzerland

SIR: It is because of my great interest in the native people of Liberia that I attempt, through you, to approach the League of Nations in behalf of these people and to protest the treatment they are at present subjected to.

The natives of Liberia are forced to work on the roads under the following conditions:

1. They are forced to work nine months of the year.
2. They are compelled to furnish their own tools.
3. They receive no compensation whatever for roadwork.
4. They are compelled to furnish their own food.
5. They are compelled to furnish food, i.e., rice and palm-oil, to the commissioner and to the soldiers who act as overseers.
6. Upon failure of the chief of a tribe to supply the demanded number of men, he is at once heavily fined and forced to pay cash forthwith or go to jail. Often these men are compelled to pawn their wives and children to get the money to pay these fines.
7. For the most trivial thing the laborers are fined small sums and forced to pay in cash, which is quite an impossibility. They often have to sell their food, which they have brought long distances, to get the money to meet these fines.
8. It is said that men on the roads are whipped so severely that they die from the injuries, but because high officials are implicated it has never been possible to get a report of the facts. The natives, of course, are afraid to inform against these powerful men.

As a result of this system of forced labor, the natives are leaving the country in large numbers. Mr. Raymond Leslie Buell, whose writings on Liberia are in every detail correct, speaks briefly of this fact in his work, "The Native Problem in Africa." Coupled with this condition of forced labor in Liberia, is the even more pernicious practice of shipping laborers to the island of Fernando Po. This is carried on by and through the high officials of the Liberian government, and it is therefore impossible to ask the courts, the legislature, or any other official agency to interfere, since all are creatures of the President and will not attempt to act. Thus this traffic in human beings goes on with impunity. The inducement to force the natives out of the country lies in the sum paid by the farmers of Fernando Po —£10 ($50) for each boy. This money is divided among the official classes of Liberia, and the poor native is without redress.

The legislature endeavored to put a stop to this shipment of laborers out of Liberia, but the counties of Sino and Maryland refused to be included in the law, since the Vice-President and Postmaster-General are the shipping agents from those counties, and the President is a party to the transaction.

Thus the law fell short of its final object and affected only the counties of Cape Mount, Grand Basa, and Montserrado. But even in these three counties the law is evaded. The shipping agents, whose names I mention below, ship boys from these counties as passengers to Sino, whence they are reshipped to Fernando Po. This is open violation of the law, yet it cannot be stopped. For the county of Maryland the Hon. Allen C. Yancy, Vice-President of Liberia, is the appointed shipping agent.

On one occasion, the native African Commissioner-General, the Hon. Reginald G. Sherman, on an official visit to the county of Sino saw the frontier soldiers being used to catch and detain boys for shipment to Fernando Po. He at once put a stop to it and reported it to the President. Mr. Sherman was immediately dismissed for his pains, and the shipping goes merrily on against the interest of the farmers of Liberia, as well as the Firestone Plantation works. Also, as stated above, this is fast depopulating the country, interfering with the getting of produce and the production of food products for the populace of the country.

The principal reason for my appeal to the League of Nations is that this condition of affairs cannot much longer exist in Liberia without resulting in bloodshed. President King feels that he is so well fortified as President of Liberia that he is immune from harm or influence in his demeanor as a self-instituted dictator of the little republic. Therefore I take this method in an attempt to prevent that which is sure to come if the League of Nations, of which Liberia is a member, does not in a friendly way interpose and stop this oppression of the native people—that is, a bloody fight or a revolution.

I would, if permitted, make this suggestion: Let the representatives at Monrovia of the nations who are members of the League be requested to make a report on the statements that I have made—as to their truthfulness and correctness—and then take such action as you deem best suited to give to the natives the relief we ask.

[Signed] THOMAS J. R. FAULKNER

Labor conditions in Liberia are of special interest to Americans because of the large amount of American capital invested there. The Firestone company, for instance, has extensive rubber plantations in Liberia. Raymond Leslie Buell, writing in The Nation of May 2, 1928, has this to say concerning the agreement between the Firestone company and the Liberian government by means of which the former is assisted in maintaining an uninterrupted supply of labor:

> One article of the Firestone Planting Agreement frankly provides that the Liberian government will "encourage and assist the efforts of the lessee to secure and maintain an adequate labor supply." The government has already established a labor bureau to furnish the . . . men. According to the Negro head of this bureau, Mr. Firestone pays to the government and the chiefs for each man recruited one cent per day. While there is no enactment obliging the men to work, the order of the chief is, in fact, law and few dare disobey it.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 5, 1930 No. 3374

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 257

EDITORIALS:

Godlessness and Humbuggery 260
A Crisis at London.. 261
Cutthroat Competition 261
The Newer History... 262
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN............................. 263
HEADLESS WASHINGTON. By Oswald Garrison Villard........ 264
PARITY OR REDUCTION? By Norman Angell.................. 266
DIVORCE—AND AFTER. III. DIVORCE AND THE CHILD. A Personal Narrative.. 268
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter......................... 270
CORRESPONDENCE 270
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.............................. 271

BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:

Park in the Gathering Dusk. By Eda Lou Walton.............. 272
The Pretensions of Humanism. By Henry Hazlitt............. 272
"All That Glitters—" By Fred T. Marsh...................... 273
Economics and Ethics. By Henry Raymond Mussey............ 273
Aggressive Pacifism. By Norman Thomas..................... 274
The Sex Racket. By Benjamin Ginzburg...................... 274
The Hero of San Jacinto. By W. J. Ghent.................... 274
Books in Brief.. 276
Drama: Turn to the Left. By Henry Hazlitt.................. 278
Films: Inflated "Grandeur." By Alexander Bakshy............ 280

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Haiti—a Plan for Self-Government. By L. J. de Bekker........ 282

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
Dramatic Editor Literary Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

WE AGREE WITH SENATOR NORRIS that the President by one sentence could "wipe out corruption in law enforcement." Not literally, of course. But what the Senator has in mind, we suppose, is one outspoken and indignant denunciation by the President of government officials who play politics and are recreant to their oaths, and a declaration that he will, in so far as he has the power, see to it that they are punished if faithless and rewarded if faithful. To this should be coupled the statement that politics must be banned from the prohibition enforcement unit. The trouble with Mr. Hoover is that no one really knows where he stands—despite his talk of prohibition's being a noble experiment. As long as he fails to take a clear-cut stand, as long as he is as silent about the playing of politics within the enforcement ranks as he was about the corruption in the Harding Cabinet of which he was a member, the enforcement officials, too often appointed for, by, and with politics, will play any game but the right one. It is this sort of thing which makes sincere prohibitionists declare that the law has never really had a trial. Certainly no Executive has so far acted as if he had the law really at heart. As long as the politicians are allowed to have their way with the enforcement service it is idle to expect that it will be other than inefficient and corrupt.

OUR ANTI-TRUST LEGISLATION and its application continue to be the despair of the economist and the picture puzzle of the lawyer. On February 15 the government filed a suit against nineteen California oil companies to enjoin them from "conspiracy to maintain an unfair price for gasoline," although the major companies, at least, were operating under a Trade Practice Conference code, including agreements for posting prices and adhering to them. The Department of Commerce and the Attorney General need to get together. On February 22 the Standard Oil Company of New York and the Vacuum Oil Company announced plans for a billion-dollar merger. Both companies are former subsidiaries of the old Standard Oil Company, dissolved under the anti-trust act in 1911. One does a general oil refining and marketing business, the other makes and sells lubricants; so their business is complementary. The Department of Justice is expected (and it may be added desired) to bring an appropriate suit in equity to test the validity of the merger, which counsel for the companies believe to be legal.

ON THE SAME DAY with the announcement of the Standard and Vacuum Oil merger and projected suit, the Interstate Commerce Commission gave its approval of the merger, with an expected operating economy of ten million dollars a year, of the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern Railways into a 15,000-mile system which will dominate the Northwestern territory between Minneapolis and the Pacific Coast, though it will have competition from the Milwaukee. Thus far have we traveled since 1901, when the Supreme Court in the Northern Securities case dissolved the Northern Pacific-Great Northern merger in effect at that time. In approving the present merger, however, the commission required the merged roads to break up their present system by divesting themselves of their 97 per cent ownership of the Burlington, which gives them access to Chicago, as the commission's plan, presumably in pursuit of the lofty ideal of competition, calls for the erection of the Burlington into a separate system. The commission points out, however, that it is not now denying the Northern lines a permanent entrance into the Chicago district. All three of these cases illustrate afresh the difficulties inherent in the attempt to secure the benefits of unified organization or operation at the same time that we continue our ill-advised policy of trying to maintain competition unimpaired.

THAT JUDGE THOMAS D. THACHER of New York has been willing to resign the life position in the federal judiciary which he has been holding in order to become Solicitor General is a remarkable happening. Once a federal judge always a federal judge has been the rule, especially when one has made such a name for oneself as has Judge Thacher. He has won golden opinions from the bench and the bar for his learning and his industry. Everyone has believed that he had only to wait a few years to be certain of promotion, probably to our highest court. Before that tribunal he will now appear as government advocate in many, many cases. As such he will have a greater opportunity than any other attorney to impress his personality, his knowledge, and his concepts of public policy upon the members of the Supreme Court. That will not hurt his chances for future appointment should he decide to reenter the judiciary; it may even open up to him other avenues for governmental service, just as John W. Davis, after being Solicitor General, became Ambassador to London and nominee for the Presidency. President Hoover has made an admirable appointment; and the government acquires a gifted, liberal, and broad-minded official.

BANK FAILURES CONTINUE to be one of our national scandals. In 1929, according to government figures, suspensions involved almost twice as much depositors' money as in 1928. The number of suspended banks in 1929 is reported as 633, and their deposits were $257,000,000. Most of these failures as usual were in the Western and Southern States. More than 87 per cent of the failed banks were not in the Federal Reserve system, and were operating, of course, under State charters. In Nebraska the situation is particularly bad, for that State some years ago optimistically undertook the guaranty of bank deposits. As a consequence of bank failures it has an obligation of $20,000,000 with no money left in the fund to discharge it. Shall the deficit be met by general taxation or by increasing the levy on the banks that still remain solvent? This, however, is only a local aspect of the problem, which is itself national. The suffering and loss involved in these failures justify the attention which Congress appears ready to give to banking as soon as the tariff abomination is out of the way. Banking standards have undoubtedly been too lax in the farm regions. It is doubtful whether anyone should be allowed to undertake the responsibility of financing a community when he has only from $10,000 to $25,000 of capital to put up; yet if small banks are to be abolished, how are our small communities to have their farming and mercantile operations financed? We are the only people in the world disgraced and burdened by bank failures, and parts of our own country are free of them. It will be inexcusable, then, if means cannot be found of attaining for all communities that minimum requirement of banking, namely, safety.

THE CASE OF RUTH ST. CLAIR, first woman to be sentenced for life under the New York Baumes laws, excited a great deal of protest when the sentence was pronounced a week or so ago. It was pointed out that four crimes of shoplifting do not in themselves constitute such a threat to the public as to warrant shutting a person up for life at public expense because of them. But Mrs. St. Clair's complete dossier has been made public by the Municipal Parole Commission and it is evident that while it is altogether undesirable to incarcerate her for the rest of her life in Auburn Prison, some form of restraint is desirable for a case so plainly pathological as hers. Incorrigible, a runaway from her hard-working parents, defiant, tempestuous, untruthful, and at the same time ingratiating and charming to those who sought to help her, the girl presented a case with which social workers are only too familiar. Her attitude officially from the age of 13 and probably much earlier was definitely anti-social. But for those persons who have ceased to believe in "natural cussedness" without a good and sufficient reason, the case of Ruth St. Clair should not be closed without the services of a competent psychiatrist, without the most expert and painstaking attempts to discover, if possible, wherein her deep-seated quarrel with society lies, and again, if possible, to remove it. One of the most grievous defects of our prison system is that we have provision for no such treatment for prisoners; nor, if psychiatric treatment proves ineffective, for restraint except under the old system of bolts and bars, silence, bad food, and the soul-destroying routine of the prison.

FINANCIAL PROVISION for a few, rather than a straight out-and-out old age pension system, is the unsatisfactory aim of four bills recently introduced in the New York Assembly. The distinguishing features of the new system, as set out in the report of a commission that has been studying the subject, are the extension of aid to needy persons in their homes, thus allowing them to continue their occupations but supplementing their inadequate earnings with public allowances, and an equal division of the financial burden of relief between the State and the counties or cities. By this plan, it is pointed out, a farmer who under the usual procedure would not be able to obtain public relief unless he sold his farm and entered a poorhouse will be enabled to retain his farm and earn what he can, the State or municipal government contributing the difference, to an amount not exceeding in general fifty dollars a month, between what can be earned and what is needed for support. Practically, of course, this is only a modified scheme of poor relief, available, as it happens, only for dependent persons who are seventy years old, but with some of the stigma of charity taken away and the poorhouse thrust into the background. The new plan, if it is adopted, will doubtless be better than what we now have, but at best it can only insure public aid to a few, not to all.

THE INDEPENDENT LABOR PARTY loses the support of J. Ramsay MacDonald, easily its most distinguished member, the British Prime Minister having given notice that he does not intend to continue his annual subscription to the party funds. The reason for Mr. MacDonald's withdrawal is not stated, but it is natural to conjecture that he has become somewhat weary of the persistent and at times violent opposition in the House of Commons of the extreme radicals of the Labor movement, led by James Maxton, and has decided to part company with a handful of nominal followers who cannot be counted upon to support any government policy. Undoubtedly Mr. MacDonald's action involves some political risks, since even with the Independent Labor members the Labor Party is in a minority in the House, but it may well be that a united Labor front, unbroken by defections at critical moments, will strengthen rather than weaken the government. Something may also be gained, perhaps, from the division of opinion which Lord Rothermere's new United Empire Party may make in the Conservative ranks, although the prospects of the new party, with its futile slogan of free trade within the Empire, do not seem to be very bright.

THE GENEVA TARIFF conference, called to pave the way for a "tariff truce" such as was contemplated in general by a convention drawn up at Geneva last year, made only a beginning, apparently not a very large one, in a task which promises to engage more and more the attention of Europe. Ever since a number of European and American bankers, in 1926, set their names to a statement sharply arraigning the evils of high and discriminating tariffs, there has been a steadily growing agitation in favor of calling a halt in tariff building preparatory to lowering the barriers that have already been set up. The conclusion of any collective working agreement at this time, however, proved too much for the conference, especially after Giuseppi Bottai, Italian Minister of Corporations, had pronounced the scheme "premature" and "inapplicable," and the general session ended with the creation of two committees, one to draft an agreement for a tariff truce, the other to consider means of facilitating the reduction of duties. The object aimed at is so admirable that it is to be hoped the committees, which set to work at once, may not be discouraged by the great difficulties to be overcome.

VICTORY FOR THE GOVERNMENT, defeat of labor and liberal groups, and an obvious trend toward the dominance of two national parties are the outstanding results of the general election in Japan. Premier Yuko Hamaguchi continues in power with a majority of more than thirty seats in the lower house of the Diet, and with substantial gains in rural districts which had previously supported the Seiyukai, or leading opposition party. The defeat of the proletarian parties, 90 per cent of whose candidates were rejected, is attributed in part to the workings of a system of proportional representation and the political instability of a considerable portion of the electorate under a universal male suffrage which is still new, but the main reason appears to have been the lack of unity and organization in the Labor following. The election turned wholly upon domestic issues and, as usual, upon personalities, but the victory of the present government with an increased majority will undoubtedly strengthen the position of the Japanese delegation at the London conference. Japanese business interests are naturally gratified at the prospect of continued governmental support for the gold standard and a balanced budget.

THE RESIGNATION of Cardinal Gasparri as Papal Secretary of State removes from Italian public life one of its really outstanding figures. The heat of religious controversy may have blinded many to his distinguished services in behalf of peace during the war, and in behalf of international reconciliation afterwards. The Papal peace note of August, 1917, was largely his work. Although ineffective, it was of great importance as an expression of the Gasparri policy of resistance to the attempts of certain factions within the Roman Catholic church to tie the fortunes of the Vatican with one or another of the contending groups. After the war the policy was maintained. The Vatican condemned the French invasion of the Ruhr and other manifestations of extreme nationalism. The Cardinal's services to his church, of course, are historic. He brought the Vatican out of the war with increased prestige, initiated the series of concordats which solidified its position in Europe, and negotiated the Lateran treaties which put an end to the Roman Question. Personally, Cardinal Gasparri is a scholarly and humane man, and, within the limits fixed by his office, a sincere liberal. Of his successor, Cardinal Pacelli, little is known save that he is a shrewd and experienced negotiator.

NO FEWER THAN 15,060 German women are now attending the German universities and institutes of higher education, out of a total enrolment of 98,000 students, which is in marked contrast to the total of scarcely 3,000 women who were admitted to university lectures in the year prior to the war. As many as 2,079 women are now studying at the University of Berlin, 1,367 at that of Munich, 827 at the University of Cologne, and 682 in Hamburg. The South German universities are also popular, there being 1,202 women in Bonn, and 885 in Freiburg. It is interesting to note that 194 of the total are studying theology in contrast to 11 who were preparing for the church in 1912, while 1,511 women are now studying political economy and law. To medicine 3,141 women are dedicating themselves, while over 10,000 have registered with the various philosophical faculties—in the latter group being included all women who are fitting themselves for teaching and desire a general education. There is even one in Munich who is seeking to become a veterinary surgeon. When one remembers that the universities were not wholly opened to women until the war came and that the first high school for girls was not established until 1885, when the Victoria Lycee was founded in Berlin thanks largely to the English-born Empress Frederick, the increased number of women seeking higher degrees in Germany seems nothing less than astounding.

THE ADVENTURE OF ADMIRAL BYRD and his men at the South Pole is almost over. After a year of white earth they are on their way back to a green one, and the contrast must surely be refreshing to their spirits. In spite of the daily radio communication with the camp at Little America, it is doubtful if the New York Times correspondent, Russell Owen, really told the inside story of life there. Nor will Byrd or his men tell it—for publication—when they get back. But it would be well worth while, we suspect, to be able to hear honest reminiscences of a year in which human wants were reduced to a minimum, in which living conditions were different in almost every respect from those to which the group was accustomed. There were, to be sure, the most intricate and delicate of machines—the airplane, the camera, the radio, and instruments for calculating distances, altitude, weather, the shape of the earth, the depth of the ice, the height of the mountains. But there was not a leaf or a bird, not even a camp cat unless Mr. Owen forgot to mention it. There was food only out of cans. We should like to hear more of this camp: how about the hot water? Was it cold when you got up in the mornings? Was it ever anything else but cold? Did your coffee freeze while you lighted a cigarette? Did the supply of cigarettes last? Mr. Owen can go on reporting steadily. Meanwhile his companions on shipboard are doubtless improving their time by reading their letters over again, and we at home, protected alike from the perils and the thrills of adventure, can be grateful that the ship got a good start, that the party is so far safe, that the year of exploration and adventure is evidently to end so auspiciously. We shall be relieved to hear that the ice is past and open water and home ahead.

Godlessness and Humbuggery

THE renewed attacks upon the godlessness of the Union of Soviet Republics need surprise no one. It was about time for a new line of attack to develop, and the Soviet leaders, with their usual complete incapacity to judge the effect of their acts upon public opinion abroad, have given their enemies the desired opening. This anti-religious slant is, of course, not a new policy; it has been prominent from the beginning despite certain provisions in the Soviet constitution which on their face guarantee freedom of worship. The Soviet rulers have been as eager to be known as anti-religious as they are quick to resent the theory that they are democrats temporarily lured from their moorings. They are not democrats, and they have been as outspokenly opposed to all churches as they could well be. What they have done lately is simply to increase the anti-religious pressure in certain places with the result that, as Walter Duranty cables from Paris to the New York Times, there are harsher and more widespread attacks upon the Soviets than at any time in the last seven years, especially in Germany, England, and France, though each country gives quite different reasons for its outburst. To these have been added the protests of the Pope, of the Church of England headed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with our own Bishop Manning following suit here, and from all over the world very genuine protests from Jews deeply moved by the sufferings of their co-religionists in the territory of the Soviets.

The Nation has never for one moment been recreant to its belief in religious liberty. It must therefore be highly critical of the anti-religious policy of the Russian state in so far as it affects the right of the individual to worship as he pleases. We cannot, however, permit ourselves to be humbugged by all this sudden outcry against the Soviets. Much of it is purely fake. Thus, Senator Borah has disposed of the false charge that fourteen rabbis were about to be executed; eleven are free and the others will soon be released. Again, it has been admitted in London by the Tories that they are exploiting this outcry in the hope of ousting Ramsay MacDonald from office, and by Sidney M. Dawkins, general secretary of the Council of Christian Protest, that of the many atrocities they and the Archbishop of Canterbury have lately been citing not one has occurred since 1918! That adequately stamps the whole crusade.

For some time past, however, there has been plenty of evidence that the present rulers of the Soviets were themselves going back upon the original constitutional guaranty of freedom of worship. For instance, there was issued on April 8, 1929, a sweeping decree of some 6,000 words prescribing the rules to govern every phase of existent religious organizations. Their expenditures are minutely prescribed —even the repair of their buildings, the hiring of janitors, the acquisition of wood for fuel. Under this decree "religious societies and groups of believers do not enjoy the rights of juridical bodies." After being thus deprived of a legal existence the churches are dealt with in detail to the extent of sixty-eight paragraphs. Despite these handicaps the churches in Russia have been operating ever since the edict was published in the Izvestia at the end of April. As Malcolm MacDonald, son of the British Prime Minister, informed the House of Commons on February 19, he himself had no trouble in worshiping in Moscow a few months ago in company with 1,000 other persons.

Moreover, the Metropolitan Sergius, the present chief patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church, has supported the attitude of the Soviets by declaring that religious propaganda is allowed, that there are no brutalities toward individual church ministers, and that there has been no repression by the Soviets of believers and clergymen for their religious beliefs, "but for anti-government acts just as for other citizens." He repeated this interview to the American and English correspondents the next day, and among other things denounced the Pope of Rome as the enemy of the Orthodox church because "the Catholic church under the Pope's leadership in Poland alone in 1929 forcibly confiscated 500 Orthodox Russian churches, converting them to Catholic uses. As far as we know, no archbishops in England or elsewhere acted against these Catholic violences." Indeed, it seems to us, too, that the Pope does not come into court with very clean hands. In this connection we would refer our readers to our issue of January 15 last, in which will be found from the pen of our Moscow correspondent, Louis Fischer, a detailed narrative of the relations between the Vatican and the Kremlin since 1922. It is here clearly shown that the Pope was constantly negotiating with the Bolsheviks with a view to taking over the ruins of the Greek Catholic church. During all these years he could have protested against Bolshevik anti-religious persecutions quite as warmly as he has recently. And so could Bishop Manning and all the rest, because hundreds of persons have been punished on all sorts of ridiculous and trumped-up charges meant to hide the fact that they were really being exiled or imprisoned because of their religious activity.

Walter Duranty undoubtedly puts his finger on what is back of a great deal of this sudden passion on behalf of those Russians who are being deprived of their religion. It is the growing economic menace that the Soviet state offers to the trade of Europe. It is able to dump its products abroad at any figure that it chooses in order to get the foreign monies which it needs so direfully. It is dumping matches, textiles, and gasoline at cut rates. The Russians believe that they are saving 40 per cent of the cost of production in other countries, because they have done away with big salaries, high-pressure salesmanship, advertising, and the other inevitable accompaniments of capitalist competition. This alone would make them formidable competitors. When, however, they dump their products at almost any price, since, as Duranty says, if they get only a fraction above the cost of transportation "that fraction will be profit to the Soviet state—profit because it would be something added to Soviet wealth from abroad"—it is not surprising that Europe begins to strike back in any way that it can. Its leaders are doubtless thankful for the stupidity and folly and anti-religious intolerance of the Soviets, which gives them so welcome an opportunity to stir the religious world.

A Crisis at London

UNLESS something radical is done, and done quickly, to straighten out the extraordinary situation at London, the London conference is likely to go down in history as one of the most disastrous attempts at international cooperation in which the United States has ever engaged. Two problems in particular, both of grave seriousness, confront the American delegation. The first is to insure the attainment of one of the two main purposes for which the conference was called, namely, the actual reduction of existing naval armaments. The second is to avoid entangling the United States in a European security pact. For the existence of both of these problems in their present acute form the Hoover Administration and its delegation at London are so far responsible that the failure of the conference, if that calamity should happen, would be properly chargeable to the United States more than to any other Power.

The statement issued by the French delegation on February 11, calling for 724,479 English tons of naval craft by the end of 1936, with 240,000 tons of that amount to be built during the period, contained nothing new except the figures. Weeks before the American delegation, surrounded by an imposing array of experts and helpers and attended by a squad of uniformed marines, departed from New York the French government, in an elaborate memorandum to the British government, had traversed comprehensively the business of the conference and outlined in detail the position of France regarding its naval needs.

Instead of showing that it had grasped this situation and was prepared to meet it, the American delegation has strewn its course with some amazing blunders, in all of which, apparently, it had the approbation of Washington. When Mr. MacDonald, the question of battleships having been thrown to the fore, proposed to consider at once the abolition of that type of vessel, Mr. Stimson turned him down; the conference had been called to deal with cruisers, and there must be no interference with that grand design. A single preliminary skirmish over the abolition of submarines caused Mr. Stimson to throw up his hands, and the fight was lost before it had fairly begun. An exhibition of bungling that was a disgrace to American diplomacy concealed the fact, until an alert press forced it out, that the United States, champion of armament reduction, was actually proposing to build another battleship at a cost of from $35,000,000 to $50,000,000. The publication of the French statement of February 11, followed by the overthrow of the Tardieu Government, completed the moral rout of the embattled Americans, this time with the British close at their heels. It was matter of common knowledge that M. Tardieu's tenure was precarious, as it was that no succeeding ministry would be likely to modify greatly the French demands, and that any modification that might be conceded would still leave the way open to largely increased building; but the Stimson aggregation could only betake itself to gloom and leave the correspondents to cable that reduction was no longer even a pleasing hope.

The second problem is equally grave. France is willing to trade tonnage for a security pact, with the covert understanding that the United States shall be one of the guarantors. It is the old game of maneuvering the United States into burning its fingers with European quarrels, yet the American delegation is actually reported as not wholly unfavorable to the suggestion. Senator Robinson, to be sure, has spoken out in reiteration of the time-honored American policy of keeping America free, but it was immediately noted that he did not wholly close the door; while Mr. Hoover, fresh from his fishing exploits in Southern waters, allows himself to be represented as deterred from entertaining the proposal, not because he himself will have none of it, but from fear of the irreconcilables in the Senate. In other words, where the reply of the American delegation should have been a prompt and emphatic "No," there is real danger that the delegation, with the tacit acquiescence of Mr. Hoover, may allow the United States to become entangled in the net which France has spread for it, and that America, in addition to losing the naval reduction which it hoped for, may emerge from the conference with its hands tied. If that is the outcome, it will mean that the danger of war will be greater after the conference than it was before.

It is time that the country waked up to the significance of what is going on at London and Washington. An unprepared and inept delegation at the Ritz is losing its grip on the realities of the armament situation, and a political trimmer at the White House is aiding the decline. The American people want naval armaments reduced and limited, but they also want to see American independence scrupulously preserved. They are not yet ready to barter statesmanship at London for a dreary program of backing, filling, and drift, nor statesmanship at Washington for a record catch of sailfish on a Presidential junket.

Cutthroat Competition

IN one industry after another unlimited competition, the main reliance of the public for good quality and fair prices, continues the suicidal process of cutting its own throat and making necessary some other plan of industrial control. A few days ago it was announced that the automobile tire industry had passed into new hands, with Cyrus S. Eaton, of Cleveland, and his associates controlling Goodyear, and the omnivorous and omnicompetent Du Ponts controlling the United States Rubber Company. In 1920 there were 300 tire companies; today there are 30.

There is something like $10,000,000,000 invested in rubber, and the industry has paid its stockholders only about 2 per cent over the past ten years, as a friendly Congress and Supreme Court have not seen fit to guarantee the rubber industry a "fair return" like that which they would insure to railroads and public utilities. Yet, somehow, despite financial disaster, the industry has grown. When the British government, after a vain six-year effort to keep up the profits of rubber planters by enforcing the Stevenson export restriction act, in 1928 raised the ban, large quantities of stored crude rubber were thrown on the market. The American rubber companies, overstocked with high-priced rubber, suffered huge losses. In addition, excess capacity during recent years has caused fatally sharp competition, and great numbers of the weaker companies have dropped out of the running. Several mergers are now expected, and the industry, to quote Leslie Gould in the New York Evening Post, "is believed to be entering upon a more stabilized phase, with cooperation substituted for 'cutthroat' competition in the marketing of the finished product and the law of supply and demand governing the crude product." In other words, the days of old-fashioned competition in tire manufacture are thought to be over.

In oil production there is a comparable, though entirely dissimilar, story. Two of the Standard companies, in an effort to discourage drilling, some weeks ago cut the price paid for crude oil, the Sinclair and Prairie Oil and Gas companies at first refusing to follow their lead. But oil production plus imports is far above current demands, Texas alone producing 175,000 barrels a day more than it can sell, despite the fact that crude-oil producers are "prorating themselves to death," as one authority puts it. In plain language, while existing producers limit their output, new wells are being brought in so fast that the price cannot be maintained. The American Petroleum Institute meanwhile is hard at work trying to bring about operation of each oil pool as a unit. In consequence of the uncontrollable crude production, stocks of refined oil pile up. Gasoline stocks were 31,000,000 barrels at the end of August, and 47,000,000 at the end of January. The spring motoring season will open on April 1 with stocks 6,000,000 barrels in excess of the corresponding figure last year. So the hard-headed Standard companies, faced with the competition of "distress" gasoline, have cut gasoline prices in the Middle West to help carry off the excess. Unrestricted competition in crude production is creating conditions with which the highly organized and skilfully managed refining companies are having difficulty in contending.

A third interesting example is cited in the recent address of Mr. Frank Haas, of Philadelphia, before the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers. Mr. Haas declares that the depression in coal mining is due primarily to speculation in coal lands, and urges a most ingenious plan of government ownership of such lands, with private operation of the mines, as the way out. Mr. C. E. Bockus, president of the National Coal Association, opposes Mr. Haas's specific suggestion, yet asserts that the industry is suffering from "uneconomic, unreasonable, and unfair competition" and fatal overproduction.

All three of these industries, widely different in their individual circumstances, teach the same lesson that our suffering agriculture proclaims with a voice heard to heaven, namely, that unorganized private competition is incompetent to bring about a stable production at prices that will give producers fair remuneration. Where they can, intelligent business men in self-protection organize their industry, and we then proceed against them for monopoly. None the less, industry has got to be organized, will be organized, is being organized. That organization must be controlled to the end of public advantage, not purely private profit. Mr. Haas puts his finger on a vitally important element in such control, for there is truth in the words of the old Indian land grant quoted by Henry George: "To whomsoever the soil at any time belongs, to him belong the fruits of it. White parasols, and elephants mad with pride, are the flowers of a grant of land."

The Newer History

PEOPLE who wonder why history is forever being rewritten and why the "facts," once they have been collected and verified, somehow do not seem to stay put will find some interesting answers to their questioning in the presidential address which Professor James Harvey Robinson gave last December before the annual meeting of the American Historical Association at Durham, North Carolina. According to Professor Robinson, it is not enough that history should be authentic; authenticity, as a rule, is much the easiest part of the historian's task. Documents, indispensable though they are, need to be interpreted, and interpretation registers not only changes in public opinion, in the way in which peoples and governments look at things, but changes also in the kind of material of which history makes use.

The present generation, for example, has relegated to the lumber-room most of the "national" or "patriotic" history that was once a pride. Only perfervid aggregations like the American D. A. R. would be likely to welcome today the kind of history that gave Bancroft his fame, and only the followers of Hugenberg in Germany would be pleased if another Treitschke were at work. The taste for partisan history has been sadly dulled, for partisanship means prejudice and prejudice never gives us the whole truth.

Professor Robinson is very much for internationalism as a point of view, whatever he may think of things done in its name. "Since the war," he reminds us, "there have been established a world council, a world court, and, latterly, a world bank. . . . The most skeptical must see, in all these, unprecedented gestures in the furtherance of human unification. It may be that the last mentioned, the world bank, may ere long be speaking more convincingly than either league or court." But he goes farther, and sees the so-called prehistory of the archaeologist and the ethnologist displaced by an earlier prehistory which shall include animal psychology. Years ago he was startling his historical colleagues by urging the recognition of what was then a doubtful prehistory. Today he commends the work of Köhler, Pavlov, Yerxes, and others "as essential contributions to the historian's problems."

So, for the scholar at least, the range expands. The historian, like Wesley, is to take the world for his parish. International interests in every form—finance, commerce, labor, food supply, communication, population movements, peace, war, politics, the Russian menace to world capitalism, and the thrust of a new India and a new China at empire and the tradition of "backward races"—all are to be the preferred grist for the historian's mill. The intellectual history which Professor Robinson himself has done much to illuminate must have discarded its nationalist partitions, for ideas belong to mankind and the radio will soon enable the whole world to listen in. It is a devastating invasion of the established academic order, this coming of an international mind, and there will doubtless be many in the American professoriate to resist or decry it, but the trend is clear. The newer history will be foolishness if it prophesies; it will be wisdom if it interprets the past in world terms.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

FISH can't tell time nor keep a discerning eye upon the calendar. And so when Saturday dawned hot as spring I thought the pickerel might be fooled and not realize that they were out of season. Possibly the scheme of mine was treacherous. A fish should not be either caught or somewhat flabbergasted before his proper time. In all truth I caught nothing, but I undoubtedly frightened a few. Possibly a lasting neurosis may cause a fish as much tribulation as one brave but losing fight against a determined angler. And one I would have landed, maybe more, but for the fact that my treachery was met in kind. When I went through the woods in the direction of Diana's Cove a dog followed me.

He was a stranger to me, but he seemed amiable and well intentioned. I didn't particularly want him, for we had nothing in common. Soothingly, I spoke to him about going back to wherever he came from and he wagged knowingly and continued to follow after. Whenever I said "Nice dog," he vibrated ecstatically as if starved for compliments. I, myself, have found that it has been rather a lean year for kind words. Yet soon it was apparent that this dog responded merely to tones in the human voice. I never saw a dog with a poorer conception of the precise meaning of words. He had practically no vocabulary. To him, "Get the hell out of here" sounded just the same as "Nice dog." He shook with joy each time he was commanded to be gone. I grew imperious and even so failed to read my lines with any marked success. I called him "bad dog" and many other things more harsh, and he continued to caper and grin.

Pantomime was also useless. The little play which I acted out for his benefit went completely over his head. Since he did not seem so very bright I hammered my part grossly and underscored all the points. It would have been what the average New York critic calls a "great performance." There was no subtlety. All the strokes were as broad as those of Miss Cornell in her latest box-office triumph, "Dishonored Lady." Seemingly it was his notion that this was just the beginning and that the comedy might grow clearer as it proceeded. Although dumb he was polite and never coughed or laughed in the wrong places. Maybe it wasn't a comedy. I was trying desperately to portray a man terribly intent upon being alone. This, I imagine, is really tragedy because the protagonist is always crushed in the end by men or Airedales that want to tag along.

My next thought was that the whole situation might be cleared up if only I could happen upon his name. This at least should be a word he would know. Lacking such identification, the phrase "bad dog" might seem to him merely a tirade against the species in general, and nobody ever takes blanket indictments personally. Although this angling kibitzer wore no collar nor any other identifying mark, it did not seem to me impossible to dive into the random and come out with his precise title. It may be hard to guess the name of a princess, but Airedales are christened out of a most limited imagination. This dog was Airedale in part but there had been at least one drop of spaniel blood and the law of Mendel operated savagely against him.

The experiment of identification proved a complete failure, but it was no fault of mine. Possibly he had a name unusual in some degree but I doubt if that was the difficulty. He wagged violently for "Rover," barked appreciatively at "Sport," and when I called him "Tige" he rolled over on his back in sheer joy. If anybody ever told him, "My name is the symbol of my identity and must not be lost," he quite evidently had forgotten the phrase. Of pride in precise personality he possessed not an atom. I decided that he had probably been the youngest puppy in a considerable family and, through being much put upon, had adopted a regressive anonymity as a defense mechanism.

Without much hope of success, I tried the final experiment of picking up a stick and waving it at him in a menacing way. I am not a good menacer and he merely mistook this for another game and entered into the sport wholeheartedly. After that I gave up and tried to accept, with as much philosophy as I could muster, the fact that I was doomed to spend the afternoon with a fool. By previous experience I knew that the experience although painful would not necessarily prove fatal. Later my estimate of the Airedale (I decided for no particular reason to call him Harold, after an editor) was completely changed. Harold was not a defective but a shrewd and calculating scoundrel. That developed as soon as I began to fish. Before we reached the lake he trod lightly over the dead leaves and created no commotion. While I was baiting the hook he grew animated about the bacon, but desisted when slapped on the nose and he sat satisfactorily silent while I lowered the line.

Scarcely five minutes had elapsed when there came a terrific tug on the line. One man's guess is as good as another's in such matters, and, according to my estimate, such a wrench could have come from nothing less than a five- or ten-pound pickerel. I never knew or shall know, for as I waited for the monster to impale himself more definitely on the hook Harold leaped up from his reclining position and began to roll about in the leaves behind me. Naturally the pickerel did not remain in any close contact with the bait. He was convinced that some mastodon was roaming through the birches and he hurried deep into the eel grass. Having given the alarm, Harold relapsed into relaxation and grinned at me foolishly as if this deed of his were no more than an aimless infantile prank. I looked at him severely, but he met my gaze steadily and there was no hint of a malicious intelligence working against my best interest.

The next time the fish may have been an ounce or so smaller but he was more definitely committed to the hook. Only a single twist of the wrist was needed to pin him fast. But that thrust was not delivered. Harold was up on the instant and into the lake with a long shallow dive. The frightened fish broke away, but he was not too frightened to take my bacon with him. I no longer hated Harold. According to his lights he behaved patriotically. His was a class war. A sophisticated person with a finely chiseled and molded mind had matched his wits against creatures primitive and dumb. Harold knew which side he was on.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Headless Washington

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Washington, February 20

THAT is what Washington is—utterly headless. The breakdown of leadership is really appalling. I doubt whether it has ever before been as bad, for the problems of government steadily grow more involved, more difficult, and more numerous, and call more and more for vision, ability, and consistent statesmanship if they are to be solved. One has the feeling that everybody in Washington is floundering in a situation which he cannot control. One wonders whether the whole system is not cracking. When one beholds three important investigations going on simultaneously; when one watches the Senators trying frantically to keep up with their work on committees of inquiry in addition to their regular committee and Senatorial work; when one visualizes the multitude of problems which are half solved, or are waiting solution at every turn, such as Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam, the Mississippi flood prevention, the inland waterways situation, to say nothing of the railroads, prohibition, the tariff, and all the rest, one is compelled to ask oneself whether the business of government has not become too complex and too difficult for the machinery we set up in 1789.

The chief failure is, of course, in the White House itself. Not that anybody should have expected anything else. Mr. Hoover has never shown moral courage, nor the capacity for leadership, since his Belgian days. As Secretary of Commerce the whole philosophy of his job was to collate figures, to progress in the coordination of industry by means of trade understandings and agreements—which may yet be held in court to violate our laws—and then to smooth the way for big business in every legitimate manner. Why should one have expected a complete change in the moral make-up of the man or in his political theory when he reached the White House? The entire legislative situation here in Washington today is due to Hoover's inability to refuse to promise the extra session to Senator Borah when Herbert Hoover, still a candidate, was striving for the goal of his ambition. He did not dare say no to the Senator from Idaho for fear that he would lose the farmers' vote. The extra session has come and gone, we are at the end of the third month of the regular session, and there isn't the slightest prospect whatever that the farmers will get any of the tariff aid which, together with the creation of the Federal Farm Board, was the object of the special session.

You cannot lead a nation that way, not even if you have the Republican leaders to breakfast every day in the week, and especially not if you have the kind of leaders to handle whom Mr. Hoover has to ask to his table. Watson, Tilson, Longworth, Snell, Wesley Jones, McNary, Wood, Andy Mellon—not a real idea, much less a principle, in a carload of such as these. But how in turn can they be blamed? After the White House breakfast on February 17, there was the usual press talk that the President was now "going to take a hand"; that he would "warn Congress sternly," especially the Senate, that something would happen if they did not move. It was suggested that he was on the point of going over the heads of the legislators to appeal to the country. All of this sort of thing until a day later the Washington Star appeared with the reassuring but hardly unexpected headline that Mr. Hoover had decided not to interfere with Congress. It was a wise decision, for the truth is that when he asked at his own breakfast table whether he could do anything to hasten the Senate he was bluntly informed that if he tried to do anything it would be disastrous. To such a pass has come the "leader of his party." It remained for a Democrat, Congressman Garner of Texas, to speak the truth in meeting. Declaring that "the titular Republican leader in the White House is either lacking in courage or capacity to lead," Mr. Garner added that there is not a Republican leader in the Senate or House "who has the faintest idea of what the President wants, and, worse still, they haven't the slightest idea that he wants anything particularly constructive or progressive." The apparent failure of the London conference makes it clear that the President has blundered there in letting the delegation go abroad without a clear-cut policy determined in advance and a readiness to achieve some disarmament come what might. And Mr. Hoover sorely needed a success in foreign affairs to conceal his nakedness at home!

Now the astonishing thing about it is that many of the problems which confront the government are those in which Mr. Hoover was supposed to have shown peculiar fitness and capacity. They are economic problems, business problems, often engineering problems; for the political issues are being steadily shoved aside for business and economic ones. If the President has convictions and yet gives no clear-cut, convincing note, he is without courage. Never did a man need more to study the career of Grover Cleveland. In his second term that President aroused a storm of hostility. He, too, was charged with being the servant of big business, but at least no one could doubt where he stood or what he wanted. It is simply impossible to think of Mr. Hoover's doing what Mr. Cleveland did when he wanted reelection—plumping for a tariff for revenue only when all his advisers told him that if he came out for that his defeat would be certain. To this he replied: "Very well, gentlemen, then we shall be defeated." If Mr. Hoover ever does anything to electrify the country in some such way, the Washington corps of journalists will surely lose a number of its members from heart failure. At present he sits in the White House and sulks, calling the Senators every kind of name, yet unable to make a stepping-stone of his dead self and stir the country by taking a militant position and assuming the leadership not merely of his party, but of the whole country.

Still another reason why he cannot do this is that he, like the rest of Washington, is without a definite program, either political or economic. Here he is no worse and no better than the men in Congress—not even the Progressive group, which remains the one hopeful portent in the entire situation. Most people in Washington do not know that we are on our way somewhere, socially and economically. Few of them can visualize the whole forest, they are busy at best in repairing an occasional tree, filling a hole here, running a rod through a trunk there. As for having any sailing chart for their political progress, they do not know that such a thing exists. They cannot realize that we are in the midst of a tremendous economic revolution. They cannot put together the innumerable items of economic news that stare out at us from each daily paper—that the railroads are being consolidated; that there are only thirty tire companies left out of three hundred; that the great Vacuum and Standard Oil companies have come together; that mergers are expected in the automobile field and a dozen others; that at every turn there are combinations and consolidations; that but for the fear of our anti-trust laws we should be seeing in this country precisely what has just happened in Germany—the bringing together of every iron and steel plant in the country, so that the industry is being governed as a whole by a steering committee for the purpose of modernizing the weak, financing the struggling, dividing the domestic field among the plants best fitted for each line, and preparing for exports with which to conquer the European markets. Instead, we have in Washington the headless and planless effort to stop a combination here, to control another there, to beat the devil around the bush by the inter-trade agreements to which I have already referred. And constantly the Senate has to give its time and strength to muckraking various official bodies, or overhauling official activities to prevent the perversion of government by the deliberate turning over to private business of certain governmental functions, or their complete warping by the servants of big business whom Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Hoover have appointed to positions in which they are supposed to be the watch-dogs of the government. This sort of inquiry is sneered at by the press; it infuriates big business, and the public becomes cynical about it. But if anything should stop it, that would be nothing short of disaster. It is quite true, as one news bureau has said, that the Progressives feel that if they do not keep on their job there will not be a single natural resource of any kind, capable of being turned over to private exploiters, which will not be turned over by Mr. Hoover if he is allowed to have his way during the next three or seven years. It was only this week that Senator Couzens, who is presiding over the hearings of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, declared, after hearing certain charges as to what has been happening in the Federal Power Commission, that "conditions in the commission have become so intolerable that it presents one of the rottenest exhibitions of government I have ever heard of."

Speaking of programs, and the lack of them, what could be more pitiful than the attitude of the Progressives and the Democrats on the tariff? Here is a God-given issue at hand. The Democrats in Congress, having also no leadership of any kind, and having been betrayed on the tariff issue by their party convention and their party candidate of 1928, are naturally unable to agree on any policy or to take any definite general position. They are also engaged in getting their feet into the trough as rapidly as possible. The most disgusting example of this practice has been afforded by Senator Copeland of New York. Did he, for example, vote against the Aluminum Trust, which robs every housewife in America for the benefit of poor, starving Andrew Mellon and his family? He did not. He said he had been told that the workers in some aluminum factories in the State of New York would lose their jobs if we did not help Andrew out. He could see only the votes of his constituents, nothing else. He has forgotten, if he ever knew, that the historic Democratic policy has been a tariff for revenue only, and he is certainly not of the opinion that the interests of the entire country are superior to those of a handful of workers. He goes round the country making speeches against graft, and then votes freely for the "honest graft" of protection, whenever he thinks that any factory owner or worker in New York State may be helped by his vote. He is in no wise different from nearly all the others in his party. Certainly none of the so-called Democratic leaders have any real thought that there is a principle at stake here.

Neither have the Progressives. They have stood together much better than was expected; for once Senator Borah has really shown leadership. Remarkable as it seems, he has regularly attended group meetings of the Democrats and Progressives; for once he has shown symptoms of the fighting leadership that he might have exercised years ago, if his ability and brilliance had been matched with equal courage. He might well have been the most influential figure in political life today. The Progressives have fought hard against many tariff increases. They hit the Aluminum Trust a staggering blow; they have so far kept the Senatorial tools of the sugar barons from still further mulcting the American people. They have cooperated far better with the Democrats, and the Democrats with them, than had been deemed possible. Yet they, too, vote now and then because of some State interest, for things which they ought to oppose, just as Senator Norris actually voted for a sugar bounty for the Nebraska beet-sugar growers. What could they not accomplish if they realized that there was a principle at stake in all this? They are greatly stirred up because the farmers are going to be buncoed again and are not going to be brought within the charmed circle of the protection grafters. They are doing their best to see that Mr. Hoover and his party live up to their promise of agricultural tariff relief, but in doing so they cannot lay claim to holding any moral position. They are debarred from attacking the whole system because they seek favors for their several States.

It has been rightly said that without vision the people perish. Doesn't that apply to government as well? How long will it be before the so-called leaders here can see that the days of tinkering, and of stopping leaks, and of patching, and of taking one timid step in this direction, and another in the other direction, are rapidly nearing their end? The time is surely at hand when there must be a nation-wide protest against the whole business of compromising and of special privilege and favoritism, which in one form or another is corrupting the government, weakening its machinery, and making impossible any grappling with our general economic problem on the basis of genuine and far-reaching economic reform. Leadership here? There isn't any. Few of the observers even realize what it is all about and where it is taking us—least of all, apparently, the man in the White House. Naturally, he is the most conspicuous target; he ought to be. There is criticism on the part of the regulars, even those who do not like Mr. Hoover, that certain groups are out to "get him." Why not? There could be no greater service rendered to the country today than to make it clear just how bankrupt the White House is, and whither its conduct of affairs is taking us.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Parity or Reduction?

By NORMAN ANGELL

London, February 22

(By Cable to THE NATION*)*

A FAINT ray of hope that the conference may emerge from its present doldrums comes from Paris; it is based on the expectation that Briand may succeed Tardieu as the directing force and prove more flexible than his predecessor. But this does not suffice to render the present feeling anything but one of pessimism. It is necessary to point out, however, that the present marks the moment when cards, in the shape of respective claims, have been put on the table, which is naturally the moment of severest struggle and least concession. Public opinion in Great Britain continues to show increasing disappointment at the slowness of the conference. It is probable that a downright offer to abolish the battleship and submarines and to reduce cruisers still further, subject to corresponding reduction by the other Powers, would be enormously popular even in the face of the monstrous French memorandum. Indeed, it is felt that such a move would make the French defense of the submarine more difficult. It is the general feeling in conference circles that before progress can be made France must be made conscious of her moral isolation, which implies diplomatic and later military isolation. When France feels that her present policy involves definite alienation of potential allies she may modify her stand. An interesting suggestion in this connection is that the French nervousness concerning the German "pocket" battleship might be made the ground for calling Germany into consultation. It has been felt all along in some quarters that Germany should have participated in the conference.

London, February 13

(By Mail)

Even those with a very qualified faith in the wisdom of mass opinion in international affairs (so often in the past warmly responsive to war excitements of all kinds) have wished the last week or two, while watching the higgling hesitation of every government in approaching the problem of disarmament, that some of the issues which have come up for discussion could have been put to popular referendum.

Long before the conference met, public opinion in Britain seized upon one issue as being the decisive one if real reduction in the weight of armaments were to come out of the deliberations. That issue was the abolition of the battleship, battleship here meaning the ship of over 10,000 tons. The layman was encouraged to plump for this particular slogan by the fact that even the naval experts, some of the best minds in the Admiralty, had been agitating for the abolition of the monster ship as a useless anachronism. If the British public could have expressed itself it is all but certain that in its present mood it would have swept away the battleship and the submarine altogether. But the British government, under pressure from the main conservative body of the Admiralty, began by being extremely hesitant in responding to these movements of public opinion. The opinion, however, grew insistent, and there was a quick change of attitude on the part of the government. The Prime Minister, although qualifying the statement, let it be known that this government would desire to see the complete abolition of the big ship. But the American delegation did not seem to respond to the feeler, while unofficial American opinion declared the step incompatible with the sacred principle of parity: if the big ship were abolished the cruisers, which are now auxiliary ships, would be the capital ships; the armed merchantmen would be the auxiliaries; and this, argued one American school, would give Great Britain such an enormous advantage as to put an end to the whole principle of parity. Other experts, of course, protested that there was no shadow of validity in this latter argument for reasons which in their turn were answered by counter-arguments. In any case, the decisive and simple measure of getting rid altogether of these big ships, of wiping them out from our programs and deciding that they should sully the seas no more, somehow got whittled down and the conference got on to the problem of abolishing the submarine. But the submarine is the reply of the lesser naval Power, in this case France, to the Power which possesses great ships. If somehow Britain and America had been able to go to France and say simply, without qualification, "We have agreed to get rid of the great ship altogether. Will you agree with us to get rid of the submarine?" it would have been extremely hard for France in that simplified situation to say no. But to ask for the abolition of the submarine while the great ships, in which Britain and America are so rich, are retained seemed to France, of course, an unfair trick of the Anglo-Saxons.

Thus does real progress in disarmament come to grief on hesitations and complexities. What seems to be happening is that, without the government intending it, the technicians, the Admiralty, are passing upon political questions. In such circumstances one must give due weight to the difficulty of a government composed of civilians. The Cabinet is made up of laymen. They are confronted by what is an all-but-unanimous technical opinion. There is just the risk that Admiralty resignations might result from opposing the Admiralty view and might cause something like a popular stampede, even of that opinion which is now decisively against the big ship. For many of the public, too, would be impressed with "expert" opinion, not realizing that the problem is one not of naval technique, but of politics and psychology; and that the "experts" would be judging matters outside their province.

Unfortunately, in this discussion, the other side's case always seems so much simpler than ours. It is commonly asked here: Why could not the Americans straightforwardly have accepted MacDonald's tentative offer to abolish the big ship altogether? There is, as these lines are being written, intense irritation at the reply which the British delegation are reported to have made to the American suggestion as to the building of a Rodney. Our technicians seem to have pointed out as a large part of their reply that the American interpretation of parity leaves gun-power out of account. The United States now possesses twenty-four sixteen-inch guns (eight in each of her three largest battleships), while Great Britain has only eighteen (nine each in the Rodney and the Nelson). If an American Rodney were built the United States would have thirty-three sixteen-inch guns to the British eighteen. To this the Americans retort that their superiority in gun-power is offset by the greater speed of the British battleships. It is felt that discussion of this kind could go on everlastingly and interminably. More and more is the purely conventional nature of "parity" being revealed. There is and can be no real "yardstick" of power which has to equate such diverse elements as industrial self-sufficiency to speed of ships or range of guns. We have already noted how a discussion of the battleship question brings us to the mercantile marine. That would bring us to the reserve of a mercantile population, all of which presumably would have to be taken into account. If, as an American once commented, factors of power must include "fogs, bogs, and hogs," how many fogs or bogs or hogs are to be calculated as equivalent to one battleship or one cruiser?

And even if one could get over this first difficulty, there is a second one more vital and more fundamental still. Armaments, of course, envisage the event of war, the contingency of all our peacemaking arrangements having broken down. That assumption must precede any discussion, any building, any armaments. Without it, the whole thing is utterly meaningless. But if the peace-keeping arrangements break down in the way in which they broke down in 1914, and the nations are aligned in rival camps as their respective interests may dictate, the figures which will count then are not the figures of each nation but the figures of the groups, the alliances. Since naval power is relative, it is impossible to say whether a nation is strong or weak until you know whom it has to fight. "On the African lakes during the war," says Admiral Richmond, "an armed motor-boat was a capital ship." Another admiral said to me the other day, "We ought to write on the walls of the conference room: Who is the enemy?" Britain and America have spent months and months in negotiations in a laborious attempt to achieve parity. But if in fact they are going to be ranged on the same side when the next war breaks out, the very day that war is declared each will want the other to have as much power as possible. As a wearied and cynical delegate said at a previous conference after a week of fighting over a few destroyers, "Mais, à la fin, it doesn't make any difference, for we can make alliances so much more quickly than you can make ships."

Even occasional attendance at a conference like this brings home to one the fact that men agree with apparent readiness to a truth or a proposition long before they believe it in any vivid fashion or realize any of its implications. Two and two, of course, make four—unless we are discussing navies. For quite a time now the British and the Americans have agreed, and I don't doubt for a moment that the sincerity of the agreement is absolute and complete, that in no circumstances whatever could they go to war with each other again; that such an event is as improbable and unthinkable as war between Pennsylvania and Ohio or between Yorkshire and Northumberland. So be it. Then it cannot matter to either what the other has in the way of armament. But that is precisely the resultant four that you must not make from this particular two and two. There are sections on each side which watch fiercely and suspiciously for any indication that the other side may be stealing a march; every "concession" is narrowly weighed as though any increase in the power of one was a vital and dangerous menace to the security of the other. These contradictions and inconsistencies are, it will be said, an old enough story. But they are recalled now for this reason: One of the real events of the conference is that now at last there seems to be a tendency to admit fully and with some meaning in the admission what at the outset was only admitted in words, with no faintest realization of the real implication of the words.

As a result of this rather elusive change of mood there is, I think, a general expectation that the political by-products of the conference will be fundamentally much more important than the results in actual limitation or reduction. The belief plainly is growing that any technical agreement will have to be accompanied, as were the technical agreements of the Washington conference of 1922, by a political agreement something along the lines of the Four-Power Pacific Pact—an agreement, it will be recalled, by which the four Pacific Powers undertook to respect one another's rights in their possessions, to refer to a joint conference any controversy arising between them involving those rights, and in case those rights were threatened by the aggressive action of any other Power, to consult together fully and frankly so as to come to an understanding as to the measures to be taken.

Any agreement along the lines of the Four-Power pact would go far to meet the French position. It will be recalled that, in response to the invitation to the conference, the French asserted once more the position that they have asserted with unfailing and unbending insistence at every conference of the kind they have entered since the war. They go on repeating, in effect: "A nation's first duty is to defend itself, achieve security. If an international organization of any kind can give it some measure of security, it is justified in disarming. If not, not." They have never wavered in the assertion of this position and have stated it always with complete frankness. To the contention that they have been given security upon security by the Locarno and other arrangements, they retort that no sooner does a British government sign an undertaking of this kind than British public men or another British government begin to whittle down its commitments. However that may be, the expectation is now general that something along the lines of the political instrument which accompanied the Washington disarmament agreements must accompany the ones arrived at in this conference. The Senate difficulty has, of course, loomed large, but a possible way round has been suggested. It is to the effect that an executive declaration might be made stating simply that in the event of any danger of the rupture of the Kellogg pact, it would certainly be the desire of the United States to consult with the Powers party to this conference as to the measures which might properly be taken to preserve peace, or prevent the extension of the conflict, if conflict had already occurred. It is recalled in this connection that the most important foreign policy that the United States has ever adumbrated—the Monroe Doctrine—was put forward by the Executive alone. It seems to be thought that the Monroe Doctrine might be followed by a Hoover Doctrine, an expression of what America might be counted upon to do in the event of a violation which threatened the peace of the world.

If French pressure so far succeeds as to secure something in the shape of such a declaration, it may have results which are not perhaps taken fully into the French calculations. That result would be, as a by-product of the declaration, some beginning at least in the settlement of the freedom-of-the-seas controversy, which is the outstanding ghost always present at any Anglo-American banquet. For if America gave an undertaking to confer with other signatories of the pact as to the course to be taken in the event of a violation, and if the British feel pretty sure that America would not claim the right to supply the aggressor with the means for continuing his crime, the great outstanding danger of conflict between Britain and America, namely, the question of neutral right, would have been removed. Some step in the removal of this old difficulty has, of course, been taken by Britain in the signature and ratification of the optional clause. And while provisions are made in the ratification not to have prize cases taken to the international court, the effect of the signature will be to make it easier to reconcile the British and the American attitude on this subject.

Divorce—and After

III. Divorce and the Child*

A PERSONAL NARRATIVE

MY former husband and I obtained what might be called a cooperative divorce. Our attitude toward each other at the time was one of sympathy, even affection; we were young and fairly eager to "do the right thing" by one another and by our only child, of whom I was given complete charge. My husband, who was a sculptor, had not been able to do much toward our mutual support, but his family was very well off and had helped us by means of a regular allowance. Moreover, I had been earning money fairly regularly over a period of two years before we decided to separate. It was agreed, when the matter of the details of the divorce arose, that my husband should give to me and our son a large part of the allowance which his family had been contributing to our support. It did not occur to me to ask for alimony because I had complete confidence in his good-will and in the kindliness and generosity of his family. I had no desire to have them give me more than I required to live in the moderately comfortable manner to which I had been accustomed; and I felt certain that they would not grudge me and their grandson the means to do so.

Shortly after our divorce my small son contracted a contagious disease which resulted in certain permanent disabilities. The family rose to this occasion with additional funds. My former husband and I were still on excellent terms and confided in each other as intimate friends although by that time we were both embarked on new emotional relationships.

A year elapsed, during which my new relationship acquired permanent tendencies. Unfortunately, the groom-to-be was not a good wage earner. In addition to that he seemed to be completely lacking in paternal feelings. He was not a simple personality, and I, unfortunately, was not able to guide my emotions into the practical channels which would make for a comfortable home for my child. I was, I fear, frankly more interested in having a good life of my own. My relationship with my former husband had never been a happy one. I had suffered from the very beginning. And now I felt that I had a right to grasp at happiness for myself. I had the naive faith that I could bring out the latent paternal feeling in my new husband. I was mistaken. Although he conducted himself toward my son with exemplary politeness his attitude toward him remained that of the pleasant but rather uninterested household guest. I realized later on that he was unconsciously resenting the presence of a child who was to him an alien person in our home, an alien, moreover, who absorbed some of my time and a great deal of my thought. What was disagreeable to him, he instinctively pushed out of his mind; and very soon he became apparently almost unconscious that there was another personality in the household. This was possible because the boy was still young enough to have bedtimes which almost coincided with my husband's return from work and because he was a docile and quiet child.

The result of this was to give the child an ever-intensifying fixation on me. Meanwhile he saw less and less of his own father, who claimed that because he lived downtown in New York, while we lived far uptown, it was very difficult for him to make frequent visits. Because of his disabilities the boy was having a very difficult time in school. I felt more and more borne down under the weight of his dependence on me. When I failed to give him as much of my time as I thought he needed, I felt guilty about it. There was no one to share this emotional responsibility. I finally decided to call on the boy's father for help. We were still friendly, but we were seeing far less of each other. He agreed that he would try to see more of the boy, but I knew before the conversation was over that the battle was lost. He simply was not sufficiently interested any more. He was too immersed in his own affairs really to make the effort to carry out his promise. It was at this time that I realized that his paternal feelings, which had never been very strong, were now quite dead. If they had lived in the same home, the father would have identified the child with his own ego (which was by no means small). As it was, the child had lost his primary interest for the father; in fact, with its difficulties and drawbacks, the responsibility of being a father had become something of a burden to him.

Soon a new complication arose. My second husband lost his job, and though I was working we were living to a large extent on the allowance that my ex-husband's family gave me. My husband, through no fault of his own, was out of a job for six months; and the ex-family decided very soon that they did not wish to be supporting or helping to support him. They began to make reductions in the allowance. From that time on I was made to feel that I was the object of a sort of grudging charity. The financial arrangement was changed every three or four months. I never knew what I could actually depend on. Having geared my living to one standard, I would find suddenly that it must be geared to another. The changes were not enormous, but the fact that I never knew what to expect gave me a feeling of complete instability. In addition to this I had come so to hate the idea of accepting the money that I thought and worried about it much more than was warranted by the actual situation. You will wonder why, after my husband got a new job, I accepted the money at all. My husband was not earning enough to make it possible for us to give the child the various medical and other special advantages which he needed. Aside from that, however, I should have felt that it was unjust to ask him to bear the financial burden of a child not his own, especially since the boy's paternal relatives were driving about in motor cars and living in luxury. There was only one way to extricate myself and that was by earning enough to swing the thing alone. That I was unable to do, partly because the doctors' bills were so constant and large, and partly because my own mental state made it impossible for me to throw myself with great intensity into my job.

---

* This is the third in a series of articles on the problems created by divorce. A fourth will be printed in an early issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.

After three years of this, the emotional strain seemed too great for me and I decided, with the help of a psychoanalyst, that it would benefit both me and my son to send him away from me for a while. An excellent boarding-school was chosen, small and homelike, with a group of teachers who had an intelligent modern attitude toward education and family problems. Now the financial difficulties increased. By this time I was paying half the boy's expenses while the family paid the other half. I had to keep an itemized account of everything that I spent for him. Although my capital was zero, I was the one who had to make the outlays, half of which would subsequently be refunded. Each bill was disputed or commented on adversely, or if this was impossible, the letter which contained the check was full of other complaints. I was made to feel that the family resented every penny spent. I was heckled for my child's behavior as well. As a matter of fact, I had been rather scrupulous in making the boy feel that the family, particularly his own father, were really very grand people. But this magnanimous attitude was beginning to wear thin.

During the child's vacations he usually saw his father once. From these visits he returned depressed, if not definitely distraught. His father, it appeared, could not spend the few hours without lecturing him severely on some subject. On the day when that subject turned out to be something connected with his disability, which the boy was powerless to correct, I turned into a militant mother. On that day I lost all my desire to try to understand the point of view of my ex-husband or of his family. From then on I regarded them all simply as a means of obtaining the greatest possible benefit for my son, and I wasted no sweet words or thoughts upon them. My correspondence became acrimonious and so did all my feelings. I am afraid that I let my son perceive that I felt rather contemptuous toward his father. The boy was by this time twelve years of age and was not in the least attached to his father. Eventually he confided in me that he did not like him; and I could not bring myself to urge him to do so under the circumstances. It would have seemed to me a silly piece of sentimentality. I did tell him that I thought his father was a very selfish person, but that I also thought he could be very agreeable and charming and that some day, perhaps, they might become good friends.

The family now adopted the attitude that I had never allowed the boy's father any say in his upbringing and therefore it was only natural that he should have lost interest. This, I believe, referred to certain sporadic pieces of advice which my first husband offered me perhaps once or twice a year, or about as often as he saw his son during that period. Once or twice, when the financial situation seemed intolerable, I dared to think that if the family would only stop to consider the very harsh difficulties I had experienced in bringing up a handicapped child, they must surely stop their ugly, heckling tactics. On these occasions I wrote letters to them, trying to make them understand what it all meant, trying to appeal to their imagination and even sympathy. For a short while thereafter they would mend their manner. But only for a while.

Now that my son is almost grown, his father has begun to take some interest in him. It is spasmodic, as usual, and of doubtful benefit. He raises the boy's hopes and summons to himself a child's quick, warm affections, only to baffle him later by coldness and neglect. I should say that the result of all this is that the boy's life has been pretty much ruined. He has a strong sense of "not belonging." How could it be helped? If I had given up my life to him that might have been avoided, but I'm afraid that I loved life more than my child. If I had given up the things that I wanted for his sake I might have ended by hating him and I think perhaps he would have suffered from that more than he has from the other condition. If his father and I had stayed together we would have ruined our own lives, without doubt. I am not prepared to say that our son's life would not have been happier. It might very well have been, if his father and I had remained friends in the same home. That, of course, was possible, since long before we separated we were very good friends in spite of our unhappiness. But who is to say which lives are more important? Any judgment on that question would be quite meaningless.

In any case, it is likely that the child will suffer from divorce, especially if he is an only child. If foster-homes of a high standard could be found, I believe that would be the best solution for the children. They might then get the emotional stability that they require to be healthy psychically. Such an arrangement, to be effective, would have to last over a period of years, and the real parents would have to keep "hands off," so that the children could make a complete transference of their love and confidence to their foster-parents. Probably no mother and few fathers would ever agree to such an arrangement. And I will admit that it would undoubtedly be difficult to find the desirable foster-parents. Perhaps if there were a demand for them, the supply would increase. Of course, my story points its all too obvious financial moral. If there are children, a monetary settlement is essential to protect them and also to protect the mother from a harassing situation and constant contact with a past whose associations may become very disagreeable.

In the Driftway

CHICAGO is not the only place in the United States where the government has "gone broke." In Laurens County, Georgia, more than half of the public schools, with an enrolment of 5,000 children, have been closed until next autumn because of lack of money with which to pay the teachers. An effort was made to borrow funds with which to carry on, but banks both in and out of the State refused to make any further loans until the indebtedness for 1928 and 1929 was cleared up.

* * * * *

WHILE some public schools are closed because of financial bankruptcy, Thomas H. Briggs of Teachers College, New York City, would close all private schools by law because they are "educationally bankrupt." So between financial and educational bankruptcy there may be so many closed schools presently that almost any boy can respond to the inner call to go swimming in early March without playing hooky. Dr. Briggs is against the private schools because, he says, with a few exceptions they are not contributing anything to the progress of education and because it is unusual to find parents who send their children to private schools and at the same time do anything to promote public education. The Drifter thinks that Dr. Briggs underestimates the work done for the progress of education by private schools. Doubtless it is true that most of them are hidebound and ultra-conservative, but a saving remnant are doing experimental work of a highly interesting and valuable sort. The Drifter's own distrust of private schools—and it is a strong one—is not based on their educational methods but on the ground that they tend to create snobbery among the pupils.

* * * * *

WHEN the Drifter was a youngster, nearly all the boys and girls whom he knew went to the public schools, and all their parents would have thought it a mistake to send them elsewhere regardless of whether or not they could afford it; they felt that private schooling would make their children undemocratic. The Drifter understands that a similar feeling still exists in most parts of the United States and that in general it is thought that the public schools are not only more democratic but superior to private institutions in their educational technique. New York City is a notable exception. To the Drifter's distress most of the children of his friends in New York are sent to private schools—even when the parents can ill afford it—and much as the Drifter deplores the situation he sympathizes with the fathers and mothers who are responsible for it. In New York City the public schools are notoriously overcrowded, and good teachers are handicapped by a sterile political overlordship. But even if the schools were the best in the world, they are filled with children whose home environment constitutes an enormous impediment to effective education. When one considers that children learn more from their fellow-pupils than they do from their teachers, the situation puts conscientious parents in an unpleasant predicament between the desire to be democratic and a wish to do the best possible by their offspring. It is hard to see, for instance, how a child can grow up to use correct English in the public schools of New York City—though happily some of them do. Of course the defects of the New York public schools are largely due to the fact that parents of the so-called "better element" have preferred to send their children to private schools rather than put up a fight to improve the public-school system.

* * * * *

BUT however much truth there may be in Dr. Briggs's general argument in favor of public as against private schools, his proposal to close the latter by law goes too far unless we are prepared to accept absolutely the Russian system of life. It is true that children belong to the community as well as to their parents, but if the state is going to insist on taking sole and exclusive charge of their education, then it must also see that they are fed and clothed—and spanked when necessary. At the moment—and apart from the fact that the Supreme Court has ruled in connection with an Oregon statute that private schools may not be closed by law—Americans are no more ready to surrender the sole control of schooling to the state than they are to turn over to it the exclusive publication of their newspapers, magazines, and books.
THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

"Strictly American"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My copy of The Nation having failed to turn up in the mail last Saturday, I went to the large, fine shop of this capital city of Pennsylvania which deals exclusively in periodicals and stationery, to buy the missing copy. I was told that "We don't carry The Nation. We handle only strictly American publications."

Do please send me the missing number!

Harrisburg, Pa., February 14 HELEN R. MARTIN

Creative Centers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Artists and professionals are being forced in growing numbers to eke out insufficient livelihoods in overcrowded and standardized atmospheres. There are unnumbered rural or suburban acres lying idle and untouched. Why not establish on these unused areas small units of artists and professionals? By concentrating on the surrounding community these artists and professionals might be able to fill both the social and educational needs of their neighbors. Economic betterment for all concerned would also be assured.

Four years of experience in one community in the Blue Ridge Mountains is the basis for this proposal. In this community we found a native population which ordinary industrial systems could not sustain because of its unstandardized character, and for which ordinary training schools made no provision. The modern approach in teaching proved the practical solution, since it preserved the native simplicity and at the same time gave it tangible outlet in group activity. We chose native hand-hooked rugs as a medium, but we also chose workers who had never made rugs commercially, because we found that the mechanical demands of tourist or "seasonal" trade had already destroyed any native freshness in the types upon which it drew. As artists, we began at the opposite pole and employed the same freedom in use of materials which we would have exercised in painting. The new rugs thus freely designed and created outsold the commercialized ones in the market; and our volunteer "industry" soon included fifty families within a radius of twenty miles.

There were literally hundreds of such families in our immediate vicinity, and there were other mediums besides rugs capable of development. By developing native resources and training native talents, creative centers would emerge as new clearing-spots for the new findings. These centers might logically function in cooperation with state extension departments.

New York, February 20 ZOLTAN HECHT
ROSA PRINGLE HECHT

Our Mistake

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation dated February 19 appears an article entitled The New Chief Justice. Speaking of Mr. Hughes, it says: "He came off the bench—to wage his weak and futile and intellectually pitiful campaign for the Presidency in 1912. Few contrasts could be greater than that between the Hughes of 1906 and the Hughes of 1912."

Mr. Hughes resigned from the Supreme Court in 1916. He was a member of that tribunal for six years, from 1910 to 1916.

New York, February 15 WILLIAM ISAACS

For Albany Readers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation Club of Albany is holding a meeting on March 4 at which Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard will speak. Harold P. Winchester, of the J. B. Lyon Company, Albany, is in charge of arrangements.

Albany, February 21 HAROLD P. WINCHESTER

Minorities in Czecho-Slovakia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation for December 25, in an editorial comment dealing with the minority rights, you say that "the plain fact of the matter is that the Little Entente, and particularly Czecho-Slovakia, have treated the minorities treaties very much like scraps of paper."

Czecho-Slovakia concluded the treaty for protection of the minorities with the Allied Powers on September 10, 1919. This treaty consists of fourteen articles of which the most important are Articles VII, VIII, and IX. Article VII guarantees to all Czecho-Slovak citizens, without regard to race, language, or religion, full equality before the law, full civil and political rights, free use of any language in private, commercial, religious, and public life, and, finally, the possibility of the use of their own tongue before the courts. Article VIII guarantees to linguistic minorities the right to found their own philanthropic, religious, and social institutions and schools, and to use their own language. Of particularly great importance is Article IX which points out the duty of the government to establish minority schools in towns and districts containing a large number of inhabitants who do not speak the Czech language.

The provisions of the treaty have been incorporated in the Czecho-Slovak constitution. As to how they are applied in practice, the minority schools offer the best example. In the beginning of the school year 1925-26, there were in Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia 7,628 Czech schools with 22,439 classes for 848,348 Czech children (an average number of 38 children in a class), and 3,493 German schools for 341,124 German children (38.6 average per class). These figures refer to the proportion of schools in Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia only. The Czecho-Slovak government has, moreover, established German schools in Slovakia and Ruthenia where there were none under the Magyar regime. It has established in Slovakia 112 German schools, and there are 11 classes with 555 children in Carpathian Ruthenia.

The franchise in Czecho-Slovakia is universal, equal, and secret, without restriction, and in the Czecho-Slovak Parliament the various racial groups are represented according to the strength of their votes. In the election held on October 27, 1929, the racial groups in Czecho-Slovakia received the following representation. In preparing this table I have not apportioned to their respective nationalities thirty seats won by the Communists.

Czecho-Slovaks	191
Germans	66
Hungarians	9
Poles and Jews	4

The Germans are again represented in the government, having two ministers—one a Social Democrat, the other an Agrarian—in the Cabinet. Civic rights include liberty of the press and the right of public meeting. In 1918, in the whole territory of the Czecho-Slovak Republic, only 28 Magyar newspapers were published; at present there are more than 100. The flourishing political life and the number of associations and clubs among the Hungarian minority are the best proof of the minority's situation in this respect. The Hungarian minority had in Czecho-Slovakia in the 1924-25 school year 814 elementary schools, of which 811 were state schools and 3 private schools, 5 secondary schools, 1 agricultural school, and 1 commercial academy.

On the basis of the foregoing brief information, is it right to accuse Czecho-Slovakia of treating "the minorities treaties very much like scraps of paper"?

New York, December 27 S. KLÍMA

Contributors to This Issue

NORMAN ANGELL, author of "The Great Illusion" and editor of Foreign Affairs, is a Labor member of Parliament.

EDA LOU WALTON is assistant professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University.

HENRY HAZLITT is literary editor of The Nation.

FRED T. MARSH writes occasional book reviews for The Nation.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY is managing editor of The Nation.

NORMAN THOMAS is executive director of the League for Industrial Democracy.

BENJAMIN GINZBURG is preparing a volume to be entitled "The Adventure of Science."

W. J. GHENT is on the staff of the Dictionary of American Biography.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY, author of several books on the theater, writes on motion pictures for The Nation.

L. J. DE BEKKER is a New York journalist, secretary to the committee on Haiti.

Books, Drama, Films

Park in the Gathering Dusk

By EDA LOU WALTON

The rare, unfathomed waters of spring night
Refill with deepening blue this well of trees,
Where tiny liquid lamps like luminous shells
Float windward on the dusk.
Somewhere a blossoming cherry is whirled down
The inundating tide, a fragrant pause,
And then the twilight rolling in again,
And memory lost.
And tiny pools close eyelids to night's hand
Laid delicately down.
The bosom of warm mist dilates encompassing
The sun-delivered garden.
And this that was a passion to the dawn,
Sought out and pressed upon,
Is, for the dark, a gathering place of tears.

The Pretensions of Humanism

Humanism and America. Essays on the Outlook of Modern Civilization. Edited by Norman Foerster. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.50.

FIFTEEN humanists, under the editorship of Norman Foerster, are here drawn up in battle formation, flinging, if I may quote the volume's paper jacket, "the challenge of culture to the anarchy of our times." In a martial chorus such as this, one may legitimately hope to come upon at least a clear definition of what humanism is. I regret to report, not indeed an absence of definition, but what is perhaps worse, an embarrassing excess and variety of definitions. Mr. Foerster begins by remarking that humanism, in its broadest signification, "denotes a belief that the proper study of mankind is man, and that this study should enable mankind to perceive and realize its humanity." One does not have to scrutinize this definition very closely to perceive its essential hollowness. Pope's line has always sounded impressive, but what does it mean? If it means that we must confine ourselves, in science, to psychology, human physiology, and the various social disciplines, and eschew botany, geology, astronomy, mathematics, physics, it is pure nonsense; if it means that man should study whatever interests man, it is the baldest truism. As to the second part of the definition, it seems to mean nothing more than that human beings are human beings, an observation not very illuminating.

Though Irving Babbitt's entire contribution to this volume is ostensibly "an essay at definition" of humanism, it does not seem to me very much more helpful. Mr. Babbitt does not in fact give any clear definition of humanism, though he does tell us, in several places, what it is that humanists aim at. They aim "at proportionateness through a cultivation of the law of measure." " 'Nothing too much' is indeed the central maxim of all genuine humanists, ancient and modern." And a sentence of Matthew Arnold's is quoted in further support and elucidation: "I hate all over-preponderance of single elements."

Now if I may presume to say so, it seems to me that all this gets us precisely nowhere. Did Arnold hate the ocean, for its over-preponderance of salt water? Did he hate the heavens, for their over-preponderance of space? What is over-preponderance? How does one determine its existence? It seems to me that these last two are the only real questions. Everyone thinks himself opposed to over-preponderance, to disproportion, to "too much"; the words themselves are condemnations. The real disputes arise when it comes to determining, in any specific practical or literary judgment, just what constitutes "too much." And this means that "proportionateness" and "moderation" can never be final criteria; they are themselves subordinate to ulterior ends, and their presence or absence can only be determined by reference to those ends.

Even Mr. Babbitt does not believe in moderation when it comes to a showdown. Not when he is wrestling with those serpents, the naturalists. "When first principles are involved," he points out righteously, "the law of measure is no longer applicable. One should not be moderate in dealing with error." And when the battle grows hottest most of the other humanistic laws also go by the board. In his Forum article we found Mr. Babbitt denouncing the "anti-intellectualists" from Rousseau to Bergson; here we find him appropriating the entire Bergsonian poison: "The final appeal of the humanist is not to any historical convention but to intuition." He can spend half his breath regretting our "egoistic impulses," and then write that "the real humanist consents, like Aristotle, to limit his desires only in so far as this limitation can be shown to make for his own happiness" [italics mine]. At least the law of self-contradiction seems to hold a secure place in the humanistic credo.

We must pass on to the rest of the stalwart little band. Louis Trenchard More, listed as a professor of physics at the University of Cincinnati, seeks to show that a science of psychology, of sociology, or even of biology is impossible; that the only possible science is physics, "for the aim of all science is, and must be, to express its laws in the language of mechanics." Having left us with only one science, Mr. More evidently does not think very much of the present state of that one. He finds Whitehead, Eddington, and Einstein "dreamers," who "have pictured a phantasmagoria, instead of a world, as non-sensical as the hallucinations of the medieval monk driven mad by the fevers of asceticism."

Paul Elmer More's contribution is merely a reprint from "The Demon of the Absolute"; it is an attempt to settle perhaps the most baffling of all metaphysical problems—the relation of the mental and physical worlds—by a display of irrelevant oratory. I have already reviewed this elsewhere. Mr. G. R. Elliott has discovered that "the main source of our modern spiritual catastrophe . . . is . . . blind spiritual pride. . . . We see how vicious it was for the Stoic to be proud of his pride, and for the monk to be proud of his humility. We have not yet seen how vicious it is for the modern citizen to be proud of being neither proud nor humble." There would not seem to be much chance of escaping viciousness. Mr. Elliott, however, points a way: "The human task is to clarify and obey, as well as we can, Laws which we did not invent." Mr. Elliott does not tell us just what these Laws are; the awe-struck majuscule suggests the Ten Commandments, but Mr. Elliott prefers not to be vulgarly specific. In any case it would seem to me both difficult and presumptuous for man to attempt to clarify Laws which he had no hand in inventing. Mr. Elliott, I might add, opines that Baron Friedrich von Hügel and Professor Irving Babbitt are "the two most potent and distinguished personalities . . . that have so far appeared in English literature of the twentieth century."

Mr. T. S. Eliot believes that "the need of the modern world is the discipline and training of the emotions," and this, he has found, is "only attainable through dogmatic religion." As for humanism, he does not attempt to define it: "I take it that the reader thinks he knows what it means, and that he will understand that I am putting before him the difference between what I think he thinks it means and what I think I think it means."

As the reader is perhaps becoming a bit dizzy at this point, it may be well to haul up. The present symposium is surely not lacking in value, and many of its contributors are men of high ability. Mr. Robert Shafer has written an admirable article, from his standpoint, on Dreiser, and I have read Mr. A. R. Thompson on modern tragedy, Mr. H. H. Clark on American fiction, Mr. S. P. Chase on modern poetry, and Mr. Gorham B. Munson on modern critics, if not always with agreement, at least with interest and profit. One must guard against allowing the humanists to drive one into a merely antagonistic position; their own philosophy, as I indicated recently in discussing Mr. Babbitt, is itself largely a product of "the subservience of contradiction." Much of what they have to say about tradition, knowledge, discipline, completeness, is worth at least a respectful hearing. My own objections to their views I have already set forth in a previous article. They are trying to revive an outworn and discredited metaphysics. They fancy they have solved problems when they have merely distributed labels and catchwords. Most of them seem to imagine that complex literary questions can be settled by the crude methods of practical politics, and they see the literary scene naively as a bi-party struggle for power between the Humanists and the Naturalists. They are in the habit of judging all writers, not by their genius, originality, or power, but by whether or not they are fountains of correct humanistic thought. I may as well confess, finally, that I distrust not only "humanism" but every other sweeping pansophy with equal pretensions. Surely there is no more glaring example of "blind pride" than these pat wholesale solutions of the infinitely complex and diverse problems of life and art.

HENRY HAZLITT

"All That Glitters—"

Pure Gold. By O. E. Rolvaag. English Text by Sivert Erdahl and the Author. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THIS novel is a study in avarice. The incidents are selected with unvarying monotony to show how the lust for money grew in the hearts of an ignorant Norwegian-American couple until it came to dominate their lives and, eventually, to destroy them. The years go by and the "babies" (gold coins), the "brats" (bank notes), and the "shillings" (silver dollars) accumulate in spite of two or three affairs that involve heavy losses. Later, all the money is changed for "kids" (thousand-dollar bills), which the two divide between them and carry in canvas belts worn day and night, winter and summer, next to the skin. Only once does the author leave his two pathetic misers to look about him. Then it is to show the effect of the war on the rural community in which they live. This portion of the book adds little to his story, or to our understanding of war psychology.

Mr. Rolvaag has not attempted to write a true novel. Instead, he has written a theme-story of the De Maupassant order, extended to novel length and unsupported by subtlety of approach or beauty of style. "Pure Gold" is not well sustained. In parts it is baldly reiterative, the result of heavy-handedness. Some of the passages, showing the gradual disintegration of character, are well thought out and well executed. But it is time that the critical reader should demand something more than character studies, descriptions, essays, from the novelist who claims serious attention. All these may be done in forms which, though no less delighftul, are comprehensively less demanding than the novel.

FRED T. MARSH

Economics and Ethics

Economics and Ethics. By J. A. Hobson. D. C. Heath and Company. $4.

THERE was a certain fine inevitability in the choice of John A. Hobson by the editors of the Heath Social Relations Series to write their volume on "Economics and Ethics," for no other man in the English-speaking world shares in equal degree the qualifications for that task possessed by the distinguished contributing editor of The Nation. His long career as an outstanding unorthodox economist, his broad studies in other fields of social science, and his lifelong humanistic interest mark him out as the one man best qualified to undertake the pioneer work of bringing modern economics back into fruitful relations with modern ethics.

Mr. Hobson first defines welfare in terms of organic well-being, giving due weight at once to the innate equipment of the human animal and to the complex of ideas and institutions that bind him in the community. The "formal disparagement of community in the interests of an all-absorbing personality is the most distinctive note of modern life," says Mr. Hobson, and his book must be judged a successful attempt at a proper redressing of the balance. "The art of human welfare in its full relation to the population of the earth and the civilization of the future" he considers the chief duty of man, and economics becomes a branch of the wider study of human conduct.

Production and valuation are both social processes; all rights, to property and income alike, rest essentially on their contribution to well-being. Hence absolute individual claims disappear. The question becomes, not how much the community may take from the individual, but how much it shall allow him. Here enters Mr. Hobson's well-known distinction between costs, the payments necessary to call forth economic activity, and surplus, the payments not thus necessary. Costs, even as things stand, do not include the ridiculously exaggerated amounts we pay our great business men like Henry Ford, or the loot taken by monopolies and economic "pulls" at hundreds of points through our economic system. Surplus, wherever it arises, ought generally to be taken, by taxation or otherwise, for common purposes such as the increase of material equipment, the productive training of the human agent, above all, the provision of those non-economic common services on which so much of the interest and richness of life depends. An intelligent and equitable control of distribution is an essential condition to an orderly and adequate production, and that in turn to a genuinely humane consumption.

> Thus the humanist who regards the advance of civilization and of personal well-being as requiring a diminishing volume of human interest and energy to be devoted to the economic functions, an increasing volume to the free arts of personal expression and enjoyment, will fasten upon the social control of the machinery of production as an indispensable condition for enabling man as consumer to secure the leisure and liberty in which alone an art of life may flourish.

It is impossible to follow the detail of Mr. Hobson's interesting suggestions for the reform and improvement of the economic system in the light of his dominant ethical principle. Perhaps their spirit has already been sufficiently suggested. Recognizing clearly the difficulties and limitations of community action, he yet sees plainly the necessity of rational social control if our disordered and acquisitive economic system is to be brought into its true place as an important part of a real system of human welfare. Thus controlled, he envisages it forever reducing the human costs and increasing the human utilities of economic goods and services, thus liberating more and more of human energy for "those free creative activities in which production and consumption are fused in costless satisfactions." It is a noble idea, admirably worked out.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Aggressive Pacifism

Pacifism in the Modern World. Edited by Devere Allen. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

MR. ALLEN has given us a symposium to which most of the better-known American pacifists, Fenner Brockway of England, and Rabindranath Tagore of India have contributed. It is notable for the vigor and range of its ideas and for two other qualities: (1) the pacifism the writers discuss is not passivism; it is or seeks to be positive, even aggressive, as a method of dealing with injustice; (2) this pacifism is not derivative; that is, it does not rest on some texts of Scripture, nor is it, as most of the writers see it, a mere deduction from some abstract philosophical principle. Each writer deals more or less strictly with some particular phase of the problem—e.g., pacifism and national security, pacifism and class war, etc. The method obviously has the disadvantages as well as the advantages of all symposiums. It gives us, however, a book well worth the reading, and offers food for thought even to those whom it does not completely convert.

NORMAN THOMAS

The Sex Racket

Our Changing Human Nature. By Samuel D. Schmalhausen. The Macaulay Company. $3.50.

THIS is a collection of essays, articles, and literary sweepings served with pungent psycho-analytic sauce. There are disquisitions on human nature, psychology, woman, civilization, modern poetry, George Bernard Shaw, Frank Harris, H. L. Mencken, and above all, sex. The chapter headings include Sex and Human Nature, The Psychology and Pathology of Sex (A Preface to the New Sexology), Sex in the New Society, The Fall of Woman, The Immorality of Conventional Morals (A Study in Sadism). The other thirteen chapters are also not lacking in the sex appeal.

The only comforting thought that the reviewer got after wading through the 500 pages of the book was the hope that we may soon be nearing the end of the psycho-analytic sex racket. Whether it be out of a desire to vary the monotony of straight sexology, or out of deference to a public saturated with a sex diet, or finally whether it be through an internal development of doctrine, the reviewer does not know, but Mr. Schmalhausen is led, in some of his essays, to champion the view that we need something more than straight psycho-analysis and sex expressionism. We must reconcile sex and the ego, he tells us; we must harmonize sex and human nature. It is this that leads the publishers to couple Mr. Schmalhausen with Walter Lippmann as advocating on psycho-analytic grounds the Lippmann morality of self-discipline. The reviewer would not go so far; there seems to him to be no trace of self-discipline in Mr. Schmalhausen's book. On the most serious interpretation of his thesis, what Mr. Schmalhausen seems to be looking for is how to keep the "kick" in sex from evaporating after psycho-analysis has uncorked the bottle. Doubtless, as he tells us, we shall need a much greater Freud to solve this problem for us.

None the less the fact that Mr. Schmalhausen entertains such a thesis may be regarded as a hopeful sign of the times. People are beginning to find out that there is more in the human problem of love than the physical instinct of sex. Sophistication, when no longer regarded as equivalent to wisdom, may eventually become a drug on the market. If this happens, an old, old rhythm will be repeated. The rhythm goes back to Adam, who was probably the first to discover—and without the aid of Mr. Freud—the physical side of love. Out of his discovery came the myth of the tree of knowledge which, according to Spinoza, was simply designed to teach man that he was not altogether like the animals in the Garden, and that he had specifically human, moral problems. This moral may yet find an audience in these modern times of ours. And when that occurs, the sex racket will be liquidated and the new psychology will be absorbed into the humanistic tradition.

BENJAMIN GINZBURG

The Hero of San Jacinto

The Raven. A Life Story of Sam Houston. By Marquis James. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

IT is as a national figure, and an important one, that Mr. James regards Houston, and he has presented the man against the background of national events. But the personality of Houston is unique, and the author's happiest efforts are given to a portrayal of his character. The book is the result of years of research. The author has had access to sources untouched by any other writer and has made effective use of them. He has sought not only the facts, but from legends and traditions the atmosphere of the different environments in which Houston moved. In his treatment there is neither "heroizing" nor depreciation. One sets down the book confident that the hero of San Jacinto has at last been presented as he was.

Every period of this enigmatical being's career is brought into clearer relief. Wild, indolent, and romantic, an aimless runaway among the Cherokees of eastern Tennessee, adopted by Chief Oo-loo-te-ka as a son and named Co-lon-neh, or the Raven, the boy showed little promise of the part he was later to play. But then came the War of 1812, his notable service as a soldier, and out of that service a sudden rise to preferment and fame. The romantic tragedy of Houston's life—his separation from his young bride, his resignation of the governorship of Tennessee, and his self-exile among the Indians—is deftly treated by Mr. James. The women who played so determining a part in Houston's career are all here in vivid portraiture: his mother; his first wife, Eliza Allen; his Cherokee wife, Tiana; Anna Raguet, whom he loved but could not win though he dowered her with "half the laurels of San Jacinto"; and the romantic but highly capable Margaret Lea, who married him, reformed his bad habits, and was in all things an ideal helpmeet.

Fresh incident and color are given to the period of exile among the western Cherokees. Introduced to this recently opened field by Grant Foreman's "Pioneer Days in the Early Southwest," Mr. James has found material in the Indian Bureau that enables him to picture anew the life that surged about Fort Gibson in the 1820's and 1830's. It is a scene dominated by the figure of that picturesque frontier baron, Colonel Auguste Pierre Chouteau (who, by the way, was not a son of "one of the founders of the French outpost of St. Louis"); but Houston's part is also outstanding even when grossly discreditable. He was there to become involved in a scandal over a government contract, to have his Indian name, the Raven, exchanged for that of the Big Drunk, and to sink to the nadir of his reputation; but it is from there also that, inspired by a new purpose,

Our Newest Books for Discriminating Readers

YEAR IN YOU'RE OUT

By SAMUEL HOFFENSTEIN

Enfin! Endlich! And at last! The new book of poems by the author of Poems in Praise of Practically Nothing will be at your book sellers on March 8th. It's Hoffenstein once more, a little gayer, a little wiser, a little madder and a little more profound than ever before. $2.00

JEWS WITHOUT MONEY

By MICHAEL GOLD

"The two books that I have ever read that seem to give one the taste and terror and immensity of the East Side are Haunch, Paunch and Jowl and now Jews Without Money."—JOHN DOS PASSOS. "The best story of tenement life I have ever read . . . unforgettable."—UPTON SINCLAIR. Just Published Wood cuts by Howard Simon. $3.00

THE AMAZON

By ELLIOT PAUL

She was Alberta Snyder, first lieutenant, beautiful and determined, who managed to get her detachment of American girls to the front in France. Shell-shock made her lose her mind; her German captor made her lose her heart; and post-war Paris nearly made her lose her soul. Just Published $2.50

THE SACRED FIRE

The Story of Sex in Religion

By B. Z. GOLDBERG

A masterly study of man's love life in relation to religion throughout the ages. Here is the entire history of the sex motif in religion, from the gross sacred rites of savage man to the erotic symbols in modern religion. Illustrated with rare prints. $4.00

A PROPHET AND HIS GOD

By E. L. GRANT WATSON

An exquisite, mystical interpretation of life and God through the life of Moses. "I read the book through with mounting interest and deepening understanding of the bitter, lonely, difficult way of a great leader."—Edwin Seaver, N. Y. American. $3.00

ORPHEUS

A History of Religions

By SALOMON REINACH

Author of Apollo, etc.

The third of the must books! Beside The Story of Philosophy and The Story of Mankind, place this Story of Religions, by one of the world's best known scholars. It will enrich your mind and enchant your imagination. Just published $5.00

SHATTERING HEALTH SUPERSTITIONS

By MORRIS FISHBEIN, M. D.

Author of The Medical Follies, etc.

If you believe that rusty nails cause lockjaw, that raw beefsteak heals a black eye, that a drunken man never hurts himself when he falls, or any of other hundreds of popular superstitions, you will want to read this amazing book—The Medical Man's Believe It or Not. Just Published $2.00

JUDGE AND FOOL

By VLADIMIR JABOTINSKY (Altalena)

"Jabotinsky has made the world of three thousand years ago as real, as exciting, as bitter to the modern reader, as it was to the people who lived in it. He has the gift of creating great tragic characters and great tragic situations. The book is in the grand manner."—Elmer Davis, N. Y. Herald Tribune. Just published $2.50

THE ROAD OF THE GODS

By ISABEL PATERSON

The well-known critic of the Herald Tribune, author of The Fourth Queen and The Singing Season, has written this fine historical story of Pagan times, a delightful story of lovers that were young when the world was young. Just Published $2.50

MANHATTAN MADE

By CHARES RECHT

Author of Rue with a Difference

"Profoundly interesting; this poetry cuts deep; it stirs the mind; it is of us and our age." Ludwig Lewisohn. Just Published $2.00

DROLL PARADE

By CARLTON TALBOTT

Mischievous, fresh and irresistible, these poems will capture even more admirers than the author's first volume, Ballyhoo for a Mendicant. Just published $2.00

HORACE LIVERIGHT N.Y. GOOD BOOKS

he was to set out on the adventure that was to bring him triumph and renown.

Considerably more than half of the book is given to the Texas period, to Houston's service in the United States Senate, and to his stubborn contest with the secessionists. The field has been worked over often, but Mr. James offers new lights that compel new interpretations and especially a stronger emphasis on Houston's part in national affairs. The man who out of an undisciplined rabble created an army, who with a remnant of this army in a single victory established the independence of Texas, and who out of chaos built up a stable republic was until 1846 only a sectional, a provincial figure. But the man who later maneuvered this republic into the Union, who as Senator and then as Governor was always an unflinching supporter of the Union, who in 1860 was strongly supported for the Presidency, and who conceivably might have been nominated and elected was an actor on a larger stage. It is this Houston that the author would have the reader particularly remember.

Mr. James's short, crisp statements, interlaced here and there with sentences longer and more flexible, give movement and dignity to the narrative, and there are many spritely turns of phrase. It is a style that will, no doubt, find many admirers, but to the present reviewer it has at least some of the defects of its qualities. If it avoids the modern vice of smartness, it not infrequently reveals an overstraining for effect. The device of ending a sentence with "however" or "nevertheless" hardly imparts the air of happy negligence that is intended, and the constant emphasis on events that are picturesque or striking entails the omission of many of the little connecting facts and explanations that are essential to good historical narration. Nevertheless, the work is entitled to high praise. As history it is thorough and authentic, and as a story it is of absorbing interest.

W. J. GHENT

Books in Brief

Joy Is My Name. By Sarah Salt. Payson and Clarke. $2.50.

This slight story of a commonplace little tragedy, told with swiftness and precision, is no less poignant because it contains none of that perverted romanticism by use of which some women novelists think to achieve realism in their "slices-of-life" fiction. Joy is a provincial English girl of the lower middle class. She has achieved her heart's desire and is a "real actress" in a small and tawdry repertory company. But she loses her pitiful little job when the leading man buys her a pair of pretty shoes. Joy nearly starves looking for work in London; even worse is the disillusion of her homecoming to "dearest mother." Finally she seeks out her old beau, the whilom leading man, now, morally as well as materially, a down-and-outer. In Miss Salt's writing one comes to look for brilliant sentences—sentences that do more than sparkle, for they serve to illuminate the depths of her understanding.

The Apes. By Eden Phillpotts. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Mr. Phillpotts is a versatile Englishman. His new book, partly a satire on humanity and partly a preachment of humanism, tells of the apes of some far-off era who, in congress assembled, receive a prevision of their child-to-be—man. It is a very small book and, although it is pleasant enough reading, seems hardly to warrant the full-book-length price which the publishers ask.

Free. By Blair Niles. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

The author of "Condemned to Devil's Island" has here written a novel having the same general background as that

To Understand India, You Must Know Mahatma Gandhi

"For all of us Mahatma Gandhi's Ideas is . . . a valuable book. I am torn between praising Andrews and emphasizing Gandhi; between commending the work of the disciple in presenting us with a book so filled with sympathy and understanding, and describing the actual ideas of the leader himself . . . Anyone eager to know just what is being done in the East to create better living conditions for a depressed and often hopeless people will find eloquent passages in these pages."—Harry Hansen, in the New York World.

MAHATMA GANDHI'S IDEAS

Edited by C. F. Andrews

The Macmillan Company Price-$3.00

A BIOGRAPHY!!

THE DEVIL

By Maurice Garcon and Jean Vinchon

An intimate account of this lively rogue and engaging fellow. And yet—

This Prince of Darkness, this fearful apparition is shown to have had another side to his mysterious nature. $5.00

E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc., 300-4th Ave., N. Y. C.

(Publishers since 1852)

If you would make your sides ache with laughter refresh your mind with wise and witty thoughts.

Read Mr. Margrie's

MAGGOTS & MEN

A schoolboy's outline of History from Microbes to Supermen. With 64 Humorous illustrations.

postpaid

30c

BRAIN STUFF

Sums up the world's greatest ideas, achievements, men, and books. An audacious booklet.

postpaid

15c

THE MIGHTY HEART

A Survey of England as it Is and a Vision of What it Might Be. With a critical appreciation of the Author by Bernard Shaw.

postpaid

$1.

WATTS & CO., 5/6 Johnson's Court, London (England)

eminently successful fictional biography. The French penal colony in Guiana is the scene. In the novel the characters are no longer convicts; they are ex-convicts, lost souls who, freed from prison, must remain the rest of their lives in exile in this poverty-stricken patch of South America. That Mrs. Niles knows her locale one cannot for a moment doubt. And yet she has failed to convey the reality to her readers. Her ex-convicts and natives seem fictional characters intended to carry along the somewhat melodramatic plot; and the book lacks the convincing power that might have succeeded in raising it above the level of the competent serial story.

Consequences. By Julia Ellsworth Ford. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Mrs. Ford has chosen the novel as her vehicle for a powerful exposé and excoriation of the traffic in opium. In an exciting story which holds the interest to its very end she lays bare the great sin of the West against the East. Lord Ramondi, son and heir of the fabulously wealthy Marquis of Berkeley, decides to travel in India and China after his graduation from Oxford. This will afford him time to decide whether he shall please his father by taking his place at the head of the family and administering the fortune that shall one day be his, or follow his own desire to become an artist. In China he makes many friends and he finds there the woman, a beautiful Chinese girl, whom he chooses for his future wife. Then, quite by accident, Ramondi learns the source of his father's wealth. It has been accumulated at the expense of numberless Orientals, some of whom he has come to count among his most valued friends, whose craving for opium, unscrupulously encouraged by those who profit by its sale, has filled the coffers of his father and of many another "noble" white man. Ramondi, overwhelmed by this terrible discovery, becomes himself temporarily the victim of his father's sin, thereby visiting upon the Marquis the punishment he deserves, a punishment which breaks him at last upon the wheel of remorse. "Consequences" points a moral which every one who prates of the "white man's burden" should take to heart.

Yama: The Pit. By Alexandre Kuprin. Translated from the Russian by Bernard Guilbert Guerney. $3.

A sentimental, humane, photographic, and very moral depiction of life in a brothel. From Kuprin we learn that the brothel is a social evil inevitable while poverty and ignorance exist, that harlots are essentially human, and that disease is the terrible price of lechery. The worst features of this artistically indifferent book are the luridness of the jacket, the obtrusiveness of the translator, and the absurd extravagances of the introduction.

Rose of Corinth. By Mitchell S. Buck. Nicholas L. Brown.

This attractive little pink volume is inclosed in a green box, is excellently printed on French Navarre paper, and contains charming green decorations by Franz Felix. It should prove an agreeable ornament for the tables of those who buy their books to look at. The reading matter consists of a short story about a beautiful hetaera in ancient Corinth. It is slightly appealing to the erotic imagination, but otherwise quite inconsequential.

The Life of an Ordinary Woman. By Anne Ellis. With an Introduction by Lucy Fitch Perkins. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

This is, of course, not at all the life of an ordinary woman but the history of two magnificent female creatures—one Mrs. Ellis herself and the other her mother. The latter had her numerous babies by herself and unaided, and then got up from her bed and cooked a meal for the rest of the family. She was a miner's wife, brought up in all the hardships and penury of mining camps, accustomed to work from sunrise to

"He has brought furrows of care to the brow of the Mayor of Chicago, but he continues unperturbed at his task of reinterpreting the American Revolution. In his new volume, as in the former ones, Professor Van Tyne gives no aid and comfort to the thought that the War of Independence was a struggle between embattled cherubims and the demons of darkness. . . . His thorough narrative, vivid in many pages, whets the appetite for further treatment from the same source."—Allen Sinclair Will in the New York Times.

"By virtue of its high literary quality, its impressive erudition, its aloof impartiality, its unhurried temper and dignity, this book must be pronounced a notable contribution to the historical literature of our time." —Henry Steele Commager in the New York Herald Tribune.

"This volume is a positive pleasure for an historian who has the least vestige of an analytical mind. . . . If the test of the interest of a book is its power of engrossing no matter where it is opened and read, this is more than interesting."—America.

"Not only scholarly, but absorbingly interesting. . . . One of the most readable histories of the Revolution which has ever been written."—Chicago Tribune.

THE WAR OF INDEPENDENCE

By Claude H. Van Tyne

$5.00

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

sunset cooking, baking, washing, scrubbing, nursing the sick, coaxing along a lazy or bad tempered or merely aimless husband, bearing and raising a brood of wild ones that were the despair of the neighbors. Mrs. Ellis, the oldest of these, herself married not one miner but two, and lived through strikes and good times until she was a second time left a widow. Where her mother had seven children, dying at thirty-nine, she bore three and lost one—and lives to write her story. It is a pertinent addition to the saga of the pioneers. They, men as well as women, were cast in a heroic mold; but reading the list of woman's chores, one wonders if the scales of heroism did not tip ever so little in favor of the wife, the mother, the housekeeper.

Drama

Turn to the Left

"TOPAZE" (Music Box) is a malicious and delightful comedy with a completely immoral tendency. Adapted from the French of Marcel Pagnol by Benn W. Levy, it might be briefly described as the American underworld drama inverted. Instead of the crook who reforms in the last act, we have the honest man who goes completely crooked, and instead of this being presented as a tragedy, it is put before us as a success story. It is a girl, too, who is chiefly instrumental in inducing the hero to give up his honest ways. He wins her in the last act, when he has proved himself more of a scoundrel than his mentor, and his proposal is not an honorable one of marriage, but simply that she shall be his mistress. She accepts, and the curtain falls on a happy ending.

It may be because of my upbringing, but I confess that Topaze, the hero, appealed to me most in the first two acts, when he was still a fool and an honest man. We encounter him first as a schoolmaster, laboriously trying to indoctrinate his little boys in the principles of virtue. He endeavors to teach them that ill-gotten gains do not bring happiness, that poverty is no crime, but most of them distress him by repeatedly giving sensible and realistic answers to such questions as whether a man who has enriched himself through evil means has any friends. He is finally dismissed from the school for his insistence on giving honest marks to the stupid son of a baroness.

Suzy Courtois, the rich and beautiful lady whose nephew he has been tutoring, is the mistress of a corrupt legislator who has been turning over various municipal contracts to his own corporations headed by a dummy. Topaze, completely innocent, is hired as this dummy at a salary beyond his wildest dreams, and is horrified when he discovers the corruption to which he has been a party. But instead of jail and dishonor, he finds that his new wealth and prominence bring him only compliment, respect, and friends seeking favors. The turning-point comes when he learns that the newspaper which threatened to expose him can be bought off, and when his great ambition, a degree in moral philosophy, which had previously been denied him on his merits, is secured for him by blackmail. Thereupon he takes the reins in his own hands, embarks upon corruption on an international scale, kicks his former employer out, and appropriates his employer's mistress.

Frank Morgan as Topaze gives one of the most admirable performances of the season, realizing to the full not only the early guilelessness and timidity of the character, but the deep pathos of the spectacle of trust and innocence confronting a worldly world.

The return of Fred Stone to the stage in "Ripples" (New Amsterdam), accompanied not only by Mrs. Stone and Dorothy but by still another beautiful and talented daughter, Paula, is the occasion for one of those tender evenings when a sophisticated New York audience smiles with tears in its eyes and laughs good-naturedly at anything said. "Ripples" is in the best tradition of Fred Stone plays: there is excellent dancing and acrobatics, a sentimental story based on the legend of Rip Van Winkle, with a lovely mountain scene and a haunting dance of dwarfs, clean fun, and tuneful music. The humor is not all it might be, but Andrew Tombes and Eddie Foy, Jr., handle their material very commendably.

HENRY HAZLITT

To John Wexley, himself an actor, we owe one of the most extraordinary plays ever put on in New York, "The Last Mile," at the Sam H. Harris Theater. It is a tragedy of the death house in a prison, based obviously on the recent prison mutinies in Colorado and New York and possibly upon a story in the American Mercury. Whether it was meant to be primarily propaganda is not clear, but if it was then the young author has achieved that rare thing, a piece of propaganda of extraordinary power and of a dramatic intensity and worth which leave nothing to be desired. Indeed, if it were more emotional and more intense the first act would be unbearable; as it was it was hardly to be endured. It portrayed the last couple of hours of a man condemned to die, the horrible ritual of preparation, the frightful effect of it all upon six other condemned men, the nauseating religious preparations, the final abandonment of hope, the march to the death chair, and finally the hum of the motor which recorded the fact that a stupid and backward State had itself committed the very crime for which it was inflicting its barbarous penalty. We defy any intelligent person to sit through this act and come out a believer in capital punishment.

The heartrending power of the scene was in part due to the altogether admirable acting of the convicted men in their cells—the march of the doomed man to the chair, most movingly portrayed by James Bell, remains unforgettable, his legs plainly weighing a ton each—and in part to the remarkable simplicity, directness, and naturalness of the dialogue, into which no mawkish sentiment was allowed to obtrude. The next acts were given over to the hopeless revolt of the convicts, who take several prisoners including the priest and the principal keeper. The latter and one of his subordinates are killed in cold blood by "Killer" Mears (splendidly acted by Spencer Tracy) as if to bring out the fact that even this horrible killing cannot be so revolting as a deliberate execution by the State. If the members of the New York Legislature could be induced to see this play they would certainly pass the bill abolishing murder by the State.

All in all, here is a great play, extraordinarily creditable to author and producer. It deserves a run of years.

O. G. V.

EIGHTH SATURDAY LUNCHEON
of the New York Chapter
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
at the HOTEL WOODSTOCK
12:45 P. M., Saturday, March 8th, 1930

"The Telephone—Servant of the People"

Speakers:
W. J. O'CONNOR, Assistant Vice-President of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.
EDWARD D. BIERETZ, International Vice-President of the Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.
DONALD RICHBERG, Attorney for Railway Brotherhood; General Counsel for the National Conference on Valuation of Railroads.
McALISTER COLEMAN, Writer.

Chairman: BENJAMIN STOLBERG
Make reservations in advance at the office of the L.I.D.,
112 East 19th Street, New York City—Algonquin 5865.
MEMBERS $1.00 NON-MEMBERS $1.25
Listen in on WEAF, 1:45 P. M., Eastern Standard Time.

☐ THEATRES ☐ ☐ ☐ FILMS ☐

LEO BULGAKOV
THEATRE ASSOCIATES, INC., presents
AT THE BOTTOM
by MAXIM GORKY
New version by William L. Laurence
Phone reservations accepted—Circle 1407
"Really worth seeing."—Brown, Post.
"A fine play"—Mantle, News.
WALDORF THEATRE—50th St., Bet. 6th & 7th Aves. Eve., 8:40
MATINEES Wednesday and Saturday, 2:40

Kenneth Macgowan and J. V. Reed present
BASIL SYDNEY and MARY ELLIS
in CHILDREN of DARKNESS
by Edwin Justus Mayer, author of "The Firebrand"
BILTMORE THEATRE—47th Street, West of Broadway
Evenings, 8:50—Mats., Wed. and Sat., 2:40.

CIVIC REPERTORY 14th St.—6th Ave. Evenings, 8:30.
50c, $1, 1.50. Matinees Thursdays and Saturdays, 2:30.
EVA LE GALLIENNE, Director
Fri.Eve.,Feb.28, "Sea Gull"; Sat.Mat.Mar.1, "Peter Pan"; Sat.Eve.,Mar.1, "Open Door" & "Women Have Their Way"; Mon.Eve.,Mar.3, "Sea Gull"; Tues.Eve.,Mar.4, "A Sunny Morning" & "The Lady From Alfaqueque"; Wed. Eve.,Mar.5, "Living Corpse"; Thurs.Mat.,Mar.6, "Open Door" & "Women Have Their Way"; Thurs.Eve.,Mar.6, "Hedda Gabler."
Seats 4 weeks in advance at Box Office & Town Hall, 113 W. 43rd St.

ETHEL BARRYMORE Theatre, 47th St., West of Broadway
Evenings 8:50; Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:30
LEE SHUBERT Presents PHILIP MERIVALE
IN
DEATH TAKES A HOLIDAY
A COMEDY ABOUT LIFE
"Stirring, fascinating, alive."—Lockridge, Sun.

The Actor-Managers, Inc., has the honor to present
RUTH DRAPER in her ORIGINAL CHARACTER SKETCHES
Evenings: Tuesday, Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday, 8:50.
COMEDY THEATRE, 41st East of Broadway. Mats. Thurs. and Sat., 2:30. VERY GOOD SEATS at $1.00

GRACE GEORGE
In the ST. JOHN ERVINE Comedy
"FIRST MRS. FRASER
with A. E. Matthews and Lawrence Grossmith
PLAYHOUSE 48th St. East of Broadway. Eves., 8:50
Mats. Wed., Thurs. and Sat., 2:30
EXTRA MATINEE EVERY THURSDAY UNTIL JUNE 15
Matinee Every Day during Easter Week.

"REBOUND"
With HOPE WILLIAMS
"This is the best light comedy written by anybody hereabouts in ten or twenty years, and it's not so damned light, either."—Heywood Broun, New York Telegram.
ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
DONALD OGDEN STEWART'S COMEDY
Plymouth Theatre. Eves. 8:50; Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:40.

The Theatre Guild Presents
METEOR
By S. N. BEHRMAN
Guild THEA., 52nd St. W. of Broadway
Evgs. 8:50. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:40

The Apple Cart
Bernard Shaw's Political Extravaganza
MARTIN BECK Theatre, 45th St., W. of Eighth Ave.
Evgs., 8:30. Mats., Thurs. & Sat., 2:30.

THE City Haul By ELIZABETH MIELE
with HERBERT RAWLINSON
A COMEDY ON MUNICIPAL POLITICS
ELTINGE THEATRE, 42nd St., West of B'dway.
Evenings 8:50. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday 2:30.

HERMAN SHUMLIN presents
THE LAST MILE
"Most exciting play in New York today. Superbly done. Cheers keep rising in your throat.—John Mason Brown, Post.
SAM H. HARRIS Theatre 42nd St. W. of Broadway
Eves. 8:50. Matinees Wed. & Sat., 2:30

VOTED THE BEST PICTURE OF THE YEAR
Matinees: Good Seats, All Prices, at Box Office
WARNER BROS. Present
GEORGE ARLISS
in
"DISRAELI"
(A Vitaphone All-Talking Picture)
CENTRAL THEATRE Daily 2:45—8:45
Broadway and 47th St. Sunday 3—6—8:45

55th STREET PLAYHOUSE 154 W. 55th Street, East of 7th Avenue.
Continuous 1:30 until midnight. Popular Prices
Commencing Saturday, March 1st—
FIRST TIME AT POPULAR PRICES
THE FIRST 100% GERMAN TALKING PICTURE
"DICH HAB ICH GELIEBT"
("BECAUSE I LOVED YOU")
"One of the best films that have come from Berlin since 'Variety'."—SAYS FILM DAILY.

☐ ☐ DEBATE ☐ ☐

DEBATE!
RESOLVED
IS THE WORLD WE LIVE IN RATIONAL?
A significant debate on the most Fundamental Problem suggested by the human mind since the Speculations of the Ancients.
JOHN COWPER POWYS says NO
Noted Novelist and Poet—Author of "Wolf Solent"
HARRY WATON says YES
Noted Author and Lecturer—Author of "Pain and Pleasure"
Chairman—DR. G. F. BECK—Director of Labor Temple
Sunday Afternoon, March 2nd, 1930, at 2:30 P.M.
Great Hall, Cooper Union, 8th St. & 4th Ave.
TICKETS 75 CENTS, AT THE DOOR $1.00
Obtainable at Rand School, 7 East 15th St.; Labor Temple, 14th St. and Second Ave.; Room 702, 110 West 40th St.; Rational Vegetarian Restaurant, 199 Second Ave.; Columbia University Book Store, Journalism Building.
For Mail Orders Address Room 702, 110 West 40th St.
AUSPICES WORKERS EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTE

Films

Inflated "Grandeur"

I DO not know if any psychologist has tried to analyze the peculiar complexes which dominate the minds of the film-manufacturing colony in Hollywood, but I am certain that the people there suffer from some strange mental disease. Taken individually they seem to have the normal quota of intelligence, technical competence, and even imagination. In any collective effort, however, they almost invariably sink to sheer puerility. Witness the present Hollywood craze for plots dealing with stage life. Picture after picture has shown us the miraculous rise of an unknown vaudeville actor to stardom on Broadway. Why, you will ask, this persistent riding to death of a patently trivial subject? Because the public demands it? No, I am sure the reason is simply that Hollywood finds in stage life the easiest formula for making a song-and-dance show realistically plausible. It has obviously never occurred to the film producers that actors today are much more anxious to attain stardom in Hollywood than on Broadway. Nor has it occurred to them that a film within a film provides as many opportunities for singing and dancing as does a play within a play or, to be more precise, a play within a film. But then, to make singing and dancing expressly cinematic, something that belongs intrinsically to the screen instead of being a slavish copy of the stage, requires a little thinking and a little imagination, whereas aping the stage requires none.

It is this strange preference for the trite and hackneyed that makes "Happy Days" (Roxy) such a painful disappointment. For "Happy Days" is not an ordinary picture. It is an experiment designed to herald forth a new achievement in cinematic technique—the enlarged projection. You would think that with the increased screen space at their command the producers would have tried to present their entertainers (since the picture is largely a revue) in all the variety of simultaneous contrasts and juxtapositions made possible by the enlarged projection. You would expect to see the screen surface used for weaving decorative and rhythmic patterns built up of different groups of actors and dancers on the principle of parallel action. But what do you find? A not particularly bright comedy introduction of stage life leading up to a glorified but uncommonly dull minstrel show, both of which derive no greater benefit from the larger screen than the ability to show an increased number of people at the same time or a full-sized figure on a scale approximating the normal. Neither of these advantages is of much importance except for reproducing the effect of the stage.

By contrast with "Happy Days," "Puttin' on the Ritz" (Earl Carroll Theater) may almost pass for a Hollywood masterpiece. To be sure, it has its defects—the inevitable story of a vaudeville team and all the stage business that goes with it—but it breaks away from the routine in a number of scenes, notably, in Harry Richman's spirited dance against the perfervid movements of the chorus. For this, Mr. Sloman, the director, deserves high praise.

Praise is also due to Mr. George Arliss for his brilliant acting in "The Green Goddess" (Winter Garden), a slight but entertaining skit by William Archer which does not obtrude its stage descent on the screen, although it does not achieve, either, any cinematic distinction.

As a comedy "Not so Dumb" (Capitol) is sufficiently amusing, with Miss Marion Davies proving herself a very able comedienne. Mr. King Vidor's direction of the picture, however, is only competent, and from him, of all Hollywood directors, we are entitled to expect something far more inspiring.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

FILM AND DEBATE

A TIMELY 3-CORNERED DEBATE!!!

SOVIETISM vs. RELIGION

MAX
EASTMAN
Brilliant Author-Lecturer
(lately returned from Russia) for SOVIETISM
(Atheism)

HARRY ELMER
BARNES
Noted Social Philosopher for LIBERALISM
(Agnosticism)

DR. STEPHEN S.
WISE Eloquent Expounder for RELIGION
(Deism)

—SUBJECT—

RESOLVED: That the anti-religious policy of the Soviet government is detrimental to civilization.

CARNEGIE HALL, 57th Street & 7th Avenue

SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1930, AT 3 P.M.

Reserved Seats, $1.00, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00, $2.50, $3.00

BUY YOUR SEATS NOW FOR BEST LOCATIONS

On sale at Carnegie Hall Box Office (Circle 1770); Rand School Bookshop, 7 E. 15th Street; New School Bookshop, 465 W. 23rd St.; Columbia University Bookstore, 116th St. and B'way; and in person or by mail from offices of

LEAGUE FOR PUBLIC DISCUSSION

11 W. 42nd St. Chickering 5796—Lackawanna 1613

(N. B. This debate will be published ad verbatim. Reserve your copy now by mailing $1.00.)

RKO CAMEO 42nd St & B'way

American Premiere

BEG. SAT. MARCH 1st

Newest SOVKINO Production

"CHINA EXPRESS"

Sensational Uprising aboard the famous Nanking to Luchow express

DARINGLY DIFFERENT—

An amazing film

WITHIN THE FORTNIGHT

Plays to See

*At the Bottom—Waldorf—116 W. 50th St.
*Berkeley Square—Lyceum—E. 45th St.
Children of Darkness—Biltmore—W. 74th St.
*Civic Repertory—14th St. & 6th Ave—See Advertisement.
*Death Takes a Holiday—Barrymore Theatre—47th St., W. of B'dway.
Ruth Draper—Comedy—41st St., E. of B'dway.
Everything's Jake—Assembly—39th St., E. of B'dway.
June Moon—Broadhurst—W. 44th St.
Mei Lan-Fang—National—208 W. 41st St.
Meteor—Guild—W. 52nd St.
Rebound—Plymouth—45th St., W. of B'dway.
Strictly Dishonorable—Avon—W. 45th St.
Strike Up The Band—Times Sq.—W. of B'dway.
The First Mrs. Fraser—Playhouse—48th St., E. of B'dway.
*The Infinite Shoeblack—Elliott—39th St., E. of B'dway.
*The Last Mile—Sam H. Harris—42nd St., W. of B'dway.
Topaze—Music Box—45th St., W. of B'dway.
Wake Up and Dream—Selwyn—42nd St., W. of B'dway.

First Nights

The Apple Cart—Beck—45th St., E. of Eighth Ave.
The Green Pastures—Mansfield—47th St., W. of B'dway.
The International Revue—Majestic—

Films

China Express—Cameo—42nd St., E. of B'dway.
Dich Hab Ich Geliebt—55th St. Theatre—55th St., E. of 7th Ave.
Disraeli—Central Theatre—Broadway and 47th St.
The Vagabond Lover—Criterion—B'dway at 44th St.

Announcement

Albany Nation Meeting, Tues Eve., March 4, 8 P. M. Channing Hall, Unitarian Church. Oswald Garrison Villard to speak on Russia and Contemporary Problems.

---

*Drama. Comedy. Musical.

Visits to Soviet Russia
FOURTH SEASON

Explorative itineraries worked out with reference to social, economic, historic, artistic and scenic features.

Visits to factories, schools, children's communities, collective farms and villages . . . art treasures, palaces and workers' rest homes . . . for the adventurous . . . camping in the Caucasus and study of primitive tribes.

Small groups, each accompanied by a qualified American leader and Russian interpreter. From $395 including express steamship passage. Literature available.

• Individual itineraries also executed ▲ Independent year-'round representation in Russia •

20-30 WEST 43rd STREET ▲ NEW YORK

THE OPEN ROAD

An Important Message.... to Readers of the Nation

Your ideals are Different. What country is causing you to change your whole outlook on life—is making you mentally sit up—fascinates you by its daring innovations—the one spot on earth you've longed to visit—or if you have been there, want to return to see its ideals in practice? Here is our exceptional opportunity to visit Soviet Russia in time to witness the May 1st International Day Celebration. A Special tour leaves April 12th—S.S. Bremen—From $340—It includes: transatlantic passage both ways, accomodations in first-class hotels in Russia, 3 meals daily, railway with sleeper, sightseeing tours, services of an English-speaking guide, etc. Under the auspices of the first American organization to present Soviet Russia to the Traveler, Educator, Business Man, Student. Full information gladly mailed.

World Tourists inc.
175 Fifth Avenue, N.Y. Algonquin 6656-8797

P.S.—Large groups of students and workers are now in formation for very low priced Tours. Only those who dont mind roughing it in Soviet Russia should inquire for particulars. $280 is the cost.

Haiti—a Plan for Self-Government

By L. J. de BEKKER

NEWS that the American Occupation might be withdrawn from Haiti aroused the keenest interest in the island; and this interest was increased to great excitement by Senator Borah's declaration that first among the "things to be done meantime," that is, before the Hoover Commission made its report, was the substitution of a civil governor to replace High Commissioner Russell. The reactions to this proposal were various and significant. The subsidized newspapers representing the Occupation and President Borno at once assumed the attitude that the appointment of a civil governor would be an insult to the national pride of Haiti. The Opposition press immediately retorted that it was not important what the governor was called, especially during a transitional period, since the American high commissioner had been governor in fact since 1922. This view, expressed by Charles Moravia in his Opposition journal, Le Temps, drew a supporting letter from Elie Guérin, a Haitian lawyer and for many years a prominent figure in the Haitian nationalist movement. After remarking that it seemed as though word must have been given by Borno to his newspapers to feign indignation at the word governor, M. Guérin continues as follows:

> As Le Temps has so judiciously asked: Why should we be alarmed at the correct naming of a thing which we have endured [under another name] for eight long and mortal years? As Le Temps said in its editorial:
>
> > Since 1922 this country has endured the misdeeds of a governor under the name of high commissioner. . . . [Yet] because he does not call himself governor the so-called patriotism of some people accommodates itself to the situation [to his misdeeds], in spite of the ruin and misery, the despair and the blood which his proconsulate has spread throughout the country to the point of engendering revolution. [Now, when] in order to assure definitive relief [for Haiti] it is proposed to invest his successor with the title of governor, here are people feigning indignation who have never played and do not wish to play any role except that of executioners of their country! A handsome state of affairs! . . .
>
> Indeed a handsome state of affairs! We nationalists say this: If we have been able to endure for fifteen years the thing itself in all its horror without faltering and without approving it, ceaselessly struggling against it in spite of all the risks of persecutions and suffering, we shall express no indignation merely because it is called by its true name.
>
> It is necessary for the Haitian nation to permit a high commissioner or a governor to restore her sovereign rights, just as she permitted Admiral Caperton to come and rob her of them, but this must be done under the following conditions:
>
> > 1. Cessation of the convention of 1915. The terms of this convention are still enforced, although the treaty expired in 1926.
> >
> > 2. Immediate notification to the Haitian people to prepare for an election, to be held under an altogether liberal electoral rule, for the selection of senators and deputies.
> >
> > 3. Discussion and ratification of a protocol or a treaty to be made by a reconstituted national Haitian government providing for the withdrawal of the American Occupation.
>
> Here lies the only solution which is at once logical, acceptable, and satisfactory if we are to dismiss the possibility of indemnification by the United States. . . .

While the subsidized press continued to speculate about the changes which might result in the government of Haiti as a result of the commission's visit, without admitting for a moment the possibility of the withdrawal of the marines, the leaders of the Opposition were in consultation over plans for an orderly and gradual withdrawal not only of the marines but of the entire American Occupation, following the establishment of a genuinely representative government elected by the Haitian people. Placide David, editor of La Presse, outlined in his paper a plan for self-government which is printed herewith:

> 1. On April 5 next the American agents shall suggest to the local government that in the interest of public peace the presidential election of April 14 be postponed.
>
> 2. On May 15, the term of the actual president normally coming to an end, the representative of President Hoover shall assume the responsibility of government. (It goes without saying that General Russell will not occupy this position.)
>
> 3. The special American agent shall surround himself with a council, including some Haitian representatives, to assist him in the promulgation of executive orders which shall have the following objects and shall be issued under the conditions mentioned:
>
> > (a) Formation of electoral registration commissions.
> >
> > (b) Rules for procedure of legislative elections.
> >
> > (c) Slight modifications in the method of election of senators so as to conform more to our traditions, in accordance with the constitution of 1889.
> >
> > (d) These executive orders shall be issued within two months, that is, between May 15 and July 15. At this latter date the primary assemblies shall be convoked, and a delay of two months accorded for the registration of voters.
> >
> > (e) The election of deputies and that of electors of arrondissements shall be fixed for September 30. These two elections shall be held at the same time.
> >
> > (f) On September 30 voters shall convocate at the capital of each electoral district, in a place designated by the communal administration, for the election of candidates for the senate.
> >
> > (g) On October 10 the convocation of the deputies and the establishment of the chamber shall take place.
> >
> > (h) From October 10 to 20 the chamber shall proceed to the election of senators.
> >
> > (i) On October 25 the senate shall be convened.
> >
> > (j) On October 26, the two chambers shall meet in the National Constitutional Assembly for the vote on the new constitution. Under the circumstances this work ought to be completed at the latest by December 10.
> >
> > (k) On December 15 election of the president of the republic shall take place.
> >
> > (l) On December 20 the chief of state shall be sworn in.
>
> At this last date the mission of the special representative of President Hoover as well as the military occupation should have come to an end. It seems to us that these are practical ideas which should receive the attention of the President of the United States.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 12, 1930 No. 3375

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 283
EDITORIALS:
The Lesson of Dollar Wheat.......... 286
Poor Porto Rico.......... 287
A Conspiracy 287
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN.......... 288
POWER CONTROL BREAKS DOWN. By Laurence Todd.......... 289
THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE CENSOR. IV. THE SIEGE OF FORT SCRIBNER. By Henry Raymond Mussey.......... 291
THE HOOVER HIPPODROME. By Paul Y. Anderson.......... 293
THE INVENTOR ENTERS HEAVEN. By James Rorty.......... 295
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter.......... 297
CORRESPONDENCE 297
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
Dialogue. By Irwin Edman.......... 298
Kaleidoscope. By Henry Hazlitt.......... 298
A Romancer's Columbus. By Clifton P. Fadiman.......... 298
Libertine and Libertarian. By William Seagle.......... 299
The Unthinkable War. By William MacDonald.......... 299
Into the Wilderness. By Dorothy Van Doren.......... 300
The Nationalist East. By Elizabeth MacCallum.......... 301
Illumination. By Granville Hicks.......... 303
Books in Brief.......... 304
Drama: For the Defense. By Joseph Wood Krutch.......... 306
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE.......... 307
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Massacre at Aux Cayes. By L. J. de Bekker.......... 308

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, MANAGING EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY
DOROTHY VAN DOREN ARTHUR WARNER
DRAMATIC EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH HENRY HAZLITT
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

AN ENTIRELY ADMIRABLE DECISION was handed down by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals on March 3 in reversing the conviction of Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett for sending obscene matter through the mails. The decision, written by Judge Augustus N. Hand, and concurred in by Judges Thomas Swan and Harrie B. Chase, is one of the most thoroughgoing and handsome rebukes on record to the sort of obscenity snoopers who have been so noisomely active of late. The decision says in part:

> The defendant's discussion of the phenomena of sex is written with sincerity and feeling and with an idealization of the marriage relation and sex emotions. . . . The old theory that information on sex matters should be left to chance has greatly changed and it is commonly thought that much was lacking in the old mystery and reticence. . . . While it may be thought that portions of the tract ["The Sex Side of Life"] go into unnecessary details that would better have been omitted, it may be fairly answered that the curiosity of many adolescents would not be satisfied without full explanation, and that no more than that is really given. . . . The statute we have to construe [that defining "obscene and lascivious matter"] was never thought to bar from the mails everything that might stimulate sex impulses. . . . Like everything else, the law must be construed reasonably, with a view to the general objects aimed at . . . it must not be construed to interfere with serious instruction regarding sex matters unless the terms it is conveyed in are clearly indecent.

These are only the high spots in a completely sane, reasoned, and farsighted discussion of Mrs. Dennett's pamphlet and the implications arising therefrom. Her counsel, Morris L. Ernst, declared that the decision was a severe blow at the powers of federal censors in the Post Office Department. It is time that such chastisement was administered.

ENCOURAGING NEWS comes from Geneva that the League of Nations committee of eleven jurists which is engaged in coordinating the Kellogg pact and the Covenant has gone so far as to propose an amendment to Article XII of the Covenant declaring that "in no case" can League members resort to war to settle their differences. It is, of course, a far cry from this preliminary action to its adoption by all the members of the League. But sincerity speaks out of this action, which is obviously a genuine attempt to put the right kind of teeth into the Kellogg pact. The whole trouble at London and elsewhere is that the nations, including our own, which signed the Kellogg pact did so with their tongues in their cheeks. It is hard to see how if this amendment to Article XII goes through, League members can any longer continue to go ahead with their armaments as if the Kellogg pact did not exist. More than that, the amendment, it is reported, further strengthens the pact because it excludes all the reservations permitting defensive wars, or wars in undefined regions of vital interest to the British Empire—the reservations now attached to the Kellogg-Briand treaty. Even a phrase to the effect that members of the League must have recourse only to pacific means for the settlement of any dispute likely to lead to a rupture of relations marks a step forward.

AN EMPHATIC PROTEST against the proposed betrayal of the United States by an abandonment of the reduction program at the Naval Disarmament Conference has been cabled to London by 1,200 Americans under the leadership of Carrie Chapman Catt, Raymond Fosdick, James G. MacDonald of the Foreign Policy Association, and Professor James T. Shotwell. The document again recalls to the delegates Mr. Hoover's words of promise to the American people that reduction "cannot be too low for us" and declares that this policy of reduction "has had and continues to have the overwhelming indorsement and support of the American people." The Harvard Liberal Club and the Radcliffe College International Club have sent to President Hoover a petition, signed by 62 members of the faculties of the two colleges and 765 students, demanding that our delegates stand behind a drastic reduction of the capital ships and asking "why our delegation is running counter to a policy so recently declared." At Yale, through the Liberal Club, 300 students have similarly petitioned President Hoover. Senator Borah, too, has taken a hand by a radio speech in which he declared that failure to bring about substantial cuts would be "nothing less than a catastrophe"; and well asked his hearers: "What is national security when the whole world is armed to the teeth?" In London the answer is talk of a three-power agreement between Japan, England, and the United States. That would be better than nothing. But the delegation must realize that a large section of public opinion here will not be satisfied with anything less than a genuine move toward disarmament.

NOT A SUPER-BANK, but an institution of large powers and even larger hopes notwithstanding, is the burden of the description of the Bank for International Settlements which Jackson E. Reynolds, chairman of the committee which drafted the plan of organization, gave recently in New York. The bank charter is to be perpetual and its statute is so drawn as to be hard to amend, at least to the bank's disadvantage. As far as words and promises can go, the bank will be free of requisitions or other interference in time of war, thus setting a standard which it is to be hoped may be applied to all other forms of property not directly intended for military use. What will keep the institution from becoming a super-bank is, apparently, the fact that it cannot issue currency in any form (London insisted that the bank should not be allowed to deal in acceptances) and may not engage in any financial transaction in any country represented on its directorate without the consent of the central bank of that country; but Mr. Reynolds sees it as "coordinating the central banks of the world" and eventually holding a large part of the world's gold. The Federal Reserve system has no official connection with the management of the World Bank, but there is every reason to believe that the choice of the two American directors of the bank, Gates W. McGarrah and Leon Fraser, the former of whom is slated for the presidency, was made with Mr. Hoover's approval. Both Mr. McGarrah and Mr. Fraser are men of the highest standing, and no better selections could well have been made.

ENFORCEMENT OF NARCOTIC LAWS by the federal government is due for a shake-up if the presentment of a federal grand jury at New York on February 21 is given attention at Washington. "Wholesale padding of the records of the local federal narcotic office in New York" for several months, beginning in April, 1929, under orders telephoned to the Assistant Deputy Commissioner by the Deputy Commissioner at Washington, is the startling charge which the grand jury urged should be laid before Secretary Mellon. "Evidences of gross dereliction and incompetence" on the part of some of the agents attached to the New York office, including evidence that "at least one of the agents is a user of drugs," form a part of this unsavory exposure. A few days after this presentment was made the newspapers reported that a woman federal agent, herself an addict, was under investigation on suspicion of peddling drugs in night clubs and among theatrical people. The reply of the Treasury Department is amazing. Colonel L. G. Nutt of Washington, the official whom the grand jury has branded with fraud, has been given a roving commission in the prohibition service, and the three federal officials responsible for the exposure have been transferred, one to Chicago, one to Kansas City, and the third to Honolulu.

BROADSIDE ATTACKS on prohibition exceeding in vigor and severity anything known to our legislative history marked the opening hearings before the House Judiciary Committee on the administration of the prohibitory laws. No one of the speakers went quite so far as Frederic R. Coudert, Sr., of New York, who declared that "it is easy to predict that the government, legislative or administrative, that attempted something like real enforcement would be swept out of existence at the next election, and if that were not so they would have on their hands a civil war," but a long list of prominent speakers fell only a little short of Mr. Coudert in denouncing the system and its effects. Dr. Samuel Harden Church, president of the Carnegie Institute at Pittsburgh, arraigned "the questionable methods of enforcement, all on money appropriated by Congress," and insisted that "the dignity and tranquillity of the nation have been destroyed by conditions which never have occurred before in times of peace." The president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, General W. W. Atterbury, told the committee that he could not find that prohibition "has made a particle of difference with the discipline" of the road, while the Rev. Dr. John A. Ryan, of the Catholic University of America, affirmed that "prohibition sears everything it touches and confuses the mental processes of higher officials."

A GOOD BEGINNING has apparently been made by President Hoover's commission in Haiti. Overruling the autocratic General Russell, they insisted that the Haitians be allowed to hold a parade in protest against the occupation, and an orderly and extraordinarily impressive demonstration by 1,200 women offering public prayers and then passing in procession before the commission's headquarters was the result. In consequence of the fair attitude of the commission, the Haitian opposition is reported as having given up its original intention to "boycott" the hearings. A striking body of protest has already been put into the record from leaders representing powerful groups opposed to intervention. They condemn General Russell as a virtual dictator and declare that President Borno is simply a puppet in his hands. As for the Council of State which President Borno has asked to elect his successor on April 14, they assert that the council is simply a body of clerks for the President, and that unless a popular election is allowed bloodshed will certainly result. The testimony already taken is bound to be impressive to any fair-minded person.

AMERICAN COMMUNISTS are annoying and silly, but they will not become dangerous unless the authorities give them importance by attempting their forcible suppression. Recent demonstrations in New York and elsewhere have led to some lamentable instances of police brutality, but in other cases have been met with notable good sense and good temper. We hope that progressive annoyance may be met with progressive good humor on the part of the officers of the law. Mayor Walker's two-faced public statement, however, does not help. It is likely to encourage the use of violence. Certainly no thoughtful American can have anything but condemnation for the provocative blast of Matthew Woll, acting president of the National Civic Federation and vice-president of the American Federation of Labor, who sends to commercial organizations in 500 cities and to all members of Congress a letter designed to stir up hatred against Soviet Russia as being responsible for these outbreaks. In Los Angeles a reactionary school board has prepared a fresh assault on our liberties by undertaking to prevent any young person of communist beliefs from getting a high-school diploma. Such certificates henceforth will read as follows: "This diploma is awarded in consideration of a satisfactory record in character and citizenship and the completion of a course of study as prescribed by the Board of Education." Superintendent Bouelle, according to a dispatch, regards the new wording as a guaranty that no student known to harbor communist beliefs will get a diploma. Does the Los Angeles school board know nothing of the long history of persecution for opinion's sake?

WISE AND FARSIGHTED is Stalin's decision to put on the brakes in Russia and to slow down the collectivization and nationalization of the farms. Walter Duranty declares in the New York Times that the statesmanship of this remarkable article of Stalin's "appears to put Stalin on a level with Lenin himself." That may well be, but the truth is that any child could see that Moscow has been going ahead so fast as to jeopardize the whole Communist experiment. Already Stalin says that 50 per cent of the peasant holdings have been collectivized and more than 3,500,000 tons, or 90 per cent, of the cleaned seed have already been delivered to the collectives for the spring sowing, something which appeared, Duranty reports, "quite impossible three weeks ago." Stalin is opposed at present to pushing collectivization to a further extreme of communism and of sharing even pigs, poultry, and houses with the collectives. Similarly Stalin has only sneers for those Communists who would start collectives by pulling down church bells and "calling themselves r-r-revolutionaries." This is statesmanship, for a wise statecraft knows when to retreat.

THE PRESIDENT has appointed another business "go-getter" to an important diplomatic post. John N. Willys, the automobile builder who sold out his motor interests last July for a neat $21,000,000, is to round out his career as United States Ambassador to Poland. This is in several aspects the worst of Mr. Hoover's bad diplomatic appointments, for Mr. Willys is by education, training, and experience totally unqualified for this job. Poland is in a difficult and dangerous financial situation. It is beset with grave economic and international dangers and it is in the hands of a dictatorship. To make matters more difficult, the lot of the Jews in Poland at present is direful—worse even than in 1922. Race discrimination is everywhere prevalent; economic opportunities are completely denied to all Jews, especially to Jewish women. In consequence their American relatives are deeply concerned and are most eager to have a skilled diplomat at Warsaw who will be of real help. They have nothing to hope for from Mr. Willys.

THE TRIBUTES TO PRESIDENT MASARYK on his eightieth birthday will be numerous and warm. He has been head of the Czecho-Slovak Republic since 1918, and is its founder in that he was, in 1914, the organizer of the Czecho-Slovak movement for independence and later convinced Woodrow Wilson and the Allied leaders of the desirability of building up this new state. There is no question that the government he reared has been the stablest and probably the cleanest and best of the new ones set up after the war. In this he has, of course, had the support of a highly competent foreign minister, Eduard Benes. It is naturally too early to judge of their work, or of its possibilities of endurance. Unfortunately we cannot give him the unqualified praise as a statesman which he so eminently deserves as a man, a famous leader of oppressed minorities, a champion of the Jews at a time when it almost meant martyrdom to defend them, and a patriot. It is profoundly disappointing to record that President Masaryk still believes in force, maintains a very large army, and preaches preparedness despite the folly of that policy as illustrated by the World War, and that he has not protected the rights of the German minorities in his country as he should have. The forcible wiping out of all traces of German influence and culture in Prague, for example, is a melancholy example of how one who once battled nobly for the oppressed can himself turn to oppression when in power.

GEORGE HAVEN PUTNAM DEAD? It seems hardly possible, for even at eighty-five, up to three weeks ago this dean of American publishers possessed the spirit of youth and easily and fleetly dodged motors on his daily walk to his office. A Civil War soldier at seventeen, he was captured in the Shenandoah, and was one of the few men in 1930 who could testify to the hardships and cruelties of confinement at Petersburg and in Libby Prison. Inheriting with his brothers the Putnam publishing business, he held it true to his standards for more than sixty years, refusing to yield to any pressure to cheapen them. But it was as a living link between the United States and Great Britain that Major Putnam was perhaps best known. The founder of the English Speaking Union and of a professorship in American History at the University of London, he espoused the Allied cause at the outbreak of the war, throwing himself into it with all his great vitality. It is pleasant to recall his long service to good government in New York City, his unyielding fidelity to copyright legislation, to civil-service reform, to the Indian, to the cause of political independence—he was a staunch Cleveland Mugwump at a time when that seemed treason in a veteran—and to free trade.

THE LONG-AWAITED American renaissance, we are pleased to inform our readers, is here: "Art has come to the dishpan, to the washstand, to dust-mops, and to the garage. For generations, even centuries, the perfumery industry was just a matter of pleasant smells, until one shrewd French manufacturer fixed his attention upon the container—and the industry was soon off on a new start in world-wide prosperity. One artist who became famous through his brilliant black-and-white illustrations for 'Salome' is bringing beauty now to automobile tires, turnstiles, and lighting fixtures. . . . Even for commodities such as electric washing machines the manufacturers declare that artistic design is getting to be a more important factor every year. . . . Oilcloth has blossomed out into a thing of beauty. Art is on our floors." Just another of those malicious and exaggerated travesties that Mr. Sinclair Lewis puts into the mouths of his victims? No, readers, we have had Art Week in Boston, and these remarks are from the radio speech of Dr. Julius Klein, Assistant Secretary of Commerce, in solemn celebration of that event!

The Lesson of Dollar Wheat

DOLLAR wheat has now been added to the other tribulations of President Hoover. Agricultural complaint, of course, is perennial, but agricultural distress during the past decade has been acute and widespread. The Federal Farm Board is the Administration's cure for that distress. Within eight months of its establishment wheat hits the dollar mark, and the political results are likely to be serious. The real lesson of dollar wheat, however, is hard to learn, for it involves disagreeable and unwelcome truths.

The farm cycle of the past twenty-five years has only repeated a bit of history as old as the United States. Prices of farm products have gone up, and land prices with them, while farmers thought to get rich by buying land for the rise. Then agricultural prices, and land prices with them, collapsed, and the farmers, loaded up with high-priced land, could not make a living. That is exactly what happened in spectacular fashion during and following the war. The farmer's relative disadvantage has been increased further by his inability to organize, as all sorts of industrial groups have done, to control the market. The hard fact of the business is that the farmer by the very nature of his occupation cannot successfully get special economic favors, no matter how great his political power.

For a century the farmers have tried to put their hands into the protective-tariff grab-bag. Always they have drawn out, and always they must draw out, burned fingers and nothing else. Consequently the export-debenture plan was proposed. The tariff system has for generations enhanced the prices of various manufactured goods to the real or supposed advantage of certain manufacturers and the real loss of everybody else. Discovering at last that import duties on farm products cannot raise prices in a country like ours that exports instead of importing such products, the agricultural representatives since the war have asked the rest of the country to subsidize the farmers by paying a bounty on exports so as to raise domestic prices of foodstuffs and materials against the American consumer—surely a monstrous proposal if there ever was one, though no more monstrous than the whole protective-tariff graft. The point is, however, that the farmers, even with all their political strength, did not succeed in putting through the export-debenture plan, and if they had succeeded the resulting stimulus to production would undoubtedly have robbed them of any benefit in permanent high prices.

Then came the Farm Board with its possible half-billion fund to apply big-business methods to marketing. Now cooperative marketing, in so far as it is an outgrowth of sound organization of the farming industry, is an admirable development, as the experience of Denmark has shown, but the desirable end of encouraging cooperation has been confused in many minds with the totally different end of combating grain speculation. It is believed that somehow wicked speculators are responsible for low prices, especially that they drive prices down in the fall when the farmers sell the bulk of their crops. This is simply not so. They do sometimes get rich out of price changes, but they cannot fix prices in an intensively competitive market for a world commodity like wheat or cotton. Nevertheless, the ill-directed drive against the speculator goes on, and with dollar wheat we have been treated to the edifying spectacle of a United States Senator demanding the closing of the exchanges, as though the shutting-up of the market in which the farmer's product was to be sold would raise the price he gets!

What are the facts? Wheat and cotton prices are, and in modern times always must be, world prices determined by world crops and world demand. The enormous wheat crop of 1928 resulted in an almost unprecedented carry-over into 1929. Although last year's crop was 400,000,000 bushels less than that of 1928, Europe, the great buying continent, itself raised 100,000,000 bushels more than the preceding year. Our export to Europe since the middle of 1929 has been 117,000,000 bushels less than during the corresponding period a year ago, which is more than the decrease in our wheat yield from 1928. We may, then, have a bigger carry-over this year than last. Why should not the price be low? How can it help being low? The declaration of the Farm Board in October, with prices more than thirty cents above their present level, that prices were then too low did not make them too low in the important sense of the word. That price is a right price, in the sense of a necessary price, which will move the crop. Denunciation of speculators and whole libraries of books on "ordered marketing" cannot change that disagreeable fact.

Must the farmer, then, be left to stew in his own juice? By no means, but the measures undertaken must be possible and not impossible. Improve marketing arrangements if you can, strengthen farm finance, take every possible measure of legitimate direct aid, but do not try to establish artificial prices for the farmer's product, because under our existing conditions it cannot be done. The farmer ought to be free of the unnecessary burdens under which he labors. He ought to be free of tariff graft. He ought to be free of high freight rates based on the attempt of a muddled government to insure the railroads a "fair return" on a valuation inflated by mistaken court decisions. He ought to be freed of outworn tax systems and of disastrous systems of land tenure.

Back of it all lies a more fundamental trouble. Our boasted prosperity has gone mostly to a comparative few, and the great mass of people, who make a living by working and producing rather than by planning and selling, have not found the task of earning a living appreciably eased by the events of the past ten years. The farmer's interests lie with the working class, not the trading class, and we shall get no genuine farm relief until he learns to cooperate with that working group in bringing about a better organization of industry and a more equitable distribution of its products. Such cooperation may take the form in part of common economic action, and in part of united political endeavor. If we are ever to get away from our present system of government by big business through the agency of two interchangeable parties, the farmer and the industrial worker have got to find a basis of common action. It is not wholly inconceivable that dollar wheat, for all that it means of loss to the farmer, may help forward that process.

Poor Porto Rico

ANY one who fancies that Porto Rico is a bright and shining example of American success in administering a dependency should read Governor Theodore Roosevelt's recent message to the Porto Rican Legislature. The financial condition of the Insular government, the legislature was told, is "grave." Treasury receipts for the first six months of the present fiscal year fell $1,318,556, or 25 per cent, behind the estimated receipts on which the budget was based, and the total of perhaps $9,500,000 which the Treasurer expects to collect for the year is less by $1,420,000 than the estimate. The condition of the municipalities the Governor pronounced "desperate." Taxes are in arrears and bond issues have in some cases exceeded the legal limit. There is an Insular bonded indebtedness of $25,390,000, plus a floating indebtedness of $3,024,950. Ninety-seven municipal bond issues total $18,314,300.

Governor Roosevelt is not hopeful that much can be done to remedy the situation at once, but he makes some comprehensive recommendations for the future. With a large volume of unpaid taxes, with taxes in some cases years overdue, and with taxes "unscientifically and in some instances inequitably assessed," an immediate revision of the tax laws to meet abnormal conditions might not be suitable for normal times, and forcible collection of unpaid taxes cannot be resorted to without risking an increase of failures, unemployment, and distress. The floating indebtedness of the island should, however, be funded; the system of municipal government should be revised to get rid of useless offices and save money; and the budget system should be made more effective.

All these things are important, and if they can be carried through the Porto Ricans ought, after a time, to be able to breathe more freely. The underlying factors, as Governor Roosevelt sees them, are economic. Most of the people of Porto Rico live by agriculture, but while many small farmers have "hunger and hardship" for their "constant companions" and many have sold or deserted their farms, many large holdings are only partially developed. Governor Roosevelt proposes to pay special attention to the small farmers by spreading agricultural information and education and by encouraging the formation of cooperative marketing associations with some financial aid from the government. An additional appropriation of $3,000,000 which Congress has authorized will complete the road program, give work for two years to 8,000 persons, and eventually save $400,000 yearly in road upkeep.

Finally, Governor Roosevelt comes out frankly for industrialization. He wants factories and mills and developed hydroelectric power, a Bureau of Commerce with a branch office in New York to make the resources of the island known, and assistance in answering the inquiries of manufacturers who are to be interested in investing their capital. There may be something in this for the Porto Ricans, especially if the Governor keeps up his interest and his energy. But Latin American countries, if any, which yearn for the protection of the United States would do well to consider these results of thirty-two years of such protection in Porto Rico.

A Conspiracy

A FRIEND of ours who is not generally given to viewing with alarm has just uncovered what he regards as a serious threat to that most friendless of infant industries—authorship. Himself the author of a recent book which seems to have been more widely read than bought, he is not, perhaps, a wholly unprejudiced observer, but when his opus began persistently to appear upon the lists of the "Books Most in Demand at the Public Library" without winning a place upon the economically more significant lists of "Books Most in Demand at the Bookstores" he determined to make an investigation, and now he maintains that he, as a producer of books, is faced with certain unfavorable market conditions deliberately fostered by municipal authorities.

Books, he reports (after careful consultation with publishers and booksellers), are still occasionally purchased—chiefly for the purpose of being given away. We send them to friends about to sail for Europe and we send them to other less fortunate friends who have just had their tonsils or their appendices removed, but the dealers would shut up shop if it were not for Christmas, boats, and hospitals. Thanks to the number of circulating libraries, both free and commercial, thanks to all the facilities which they have developed for making it as easy to get a current book for a week as to buy it outright, no one buys a book simply because he wants to read it, for nowadays it is just as easy and a good deal cheaper to borrow from the branch library, the stationery store around the corner, or the friend who was lately ill. Our informant insists that certain books suffer even more than others because they are not suitable for gifts, and he calculates that the mere fact that his particular work was unadapted for convalescents lost him at least a fifth of his possible profits by completely eliminating the hospital trade.

Legislation and public opinion are, says our disgruntled informant, complacently in favor of popular education and determined that knowledge shall be free, but the mere writer is forgotten and the author, gnashing his teeth while his book is being enthusiastically borrowed on every side, is presumably supposed to live either upon fame or upon the sandwiches handed out to him at the teas given in his honor by ladies who shamelessly confess that they mean to read him as soon as his latest work is "in" at the library. We are, he continues, actually proud of these institutions which supply a whole neighborhood by means of two overworked copies of the latest "success," but we ought, he says, to regard them in another light, for though to some they may appear as the crown of our educational system, they are from the writers' point of view merely part of an organized effort to discourage the buying of books. He sees no reason why the average citizen should be encouraged to patronize the Free Library any more than he is encouraged to take his ailments to the free clinic, for both, he maintains, are eleemosynary institutions and he plans to warn Congress that one is as likely as the other to "pauperize" the citizens of the country which permits their misuse. Socialization may be, he thinks, very well, but he insists that if the municipality is going to lend his books free it ought to do the same thing with Mr. Ford's automobiles, Mr. Edison's phonographs, and Mr. Gillette's razors.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

A GOOD play carries with it divers benefits, and among the useful by-products minted out of Marc Connelly's "The Green Pastures" is a new accession of vigor on the part of all the town's reviewers. The gentlemen of the press rose magnificently to their opportunity, and if this play of Negro life around God's throne set a new standard for the current season it did just the same for local journalism. Yet no one did quite so well as William Bolitho, the British Empire's gift to the New York World. Speaking of the Negro's extraordinary status in the Western world Mr. Bolitho wrote:

> They were snatched suddenly from an environment with which they had made their peace for centuries, brought across an ocean whose existence they had never imagined, taken in chains of a metal they had hardly seen before, and set down to work out their lives tilling new plants in a new land. They left behind them their very gods, their language, their songs, and were given as the sole consolation to replace them this intricate, infinitely complicated story of the Bible . . . not even in such simplified form as the older churches have brought it to, but the huge amorphous mass, riddled with all the subtly limited rationalisms which all the Protestantisms have put into it. And this Book they made their own. They digested it, as if cows might take to a ration of meat and alcohol, as if chickens succeeded in living on the tops of trees.

It is not easy, thus, to simplify the Bible but, for that matter, the reduction of Bolitho into his essential terms is no mean task. Marc Connelly, then, has scored the double triumph of acting as an agent in the clarification of both Book and Briton. I remember I was talking with a taxi driver once about the young essayist from South Africa. He made a sad hash of the name which defies phonetic reproduction and went on to say, "I read him more than any other columnist because I always know there's something there, but, boy, on plenty mornings I couldn't tell you what he was talking about."

Bolitho in his "Green Pastures" piece spoke of the Negro's adventure in history as something which "will perhaps never be paralleled until the human race is invaded and kidnapped by filibusters from another planet." But it has always seemed to me as if Bolitho himself had undergone just such an experience. The gulf set between his column and the want-ad readers of a New York morning newspaper is quite as wide as the expanse of ether which lies between the earth and Mars. William Bolitho has served his time as foreign correspondent, and yet I think he possesses less of what is traditionally known as newspaper instinct than any press man whom I know. I think the difference between his attitude and the prevalent one of city rooms is expressed in another paragraph of his column on "Green Pastures":

> It is singularly difficult to analyze what has intensely moved the mind either to enthusiasm or hatred. Yet that is a sort of duty, the only one perhaps, laid on its beneficiaries by true art. Mr. Marc Connelly's play will bear a great deal of meditation before the simple sensation of fascination is broken up into its constituents.

Now that is a mood wholly divergent from the general newspaper attitude in this country. Here we have been concerned—the exceptions are few—with recording simple facts of fascination, enthusiasm, and hatred. For instance, a typical newspaper item may be headed "Police Club Communists." You may read your morning paper from the weather forecast on the front page to the words of the founder in the current Wanamaker display ad on the back, and be no wiser as to just what a Communist is and what is the psychology of the police who club him. It is thought to be enough to say, "Levitsky, Joseph, 2984 Grand Concourse, lacerated scalp and multiple contusions."

But Mr. Levitsky's bruises are nothing whatsoever to Bolitho. He will consider them only as extremely casual stepping-stones by means of which he may get down into the constituents of the Communist's enthusiasm and the cop's hatred. In saying that such practice is alien to American journalistic tradition I am by no means contending that it is unfortunate. Indeed, I hold the opposite view. I would there were more Bolithos. A wish for bigger and better ones would be highly fantastic. It is not good that newspapers should be so wholly devoted to the business of keeping the record and so little concerned with interpretation. Over a period of time interpretation is by far the more important job, but that the dailies leave in the hands of journals of opinion which, unfortunately, seldom command sufficient circulation to make them fitting emissaries for the mass mind.

When a group of Jewish internes is hazed in a local hospital it seems to me insufficient that the papers should merely handle the surface facts of the episode without going into some speculation and study of the community's state of mind in the matter of race prejudice. There are more monsters in the depths of an ocean than ever leap out of the water, and journalism is largely a matter of tabulating the little hops of flying fish and ignoring the whales.

But though Bolitho at his best has written the most brilliant pieces it has ever been my privilege to see in any newspaper he does possess certain faults in technique. All baseball fans have seen at one time or another the eager shortstop who covered wide territory and yet failed his team upon occasion through his effort to throw the ball a little before it reached his hands. I have known Bolitho to indulge his passion for analysis before he had quite allowed the fact itself to enter into his mind. Or if it was in the mind of the writer it had not yet penetrated the consciousness of the reader. Before "the simple sensation of fascination is broken up into its constituents" some little time must be spent in observing and noting down the outward manifestations of the thing. Mr. Levitsky's multiple contusions should be counted and even thumbed over before the exploration into Mr. Levitsky's soul commences. One should not attempt to make straw without bricks.

But the intention of this article is bouquetial. As one columnist to another I bow low three times, no mean feat for me, and tap my forehead on the floor.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Power Control Breaks Down

By LAURENCE TODD

F. E. BONNER, executive secretary of the Federal Power Commission, testifying on February 20 before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, complained that "persecution" of the electric-utility corporations had endangered the progress of hydroelectric development in this country.

Congress began some three years ago to wonder why power generated by privately owned American companies on the American side of Niagara Falls is sold to American consumers at double the prices charged to Canadian consumers in Ontario, who are served by a government-owned and government-operated hydroelectric system. In March, 1927, as the session of the Sixty-ninth Congress was ending, Senator Walsh of Montana quietly introduced a resolution providing that the Senate investigate the financial and propaganda aspects of privately owned public utilities. Senator Walsh hoped that his resolution would slip through unnoticed in the final rush. Instead, he barely got it reported out of the Interstate Commerce Committee to which it had been referred; and when finally, by one vote, the resolution was reported to the Senate, it received what its enemies regarded as a death blow: the investigation it embodied was put into the hands of the supposedly innocuous Federal Trade Commission. But the Federal Trade Commission assigned Judge McCulloch to conduct the utilities investigation. Judge Healy, new chief counsel for the commission, began to examine witnesses about the propaganda machinery set up in more than thirty States by the Power Trust. The country was amazed to learn that its daily and periodical press, its public schools, its churches and Boy Scouts and other civic organizations had been for years absorbing propaganda which was designed by the National Electric Light Association and its allies to prejudice the public against any step toward public ownership. For two years the Federal Trade Commission has steadily pursued its inquiries. It has now entered upon the financial phase of the probe; and on February 24, economists who have been examining the financial structure of power companies since the investigation was ordered began to disclose their findings before the commission, disclosures which Mr. Bonner, presumably protector of the public against the Power Trust, characterized as "irresponsible newspaper statements" and "persecution" of electric-utility corporations.

The power investigation now going on before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee has for its immediate object a plan for reorganizing the Federal Power Commission on a scale commensurate with its great responsibility under the Federal Water Power Act. That act set up a commission composed of the Secretaries of War, Agriculture, and the Interior, with an executive secretary and a small staff of accountants and counsel, to administer the leasing, for periods of not more than fifty years, of the power sites remaining in federal control. These sites are on navigable streams and their tributaries, on public lands, and in the national forests.

The administration of the act as described in testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate led Senator Couzens, the chairman, to declare that "conditions in the commission have become so intolerable that it presents one of the rottenest exhibitions of government I have ever heard of." The disclosures which led up to this declaration began with the publication in August, 1929, of an anonymous memorandum which purported to reflect the desires of power executives to kill off the accounting system installed by Chief Accountant King of the commission and expressed the hope that a suitable successor might be chosen to O. C. Merrill, secretary to the commission since its establishment in 1920. When this secret document came to light, with its suggestion that the quotations for electric-utility stocks would be injured by examination of padded investment accounts, Solicitor Charles Russell, recently brought over from the legal staff of the Interstate Commerce Commission, joined Accountant King in defending the right of the public to have the water-power act enforced.

Russell and King have recently told the story of the commission before the Committee on Interstate Commerce. They presented records showing that no fundamental question as to federal control of federal power resources had ever been passed upon by the commission. They showed that in nine years an average of only five and one-half hours a year had been devoted by the three Cabinet members to the work of this commission. This precious time had been devoted to granting permits or extensions, or to other routine work. Regulation of rates had never even been approached.

Then King brought out a report made to Congress in January, 1928, which had been withdrawn by the commission, deleted to the extent of twelve pages, and then resubmitted in its amended form. Those twelve pages consisted of a series of illustrations of alleged fraudulent or padded accounting.

The first was that of the Niagara Falls Power Company, one of the concerns named by Bonner as victims of persecution. This company, according to the statement which the commission suppressed, had refused to give access to some of its records to the commission's accountants. But their examination did disclose that "considerable property which had been abandoned and demolished was still carried in whole or in part in the plant-investment account; that many large amounts in connection with new construction appeared to have been erroneously charged to property investment; and that many millions of dollars carried in the plant investment account did not represent actual investment either by the company or its predecessors."

Then followed an analysis of the company's claim for valuation on which consumers must pay dividends through the rates paid for electricity. Of $77,671,451 claimed by the company, $31,190,974 was found to represent lands, structures, and equipment. There was an item of "intangible property" amounting to $5,762,143, and one of "overhead costs" amounting to $8,718,334, while "water rights" were valued at $32,000,000. These water rights came from the federal government. Then there was a claim of $27,465,125 for "new construction," charged in with the rest, although this item did not belong to the original investment.

Another case deleted from the report was that of the Clarion River Power Company of Pennsylvania, promoted by H. D. Walbridge and Company, New York bankers. Book costs of this development were $11,032,816.57. The commission's accountants found that the expenditures on actual construction work were $4,360,000, while "more than $6,000,000 of alleged cost is represented merely by entries on the books and is unsupported by evidence of expenditure or cost." The Walbridge firm refused to permit access to original records. The Clarion River Power Company is now controlled by the Associated Gas and Electric Company. This report in its original form, while still confidential to the press, fell into the hands of an editor of the McGraw-Hill publications, who notified the Niagara Falls Power Company of its damaging contents. Colonel Kelly, vice-president of the company and former chief engineer for the Federal Power Commission, came immediately to Washington urging Secretary Merrill and then the members of the commission to withdraw it. Merrill refused to approve its suppression, but Secretaries Davis, Work, and Jardine recalled it from Congress and deleted the evidence of what the Niagara Falls Power Company was doing.

Within a year after the failure of this attempt to disclose padded cost accounting by electric utilities, Merrill decided to resign, though his salary had just been raised from $7,500 to $8,000 a year. He had tried for nearly nine years, without success, to get the White House and Congress to provide the commission with adequate personnel to check up the claims of applicants as to the investment they made before getting sites, and thereby check the inflation of capital accounts. He has testified that in 1923-24 there was created a finance committee which raised, chiefly from among the big power companies that were among the applicants for federal power sites, a fund of $25,000 to send an American delegation to a world power conference in London. He was among the delegates. While he remained on the government pay roll as executive secretary, he used most of the $7,000 that was left in this fund to go to Europe to other conferences in succeeding years. Secretary of Commerce Hoover was honorary chairman of the American Committee of the World Power Congress, and knew the source of these funds, Merrill has testified. Good fairies in the form of Paul Clapp, of the National Electric Light Association, Henry J. Pierce, of the legal staff of Electric Bond and Share, and a representative of Harris, Forbes, and Company had raised the original fund for this American Committee of the World Power Congress. Clapp now guaranteed to Merrill for five years a $15,000 salary as chairman of that organization. The National Electric Light Association undertook to distribute the load among the other leaders of the power industry, including Electric Bond and Share and the Guaranty Trust Company.

When Merrill left his government post, he wrote a letter recommending F. E. Bonner as his successor. Secretary Wilbur went for advice concerning Bonner to an executive of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, who was also a trustee of Stanford University and a classmate of President Hoover, and Bonner was duly appointed.

Merrill had mildly protested because he was not given facilities to do his duty. Bonner promptly announced that no increase in the accounting or legal staff of the commission was needed. Secretary Wilbur echoed this opinion, although the previous commission, in the Coolidge administration, had urged upon Congress the dire need of more help in digging the truth from the claims of the power companies seeking federal favors. Bonner has declared that Merrill was to blame for delay, in the past nine years, in auditing the power applicants' investment claims. Merrill in turn has blamed the Director of the Budget Bureau, General Lord, and Congress, and has indorsed King's assertion that the commission should have its own staff of accountants and counsel and no longer depend upon personnel drawn from the Departments of War, Agriculture, and the Interior.

Here must be quoted the final paragraphs from the anonymous memorandum of last summer:

> The foregoing statement shows how critical is the situation which now results from an increased appropriation by Congress which is to provide for an increase in the personnel, and consequent activity, of the accounting staff of the commission. We have made representations to the Water Power Development Committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce that this accounting work could be better done by the Departments of War, Interior, and Agriculture than by the commission's staff directly. If this committee is successful in presenting this argument to the secretaries who form the commission, and further direct enlargement of the accounting staff is prevented, it is believed that these departments will not have men specially trained for this work. At least, they will be removed from the direct supervision of Mr. King.
>
> There is another phase of the present situation which we are watching carefully. It is rumored that Mr. Merrill may be persuaded to accept some other more lucrative and less trying position. The new Secretary-Commissioner may be persuaded to appoint as his successor some engineer who may quite naturally be sympathetic toward the development of the accounting force and its activity as previously outlined. . . . It is anticipated that the agencies and forces opposed to our industry in national legislation will not have their attention directed to this matter and it is hoped that discreet representations can be made to the new Secretary-Commissioner.

On November 16, 1929, Wilbur approved a recommendation by Bonner that the three departments be drawn upon for personnel to do accounting work, and that "the pre-license cost statements of applicants for licenses and the construction-cost statements of licensees be referred as far as practicable to the Departments of War, Interior, or Agriculture for examination and recommendation prior to review by the accounting officer of the commission."

Bonner at one time tried in vain, by bringing Solicitor Russell into private conference with M. O. Leighton, representative of the Electric Bond and Share Company, to persuade Russell that Accountant King was obstructing unduly the granting of power sites to Leighton's clients. Conflict in the commission staff led to deadlock, Bonner and Wilbur preventing the securing of further funds with which to bring the disputed investment accounts to decision, and King and Russell refusing to approve the unaudited claims. For months Bonner referred no legal problems to Solicitor Russell and deflected accounting work from King wherever this could be done. Now a demand has been made in the Senate that Bonner resign, while Administration suggestions that King and Russell be likewise dismissed have been met by Senator Norris's declaration that they should be promoted as faithful servants of the public.

The Christian Science Censor

IV. The Siege of Fort Scribner*

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

THE effort of the directors of the Mother Church to suppress Edwin Franden Dakin's "Mrs. Eddy: The Biography of a Virginal Mind," published last summer by Charles Scribner's Sons, and the methods employed in that effort have fortunately received an unusual amount of publicity. The entire incident is so revealing, however, that it cannot be omitted in any account of the church censorship, and there are certain aspects of it that have not hitherto received due attention. I attempt no criticism or appraisal of Dakin's work further than a reminder, to those of my readers who share my own distaste for the "modern" method in psychology and biography, that the book is a careful, thoroughly documented study, which was greeted by the reviewers almost without exception as one of the outstanding biographies of the year.

The book was announced last April for publication in the early fall, and the publishers put into the hands of each of twenty members of their sales organization a confidential statement of "selling points" on the work. In some unexplained way this memorandum came into the possession of Mr. Orwell Bradley Towne, Publication Committee for New York, and the executives of the firm, much to their surprise, shortly received a call from him, memorandum in hand. Mr. Towne made a strong protest against the publication of the book on the ground that the memorandum proved the book to be "false" and "unworthy." He remarked the danger of offending several million people, and suggested that the manuscript be submitted to the Committee on Publication for checking as to the reliability of its sources and the accuracy of its data. Just how complete and accurate information and fair criticism Mr. Dakin would have received from that source I leave my readers to judge in the light of the facts I have given concerning the treatment of other lives of Mrs. Eddy. Mr. Towne was politely but firmly informed that Scribner's does not submit books to censorship by interested parties before publication. His little reconnaissance in force had disclosed the existence of a fort that apparently did not intend to haul down its flag at the first sign of danger.

It was accordingly decided to try diplomacy next. No use to fight if things can be arranged pleasantly among gentlemen. It was discovered that Albert Lombard, Committee on Publication for Southern California, was an old Harvard roommate of Henry H. Saylor, editor of Architecture, published by Scribner's. On July 3, Mr. Saylor received a letter from his old friend reminding him of Lombard's old-time interest in Christian Science and consequent concern over the Dakin book, which Lombard understood to be inaccurate, inadequate, unfair, and quite unworthy the esteemed name of Scribner. So Lombard suggested: "If you are in a position to discuss this subject with the proper person so that it will receive judicious consideration, the best interests of both of us may be served." It was all very pleasant, gentlemanly, and friendly, as became one old friend to another, and as became a proper diplomat. The letter was passed on to "the proper person" in the Scribner organization, but once more nothing happened except that preparations for publication went steadily forward. The committee had lost this little diplomatic skirmish, too. There seemed to be nothing to do but bring up the siege-guns and prepare for action with the heavy artillery if necessary.

Exactly what went on in the offices of the publication committee in Boston during the hot days of last summer it is impossible to say, but one can make a fairly safe guess from what has occurred since. Evidently the campaign plans were laid there and we have concrete evidence that certain directions went out from that office to the State committees as to how the campaign was to be carried on. The Dakin book was published August 16 and was in the hands of booksellers all over the country by the beginning of September. Immediately the publishers began to be deluged with letters of protest from Christian Scientists and with perturbed inquiries from booksellers who suddenly found themselves under hot fire.

The letters from Christian Scientists may be divided into two groups, those that threaten boycott and those that do not. An occasional letter suggests that the writer has looked into the book, but the vast majority were evidently written, under direction or suggestion, by persons whose knowledge of the book was obtained at second hand. I quote a few representative examples:

> New York, September 19
>
> You have recently published a book about Mrs. Eddy which I understand is disrespectful of her character and accomplishments. . . . As far as I know there is no premeditated attempt on the part of the organization to cause letters to be written to your good selves but doubtlessly you will have received many letters in addition to this one.

> North Cohasset, Mass., September 5
>
> I am writing to protest against the publishing by Charles Scribner's Sons of the spurious life of Mrs. Eddy.

> Boston, August 28
>
> A great protest goes up from true Christian Scientists everywhere that at this date such a wholly false and malicious book should be published by your respected house.

> Louisville, Ky., December 2
>
> I have just learned of the book, "Mrs. Eddy, the Biography of a Virginal Mind," by Edwin Franden Dakin, which has been published by your firm. . . . I feel impelled to lift my voice in protest against the publication and circulation of this book which has been described as "biased and offensive, avoiding any good word for Mrs.

---

*This is the last of a series of four articles.—EDITOR THE NATION.

> Eddy and misrepresenting her wherever possible." . . . With sincere hope that this book, which is so objectionable to Christian Scientists, may be speedily suppressed . . .

I turn with pain to the boycotting letters, for the publication committees often point out that their religion prohibits them from any attempt at injury to publishers, and I regret to see them so singularly unsuccessful in restraining the misdirected zeal of their erring followers. Here is one that is quick on the trigger:

> New York, August 30
>
> After reading the review of a book that you have just published called "Mrs. Eddy: The Biography of a Virginal Mind," by E. F. Dakin, I wish to inform you that I, for one, will never patronize your shop again and if there is any way that I can keep others from buying books at your store I will endeavor to do so.

In different vein:

> Toronto, November 5
>
> I trust you will realize that I am writing this in a very friendly way, but I would also point out that I could not purchase books from a house publishing such objectionable matter and, as you doubtless realize, there will be many, many more purchasers of books who will feel as I do.

On a post card, only this:

> New York, December 13
>
> Dear old Friends—Sorry I cannot buy from you now. Earnestly.

From an ignorant anonymous Scientist to the author:

> Bridgeport, Conn., August 26
>
> You must want to make a living off the dead, and at that a woman, that now cannot defend herself. No one would do such a thing but a Coward in the sight of God. . . . To all C. Scientists you are to them a Coward and lower than a Worm. The book and publisher will be boycott by all Christian Scientists.

Letters from individuals suggesting or threatening boycott could be multiplied indefinitely; the publication committees virtuously disclaim them, but occasionally even a publication committee apparently slips. By some error the publishers received official letters of protest (all but two written within two weeks of September 16) from no less than nine churches, all of them, by a curious coincidence, in St. Louis or Kansas City. The spirit of truth seems to have prevailed mightily and all at once in this geographic area. The following letter is signed by the clerk of the Third Church of Kansas City:

> Kansas City, September 16
>
> [The Dakin book] . . . is obnoxious to all Christian Scientists and misleading to the general public.
>
> . . . The Church Manual . . . governs every Branch Church . . . and we are one of those branches. A by-law . . . reads as follows: "A member of this church shall not patronize a publishing house or bookstore that has for sale obnoxious books."
>
> We are calling your attention to this, feeling that if you understood the circumstances you would not want to be instrumental in putting out a book which was not true and might be detrimental to you.

Even more directly to the point was the communication of the Sixth Church of the same city:

> Kansas City, September 17
>
> At a meeting of our executive board . . . motion prevailed that a letter be written . . . protesting that [the Dakin book] is obnoxious according to the understanding of Christian Scientists, and that in conformity with our Church Manual we will have to desist from patronizing your company unless the book be removed from publication.

From these business-like communications one turns to one signed for the trustees by the clerk of the Fifth Church in St. Louis. It contains no mention of by-laws, but after stating that the Dakin book "is in every respect objectionable to our membership" ends briefly thus: "We trust that the Spirit of the 'Golden Rule' will prompt you to give our protest consideration."

For months the publishers were covered with a barrage of protests such as have been indicated, the whole campaign evidently having been most carefully organized and directed. While the main fortress was thus being beleaguered, every outlying post from Burlington, Vermont, to Honolulu was likewise being subjected to vigorous attack, always with the same weapons and essentially the same strategy. The skilful national organization and the great success (probably exaggerated, however) of the campaign are indicated in the following extract from a letter of Richard C. Shoup, Publication Committee for Georgia, published in the Macon Telegraph of December 20:

> These protests have been entered so effectively that according to Mr. Charles [sic] Scribner, senior member of Scribner and Sons, the book has been removed from sale in four-fifths of the bookstores of the United States. To achieve this result, it was not necessary to use threats, in fact very definite instructions were issued by the manager of the committees on publication in Boston, Massachusetts, that no threat was to be used. We found that the booksellers are as a whole reasonable and fair-minded men and they are not interested in assisting the publishers to distribute a malicious, untruthful book, objectionable (because of its misrepresentations) to many of their fellow-citizens.

I call special attention to the "very definite instructions" that went out from the manager of the committees on publication, and express my regret at the mention of only one feature of those instructions. I remind my readers of the sample letters to the publishers already quoted and raise the question how church members, under the obnoxious-book rule, could call attention of booksellers to the obnoxiousness of the work without threatening a boycott. Certainly the bewildered booksellers somewhere got the impression that they were being threatened with dire things. I have space for only a handful of their letters to the publishers:

> Palo Alto, Cal., October 8
>
> I have been forced by the Christian Scientists here to put copies I have of "Mrs. Eddy" under the table and to refrain from buying any more.

> Los Angeles, August 27
>
> The local chairman for the Christian Science Committee on Publications has just been here. Apparently every effort is going to be made to suppress "Mrs. Eddy"—up to and including intimidation. [From a later letter] The Christian Scientists are giving us no rest. "Old Charge Customers" write in and they bedevil us daily.

Detroit, November 23

Due to violent protest by the Science Church in our City and boycott on our store by these good people, we have been forced to withdraw the sale of your book "Mrs. Eddy" from our store.

Utica, N. Y., October 22

A good friend of mine who is a prominent Scientist advises me not to stock the book, stating that it was extremely detrimental to Christian Science, and that if we offered the book for sale our store would be shunned by all local Scientists.

Without setting forth more of the abundant available evidence, I summarize briefly my own conclusions. The church authorities, unable to bring about the withdrawal or modification of Dakin's work, set in motion the machinery I have earlier described, with the deliberate purpose of preventing the sale of the book as far as possible. The campaign constituted in its essence, whatever it was in name, a nation-wide boycott of the publishers and of all booksellers who did not yield to the request that the book be withdrawn from sale. The actual carrying out of the measures was in the hands of the State and local publication committees and individual members of the church, but complete responsibility for the campaign as a whole rests on the manager of the publication committees and on the Board of Directors who appointed him; for under the Manual they have the power to control his official actions. No disclaimer on their part can free them of such responsibility. The action which has received such wide publicity in this case is thoroughly consistent with everything that I have been able to learn of the methods and ideas of the directors, the committees on publication, and great numbers of individual members of the church acting under their direction and suggestion in many other cases that have not had much public attention during the past quarter-century. In many cases their action has resulted in virtually entire suppression. In the present instance the Scribner flag still floats defiantly. A new popular edition of the Dakin book, containing important additional matter, including sensational extracts from Calvin Frye's diaries, has just come from the press.

With this case I bring my record to a close. I have tried to set down honestly and fairly, and as adequately as possible within my space limits, the relevant facts concerning this remarkable publicity organization. My wish has been not to attack any individual or group or to impugn their motives, and above all not to attack the Christian Science religion or the faith of its adherents. I have wished to attack, by the simple statement of facts, the operation of a powerful and dangerous publicity machine absolutely controlled by the central authorities of the Christian Science church and used to an end that I believe dangerous to orderly progress, namely, the suppression of truth. If the general public, and notably our newspapers and publishers, can be put on notice regarding its operation, and if the attention of the honest and thoughtful Christian Scientists of the country can be drawn to the abuse of power within the church, with a view to ultimate correction of such abuse, my end will have been achieved.

The Hoover Hippodrome

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, March 1

NO amount of glossing or suppression can conceal the fact that at last the Hoover Administration is in serious difficulty. The number and gravity of its troubles may not be sufficient at this time to warrant free use of the phrase, "One-Term Herbert," recently attributed to an Old Guard cynic, but they are enough to inspire genuine apprehension among the President's friends, and to explain some of the panicky maneuvers recently executed at the White House. Chief among the causes of worry are the following: (1) the business depression and attendant unemployment; (2) loss of party unity and control in Congress and the multitude of ensuing complications; (3) the situation created by the Farm Board's efforts to interpret and apply the agricultural marketing act; (4) multiplying signs of scandal in connection with electric-power developments. Moreover, the Administration now faces the possibility of failure or disappointing compromise at the naval conference, with the added knowledge that any measurable success would alienate some of its most powerful supporters.

* * * * *

IF any President caused the business depression, it was Coolidge. Nevertheless, Hoover will receive the blame, precisely as he would have received the equally undeserved credit if the condition had been reversed. He is clearly responsible for staging a ballyhoo to conceal the facts, instead of making an earnest effort to ascertain them and apprehend their causes. Coolidge's opponents learned that there was no answer to prosperity, and Hoover's supporters may learn that there is no explanation of adversity. Sometimes a poor rule works both ways. As for Hoover's relations with Congress, they have gone steadily from bad to worse until it is difficult to say in what quarter dissatisfaction is most intense. Certainly as much resentment exists between the President and the Republican leaders as exists between either of them and the Progressive-Democratic opposition. From the beginning Hoover's technique in dealing with Congress has been singularly simple and ineffectual. First he threatens; then he runs. So often have Old Guard leaders gone forth to fight behind the President, and suddenly found themselves fighting alone, that they hesitate to follow him anywhere. Even Jim Watson has sufficient pride to feel the humiliation when he concludes a long and passionate defense of a White House statement, and sits down to find that a supplemental statement has rendered his defense ridiculous. That is what happened this week.

* * * * *

THE episode was a perfect illustration of three Hoover characteristics that have involved their possessor in plenty of grief and embarrassment, namely: his habit of resorting to circus stunts to divert attention from disagreeable situations; a curious lack of candor in selecting and staging his material; and a precipitate tendency to disavow and abandon it in the face of hostile reaction. Thus, at the conclusion of a White House breakfast he made public a list of appropriation bills pending before Congress, with the warning that passage of all these bills would necessitate a drastic increase in taxes. The impression to be conveyed was that of a wise and frugal President demanding economy of an extravagant Congress. A more transparent piece of hippodroming cannot be imagined. Members of Congress are constantly introducing appropriation bills without the slightest hope or intent of having them passed, and there has seldom been a time in recent years when such a list could not have been compiled. Any such list would have been equally long and equally meaningless. The Senate's reaction was as prompt as it was inevitable, and on Senator Watson, as the Republican floor leader, fell the unhappy duty of justifying the White House strictures on Congressional extravagance. Hardly had he concluded when he was handed a supplemental statement from that source explaining that the President had not meant his admonitions for Congress at all, but for those individuals and organizations on the outside who were pressing Congress for appropriations outside the budget. I am told that Jim mopped his massive brow and fervently inquired: "How in hell are you going to stand behind a man who has St. Vitus dance?" The public may be excused for experiencing a similar dizziness when it hears one group of trusted Hoover spokesmen denouncing the Senate coalitionists for obstructing and mutilating "the Administration tariff bill," while another equally trusted group carefully explains that the coalition is writing exactly the sort of tariff bill that the President desires.

* * * * *

THE affairs of the Farm Board have reached a critical stage. It is obvious that Chairman Legge is determined to adopt whatever measures he considers necessary to carry out his original aim of bringing the farmers into cooperatives, and bringing the cooperatives into the marketing organization sponsored and financed by the board, and that he is prepared to conduct ferocious reprisals against any and all who oppose his program. Is the board charged with price-fixing? Well, I can only say that those who counted on anything else must either have been ignorant of the purpose of the farm act, or they had an abiding faith in the inability or unwillingness of the board to administer it, for price-fixing always was the ultimate object. Either Chairman Legge will put the grain trade out of business, or the grain trade will put him out of business. The outcome is up to Mr. Hoover. My money is on Mr. Legge as long as he lasts, but I am not certain how long he will last.

* * * * *

THE Senate committee investigating lobbying finally has unearthed a long-suspected scandal in connection with Muscle Shoals. When such corporations as the American Cyanamid Company and the Alabama Power Company set out to get possession of a government property valued at more than $100,000,000, scandal is always suspected although it is not always disclosed. The disclosures in this case involve Messrs. Coolidge and Hoover to a degree that would be sensational in any country except this case-hardened republic. Even here they very possibly will suffice to insure passage of the Norris bill for government operation of the plant. Under the circumstances it will be somewhat embarrassing for Mr. Hoover to emulate his predecessor by vetoing the bill. The facts are fairly simple. The Cyanamid company, in partnership with the Union Carbide Company, wanted the property. So did the Alabama Power Company, a child of Electric Bond and Share. Both were fearful of government operation, and the Alabama Power was fearful that if the Cyanamid company got the plant surplus power might be sold in competition with its own service. So they fought. By devices which remain shrouded in mystery, Cyanamid enlisted the support of the American Farm Bureau Federation and its legislative agent, Chester H. Gray. Agents ostensibly representing the federation, but actually on the Cyanamid pay roll, went about the country lining up farm organizations in support of the Cyanamid bid. It was not long until wiser heads perceived the danger in this conflict. They saw that if Cyanamid and Alabama Power continued to fight for this government property, neither of them might get it—the government might keep it and operate it for the benefit of the public. Accordingly, Gray testified, President Coolidge directed him to see officials of the Cyanamid company and ask them to arrive at some amicable agreement with the power interests. At that time Mr. Hoover was Secretary of Commerce. In a purported confidential memorandum signed by Claudius Huston, now Republican national chairman, and addressed to J. W. Worthington, leader of the fight against government operation, it was stated that "you and I, in the fall of 1925, did our utmost to bring the power and chemical groups together, . . . and Mr. Hoover attempted to do so later, and Mr. Hoover even undertook to bring these interests together through Owen D. Young, and failed."

* * * * *

THAT was the evidence before the committee. Observe how it was reported by the Associated Press:

> Testimony that President Hoover, while Secretary of Commerce, had attempted to aid in solving the long-standing problem of Muscle Shoals by an effort to reconcile the divergent views of the power and chemical groups was heard today before the Senate lobby committee.

Was this an effort to obscure the significance of a spectacular news development or is it to be explained on routine grounds? Subsequently, according to the evidence, it was suggested that if the power and chemical interests should succeed in reaching an agreement for a peaceable division of the spoils, they should do it in a manner that would enable them to deny its existence. They now deny that any agreement was reached, although the competition for Muscle Shoals seems to have lessened appreciably!

The Wintry Mind

By WITTER BYNNER

Winter uncovers distances, I find;
And so the cold and so the wintry mind
Takes leaves away, till there remains behind
A wide cold world, and so the heart grows blind
To the earth's green motions lying warm below
Field upon field, field upon field, of snow.

The Inventor Enters Heaven

By JAMES RORTY

FOR some years the deaf old man had contemplated his departure from the terrestrial scene without reluctance, without fear, but with a certain characteristic curiosity. Perhaps for that reason his translated self was moved to linger briefly, before beginning its celestial journey, to assist at the unprecedented tribute with which America honored the memory of her greatest inventor.

It had been rather imaginatively conceived, after the manner of the English celebration of Armistice Day. Promptly at half-past eight on the evening of the funeral, the main switches of the power stations clicked in unison, and in darkness America mourned her loss. Light and sound and motion were all pinched out in this sudden pause. The radio, too, was silent—had not the great inventor anticipated this whole development decades ago?

All over America millions of awed people sat in the darkened motion-picture houses, facing screens which had suddenly gone blank; minds turned inward upon the mind's blank curtain; dismayed, and groping uncertainly for the rusty tools of image-making; struggling painfully in vacuum, as the fetus struggles in the womb; hating birth and begging for the return of the anaesthetic flicker of false love, false birth, false death.

Yet here and there something stirred in that darkness. A boy's hand felt for the breast of his girl, who covered his hand with hers. Together they rose and crept out into the wider darkness, the more entranced silence, of Broadway. All traffic had stopped; the extinguished bulbs which festooned the façades of the buildings drooped like paper garlands, withered by the sudden frost of silence and darkness. Broadway was like an abandoned motion-picture set, unreal beneath the casual silver of the brightened moon.

Suddenly the lights snapped on. The ten-minute tribute of darkness and silence was over, and now the ether vibrated with the earth-girdling bellow of the greatest radio hook-up in history. The eulogistic phrases were familiar—too familiar; so was the toneless voice of an ex-President of the United States for whom the great inventor remembered voting. But he could hear now, since death had stripped him of his protective infirmity. Muttering sadly to himself, the old man pressed his fingers to his ears.

* * * * *

From everlasting unto everlasting stretched the glassy sea. Beside it rose the ramparts of the Kingdom, tower on tower, praising the Most High in soaring splendors of jade and chrysoprase. Like the choiring meadow larks of a California spring, like a paean of light made vocal, came the celestial antiphony: "Alleluia! Alleluia! Allelu-u-u-ia!" All this was as it should be, reflected the inventor. Yet it did not seem quite right that the gate of the heavenly mansions should look a little like the entrance of the New York post office, even though much vaster and more luminous. And the inscription over the portico was different. It was difficult to read—something about children.

Reading this, the great inventor felt himself very old, and a little hesitant. The ceaseless iteration of the alleluiaing angels struck him, too, as a little fatuous. He could see them now, hundreds of them, stationed at intervals along the heavenly ramparts. There was one close by the gate, a magnificent winged creature, clothed only in light so that the inventor could not help observing that the seraph was appropriately sexless. Soon, he reflected, it would be this one's turn, and even as he watched—

"Allelu—"

"Shut up!"

The voice which had so rudely interrupted the celestial antiphony was anything but seraphic. Equally incongruous was the appearance of the bearded ancient who had suddenly appeared through a side gate, hurriedly thrusting his arms through a monk's cassock.

"Come right in. You're expected."

This, then, would be St. Peter. Smiling diffidently, the inventor mounted the steps while he gathered his thoughts together for the speech which would undoubtedly be expected of him. Also, he reflected with a throb of apprehension, there would be those terrible reporters. Their questions always fell into two categories: things that God Himself couldn't answer, and things that didn't matter. It was almost as if America hadn't manifested a bit of adult curiosity in the last decade. The worst of it was that a coerced answer to a foolish question is always equally foolish. For years he had been obliged to celebrate his birthday by writing himself down a conceited, priggish child. And he wasn't that. Damned if he was!

"On the contrary, you're damned if you're not."

"I beg pardon? You know I'm a little deaf."

"I beg your pardon. You know quite well that in your present state you are nothing of the sort. Neither am I. Nor am I deaf to the thoughts which you have just been thinking. I must say that you have changed greatly since we received our last report of you. As you see, I have had the gates opened, but perhaps it would be as well for us to wait and talk a bit before we go in."

Silently, before the dazzled eyes of the inventor, the gates of pearl rolled back, disclosing a limitless vista of towers and castles. Something in the pyramidal, stepped-back style of the heavenly architecture struck the inventor as familiar. The resemblance was intensified by the din of riveters and the hiss of welding machines that surged out through the heavenly gates. Familiar, too, were the banners swung high above the streets of gold and bearing the inscription: "Forward, Heaven. Business Is Good. Keep It Good."

"Heaven seems very populous," remarked the inventor mildly.

"Frightful! Frightful! A while back we had a slight recession. Some of your people were caught long on bliss and threatened to grow up. But now they're coming again faster than ever. And you can't turn 'em away. That's the rule, you know. Of such is the kingdom of heaven." The guardian saint pointed at the inscription over the portico.

"But I didn't realize that earth had produced so many good people!"

"Good? What's good? All that's beside the point. The twentieth century will probably go down as the most exquisitely childlike period in human history. That last children's crusade your fellow-countryman Wilson was so keen about—we were simply swamped! Haven't caught up yet. A new mob of children at the gates every day. They seem to come faster and faster."

"But how about hell?"

"Hell! There's a deserted village for you. They haven't had a baker's dozen in the last ten years. You ought to see it."

The inventor's mind leaped to a new vista. Even in the presence of eternal bliss the habit of curiosity is not easily suppressed.

"Do you know," he started, "if you wouldn't mind—"

But the saint gestured for silence. The din of the riveters had ceased. In the profound silence of eternity the inventor could hear the soft fall of pin feathers upon the streets of gold, dropped by the processions of the saved moving back and forth over the celestial causeways. Suddenly a burst of choral music shook the ramparts.

"That's the Celestial Rotary Chorus," explained Saint Peter. "They're rehearsing their welcoming song for you. Listen!"

The chorus swelled in volume until the words were clearly distinguishable. It was the song which George M. Cohan had composed for the celebration of Light's Golden Jubilee, the fiftieth anniversary of his greatest invention:

He is A Wiz.

The inventor remembered it only too well, and blushed.

"The voices seem—well, perhaps a little light."

"Of course," answered the saint. "That's the Rotarians. Boy sopranos. Always have been and always will be. Time without end. God knows I've heard enough of them."

The accent of bitterness in the saint's voice was unmistakable. Seeing the surprise in the inventor's expression, he shrugged his shoulders. "You're thinking that heaven is perfect? Well, it is. Perfect for children. But I'm not in it. I'm the gate-keeper. It's your heaven, not mine. Come along, the Rotarians are waiting for you—Hey! Wait, where are you going?" For the old inventor had spread the tail of his frock coat like a sail and was in full flight toward the abyss of night.

"Do you mean to say," shouted the saint as he caught up with him, "that you actually don't want to enter heaven?"

The inventor turned and stared at him. "I'll see you in hell first," he stated succinctly.

Throwing back his head, the guardian of the gate laughed long and loud. "See me in hell first, eh? That is an idea. Wish I might. No such luck for me. And what, by the way, makes you think that you'll get in? Hell is very exclusive. For adults only, you know."

"So I gathered," replied the inventor with dignity. Then, as the memory of his earthly frustrations gathered force: "Do you suppose I enjoyed seeing my life-work made trivial and ridiculous? I was an inventor—it was my passion to use the tools of science for the service of mankind. I gave the world light—good light, cheap light. Is it my fault if they used it to outrage the beauty and peace of the night—to make a cheap bazaar out of every street and avenue, selling one another cigarettes and chewing gum at the rate of a million candle-power a minute? I gave them the phonograph, so that every man, woman, and child might know the glory of great music and great speech; so that the great singer, the great instrumentalist, might have all future generations of men for his audience. So I thought and dreamed. Yet today I am afraid there is less music in the heart and mind of the common man than ever before in history. I gave them the motion picture. At first I thought it was a toy. Then, too late, I saw that it was the medium of a new art. For by that time it had become merely a new racket for the pants-makers, and millions of minds were being trivialized and anaesthetized by that endless flicker of falseness and venality. How much of my work was actually applied to the service of a sane humanity? How much of it was cheapened and perverted by the greed of men, the mechanical greed of money to make more money? My work was honest work. I never cared for money—never thought about it. You imply that my work helped to fill that vulgar adolescent heaven of yours. I deny it. At any rate, it's your heaven, not mine. I want none of it."

The guardian of the gate had listened to this outburst with growing admiration. "Do you know," he remarked, "I think perhaps you have a chance. Be sure to tell all this to Lucifer the first thing. You understand the basis of the divine categories, don't you? Heaven is for children and nose-followers, people who follow their noses like the animals, only not so well; people who praise God because they have never grown up enough to respect and praise themselves. Hell, on the other hand, is for adults and hell-raisers; people who praise and serve man from everlasting unto everlasting; who follow Lucifer in the revolt that one day will shake the stars. From the divine point of view, heaven is the abode of that mercy which is death; whereas hell is the home of the immortals and the eternal outpost of hope. Goodby and good luck to you. And give my regards to your friend Steinmetz."

"Steinmetz? But Steinmetz was not a bad man."

"There you go again! Good or bad, he went to hell like a shot. So did Aristotle, and Francis Bacon, and Galileo, and Newton, and Darwin, and Michael Faraday in spite of all his piety, and Gregor Mendel in spite of his priest's cassock, and that old viking Thorstein Veblen who wrote 'The Place of Science in Modern Civilization.' Oh, you'll have excellent company."

On the brink of the abyss the old inventor halted and turned a troubled face to his celestial mentor. "There's just one thing," he murmured. "Henry . . . You know, I am greatly attached to Henry. Do you suppose—"

"I think so. Yes, I'm confident of it. Henry has a great many things to repent. He's a very unconventional man and he's still growing. Remember, also, that he's never asked for mercy—not even from the bankers."

Again through the gates of pearl came the shrill chorus of the Rotarians.

"They're welcoming an ex-President of the United States," explained Saint Peter. "You know him—a very good man. It seems he burst a blood-vessel broadcasting your funeral elegy."

The inventor smiled—with a certain diabolism. For already, in anticipation, the fires of hell warmed his heart with a fine glow of adult malice.

"Serve him right," he said. "I never liked him."

In the Driftway

AS he isn't good at conundrums, the Drifter has been shamefully dilatory in answering a question posed by Margot R. Granger of Charlottesville, Virginia. "Having found you ever avid of discussion upon various topics, I write to ask what your idea is of the word virtue," is Miss Granger's simple plea. "Among a gathering of the younger generation," she goes on to say, "the word was given so many definitions, of such varying meanings, that I'm puzzled. To one it was merely an inconvenience upon occasions, to another a necessity, a third couldn't be worried as he was eating, another refused to discuss such a word in polite company, another even compared the word with altruism." Now if that isn't enough to spoil anybody's day the Drifter would like to know what could be. The dilemma of the Drifter's correspondent is that of every person nowadays who attempts to probe ever so little beneath the cuticle of things as they are. For the ancients, and for moderns too until psychology came along to upset us all, the question was different. The problem used to be to choose between Virtue and Vice, which invariably were spelled with capital letters as became such august deities. There never was any question as to what Virtue and Vice were.

* * * * *

BUT Virtue went under the scrutiny of the psychoanalysts, and when they got through with her she was spelled just virtue—and most illegibly at that. According to them virtue is a strange conglomeration of habit, superstition, the greed of the privileged, the hypocrisy of the powerful, together with a substantial residuum of hard common sense based on the human experience of the ages. To us moderns is given the problem of isolating and preserving that substantial residuum while scrapping the rest. Most persons of the older generation have frankly funked the job. Parents are often flabbergasted at the intelligent and reasonable questions of their children and unable to do more than move from event to event, powerless to formulate any fixed philosophy. For the most part the younger generation is just like them. So far as the Drifter can peer into the minds of high-school and college boys and girls today, they are unabashed pragmatists. They are hardly concerned at all with general principles; they are satisfied to seek day by day through personal experience the best way of life.

* * * * *

BUT the Drifter's correspondent reminds him that some persons of the younger generation are interested in principles and definitions. All the definitions of virtue reported by the Drifter's correspondent seem to have some validity. Undeniably virtue is an inconvenience upon occasions—although not merely that, as the Drifter's correspondent quotes one of her friends as saying. Virtue does seem also to be a necessity to most persons, which is what Voltaire meant when he said that if there had not been a God it would have been necessary for mankind to invent one. On the whole the Drifter likes best the answer which identifies virtue with altruism, for it suggests that virtue is concerned primarily with one's attitude toward other people.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Einstein on Peace

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Thank you for your editorial, Einstein on Peace, in The Nation for February 5. A few weeks ago it was my privilege to hear Professor Einstein speak to a group of international students at the Alexander Humboldt House in Berlin. Though the room was crowded, there was something about the man as he sat in his chair waiting to speak that created a peaceful quiet. His first words cast a spell over all of us, and for the two hours during which he spoke and answered questions in his simple and unaffected manner we felt that we were living in a world of peace. I am sure that none of us will ever forget the softness of his voice, the light in his eyes, and the truths that he spoke.

Berlin, February 20 SHEPARD ARTHUR STONE

Viva Voce Votes

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I "viewed with alarm" your article about the Linthicum bill which proposes to make the Star Spangled Banner the official anthem of the nation. If a toothless flutist who plays chiefly by ear and beats time with both feet may qualify as a musical connoisseur, then I want to say a few words.

I submit that the Battle Hymn of the Republic is better in every way than the Star Spangled Banner or My Country 'Tis of Thee. If Congress is going to pick a national anthem I think it should qualify for the job by learning all three songs and singing them viva voce in joint session. Then, I'll bet that the Solons would do such a good job of the Battle Hymn of the Republic and make such a mess of the other two that without debate the Battle Hymn would get a unanimous and enthusiastic vote.

Portland, Oregon, February 20 ALBERT C. JOURDAN

Women and Wages

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One encouraging feature stands out in the controversy which has followed Harvard's discharge of the scrubwomen at Widener Library. That is the offer of the Women's Trade Union League to organize the women workers at Harvard. We may be indignant at the employment policies of this wealthy university, our sympathy may go out to the hard-working women who have lost their jobs, but we should be even more concerned over the very low wages these women were receiving—over the very low wages paid women workers everywhere.

This is not the first time in Massachusetts or in other States that the minimum-wage law, which was designed to protect women, has interfered with their means of livelihood and forced them into even lower-paid employment. Any so-called protective legislation, such as the minimum-wage law, which applies to women and not to men helps fasten the burden of low wages on women. Any group of workers whose right to work is restricted by law is hampered in competing with other workers. If minimum-wage laws are necessary, let them apply equally to men and women.

Boston, February 4 ALMA LUTZ

Books and Drama

Dialogue

By IRWIN EDMAN

And so I tell myself that this is peace,
This dark sweet lassitude, this musing death,
Where ardors sicken not, nor fires increase,
Nor any hope can stir the even breath.
I tell myself, "So must you always live,
Only this freedom is felicity,
They forfeit this who dare to take or give
A love that drowns them in a desperate sea,"
I tell myself. To which myself replies,
"This peace you prattle is but tired regret,
Your quietude is all compact of lies,
Your joy half built on what you half forget,"
Thus in the drowsing comfort once again,
The homesick heart, the immemorial pain.

Kaleidoscope

The 42nd Parallel. By John Dos Passos. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THE most striking quality about "The 42nd Parallel" is its structure. It is built after the manner of Aldous Huxley's "Point Counter Point" and of Mr. Dos Passos's own "Manhattan Transfer," but in one or two respects it is more intricate than either. It is really five novels shuffled together; among these are also shuffled excerpts called The Camera Eye and Newsreel. One reads, say, forty pages about the adventures of Mac, then a camera eye, then a newsreel, then a three-page biography of Debs, then thirty pages about the adventures of Janey, then another newsreel, then more about Mac, and so on. Toward the end the paths of two or three of the main characters cross, but haphazardly; there is no general drawing together of the threads, no climax, no rounding-out of anyone's story; things simply leave off, arbitrarily, anywhere.

It would be difficult to point to any unity in the book except that supplied by the binding. The forty-second parallel, as the reader will recall, is that imaginary circle of latitude which passes roughly through Chicago and slightly north of New York. But many of the events in the present volume happen in Mexico, New Orleans, and Paris. Apart from style and treatment, the themes have chiefly in common the fact that they represent various aspects of life in these United States. We begin with Mac, who picks up a job peddling Boccaccio and "The Queen of the White Slaves," gets a girl into trouble, marries her, deserts her, becomes a wobbly, drifts to Mexico, lives with a Mexican girl, runs a bookstore for a time. Next we follow Janey, who ends by becoming the adoring secretary of J. Ward Moorehouse, a go-getter and platitudinarian who has risen from a real-estate salesman and reporter to a public-relations counsel, and has married first the dissolute daughter of a nose-and-throat specialist and then, having divorced her, a Pittsburgh heiress, after he has spent the night with the latter on the day following her father's death. Next we come to Eleanor, who as a girl swears that she will kill herself if a man ever touches her; she becomes an interior decorator and enters into a platonic friendship with Moorehouse. We end with Charley, who drifts around as a garage mechanic, and doesn't marry his girl after she has been seduced by his friend. He winds up on a boat off for the war in France.

Mr. Dos Passos is a writer of extraordinary talent; he knows American cities, he knows a great deal about life, he has a shrewd insight into men and women. "The 42nd Parallel" is full of amusing incidents, and at times, particularly in the early pages, it is absorbing. But it leaves one wondering whether Dos Passos's present method is not more a handicap than a help to him. This kaleidoscopic shaking of the fragments of several novels into one no longer has the attraction of novelty, and its other advantages are not always clear. Dos Passos's present prose, too, seems to me greatly inferior to the prose of his "Three Soldiers." What he does here is simply to omit commas from their conventional places, link his statements together with the conjunction "and" as a substitute, and run phrases, nouns, and adjectives into single words, such as (all of these are from his first paragraph) "fourfamily," "whaleoil," "cavechested," "blondegrey," "nightwatchman."

The net result of these mannerisms, which have already become stereotyped in the writing of the whole school of "new barbarians," is that the style of one member of the school has become almost indistinguishable from that of another. It is a prose that rapidly tends to become monotonous. It may be said in defense of such undistinguished writing that it is perfectly adapted to record, as it does here, the adventures of undistinguished people. But where the characters are so aimless and unimportant the novel itself may come to seem aimless and unimportant. Dos Passos's men are interested only in women, liquor, and money; nearly all of them pass through the same weary cycles. Even the reds and revolutionists that he presents with sympathy are so much driftwood, without persistence, ambition, emotional or intellectual discipline. The reader sees the tired cynical smile on the face of the narrator, and begins to feel almost as tired himself. "The 42nd Parallel," in brief, shares the capital danger of all futilitarianism in fiction: the fiction is apt to seem as futile as the events it records.

I must, however, bear witness to the fascination of the nineteen "newsreels" scattered through the book. Here the kaleidoscopic method achieves some brilliant effects. Newspaper headlines, fragments of contemporary speeches, snatches of popular songs of each year, are splattered on the page apparently at random but actually with great skill. These newsreels, which begin with the dawn of the present century and end with the year of America's entrance into the World War, not only indicate the cultural background of each period of the story, but supply an amazingly compact history that combines the merits of Thomas Beer and Mark Sullivan. They reveal admirably the mores of each year, and are so arranged that one news item becomes a subtly ironic commentary on the next.

HENRY HAZLITT

A Romancer's Columbus

Columbus, Don Quixote of the Sea. By Jacob Wassermann. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

IN this biographical portrait of Columbus there is nothing new except the implications of the subtitle. The whole book is a glowing but unconvincing defense of the heroic. Columbus is seen as a Schicksalsmensch, the Don Quixote of the ocean, who sought not that which he found and found not that which he sought. Like the Knight of La Mancha, he was self-bewitched, a dark, unconscious idealist, one of God's fanatics. Incidents in Columbus's career that run counter to this romantic conception are simply rejected. Wassermann refuses to believe that Columbus during his first voyage ever wanted to turn back, because the very idea is full of "inner improbability." As for the factor which simpler and more cynically minded persons would denote as the key to Columbus's character, Wassermann has this to say: "His unappeasable thirst for gold is rooted in something far removed from greed. Don Quixote, with his mind full of the treasures of the Emperor of Trebizond, is not greedy; he merely considers these treasures as the tribute due him from the hands of destiny." This may be true of the Don, but it requires a considerable faith to believe it of the man who contracted so shrewdly and so greedily with Ferdinand and Isabella before he set foot on board his ship of discovery.

If it is easy to draw parallels between the two, it is easier still to mark divergences. It is true enough that Columbus, like Quixote, found something far different from what he sought, but in his case this was due to a geographical accident; in Quixote's, to a quirk of character. Columbus had nothing of the peculiar sweetness of Don Quixote, his ability to gain the love even of those who derided him. Don Quixote prevailed because he was a saint; Columbus because he was—among other things—a salesman. Wassermann admits that Columbus was a liar and an exaggerator; but surely he goes too far when he ascribes this to his hero's "visionary power."

The trouble with Wassermann, whose nature is intensely, almost feverishly moral, is that he cannot reconcile charlatanism with greatness. Therefore he has to rationalize or, better, mysticize what to many people would seem the qualities of a brave, daring, but greedy and unscrupulous trickster who played with commendable cleverness upon the religious susceptibilities of his employers and who was interested personally in the main chance. It is also possible that Wassermann has been misled by some obvious parallels in the exterior lives of his heroes; both suffered degradation, imprisonment, the incredulity of their contemporaries, etc. But not all Wassermann's eloquence can make these parallels seem other than accidental. As a work of lyric prose his book is valuable, but as a historical interpretation it is half-baked.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Libertine and Libertarian

That Devil Wilkes. By R. W. Postgate. The Vanguard Press. $4.

JOHN WILKES is an important name in the history of civil and political liberty. It is imperishably linked with the establishment of some of the most fundamental of English constitutional rights. One cannot deny Wilkes the title of great libertarian. But, alas, he was no Plutarchian hero. As a libertine of the eighteenth century, his name is also linked with the orgies of the notorious Medmenham monks and with the celebrated "Essay on Woman" which incidentally helped to establish the English law of obscene libel. As a result, all of Wilkes's former biographers from Fitzgerald to Bleackley have approached him with a good deal of Victorian distaste and condescension. "Notwithstanding these services," observes Fitzgerald, "we find that the idea of a statue to John Wilkes somehow shocks the sensibilities." His honesty and sincerity have been questioned and he has been habitually referred to as the demagogue.

There was thus every need for a new life of Wilkes that should be more palatable to the modern. This Postgate biography is a highly amusing and rollicking account. The manner of its telling is the simple and straightforward one of the raconteur, and on the whole I doubt if the failure to employ Freudian technique upon so obvious a subject is to be deplored. For the first time Wilkes emerges entirely as a hero. He is exculpated upon every charge that has marred his reputation. He is defended against his wife; his diversions are treated as the natural ones of an eighteenth-century gentleman; he is cleared of the authorship of the "Essay on Woman"; and finally his reconciliation with the government of George III is explained as the result of a noble and renunciatory act of duty on his part in helping to quell the Gordon anti-Popery riots in London.

The truth is that Wilkes had risen to power and popularity as a champion of the merchant class which was fighting the feudal privileges of the aristocracy, and as a convenient instrument of the great Whig nobles against the Tories. The Gordon riots made clear to Wilkes, who was an astute politician, that his usefulness had ceased, and with his characteristic cynicism he "retired" into Parliament to support the government. One may quarrel with Mr. Postgate's view of Wilkes as a politician, but it would be ingratitude for a merciful and fascinating biography. The book should be read also as an example of that voluntary bowdlerization which our sex censorship accomplishes. It has taken a great deal of skill in innuendo to tell the story of John Wilkes the libertine.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

The Unthinkable War

America Conquers Britain. A Record of Economic War. By Ludwell Denny. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

MR. DENNY develops on an elaborate scale a thesis similiar in the main to that which Nicholas Roosevelt has lately expounded more summarily in his "America and England?" namely, that America and Britain are economically at war, and that the economic superiority of America, actual and potential, makes the defeat of Britain only a matter of time. Where Mr. Roosevelt, however, treated his subject with special reference to its bearing upon the London naval conference, Mr. Denny keeps before his readers the possibility of an ultimate clash of arms. The "unthinkable war" is to him very thinkable indeed, not because either nation desires it, but because the economic conflict that is being waged is in fact a life-or-death struggle for Great Britain. There is no place in the world, Mr. Denny believes, for two such rivals for world economic dominion, and a "holy war" equipped with all the accustomed slogans of a great moral crusade may easily, all too easily, be launched once the economic struggle becomes sufficiently acute.

The evidence in support of this thesis is by no means entirely new, but Mr. Denny marshals it with startling effectiveness. At virtually every point at which the economic life of Great Britain is examined it is found to be ominously on the decline, and the decline is tending to become a rout under the powerful and often unscrupulous competition of the United States. As far as industrial efficiency goes there is no longer any doubt of American superiority. Britain is overpopulated; it has a vast and well-nigh insoluble problem of unemployment; restrictive immigration laws have closed the United States as an important outlet for a surplus population; and schemes of empire settlement have afforded thus far no effective relief. British labor is agitated and hungry; American labor reasonably contented and well fed. The Prince of Wales as a commercial drummer is an entertaining subject for editorials and after-dinner speeches, but American business, backed by an energetic Department of Commerce, is getting the world trade. Even the financial leadership which London still holds in the foreign loan market appears to Mr. Denny to be seriously threatened, partly because a declining British industry no longer produces a sufficient surplus of capital for export, and partly because financial support of foreign enterprises which in return are expected to buy in British markets results in giving an artificial support to British industries which would not otherwise be profitable.

Mr. Denny is particularly informing in the chapters which trace the world penetration of American capital, with its resultant control of foreign industries and commercial operations. His accounts of the affiliations of the General Electric Company, the International Telephone and Telegraph, and certain great banking and investment houses, of the fight for oil and other raw materials, and of the struggle of Great Britain to retain control of its radio and cable communications are an arresting exposure of the widening grip of American money and the American business mind. Mr. Denny does not write in praise of these things; on the contrary his criticism is often severe, and he shows no special reverence for distinguished names. Anyone who still imagines, for example, that Mr. Hoover is an economist or a statesman should read Mr. Denny's scathing review of the Hoover policy in attacking the British rubber monopoly.

The only prospect, as Mr. Denny sees the future, is for a continuance of what is now going on. Great Britain is "not succeeding," and there is no likelihood that it will succeed. "We were Britain's colony once. She will be our colony before she is done; not in name, but in fact." America will be too wise to try to govern the world; "we shall merely own it." "If Britain is foolish enough to fight us, she will go down more quickly, that is all." But she may fight when the American economic invasion has forced her to the last ditch. Good intentions are of little avail against economic facts, and professions of peace are quickly forgotten when a crisis arrives. Such is the possible future which Mr. Denny sees for two nations which have solemnly renounced war as an instrument of national policy.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Into the Wilderness

The Great Meadow. By Elizabeth Madox Roberts. The Viking Press. $2.50.

FROM Albemarle westward a little cavalcade makes its way slowly. The smaller children ride; if a woman must carry a baby she rides also. Otherwise the horses are loaded with salt and lead, precious grain for journey cakes and for future sowing, an iron pot or two, a pewter tankard and spoon, linen woven in the plantation behind them, wool likewise. The men carry their rifles across their arms; in a rainstorm or while fording a river it is the powder that at all costs must be kept dry. The comforts of the plantation, the houses with board floors, the full larders, the riches of sheep and cattle and swine—all these have been put away from the little band. Around them the trackless forest sheds a dark, mysterious, mottled light. Ahead is their trail, poorly marked, stony going, over mountains and across streams—the road to Kentuck, the promised land, rich with cane fields, alive with Indians, a land for the taking, but one that only strong men can take.

This is the milieu of Miss Roberts's latest novel. She relates the progress of one such pilgrimage, that of Berk and Diony, from Five Oaks to Harrod's Fort in the late seventies of the eighteenth century. The civilization they leave behind them in Virginia is primitive enough, yet it knows comfort and plenty, the delights of Gray and Milton and Shakespeare as well as the solace of a full stomach and a warm back in winter. They ride forward into a land that is in the process of being wrested from the Indians. These Indians scalp women, they burn dwellings made with infinite patience by one pair of hands. Into this grim reality Berk and Diony go as bride and groom, into the protection of the little stockade at Harrod's Fort in Kentucky. There they know birth and death, the sweet joys of love, the pain of separation, the pinch of hunger and

To Understand India, You Must Know Mahatma Gandhi

"For all of us Mahatma Gandhi's Ideas is . . . a valuable book. I am torn between praising Andrews and emphasizing Gandhi; between commending the work of the disciple in presenting us with a book so filled with sympathy and understanding, and describing the actual ideas of the leader himself . . . Anyone eager to know just what is being done in the East to create better living conditions for a depressed and often hopeless people will find eloquent passages in these pages."—Harry Hansen, in the New York World.

MAHATMA GANDHI'S IDEAS

Edited by C. F. Andrews

The Macmillan Company Price $3.00

Consequences

By Julia Ellsworth Ford
Author of IMAGINA

Introduction by JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

"Nothing more compelling has been written in years. There is a message here, but no academic discussion; an expose, but no sensational muck-raking. 'Consequences' should prove popular everywhere, and once it has been read by a few, its fame will spread, for it is a novel that deserves to live.
Ohio State Journal.

Kiang Kang-hu, a distinguished Chinese scholar says: "This is more than a novel—it is life."

E. P. DUTTON & CO. $2.50

A CLEARING HOUSE
FOR THE UNUSUAL

The Nation Reader looks through these columns each week for information on the unusual

If you have the unusual to offer—
write us for our rates

THE NATION 20 Vesey Street

cold. There, too, Diony, who has married again after Berk's long absence has convinced her that he is dead, must make the bitter choice between him and her new husband when he unexpectedly returns.

All this Miss Roberts tells gravely, in rich detail, with insight, with tenderness, with a kind of slow candor that is very comforting in a day of books that tell their tale too swiftly. She never raises her voice; in an incident as heart-moving as that wherein Diony must make her difficult choice between two good men who love her and whom she loves there is no blustering, no hurry, no piling on of adverbs, no loud trumpeting of sobs and shouts of indecision. I am inclined to think, indeed, that a little of this drama would not have come amiss. For if Miss Roberts has a serious fault, it is an evenness of tempo that descends sometimes to monotony. She gives herself so unreservedly to understatement as to lose often the force of her remarks. Diony is evidently not without passion; but only the most careful reading discloses that Miss Roberts is trying, at times, to describe her as passionate. She carves herself a wooden spoon, she bears her child, she sends her husband off on a dreadful journey from which he may easily never return, all with the same even heat. I am told that she is gay, that she is weary, that when she is confronted by an Indian brave who is determined to scalp her she shrieks with terror. But I do not hear her laughter or her shrieks. She is like a lovely, rich figure in a tapestry, without sound, without movement.

For me all this difficulty is due to Miss Roberts's language. Her mise en scène moves me as does no other in literature. I am touched by the log houses, the great fireplaces, the gourds that hold salt or meal, the spinning, the candle-making, the pewter dishes, the linsey gowns. I am touched by the virtues that these men and women had in abundance: fortitude, humor, strength, ingenuity, a generous competence that could make the wilderness give them food and fire and the materials of a living. But I see Miss Roberts's figures through a fog of language. It is, to be sure, rich and lovely language. But it makes them vague, it permits them to move only slowly and thickly. It robs them, I believe, of life that they would otherwise have in great abundance. Nothing can be done about this, probably. Miss Roberts could not write any other way if she would; and there will be plenty of readers who will admire her for just this quality. For me the sound obstructs the sense, the manner obscures the matter. And in spite of it I am moved, I am interested, I am compelled to ride on through the fog because the meadow, I am convinced, lies just over the hill. If Miss Roberts ever does come into her great meadow it will be one of the literary gardens of her time.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

The Nationalist East

A History of Nationalism in the East. By Hans Kohn. Translated from the German by Margaret M. Green. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $7.

MISS GREEN of Foreign Affairs has done the English-reading and English-speaking academic world a welcome service by translating so soon Dr. Kohn's "Geschichte der Nationalen Bewegung im Orient," which made its first appearance in Berlin only last year. It is an up-to-date and inclusive textbook in a field where such textbooks have been noticeably lacking. Hitherto scholars have treated Eastern nationalist movements individually for the most part, leaving travelers and popular writers to enjoy what has been a near-monopoly in the field of synthesis. Dr. Kohn's book is one of the few attempts that have yet been made to treat historically and between the covers of a single book those separate

1890 1920

THE DEVIL'S BOOTH

Percival Wilde

The upper-class nineties,—and Molly May Millen who knew what she wanted,—who carved her way straight into the small cold malicious heart of that brilliant era by no mere feminine accident of charm or beauty,—but by sheer nerve and a desperate genius for respectability. Each succeeding man was merely a rung in the ladder which finally left her the triumphantly moral Mrs. Quinchard of Quinchard. $2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

THE MACHINE AGE and INDEPENDENT THINKING

The journalism of The Manchester Guardian has stood the test of changing times and varying public tastes for more than a century.

Today it is more widely read than ever because it has not let its judgment on affairs be stagnated by outworn slogans nor its views be cramped by the standardized thinking of a machine age.

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

is published especially for overseas readers to give week by week in a concise form the gist of the news, reviews and opinions of The Manchester Guardian Daily.

It is a storehouse of information on international politics, European trends of thought, current English literature, and cultural developments the world over.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings and to keep their viewpoint on vital affairs clear and unprejudiced.

——————MAIL THIS COUPON——————

The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
224 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

Gentlemen:
Enclosed please find $3.00 for which send THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY for one year to the below address.

Name ....

Address ....

nationalist movements which have changed the face of Asia in the last century.

As a resident of Jerusalem, Dr. Kohn's observations on the peculiar status of Palestine are of special interest. He is among those who advocate the principle of equal political rights for Arabs and Jews regardless of changes in the relative numerical strength of the two groups. He is inclined to believe that the world may yet see in Palestine the development of a new conception of the state as an institution in which government will be conducted for the economic benefit of the entire population, while the cultural or so-called nationalist affiliations of the individual citizen will concern the government as little as his religion does at present in any secularized state.

Some of the most interesting of Dr. Kohn's general observations, appearing in the first six chapters of the book, may be best understood after reading Chapters VII to XII inclusive, in which are traced in varying degrees of detail the nationalist movements in Egypt, Turkey, the territories under Class A mandate, the Arabian peninsula, Persia, Afghanistan, Turkestan, and India. In this section the author succeeds to a remarkable extent in divesting himself of the condescension that marks the works of certain other historians who have applied themselves to a discussion of contemporary affairs in the East. His chapter on Egypt, for example, offers a distinct contrast to those comparatively recent histories of Egypt in which the development of the country has been represented as depending almost altogether on the patience and wisdom of an alien occupying Power, while the inhabitants themselves are treated somewhat like supernumeraries in a play, to set off the brilliance of the main actors. The Egypt of Dr. Kohn's work is an Egypt inhabited by Egyptians, not by Englishmen. Realism has replaced a familiar sentimentality in his approach to the subject; he is quite aware of the reasons for which the European press and European diplomats habitually represent the Egyptian struggle for freedom "not as an act of patriotism but as an outburst of fanaticism directed against Europeans, and a revolt of irresponsible soldiers and agitators against all authority and order." His portrayal of the nationalist movement in Egypt is based, therefore, on a study of what Egyptians themselves have been saying and thinking and doing for several decades rather than on the interpretation placed by Europeans on Egyptian activities.

It is not surprising that his conclusions should differ somewhat from those of conventional European accounts. "The spirit in which [Arabi Pasha's] reforms were begun," he writes, "gave ground for hope that without English intervention Egypt would have developed along liberal lines. True, the condition of the country was described otherwise in the English reports; for they were designed to justify intervention. But in reality 1882 was not a year of mutiny and bloodshed and disorder, but of an awakening national consciousness throughout the younger generation of Egyptians." And in a preceding passage he asserts that in fact peace and order did prevail in Egypt during this brief period of national government: "The attempt to reorganize and revolutionize the whole conduct of life was accompanied by far less disorder than has been the case elsewhere." This judgment is characteristic in the sense that the author has not been content to base his conclusions on commonly accepted accounts of contemporary or past events, but has considered with care evidence that has escaped the attention of previous writers. Particularly gratifying is it to find in his account a review of the contributions to the development of nationalism made by various Eastern writers and thinkers concerning whose lives and work little has been written heretofore in English.

In the first six chapters of the book Dr. Kohn has evaluated the religious movements in Asia, and especially in the world of Islam—movements which are the outcome, he believes, of the ferment accompanying a great historic process

Many Readers of The Nation
Entrust Us With Their Travelling Problems of Special Interest

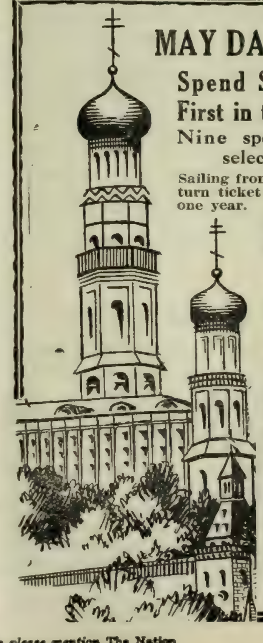
SOVIET RUSSIA
A never forgetful tour begins on April 12th, S.S. Bremen, and April 16th, S.S. Aquitania—Includes transatlantic passage both ways—accommodations in first-class hotels in Russia—three meals daily—railway with sleeper—sight-seeing tours—service of an English-speaking guide—passports, etc.—In time for International May Day. $340 UP

PRIVATE AUTOMOBILE TOURS
Reasonable Rates
Every European Country Covered
It will pay you to inquire.

EUROPEAN PROFESSIONAL TOURS
To cost scarcely more than a few weeks at shore or mountains.
Itinerary 1:
France — Germany — Belgium—Holland—England.
Itinerary 2:
France — Switzerland — Germany — Holland — England.
Itinerary 3:
France — Switzerland — Germany (Passion Play) — Belgium — Holland — England.

For small groups, our service is exceptional. Tours arranged to any part of the world. Steamship tickets at low tariff costs.

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.
175 Fifth Ave., New York City
Telephones Algonquin 6656-8797



MAY DAY IN MOSCOW
Spend Spectacular May First in the Soviet Union!
Nine special excursions on selected steamships.
Sailing from April 5 to 17, with return ticket to New York, good for one year.
All expenses for a full week of memorable sightseeing in LENINGRAD and MOSCOW
Free Soviet Visas $270 UP
Complete Round Trip
Other tours sailing every week throughout Spring and Summer.
SEE OUR NEAREST AGENT OR AMERICAN-RUSSIAN TRAVEL AGENCY, Inc.
100 Fifth Avenue
New York City
Tels.: CHElsea 4477-5124

which is entirely reshaping the intellectual and social life of the East. He has then proceeded to analyze the effects of Great Britain's influence upon the Orient and the far-reaching ramifications of the Russian Revolution. As a corollary of European aggression he finds that "it is precisely in nationalism that the consciousness of Eastern unity originates. For the present it is a sentiment of defensive solidarity in face of a united white race. But it may be the first step toward a world consciousness which for the first time in history will embrace mankind as a whole." ELIZABETH P. MACCALLUM

Illumination

Firehead. By Lola Ridge. Payson and Clarke. $2.50.
The Black Christ and Other Poems. By Countee Cullen. Harper and Brothers. $2.

